She reached it in time to dress her mistress for dinner. Lady Tarleton, to lend some colour to her hasty flight northwards, had telegraphed for her country lawyer, and he had hastened over from Carlisle to join in an unnecessary discussion of leases and to dine solemnly with his client and the vicar of the parish.

"We go back to town by the first good train to-morrow," said Lady Tarleton to her maid, as the latter prepared her for bed some hours later.

"Yes, my lady," answered Hannah Davenal. Her mistress touched her arm arrestingly.

"You have considered my offer?" she added, in a low tone.

"I am doing so, my lady," was the reply.

"Five thousand pounds," murmured Lady Tarleton, "for the name and whereabouts of the child."

"I will think of it, my lady," said the maid, slipping on her mistress' sleeping-socks of silk and wool.

"Take your time, of course," remarked Lady Tarleton, coldly.

Her attendant assisted her into bed—a large and canopied four-poster—and she lay down with a sigh.

"You are certainly distressingly clever, Davenal," she said; "but—but don't try to be too clever."

"No, my lady," responded Hannah Davenal imperturbably, and went away.

From her pillow Lady Davenal watched the blazing fire in the wide grate of the apartment. At last her eyes closed and the wrinkles in her lined brow relaxed. The wind got up and howled about the old mansion, the fire died into gloom and then into blackness. The wind fell again, and all was still in and about Groudle Tower, save for the deep-toned strokes of the distant and musical chime that, from the spire of Groudle Church, marked the flight of the hours.

The chill grey March morning began to dawn, a kitchen-maid or two stirred in the recesses of the great house and crept downstairs to their work. The day had begun.

Then, suddenly, at Lady Tarleton's door arose a loud, persistent knocking. There was a rustle of cambric and laces, and she started up.

"What is it?" she said. "Who is there?"

A man's voice answered. "It's me—it's me, my lady," she was told. "The butler, my lady. Can your ladyship see me a moment? Something—something dreadful has happened."

His mistress lit a candle, caught up a dressing-gown, flung it on, and opened the door. Outside, in the dim, wan light of the March morning, stood a manservant, slippered and collarless, and white with a strange excitement.

"It's—it's Davenal, my lady," he said; "your ladyship's maid, my lady. One of the under-maids looked in to call her and—and found her—found her dead, my lady. With a pillow over her face, my lady, and a queer scent in the room like a drug; I should say chloroform, my lady."

(Another long instalment next week.)

Your Editor Chats.

On various pages in this issue you will find all the new features promised for this week. First and foremost in point of interest is the long instalment of Mr. R. Norman Silver's new serial story, "Held Apart," which starts on the front page. As I have told you previously, this is one of the finest romances ever written, and I consider myself peculiarly fortunate in having been able to secure it for Short Stories. After you have read this first instalment, I shall be glad to have your opinions as to the merits of the story.

A facsimile of Mr. Silver's handwriting appears on page 297, where the author describes some of the odd sensations which have come over him while writing the story, and how some of the characters struck him. As you will see, the writing is extraordinarily microscopic in character, and consequently not easy to read. A pencil-case will be given to each of the ten readers who send in, on the back of a postcard, a fair copy of what the author has written. Pencil-cases will be awarded to the senders of the first ten correct postcards dealt with. Postcards must be addressed to "The Silver Editor," Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., and should arrive not later than first post on Tuesday, March 10th.

The first article of the series, Confessions of a Self-Made Girl, begins on page 304. These confessions record the way in which Maud Cardew, a girl brought up in a very out-of-the-way part of Cornwall, but who was fired with the ambition to make for herself a name and fortune, succeeded in the task she had set herself. That it was not all plain and easy sailing will readily appear on perusal of the articles, which should serve as a lesson to young girls who get the idea into their heads that country life is too slow for them, not giving any scope for their aspirations and ambitions. Such girls often imagine that they have only to come to London to find a fortune ready to be picked up on the very pavements. For one success there are unfortunately scores of failures, and girls must remember that they cannot all be Maud Cardews.

The Love Problem dealt with this week is, "Should a Girl Inform her Lover of a Previous Engagement?" On this question, there must, of necessity, be two opinions, but I think you will agree with me that the one advanced in the story will need a very strong argument to be brought forward by people who hold different views, before it can be condemned as fallacious.

Since last week I have received a large number of letters on the subject of Lady Peggy Carstairs' tirade against middle-class people. The majority are unanimous in condemning Lady Peggy, and do not at all approve of the sentiments she expressed. I have written to her on the subject, and hope to be able to publish her reply next week.

Your Editor.

The announcement regarding the new competition is unavoidably held over.

Digitized by Google

A Good Purchase.

The Romance of a Dictionary.

"Ruth," asked Mrs. Culberson of her daughter, "what was the package that came home for you to-day?"

"A dictionary," Ruth replied.

Mrs. Culberson's dismay could not have been more complete had she been informed that her daughter had brought home a boa-constrictor.

"And what did you get that for, Ruthie?" she asked.

"Because I wanted it," returned Ruth.

"It must have been pretty expensive," hazarded her mother.

"Yes," sighed Ruth. "It cost tenpence halfpenny."

Mrs. Culberson appeared relieved, but not entirely satisfied.

"It seems to me, Ruthie," she went on querulously, "that a girl who works for two pounds a week, which is the only income two people have to depend upon, ought not to be spending her money on a dictionary. If you had tenpence halfpenny to spare for books, why didn't you buy three or four of those paper-backed novels that would be of some interest to me, instead of a dictionary?"

The Culbersons lived in a boarding-house where dictionaries were a rare commodity. Indeed, Ruth's was the only one about the house except Mr. Winter's, which was an exceedingly small pocket edition that contained only the words in most common use.

But somehow, as soon as it became known that there was a large dictionary in Mrs. Culberson's room on the second floor, and that everybody had been given free access thereto, the desire for knowledge was given a wonderful impetus.

But the person who found occasion to refer to the big book most frequently was Mr. Winter. Mr. Winter was a grocer. Of course in his business he daily met with many terms that required elucidation. Hitherto he had found the pocket dictionary perfectly satisfactory, but after the advent of the unabridged dictionary the much-worn, green-backed little book suddenly lost its usefulness, and never an evening passed that Mr. Winter did not rap at Mrs. Culberson's door and politely request to "come in and look at the dictionary a minute."

His prolonged visits annoyed Mrs. Culberson at first. His presence prevented her scolding Ruth, and as he himself seemed deeply immersed in scholastic lore, thus forbidding opening a conversation with him, the poor old lady's evenings became seasons of exquisite torment.

"I don't know what makes him come up here so often," she said pettishly one night after he had closed the dictionary and gone away. "He's an awful bore."

"It's your own fault he comes," said Ruth. "You invited him."

"Of course I invited him," retorted Mrs. Culberson. "I invited all of them. Doesn't he annoy you?"

"No," she said softly. "I don't know that he does."

As the spring days took on the heat of summer Mrs. Culberson became more fretful, Ruth grew younger and prettier, and Mr. Winter studied still later each evening, in blissful oblivion of the added heat of the gas jet.

Mrs. Culberson had long since ceased sitting up waiting for him to go, but bade him good night, and went to bed in the next room.

One evening in early June ten o'clock passed, and Mr. Winter had as yet made no movement towards going away. Ruth watched him closely, as she always did when he seemed engrossed with the words before him, and she noticed that he had not turned a page for more than an hour.

He looked up at length, and their eyes met. Ruth felt her face flushing again, and with the realisation of her weakness the flush grew deeper.

"It's a pretty knotty problem that I have been puzzling over to-night," he said with a sigh.

"Couldn't you find what you were looking for?" she asked softly.

"I hardly know. I found the word I wanted. Whether it will ever mean to me what I would like it to mean I do not know. Here it is. I have been looking at it a good deal lately."

He turned the big dictionary round till she could read the line over which his finger rested. There was one word underlined with a pencil, and she knew it was the one he wished her to see. It was spelt l-o-v-e.

"Is that ever to be for me?" he asked.

The blush had deepened into scarlet then. For a moment a look of exceeding happiness transfigured her face, but a moment later the old troubled expression drove it away. She turned the leaves of the dictionary till she came to the word "mother."

"That's all right," he said, and nodded towards the door.

Away near the end of the book her next answer was found.

"Ruth," called out Mrs. Culberson, a quarter of an hour later, "what made Mr. Winter stay so late this evening?"

"He was looking at the dictionary, mother."

"Did he find what he wanted?" asked Mrs. Culberson.

"Yes, mother," said Ruth, "I believe he did."

Clarissa Harding.

Gramophones for Twenty-five Readers.

It is quite the exception to find people who don't like music; there are many who are fond of it, but yet either cannot make it themselves or if they can are not able to afford to buy a piano or other musical instrument. To such, a Gramophone would be an inestimable boon. The only thing you have to do to get the sound is to put in the record of the song or piece you want to hear and then set the machine in motion.

Each Gramophone we are giving away is accompanied by two records, and is fitted with a Concert Sound-Box, which greatly increases the volume of sound.

You can win a Gramophone by making a four-lined verse on the subject of cats, the lines to begin with the letters C A T S in the order given.

For example:

Can you find a greater nuisance,
And one that causes men to swear,
Than the beasts that spoil the evenings
Singing in the moonlight air?

A Gramophone will be given to each of the twenty-five readers who submit the best verses.

Post-cards only must be used and they should be addressed to THE CATS' EDITOR, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., and posted so as to arrive not later than first post on Tuesday, March 10th.

Digitized by Google

HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA.

By Lady Peggy Carstairs.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

LADY PEGGY CARSTAIRS. A widow, who, having lost all her money in a bank failure, undertakes to chaperon Belinda.

BELINDA NORTH. The beautiful daughter of Hardy North, an Australian millionaire.

DUKE OF EASTACRES. A comparatively penniless suitor for Belinda's hand.

DAVID CARR. A young engineer, with whom Belinda is in love.

LADY HONORIA. Sister of the Duke of Eastacres.

STANLEY FORBES. A famous barrister.

ALPHONSE HERVÉ. An eminent French artist in love with Belinda.

PRINCESS VERA ZOULOFF. A celebrated Russian beauty.

BARON ROLLA. An extremely wealthy Parisian, in love with Belinda.

PAUL DE SONNAZ. A young French nobleman, and friend of Lady Peggy.

Honoria Becomes a Most Efficient Ally.

THE words ran like an electric shock through every individual in that gay and laughing crowd. The women of Florence, with the quick emotionalism of your true Italian, turned pale beneath the warm olive of their skin, and uttered shuddering little cries. The English, more reticent, kept a steady face. The Americans, more sceptical, crowded round Claverton with eager questions.

He waived them all aside and went to Vera.

"Did the insect sting you, Princess?" he asked; "think well before you answer. Did it sting you?"

For a second the Princess hesitated. Then, with a little laugh, in mockery, it seemed, of the frightened, upturned faces of her guests, she put her hand to her throat.

"Yes," she said, touching the little spot that marred the whiteness of the skin. "It stung me there. Well," as Claverton fell back with a gesture of despair; "am I doomed?" She laughed again and linked her arm in Hervé's.

"I don't believe you, wise man," she said. "You have spent so long in the twilight of your books, that your eyes are dazed when you come into the light of life. I am too full of health, of joy"—she pressed closer to the artist's side; "to be doomed to death because an insect stung me! To your study, Mr. Claverton, we want no death's head here."

"No," as Alphonse, reading the look on Claverton's face, strove to induce her to leave the ballroom; "I tell you I will not go. I do not believe his croaking; but even if there is truth in it—which I deny—I shall be no better for acting the coward. If, as he says, I have only three days more to live, I will live them to the uttermost. Come, let us dance."

With an imperious gesture she motioned to the musicians and presently the strains of a dreamy valse, with a wistful, sad refrain, echoed through the palace.

The guests, urged by the appeal in the Princess' voice, did their best to seem gay. But it was an impossible task. One after the other the couples stopped, one after the other the women hurried to say farewell.

The words of Claverton in our ears, how could we dance? The proud, beautiful woman, with her reckless defiance, her superb audacity, filled one with a sense almost of terror. One seemed to see the shadow of death in those dark eyes and in the waxen pallor of her skin.

"A horrible fate," murmured Claverton, "yes, but who shall say it is not just? A hundred acts of wanton cruelty have not brought her pain, or punishment, have not given her pause for sorrow or for pity. It is just she should suffer and die The cruelties of your woman of fashion transcend the tortures of Caligula. To gratify your vanity you wear the plumes torn from the breast of a living bird, stained with its blood. You cause the seal to die a lingering death so that its coat shall keep the colour you desire; about your persons you string living things, heedless, careless of the agony they endure.

"For fashion's sake you women slay and torture hundreds, nay, thousands, of living creatures every year; it is just that one of you should suffer for your sins."

Leaving me horrified at his brutality, Claverton turned away. As he went from the palace he gave the servants his address.

"I shall be wanted," he said grimly. "Send when the Princess asks for me, but not before."

The ballroom was quickly cleared. The people hastened from the place until of all the guests who had danced and laughed, how short a time ago, there were left but those who were staying at the Palace.

Belinda, with the desire for action that characterised her, frightened at Claverton's warning, and distressed for Vera, urged David to fetch a doctor.

"He'll make her take something, in case the bite is really poisonous," she said.

Had the girl been in her usual health and spirits she would undoubtedly have summoned a medical man on her own responsibility. As it was, her appeal to David had not much result.

"We had better get advice, I think?" she said to Hervé.

Vera caught the words and frowned upon the speaker.

"Nonsense," she said sharply. "I won't hear of it. I'll not to be frightened by the croaking of an old woman like Claverton. I——" She paused and involuntarily raised her hand to her throat.

A spasm of pain contracted her face. A dull red flush stained the whiteness of her skin, her lips twitched, her whole frame seemed convulsed. With a startled sort of cry she threw up her arms.

"Alphonse! Alphonse!"—the look of torture deepened in her eyes, and her lips grow purple. The scarlet and the gold of her rich dress mocked the grey terror in her face. She could not breathe and she beat the air with her hands.

Her lover, clasping her tightly in his arms, strove to calm her. With a supreme effort of will she rallied.

Digitized by Google

"I am not ill, I do not suffer," she said, in a loud, harsh voice; "but, but—send for Claverton!" she gasped.

David hastened to obey her. Alphonse, summoning her women, assisted to take the Princess to her room.

Claverton was at the Palace within a quarter of an hour. He had brought with him an English and an Italian doctor. They both declared themselves nonplussed by the Princess' condition, and, half suspicious, turned to Francis for his explanation.

"The Princess was wearing an insect of a rare species," he said gravely; "found as a rule only in tropical countries. I gather from her maid that the creature, with one or two others, was sold to her by a beetle-catcher some few days ago.

"The insect, from whose sting the Princess is now suffering, lives upon poisonous substances. In other words it feeds upon decayed organic matter. Its exquisite tints are due in great part to its food; its beauty is the result of the corruption it absorbs. That corruption is conveyed in its sting; the Princess is doomed as surely as if she had a knife plunged in her heart."

Some consultation followed between the doctors and the great explorer. Specialists of European repute were sent for, and the members of the Princess' family were summoned.

Amongst the latter was Vera's mother, a fair-haired, little Parisian, with a doll-like face and a petulant, pretty mouth. It was absurd to think that the stately Vera was her daughter.

She arrived on the evening of the day following the ball. Vera refused to see her; despite her awful suffering the Princess' will was as strong as ever. Only the sister of mercy—in Italy the nurses all belong to a religious institution—did she permit to be with her, and at times Belinda.

The little Frenchwoman—Vera's mother—bewailed her daughter's lack of feeling, and determined to insist on entering the bedroom. She begged me to accompany her and I yielded to her persuasion; I wished afterwards I had not done so.

Vera heard the whispered altercation at the door, and, with a flash of her old spirit, called contemptuously that we might enter.

Her face was thin, but as yet the poison working in her veins had left its loveliness untouched.

"Call Belinda," she said peremptorily to the nurse; "and the young Englishman also, and M. Hervé."

In obedience to her word they came, treading softly, silently, as though already in the presence of death.

Vera raised herself, and, with an eloquent gesture, pointed to the sunlit street beneath her window, gay with the bright dresses of the populace, echoing to the sound of music, of voice and of violin.

"It's a fair world, a bright world," she said. "I did not always think so, but now," she smiled at Hervé, "now that I am leaving, I find out all its sweetness. To-morrow I shall not be here. Don't," she cried harshly, as her mother commenced to weep in a fretful, childish way. "It makes me sick to hear you.

"What have you ever cared for me, that it should grieve you to lose me? Your self and your aggrandisement you studied, not your child.

"Look," she laughed in her old mocking fashion, "look how my mother weeps, how daintily she cries for fear her tears should discompose her rouge! I tell you," she grasped the little woman's wrist—"I tell you it is you and mothers like you who make women such as I.

"As a baby you turned from me, giving me to the care of hired women. As a child you took no heed of me. As a girl you sold me—sold me to the highest bidder—a man steeped to the very lips in sin, who had not one redeeming quality of mind or soul. How much did he pay you, mother?" she gripped the woman tighter. "What did you get besides the glory of the marriage?"

"I did well for you, Vera," cried Madame D'Astrea, much distressed. "Your father left me all but portionless, with nothing in fact but that bleak place in Poland. Had not Zouloff taken a fancy to you, your life must have been passed on the estate, with nothing but peasants and poverty for your companions. I could not have had you with me in Paris—the expense would have been too great."

Vera laughed once more, mirthless and jarring; it disturbed my nerves to a horrible extent.

"As I say, mother, you sold me. And I—I—have had to pay the price. My youth, my innocence, my girlhood were placed at the disposition of the man who bought me. Too late I found out all that marriage with a man like Zouloff meant.

"Too late I learnt all that love might have meant for me. And you, you I say"—she struck at her mother wildly—"you have done this. Take her away," she cried. "I could kill her."

Weeping and wailing the little Frenchwoman departed. Vera, her face tense with pain and agitation, motioned Belinda to her side.

"Take care," she said, "that you aren't sold as I was. You love him," she motioned to David. "Why do you wait—why do you give this woman"—she pointed to me—"time and opportunity to sell you? Oh, don't tell me of promises, of duty to your father, respect to her," she laughed rudely in my face. "I tell you that the greatest, the most wonderful thing in the world, is Love.

"I have known riches and luxury; I have had adulation and flattery all my life, and now that I am dying I regret none of them—only love. Love that I put aside and turned away, because like you"—she touched Belinda—"I thought of promises and what my mother and the world would say.

"I stayed with my husband and his riches when I should have left them both. You hear me?" She glanced from David to Belinda.

"Put aside all foolish talk of honour and of truth to those who don't know what truth means." Once more she jeered at me. "You have a clever and a dangerous woman against you, and a crafty and unscrupulous man. Marry her, David, marry her, I say, in defiance of everyone."

She gave her hand to the young man as she spoke and with infinite gentleness he bowed his head and raised the hand to his lips. Belinda, more emotional, kissed her, weeping bitterly.

The Princess held her tightly.

"I might have done you harm," she said. "I'm glad I didn't." Then with a gesture of dismissal she turned from them to Alphonse.

As I reached the door of her room I glanced back; Alphonse was kneeling by the Princess' side, his arms about her, his face close to her own. Her hands were clasped round his neck, her head rested on his shoulder. She kissed him many times, then from her lips there broke a passionate cry—a cry that wrung the souls of those that heard it.

"I love you so! I love you so!" she said. "Alphonse, I cannot die!"

And then the door shut behind me, and with a grey mist before my eyes and a pain at my heart, I passed from the room.

That night, when Florence was hushed in silence, and the breeze from the hills was blowing fresh and sweet over her palaces and hovels, when the moon's quiet light fell on the marbles of the Santa Trinita, on the bronzed and wrinkled face of a peasant woman sleeping in the open, shining alike on the beauty, the misery, the joy, and the wretchedness of the fair city that night, Vera, Princess Zouloff died.

Some of you that read this, like Francis Claverton, may say she had but her deserts, and that her vanity and cruelty met with its just return. Others may blame, as she did herself, the little Frenchwoman, her mother, who had married her to Michael Zouloff.

For myself, I blame Vera. She had made a brilliant match with a title and a following second only to Royalty. If she was bad-tempered and ungrateful enough to quarrel with the good the gods had sent her, so much the worse for her.

As for the cruelty of wearing live things and all the evil that Francis declared came from the practice, I consider it ridiculous nonsense. Vera should have found out whether the creature was harmful or not before she wore it. The beetle-catcher who sold her the insect ought, in my opinion, to have been imprisoned, and so I told Claverton.

Digitized by Google

In conformity with the wishes of the Zouloff family, Vera was buried in Russia, on the steppes of the Ural Mountains, where lie the eternal snows. The cortège started two days after her death. Alphonse was to accompany Madame D'Astrea, who, now that her daughter was dead, looked quite kindly on him.

The evening before the melancholy procession set forth, I surprised Honoria in a whispered colloquy with David. In the terrible state of confusion, worry and trouble that the last few days had brought about, I had overlooked Honoria. I realised that it was time to bring her to book.

"What were you saying to David?" I asked firmly. "Don't prevaricate, Honoria, and for goodness' sake keep still." She was twisting her fingers in a fashion painful to witness.

"Nothing much, at least—— Oh, Lady Peggy," the poor fool looked piteous, "must I tell you?"

"If not, you go back to Mark," I answered. "Tell me at once, Honoria, or I send within an hour for your husband. You know what he will say—and do."

"I know, I know," she wailed. "But Belinda, how can I do anything to hurt her? Let me ask her permission, Lady Peggy. When I explain to her that I must either do as you wish or go back to Mark, she will let me tell you. I know she will. Let me go to her. I——"

I cut short her maunderings and with no gentle hand pushed her from the door.

"Once and for all, Honoria," I cried, shaking her in my anger, "will you obey me or go back to Mark? Yes or no—once and for all."

She wrung her hands and the tears streamed from her eyes, but at last in a voice choked with sobs she gave the answer I required.

"Yes, Lady Peggy," she cried, "I'll do as you say. Oh! I wish—I wish that I were dead."

"Quite so," I resumed, "and now what did David say to you?"

"Belinda sent me to tell him that she would meet him to-morrow morning early—quite early—before six o'clock, by the little church on the hill-side—just beyond Florence."

"And what did David answer?"

"He said he would be there. Oh, Lady Peggy, won't you let Belinda come?"

I smiled at the idiocy of the remark.

"Of course I shall," I answered. "Don't you understand, Honoria, that I'm very fond of Belinda, and that I wouldn't for the world do anything to thwart or hurt her? At the same time even you must see that it is not suitable for a young girl to do just as she likes without consulting her elders. In this instance, however, I shall not interfere. David Carr is quite a nice person, I have no objection whatever to his meeting Belinda at the hour named."

She gazed at me with a relieved expression in her cow-like eyes, though why I should insult a well-behaved, domestic cow by a comparison with Honoria, I do not know. At all events her suspicions were lulled; there was no chance of her telling Belinda of our interview, fear of Mark would keep her silent as to that and other things.

Next morning I left the palace early, just as the dawn was breaking over the distant hills. There were as yet but few astir, a contadina on her way to market gave me a cheery greeting as I passed, some beggar children, picturesque in their rags and brown-skinned beauty, surrounded me for coin. Other than these none noticed me. I reached the chapel on the hill a little after five and sank down, tired with my walk, upon the soft green turf.

I had not long to wait; David first and Belinda shortly after ascended the path and turned into the grove of lemon trees in whose shade I was waiting.

Belinda, in a gown of pale grey cloth, with her serious face and steadfast eyes, looked like a sister from a convent. Her hands were full of narcissi and sweet-smelling meadow flowers that she had plucked on the way.

Her posies dropped unheeded on the ground a moment later, for with the eager impetuosity of youth David had taken her hands in his and drawn her close, until her face, hidden upon the rough tweed of his coat, flamed crimson to the tip of her small ear.

"Let me look at you, my darling," cried the engineer, "at your beautiful blue eyes, the colour of the eternal sky. Let me kiss your hands dearest, the whitest in the world. Your mouth is the rose of the world to me, my darling. There's not another so sweet, so fresh."

He took her in his arms, and she, glowing with love, upturned her face ripe for his kisses. And there on the hill-side, with the trees above them and the green turf at their feet, there in the early dawning, they two pledged their love afresh.

As I watched them, a cold wave of doubt, touched perhaps with regret, swept over me.

I recalled suddenly, and without volition, a morning such as this, when, as a young girl, I had waited in a wood. It sloped down to the seashore, you could sit in the shade of the pines and listen to the lapping of the waves at your feet.

My hands were full of woodland treasures, wild hyacinth, primrose, and golden ivy, and then as my eyes turned from the sunlit sea to the shadow of the trees someone had come to me. His name? What does it matter. He was the younger son of a younger son. To marry him would have been madness.

My mother only did her duty when she sent him away, a course of action in which, young as I was, I fully acquiesced, and yet for all my wisdom, all that the years had taught, the sight of those young lovers standing beneath the shadow of the trees, the glad sky overhead, the green turf at their feet, gave me a grey, dull feeling of regret.

But in my heart I knew I did not regret the life that I had chosen, and the grey feeling was but momentary.

I stepped softly to where the two were standing. They were talking, or rather David was speaking while Belinda listened.

"I'm bound to finish the contract," said David; "but if I've any luck it will be through by January. The twelve-month of probation will be over then, Belinda."

"Yes," she answered softly. "I can marry you then."

"Why wait till then?" he urged. "Why not take poor Vera's advice and marry me now? I asked you once before in Cairo, and you would not listen. You would have done better had you consented, Belinda. Don't refuse me again.

"Listen, I am prepared to make a compromise. Stay with Lady Carstairs, if you wish, till January, but in the meantime to guard against any possible chance of our separation, marry me—secretly. I will not claim you, dearest, until you send for me.

"Consider how great a risk we have run these last nine months. A little more, and Lady Carstairs' plot would have succeeded. I should have thought you vain and fickle, you would have regarded me as faithless. Ah, my love, don't delay, who knows what ill-chance may come between us. What can I do in Russia to guard you here in Italy? Belinda, for our love's sake, don't refuse me!"

She sighed, and nestled closer to his heart.

"I must," she said. "At all costs I will keep my word. Don't think it is easy for me to refuse you. I never wanted you so much as now, David. Of late I am changed. I feel dispirited, dull, I am always tired, and my nerves seem numb.

"Sometimes I am too tired to do battle, and give in to Lady Peggy for the sake of peace and quiet. I am a little, just a little, afraid of Lady Peggy lately, David. I wish, oh, how I wish I could say 'Good-bye' to this life and live quietly and happily with you."

"You own you fear the woman, and yet you won't give me the right to protect you against her?"

Belinda shook her head. "Let me keep my word if I can," she said, "and stay with her for a year. I've written to father and told him I'm not well, and begged him to come to me at Christmas. He writes to say that he won't come until the New Year, when my probation ends. He hopes I shall then be ready to marry such a man as he desires for my husband.

Digitized by Google

"He mentioned Farringdon," she added. "Poor Farringdon, he's a nice boy. No, David, it's no use," as he once more urged his point. "I won't marry you till January—then I shall be free."

"But something may happen, dearest. You may be in trouble or distress."

"Then I will send for you," she answered softly. "I promise you that."

"I mistrust letters, Belinda. Remember Lady Peggy overlooks your correspondence." He pondered for a little, then turned to her with a sudden thought. "See, darling," he said, "there is a medal, a little thing of bronze that a sailor gave me at Sebastopol. If you want me, Belinda, and can't write or wire send me this. I'll come to you at once, no matter where you are."

She took the token, and seemed comforted at its possession.

"If I don't get the medal before, I shall come to you in January at Rome."

She nodded, and lifted her face like a child for his kiss. A few minutes later they separated.

Next day David set out for Russia in company with Alphonse and Mme. D'Astrea—and the dead Princess.

Belinda and I left that same evening en route for Monte Carlo. We stopped for the night at a village not many miles distant from Florence. We put up at the inn, a large and old-fashioned hostelry that dates back to the Middle Ages.

Belinda went straight to bed, and fell into a deep sleep. I had administered the usual dose of opium, and feeling sure she would not easily awake, directed my attention to the discovery of David's token. As I might have guessed, the foolish, sentimental idiot had hung it round her neck suspended by a ribbon. She had drilled a hole in the bronze, and thus enabled me to take it with the greatest ease.

It was a quaint trifle, with the head of some particular Russian saint on one side and the date on the other. I left the ends of the ribbon loose, so that the girl might easily suppose that she had lost it.

Then quite satisfied with my night's work I retired to rest. I had stopped up all secret avenues of communication between David and Belinda. I had command of the girl's correspondence, and Honoria, on pain of Mark's displeasure, would not dare to write or wire to him without my knowledge. Moreover I had proof that she would on occasion play the spy on Belinda herself.

I placed the coin with other valuables in my jewel-case, which I locked up in my dressing bag, putting the keys under my pillow. I decided to drop it in a convenient river the next day to prevent its turning up again, but judged it quite safe for the present.

I fell into a peaceful and refreshing sleep, which I suppose must have lasted quite an hour. Something, I can't say what, awoke me with a sudden start. Involuntarily I put my hand beneath the pillow, feeling for my keys. They were there just as I had put them.

Unaccountably disturbed, I slipped on a dressing-gown and hurried into the room which Belinda and Honoria shared. They were both asleep. Belinda, fair and peaceful, her face white in the moonshine; Honoria, her plain face plainer than ever in the silver beams, with its usual expression of dense stupidity, in a deep, heavy slumber.

I went back to my room annoyed at my own fears. The events of the past few days hurried through my mind; I was moved by one of those strange impulses that influence at times to look again at the bronze medal I had taken from Belinda.

I took out my keys, unlocked the dressing-bag, lifted out the jewel case, turned the key in the somewhat intricate lock, ran over my jewels with a smile at my folly, felt for the tissue paper packet that contained the medal.

The paper was there, as I had left it—but the medal was gone!

(Another exciting instalment will appear next Tuesday.)

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

The Story of a Proposal.

"It's dreadful to be poor," said I, leaning forward.

"Terrible," she assented, with great cheerfulness.

"Are you engaged to —— for the next dance? H'm!"

"N—no. I don't think so."

"May I have it?"

"I don't—oh, yes, if you wish."

"Ah, you don't know what it means to me. I've been looking forward to this for weeks."

"I thought you didn't care much for dancing."

"This isn't exactly dancing, is it?"

We both smiled faintly, and a silence followed.

"Your sister May is to be married in the summer?" I said, merely for the sake of saying something.

"Yes; isn't it jolly?"

"Henderson's a lucky beggar. He seems to get everything he desires—a sweet girl and a fortune to help to make her happy."

"But I think the nicest part of it all is that Jack Henderson was quite poor when he fell in love with May and got engaged to her."

"It was very brave of May."

"It was only natural and—right. And, of course, father and mother believed in Jack."

The last remark somehow chilled me. "It's a fortune in itself, being able to inspire people with confidence in one's abilities. I can't do it," I said, a trifle bitterly.

I felt that she was looking at me, but I did not dare to raise my eyes.

"Perhaps you haven't tried. If you haven't confidence in yourself, you can't inspire it in other people, can you?" she said, softly.

"Oh, I'm not quite so limp as all that. I don't despair of ultimate success, but I fear it will come too late."

"Don't—don't ever be afraid of that."

"Why?" I demanded.

"Oh, because—because——" She stopped, and a flush rose on her cheek.

"Suppose," said I, "that a man has a great desire, and no immediate means of attaining it?"

"Then the man must have patience."

"Yes; and when with patience the means of attaining the desire are won, he finds someone else has taken his desire away, and——"

"And he is justly punished."

"Indeed! For what, pray?"

"For letting his desire be taken away."

"But, good heavens! You talk as if a wo—a desire could be purchased on credit."

"Father says the world would stop if there were no credit," she observed, gravely.

"Not to poor men does that apply."

"I thought credit was meant for people who had money in their heads and hands, though none in their pockets."

"Do you know what you are saying?" I asked, breathlessly.

"I'm awfully silly, am I not?" she returned with a laugh that changed to a sigh. "Isn't it time we were going?"

"Do you know what you were saying?" I whispered.

"What was it?" she said, reflectively. "Oh, don't—don't look at me like that!"

"But answer me."

"Oh, please let me go."

"Not till you answer—oh, my dear."

"Jim!"

"Answer my question, and take your freedom."

There was a long silence, then, "Answer!" I said again.

"Never," she whispered with a little sob.

And so I kissed her.

Charles Jeurdain.

Digitized by Google

GREAT NEW SERIES. FIRST INSTALMENT.

Confessions of a Self-made Girl

The writer of these Confessions relates in this series of articles the true story of her life, from the time when she left Cornwall, an unsophisticated but ambitious girl, until she made her name and fortune. Her name is well known to you.

My Heart's Desire.

EVERYBODY knows what a self-made man is—well, I am the same thing in the feminine gender. The definition occurred to me this afternoon, when I was sipping tea in my boudoir, and rather took my fancy. I was just wondering casually if any little portion of the world would be interested to hear how a woman climbs? Gradually the idea took possession of me, and having an hour to spare, I hunted up an old box in which I knew I had locked away the diaries I used to keep as a girl.

I soon found them and became quickly absorbed in them; and this persuades me the more that my later years must have an interest for some, seeing they are full of incident, whereas in the earlier ones all was monotony. So I take up my pen hopefully, to make my confessions.

First about those diaries—such funny old books they are—I can scarcely believe I, myself, am really the individual who wrote them.

I was a simple, country girl, in those days, living in an unsophisticated little village, where missionary meetings were great events, and our clergyman the important man of the world. The missionary meetings were occasionally varied with grand amateur concerts (I remember) in the school-room, when local talent aired itself much to its own delectation, if no one else's.

Wonderful concerts were they! I once recollect the village school-mistress having hiccoughs so badly in the middle of "Good-bye, Sweetheart," that she was obliged to leave off; and the village carpenter, swelling to such an extent with pride over his own unique performance, that a button shot off his waistcoat into the middle of the room.

No one was ever in tune, except by accident, but we didn't mind that, and no doubt in any case the piano was most at fault.

But these are such old memories, I don't know why I rake them up now, unless because it is New Year's Eve, and a time conducive to retrospect. I see I always wrote on New Year's Eve without fail, so this is a most suitable evening upon which to take up my pen again.

In the last entry of all there is a strain of intense longing after some life, and some aim altogether new.

I wonder if I knew what I wanted at the time? If I had any definite aim? Or if I only had a vague idea that the height of bliss was to wear beautiful clothes, have countless admirers, and drive in carriages.

Judging by my diaries, I was a clever young person on the whole, so maybe it is not very surprising that I won my ambition.

"Won it?" you ask, and I see you look up with interest, for those who succeed are always so much more interesting than those who fail. I don't think it should be so.

To me, looking back from my vantage ground of success, there is something sublime in failure. I don't know how to describe it, but on this New Year's Eve I feel I would like to write a letter to everyone who had aimed at something big and failed, and tell them failure is a grander thing than success. I suppose they would all sneer at me, and doubtless in their place I should do the same. It is so easy for those who have won to talk.

Eight years ago to-night I sat in a little, low, cottage room, lighted my precious bit of stolen candle, and wrote in a round, girlish hand, that "I could not bear the village life much longer, for the monotony and littleness of it were eating into my soul, which panted ever for great things."

I smile as I read that sentence. I must have been a very high-flown, sentimental young woman in those days.

Well, I didn't have to bear it much longer, for the very next week the beginning of the new order commenced, and this evening I sit down in the midst of wealth and luxury to take up the broken thread.

There are rings on my fingers such as I had not dreamt of then, and my room is strewn with priceless knick-knacks, almost any of which would buy up my wardrobe of those old days two or three times over. Oh, yes! And I drive in carriages, and wear diamonds, and, as for lovers, they are the bane of my life!

But I like to see the old books lying here looking so dingy and out of place. They have a fascination for me that I cannot shake off, and is something deeper than just the measure of my success.

For, after all, what is success? Sometimes, in what I call my queer moods, I look round me and say: "Are you satisfied, Maud Cardew? Has it been worth while?" And there is no answer. Only I don't want to be the village girl again, not by any means. I want to go on now to the top, and when I get there I will confess whether the game was worth the candle.

Digitized by Google

But to go back to the beginning, one of the most interesting entries in my diaries is the one after I first met the Honourable Bobbie Lestrange and his friend, Di Northcote. Some day perhaps I will show it to Bobbie, but just at present he is so tiresomely persistent in his attentions, that I am almost afraid to speak a civil word to him.

I have told him fourteen times that I will not marry him, and still he goes on asking, and says he intends to until I take him for the sake of peace and quietness.

It was Robert Alexander Caryl Lestrange, third son of the Earl of Mynton, and generally known in all quarters as the Honourable Bobbie, who gave me the first helping hand eight years ago, through his friend Di Northcote.

This is how it happened—it is more like a story than real life.

I must tell you I lived by the sea in those days, and my favourite occupation was to sit in an old ruined castle on the cliff, and stare at the waves, weaving fantastical dreams. Then one day, I think it was my eighteenth birthday, I became suddenly possessed with a wild desire to make my dreams realities.

I reviewed my past with a new feeling of disgust at its seeming littleness, and took a solemn oath to myself that the future should be different.

Then I stood a long time staring at the big waves lashing themselves into fury at the foot of the giant cliffs, lost in eager thought.

"What shall I do?" I asked myself, gazing fascinated at those rolling waves.

"Something big," came the answer readily. "Something tremendous! Overpowering!" And my heart swelled. Everything there, except the human beings, seemed on such a grand scale; I could not brook the thought of being left behind and remaining a mere countrified nonentity.

I felt I did not belong to the rest. The little joys and pleasures of that uneventful, country life in no way appealed to me; instead, they fretted and galled me; come what might, and in whatever way, I must at least do something big!

But what?

I threw back my head, feeling the fresh, eager blood course through my veins, fired by the sudden passion of doing and being.

If only I could find an outlet? I was not afraid. All my life I had scarcely known what fear was; if courage could achieve I ought to conquer the world.

I stretched out my arms to the horizon, drawing deep breaths of desire, and felt myself rapidly becoming consumed by an ambition as wide and deep and measureless, as the pulsing Atlantic below me.

"I will achieve! I must!" I cried, and stopped short suddenly, arrested by the sound of voices close at hand. They came from the other side of the Old Keep wall, and I could hear every word distinctly without being seen.

"Rum old pile!" said someone, in rather boyish tones. "Must have had great times here a thousand years ago. Useful to be able to pop your man over the battlements right into the sea when he got obnoxious."

"This drawbridge must have been a marvel of engineering," said another, rather deeper voice. "How in the world did they ever get the thing fixed with that yawning chasm on each side?"

The younger man appeared first, and when he saw me he started so violently I thought he would have fallen.

"Yawning chasm!" laughed the first speaker mockingly. "Do be careful, Di. You'll turn into a poet as well as a philosopher if you don't mind. You must be more particular what you eat. Let's climb round that corner into the Old Keep."

I held my breath and stood motionless. I do not think any one excepting myself ever attempted to round that wild corner, and there was no other approach, I was caught like a bird in a trap. The younger man appeared first, and when he saw me he started so violently I thought he would have fallen.

"By Jove!" he muttered, and gazed at me in a fascinated way.

"What's up?" called the other man. "You nearly went over, you silly young idiot!"

Then the second man appeared, and, though he was not so startled, he looked very hard at me.

He was a good deal the elder I learnt afterwards, a man of immense capabilities, of which he was too much of an æsthetic to make use.

His companion had not long left college, where he had sown a somewhat over-plentiful crop of wild oats, and was now travelling incognito to repair a damaged fortune, and none too brilliant reputation. The elder man spoke first.

"I hope we are not trespassing?" he said, with a charming smile. "We little expected to find a lady in a rocky eerie with such an impossible approach."

Both were still looking rather hard at me, and I felt the blood rush to my cheeks, while I looked at the ground in some confusion.

"Oh, no, you are not trespassing!" I managed to say. "Anyone has a right here, but I think I am the only one who ever comes."

"You must be a wonderful climber," he said, in the same pleasant voice, and the younger man murmured something indistinctly about angels having wings.

Digitized by Google

"I am used to it," I answered. "I have lived here all my life, and I climbed about on the cliffs almost as soon as I could run."

"It is a beautiful spot, but very wild," he said. "I expect you get shipwrecks here occasionally."

"Yes, I have seen several."

"How jolly exciting!" exclaimed the younger man. "Did you ever go out in the life-boat? You look a perfect Grace Darling."

The way in which he said the last sentence made me feel hot suddenly, and I looked up prepared to be angry, but something about him was so winsomely boyish, I only coloured and smiled. This seemed to please him.

"Will you tell us about them?" he asked, with a little persuasive air, and seated himself on a boulder, while his companion leant against the old wall.

"Most of them went to pieces as soon as they struck," I told him, "and all hands were lost, but once a young fisherman saved six Italians on that island," and I pointed to a perpendicular cliff standing four hundred feet out of the sea.

"By Jove! Did he though?" exclaimed the younger, who was, of course, the Honourable Bobbie, while his companion, Di Northcote, added with conviction—

"He must have been a plucky chap! Did he go over the face of the cliff?"

"Yes," I answered, warming to my subject, "it was a splendid deed. Do you see that little ledge near the bottom? They climbed on to that and clung to it with their hands and feet. Charlie Hall then went down to them with a rope."

"Why didn't they weight the rope and let it down that way?" asked Bobbie. "It must have been a ticklish job."

"There is a rock overhangs the ledge," I explained. "You can't see it from here, but it would have prevented them reaching the rope. Charlie swung himself to them by pushing out from the cliff with his foot."

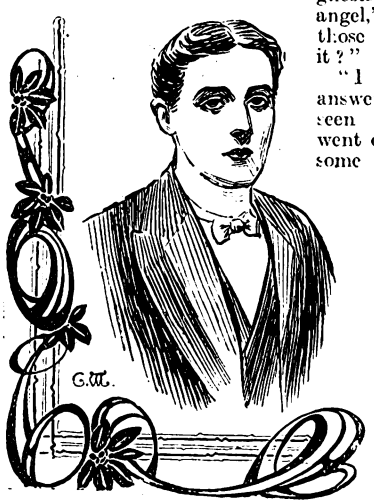
"Great Cæsar!" exclaimed the Hon. Bobbie, and dug his hands deep into his pockets, while the other man grew yet more interested.

"They drew their knives at him," I went on, "because they didn't understand that he was going to save them, and he had great difficulty in explaining."

"What did they think he wanted to do?" said Bobbie flippantly. "Pick out the fattest for his Sunday's dinner?"

I smiled at Bobbie then, for I liked the twinkle in his blue eyes, whereas I felt a little in awe of his friend, and avoided his gaze. He gave one a curious sensation of being read through and through, while all the time he appeared only lackadaisical and callous.

"Tell us some more about the coast," said Bobbie, in his coaxing way. "It's over-run with fairies, and demons, and ghosts, with an occasional angel," wickedly, "and all those sorts of things, isn't it?"



"I didn't know it," I answered, "I have never seen any." However, I went on to tell them about some of the legends and tales relating to the neighbourhood, and I have sometimes marvelled since how I, the unsophisticated country girl, could thus suddenly converse with these two strangers to their evident enjoyment.

I think it was chiefly Mr. Northcote's doing, for he asked me so many questions, and seemed so interested, it was very delightful to talk to him.

Bobbie did not say much, and I don't think he listened very particularly; he just sat and gazed at me in a way that I should have found exceedingly embarrassing, had I not been so engrossed in the conversation.

In the end a sudden idea struck me. I clasped my hands behind my back in a favourite attitude, and leant against a piece of wall.

"It is your turn to tell me something now," I said, looking from one to the other, "I want to know about your world."

They exchanged glances, and Bobbie looked amused.

"Which part of it?" he said. "It wouldn't all do for the Church Times, you know."

I turned to Mr. Northcote inquiringly.

"Have you come from London?" I asked.

"Yes," he replied. "Have you ever been there?"

"I have not been more than twelve miles from here in my life," I told him.

He looked surprised, and Bobbie gave a low, expressive whistle.

"Begin at the beginning, Di," he said, mischievously, "and work gradually towards the high-minded, superior condition of present day Society. Otherwise it might be too much for Miss—Miss——" and he looked at me inquiringly.

"My name is Cardew," I said, "Maud Cardew, I want to hear about London. Tell me what you like!"

There was a moment's pause, then Bobbie remarked, with that irresistible twinkle in his eyes, "Fire away, Di! Begin with the Gaiety girls!"

"What are the Gaiety girls?" I asked, as Mr. Northcote only smiled.

"Nobody very particular," he answered. "At least, not outside their own circle. What would you like best to hear about?"

"I want to hear about everything," I said.

"It would take such a long time," put in Bobbie, "that we shall really have to consider remaining a day or two, eh, Di? Jolly, snug little place this, you know, and we might get a bit of good sailing. Perhaps Miss Cardew will tell us where to stay?" and he turned to me again.

"I am quite agreeable," said his friend, and they waited for me to speak.

"You can stay at the farm if you like," I told them. "There is plenty of room, and my father likes a chat with strangers."

They both agreed readily, going home with me soon after.

It was on the evening before they left that Bobbie and I strolled to the Old Keep, while Mr. Northcote was out riding. We had been a good deal together during the two days they stayed with us, though seldom alone. I couldn't help thinking this last was Mr. Northcote's doing.

Without seeming to follow Bobbie, he always appeared to have a watchful eye over his proceedings; and once or twice, when he was inclined to be very affectionate, I heard him mutter in an aside—"Don't be a fool, Bob!" and it made me hot and resentful. Yet I think I liked him from the first, although then and ever since he has riled me more than anyone I have ever known.

I was glad to have Bobbie to myself that evening, because I could get what I liked out of him, whereas his friend was very reticent. We sat down when we had climbed the steep path, and watched the sunset reddening the sails of the fishing-boats, and shedding a golden glory like a halo over the world.

"It's a bit of all right, isn't it?" said Bobbie, who had a peculiar mode of his own of expressing sentimentality.

"It's grand!" I answered, and felt the old restless craving stealing over me.

"It makes you look hungry," he said, "is that how you always show your appreciation?"

"It makes me hungry," I answered, clenching my hands.

He seemed interested.

"Hungry for what?" he asked.

"Anything—everything!" I cried. "I am sick to death of my existence here. I must be and do something better than this before I die. I want to know about the world beyond. What is there the other side of the sunset? What is there behind these dreary hills? Tell me more about it. You know so much and care so little, while I am just starving."

Digitized by Google

I leant towards him eagerly, and he seemed to catch a like fire from my earnestness.

"Yes, it must be rather deadly," he said, and glanced round. "You'd have rather a good time in London, too," he added.

"Why?" I asked, and felt myself compelling him to reply, with some only half-conscious power. I say half-conscious, because I did not know what it was then. I have learnt since, and, what is still more important, how to use it.

He looked at me a moment, then he said, "Did anyone ever tell you that you were beautiful?"

"Am I beautiful?" I asked, feeling as if the whole world hung on his answer.

"Yes," he replied. "I don't know that I ever saw anyone more beautiful."

I drew a deep breath, and looked away from him for a little while in silence. What I had suspected then was true. It opened endless vistas to me.

"Do beautiful women always have a good time in London?" I demanded next.

"It depends upon many things," watching me curiously.

"Tell me what you mean by a good time?"

"Oh, carriages and horses. And flowers and heaps of admirers."

"Yes, yes; what else?"

He smiled at my eagerness. "If you look at me like that I shall have to kiss you," he said.

I felt myself crimson, and drew back.

"You wouldn't be angry, would you?" he asked.

"Yes, I think I should," I replied, not quite sure myself.

"But why? It's so harmless."

"Tell me some more," I urged, to change the subject. "Tell me what else beautiful women do in London?"

"Well, they make a big hole in a chap's pocket very often," he continued whimsically; "and they play the dickens with men's hearts when they get the chance."

"What else?"

"They spend small fortunes on costumes. They go to all the theatres, and like the most extravagant supper parties imaginable."

"How I should love it!" I exclaimed, and drew a deep breath, adding—"And what do the men do?"

"Pay the piper as a rule," drily.

"Supposing the beautiful woman is poor?" I asked, fixing him with my eyes.

"Oh, then——" he began, and paused. "Well, then——" he shrugged his shoulders. "Oh, hang it all!" he finished callously, "it doesn't really make much difference. It's much the same thing in the end, only one's called respectable and the other isn't; but it's no end of a fine line."

I looked at him wonderingly, at a loss to understand, which he quickly perceived.

"You look as if you were going to ask me what I mean," he said; "but I shouldn't if I were you. It's a jolly old world in spite of everything; and I'm not tired of having it at my feet by a long way."

"What do you mean?" I asked. "Why is the world at your feet?"

He coloured slightly, and looked conscious.

"Oh, nothing!" he answered, with seeming carelessness. "I had a bit of money a little time back, that's all—except that I wish I'd got it now."

"Is it the same with Mr. Northcote?"

"Not quite."

"I shouldn't think he cares."

"Cares about what?"

"Having the world at his feet."

"Not he. He thinks he's a jolly lucky beggar not to have a position to keep up."

I wondered a little what he meant, but was too engrossed with my own thoughts to pay much heed.

At last I got up and stood with my head thrown back in the old way, and my eyes on the sea. "I want to have the world at my feet," I said, "I must succeed. Tell me what to do."

"If some of the world could see you now," he said, with admiration depicted upon every line of his face, "I daresay it would crawl there."

I stamped my foot impatiently.

"But it can't see me," I exclaimed, "so what is the use of talking like that. Tell me what to do."

"Marrying a nobleman or an American millionaire is a good start," he said.

"Which is the better?"

"Well, the nobleman, I suppose; because then the other noblemen's wives can't sit on you just as they like."

"Then I will marry a nobleman," I said, and faced him suddenly.

He looked staggered a moment, then lay on his back and laughed aloud. "By gad! you've got a cheek!" he said, and seemed to enjoy it immensely. Then he sat up. "Never mind about all that stuff to-night," he remarked. "It's my last evening. Come and sit down and be affectionate and nice."

"I don't want to," I answered. "I would rather talk about London and success. I mean to be a great lady."

"How are you going to do it?" he asked.

"I don't know," I replied. "I will go to London and see."

He grew more serious. "I don't think I would," he remarked.

"Why not?" facing him squarely.

"You ought to have someone to look after you if you do," evasively.

"Why?"

"It doesn't do for beautiful girls to be friendless in London."

"I can take care of myself, and I am not afraid."

He watched me a few moments thoughtfully.

"By Jove!" he said at last. "I believe you'll do it. If I'm not much mistaken you've got the grit, and that's the chief thing."

"I'll tell Di," he said later. "He knows everybody; and might be able to help you."

At first I felt abashed before Di Northcote's look, when Bobbie told him of my intention. It was so evident that he believed there was something behind, and I was playing a part.

"If I were you," he said at last, "I would stay where I am."

I told him that I had fully made up my mind to go.

"What can you do?" he asked. "I'll help you if I can?"

I told him "nothing."

"My dear girl," he began.

"Yes, I know," I interrupted. "What matters is, will you try to help me or not? I shall go in either case."

He looked searchingly at me a moment.

"I see you have made up your mind," he said. "There's little enough I can do, but I don't mind trying to give you a hand."

A few days later I stood again in the Old Keep, and looked to the sea.

"I'm going to conquer the world!" I said, addressing the waves and seagulls and massive cliffs. "Maud—Duchess of Ayr—I salute you!"

(Next Tuesday Maud Cardew writes of her arrival in London, and an adventure she had in the fog.)

Digitized by Google

ALICE THURSTON'S PRISONER;
Who Afterwards Became Her Husband.

Alice Thurston was the sole support of her aged grandmother. Being an intelligent girl, she managed to earn a modest living.

Of course there were times when she was unable to settle all financial affairs that accompany all households, and this raw March morning their landlord informed them he would call at ten o'clock and expect confidently to receive the rent money which was long overdue.

Precisely at a quarter to ten Mr. Brown rose from his desk and brushed the brown hair just tinged with grey from his square, yet not unkindly brow. He went forth into the chilly air fully determined to get his due from Mrs. Howard,

It was a quaint house, with neat lawn and scrupulously clean porch and steps that were much worn from frequent scrubbing.

None of these circumstances, however, did Mr. Brown notice as he pulled the glittering brass door knob and walked into Mrs. Howard's sitting-room.

A cheerful fire was burning in the grate, and at a table, with writing material before her, sat a young lady whom the landlord recognised at once as the granddaughter of Mrs. Howard.

She was quite a pretty girl, though you would never have thought of classing her among the beauties. With curling black hair and dark, long-lashed eyes, she was not disagreeable to look upon. There was something very attractive in the dignity of her manner.

Miss Thurston rose with a polite bow, which was only dimly reciprocated by Mr. Brown.

"I have called to see your grandmother, Miss Thurston."

"I am well aware of the fact, Mr. Brown, but being conscious of her extreme nervous condition, have sent her from the room, preferring to deal with you myself."

The calm audacity of this girl fairly startled Mr. Brown.

"The money I hope, is ready?"

"No, I am sorry to say, we are unable to meet your demand."

"Pardon me, miss, I must speak plainly, an officer will be here this afternoon to put a valuation on the furniture and—"

"You shall do nothing of the kind," interrupted Alice, her cheeks reddening and her eyes flashing furiously.

Mr. Brown walked towards the door, as if to go, but, before he realised what he was doing, Alice had quietly locked the door and taken the key out and returned to her seat by the table.

"What do you mean, miss?" exclaimed the astonished prisoner.

"You will now be obliged to reconsider the question," said Alice.

"Obliged?"

"Yes, you will hardly jump out of the window; there is no other attainable egress, unless you choose to ascend the chimney, and I don't think you wish to soil that lovely suit of yours.

"You are a very rich man, Mr. Brown, and own rows of houses, railway shares, stocks and bonds and mortgages and other enterprises too numerous to mention.

"My grandmother is very a poor woman and I support her with what work I can get. Now, would you cause us so much suffering by being so cruel? You are not a bad man, Mr. Brown, you have many noble qualities and I like you for them."

She paused a moment and looked intently and gravely at the landlord.

It was not unpleasant to be told by a pretty girl that she liked him on any terms, yet he had indulged in some plain speaking.

"I have been told," she continued, "of many acts of kindness you have performed. You must show some sympathy in this case. You are extremely cross this morning, perhaps it is the weather, for I do not think you are always thus.

"Hush, I accept no excuse. You are inclined to be irritable and overbearing. If I were your mother and you a little tainly put you in a corner until be good."

boy I should cer- smiled, although he was at the you promised to moment really feeling very angry.

Mr. Brown

Alice went on with the utmost composure.

"Under the circumstances I can only detain you as my prisoner until you promise not to bother us until I am able to pay, which will not be very long. Then, and only then, will you get your money. Do you promise? Yes or no?"

"I refuse," said the landlord tartly.

"Please yourself, Mr. Brown, I can wait."

Miss Thurston deposited the key in the pocket of her dress, and sat down and proceeded to write.

Had she been a man there is no telling what he would have done; as it was, she wore an invisible armour of power in the very fact that she was a woman, and she knew it.

"Miss Thurston," said he, very sternly, "unlock that door, or I shall call for help."

"All right, do so if you wish."

"Miss Alice."

"Mr. Brown."

"Do you know it is twelve o'clock?"

"Yes, I think I heard it strike."

"I should like to get some lunch."

"I am sorry that luxury is beyond your power to-day."

How provoking she was. Mr. Brown eyed the pocket of her blue dress greedily and walked up and down the room in dismay.

"I have an appointment for one o'clock."

"What a pity you cannot keep it."

He took another turn across the room. Alice raised her eyes to his, and with a saucy smile said:

"Well, are you ready to promise?"

"Unfortunately, yes. What else can I do?"

"You promise?"

"I do, because I can't help myself."

"You have made me very happy, Mr. Brown," said Alice, as she drew the key from her pocket and unlocked the door. "I know you think me very unwomanly and perhaps bold, but if you only knew to what extremities we have been forced by poverty, I am sure you would not censure me so severely. Good morning, Mr. Brown."

With many curious and complicated thoughts and emotions struggling through his brain did Mr. Brown go forth, in which dark, flashing eyes and blue dresses played a very prominent part.

The very next day he called to assure Miss Alice he had no intention of breaking the promise she had exacted from him and he called again in a few days to tell her she need entertain no doubt as to his integrity and the next week he dropped in with no particular errand as an excuse.

Could it be possible that Mr. Carl Brown, the confirmed bachelor, had at last been captured by Alice Thurston, his pretty young tenant?

Until this interview he had always scorned women, but a great change had come since, and he succumbed to her charms.

Before Alice Thurston engaged herself to her wealthy suitor she extracted from him the promise that he would provide her grandmother with every comfort in her declining years and she was fond of telling how she gained a husband by making a prisoner of him in the first instance.

M. S. Bell.

Digitized by Google

LOVE PROBLEM NO. 7.

The New Love and the Old.

Should a Girl Inform Her Lover of a Previous Engagement?

EVERY window in the Assembly Rooms at Davyhulme blazed forth light and welcome.

Noting the general air of festivity, one turned instinctively to look for the customary red strip of carpet and the canvas awning at the entrance gates, and found them both. And then, perhaps, if the passer-by were a philosopher or a woman, he or she might stay to look on for a few moments.

Cab after cab rolled up to the rooms. The porter whisked the door open, and mysterious figures, hooded and cloaked most tantalisingly, stepped daintily to the ground, ran nimbly over the red strip, and disappeared in a twinkling. The porter slammed the door and the cab rattled forward into the darkness to make way for the next arrival.

To Jack Shrewsbury, who presently arrived with his fiancée and her mother, this was the proudest evening of his life.

In the first place he had only been engaged to Dora Slade for three days, and, as everyone knows, the first delirium of the love fever lasts for at least a week. After that time, the love continues, but the fever abates somewhat.

This was their first appearance in public since the engagement. As they hurried across the red strip he felt convinced that the eyes of all the crowd were fixed upon her in overpowering admiration. Every young man who is worth his salt passes through this stage, and indeed it must be admitted that some do so more than once.

As Jack, having taken off his hat and overcoat, and stroked his hair three times—once over each ear, and once over his forehead—was waiting for the ladies, a friend of his, named Beesley, came towards him, accompanied by a stranger.

"Good evening!" said Beesley. "May I introduce two particular friends of mine to each other? Mr. Ridgeway—Mr. Shrewsbury."

They shook hands, muttering the usual commonplaces.

Beesley beamed upon them both, as one conscious of a good action.

"You two chaps ought to be good friends," he added, "for you're both mad—on books."

After this he hurried away, probably to seek some saner companionship, and the two new acquaintances fell to comparing notes on the subject of their madness.

Ridgeway, who had formerly lived in Davyhulme, had been stationed in London at the headquarters of his firm, for two years. He had now returned to take up the sub-managership at the office where he had started his business life. By a strange coincidence the literary tastes of the two men were almost the same, and their friendship throve on this common basis.

Then Ridgeway's sisters came to claim him, and he made an appointment to call on his new friend the following evening. Shortly afterwards, Dora Slade and her mother appeared, and Jack hurried to meet them, with a guilty sense of having absolutely forgotten Dora for more than ten minutes.

They danced the first waltz together, more as a matter of duty than anything else, for Jack was but an indifferen dancer. Then Dora was whisked away for a bewildering succession of lancers, quadrilles and barn dances, while Jack sat beside her mother and realised that for one who despises dancing and yet becomes engaged to the best dancer in the district, the course of true love will certainly not run smoothly.

To add to this discomfort, just after Dora had been claimed for a waltz by his new friend, Ridgeway, he became an unwilling listener to a conversation between the mother of the latter and Dora's mother. Mrs. Ridgeway, who had returned to Davyhulme with her son, greeted Mrs. Slade as an old friend, and took a seat beside her.

"Dora is here, I suppose?"

"Oh, yes!"

After saying this, Mrs. Slade glanced nervously over her shoulder, and then turned partly round, intending to introduce Jack to Mrs. Ridgeway. But the latter plucked eagerly at her old friend's sleeve.

"Wouldn't it be nice," she said, "if my son and Dora would only make up their lover's quarrel?"

Mrs. Slade interposed hurriedly, in a vain endeavour to prevent further confidences. "Allow me to——"

"And really, my dear," continued Mrs. Ridgeway, gazing across the room towards a quiet corner, "it almost appears as though my wish—or rather our wish—will be gratified. Do you see them sitting together in the recess of the window? My boy is whispering, and your girl is blushing, and those are both good signs. But, whatever is the matter, my dear, are you not well?"

"It's a little oppressive—the room is so hot," said Mrs. Slade faintly. "But I wanted to introduce to you——"

She turned round. Jack Shrewsbury had disappeared.

* * * * *

Dora and her former lover were gliding round the room to the dream-like music of a waltz. Round and round they swept and circled, in and out amongst the crowd.

Dora was enjoying this dance better than any other during the evening, for Ridgeway waltzed to perfection. As for him, the dreamy rhythm of their movement, and the fact that his arm incircled one he had formerly cared for so much, produced a kind of glorious intoxication in his heart.

He surpassed himself in his dancing, and his enthusiasm reacted on his partner, until suddenly she caught a glimpse through the crowd of Jack, sitting patiently beside her mother. She felt somehow that she was not behaving altogether fairly to him. Not that she could have given any reason for the sudden compunction, it was an intuition, that was all.

Digitized by Google

"Do you mind if we forego the rest of this dance?" she murmured.

"Certainly! I am sorry—you are not unwell, I hope?"

"No, a little tired," she answered, and turned towards the end of the room, where she remembered to have seen Jack and her mother.

"Don't go back yet," he pleaded. "There is such a cosy corner in this bay window, and I want to ask you something!"

The strength of his enthusiasm overpowered her, as enthusiasm generally does in these cases. And perhaps she had a premonition of what he wished to say, and thought it better to have it settled at once.

"Do you remember the time when I left Davyhulme, two years ago?" he said.

It is curious how girls try to avoid a proposal of marriage, even in cases where they have looked forward to it for months.

"You—yes, you obtained a better position in your office," said Dora.

"No, I don't mean that—I mean——"

"You went to the headquarters of your firm."

"I don't allude to business matters at all, but to a certain engagement which formerly existed between you and me!"

"My mother and yours are watching us," murmured Dora, and felt to her dismay that she was blushing shamefully.

"I don't care if all the world watches us," he growled, "so long as I am with you. But you are not listening!"

"I beg your pardon," said Dora, in sudden distress, "but I saw a friend going out of the room."

"A friend?"

"Yes, and I want to tell you——"

"In one moment," he whispered impetuously. "But rude or not, I cannot wait any longer. You know what I mean. I've thought about our quarrel many a time since going to London, and would have written to you from there, only I thought—I didn't like—I thought there might be someone else—since we parted——"

"There is someone else," said Dora, and rose to her feet as the music ceased. "Will you take me back to my mother, please?"

* * * * *

Whatever Jack's daily remuneration may have worked out to, he certainly did not earn it on the day after the dance.

His head ached badly after a sleepless night, his heart ached still more; he thought of everything but his work, and was glad when five o'clock came at last, and when he was alone in his lodgings.

At one moment he fell a prey to violent despair, and then suddenly he would seize a heavy ruler and bring it down with terrific force on the head of an imaginary Ridgeway.

He did not know how long the latter had been away from Davyhulme, so instead of two years he took it for granted that Dora's former engagement had been terminated quite recently. Probably she only accepted Jack out of pique.

The idea once suggested, he forthwith transformed it in his own mind into a stubborn fact, as all jealous lovers would have done under similar circumstances. And then upon this sandy ground he built up a most imposing indictment against Dora, although he would certainly have punched the head of any man who had dared to suggest even one of the items to him.

After all, Dora was not to blame. It was that fellow Ridgeway—Ridgeway, who would arrive at any moment in pursuance of the invitation he had given to him last night.

A wild idea of springing out upon his rival with sword and buckler—or possibly poker and tongs—he banished regretfully, as being somewhat old-fashioned. Then he scribbled a hurried note apologising for his absence, but he tore it up as soon as he had written it.

It was already seven o'clock, and Ridgeway might arrive at any moment. He decided to go out for a three hours' walk without leaving any explanation for the expected visitor.

It was not that he feared to meet him, rather the reverse, but he had a feeling that his first explanation was due from Dora, and he preferred it to come from her. So he thought, as he pulled the street door to the latch and hurried along the dark, badly-lighted road.

Dora and her mother lived scarcely three minutes' walk distant, in the next street in fact, but, anxiously as he longed for her explanation, he was not going to beg for it.

As for leaving them whilst they were in a measure under his charge at the Assembly Rooms last night, his friend Beesley had pledged himself to offer his services to escort them to the cab, whilst apologising for Jack's absence. So his conscience was quite clear on that count.

Probably he would receive a letter in the morning, or she might call at his lodgings that evening, with her mother to play propriety of course. They might arrive while Ridgeway was there! The mere possibility of this brought him to a sudden standstill, and next moment somebody bumped against him in the darkness.

"Confound—I beg your pardon."

"Why don't—oh, quite right."

"Mr. Ridgeway!"

"Mr. Shrewsbury! I am on my way to your rooms."

Jack's anger boiled over in an instant. "I'm afraid I can't have the pleasure of entertaining you," he said abruptly, "certainly not until I know what you were saying to Miss Slade last night."

"What!"

"You were sitting together in the recess of one of the bay windows," continued Jack, speaking with a kind of explosive calmness, "and you were very confidential together."

"Far more confidential that I shall ever be with you," retorted Ridgeway. "By what right do you make such an impertinent request?"

"The best of all rights," said Jack. "I am, or was, engaged to the girl we are discussing."

"If you speak only of the past I can make the same claim. I was engaged to Miss Slade myself two years ago."

"Two years ago?"

"Good evening," said Mrs. Slade suddenly, affecting wisely not to have noticed any signs of disagreement. "We were just coming to see you, Jack, but as we've met you so opportunely, will you come with us and be our visitor instead of host?"

Jack bowed awkwardly, and glanced at Dora, who was with her mother.

"Dora has something special to say to you," continued the good lady, "so you two had better walk together, and perhaps Mr. Ridgeway will also favour us for an hour or two?"

"Very pleased," said Ridgeway, who saw a prospect of general explanations, and he led the way with Mrs. Slade, leaving the lovers to follow.

Then Jack remembered the long indictment he had drawn up against Dora, and prepared to launch it at her forthwith.

"If you had only told me," he murmured reproachfully.

"Next time I'm engaged I will," said Dora penitently. "At least I don't mean that exactly. But I do think it was shameful the way you went off and lost all your trust in me in a moment.

"A simple question would have cleared everything at once, and I think if you had really cared for me you would have waited and asked me. Lots of girls wouldn't have had anything more to do with you; come into supper at once, now, and perhaps I'll forgive you."

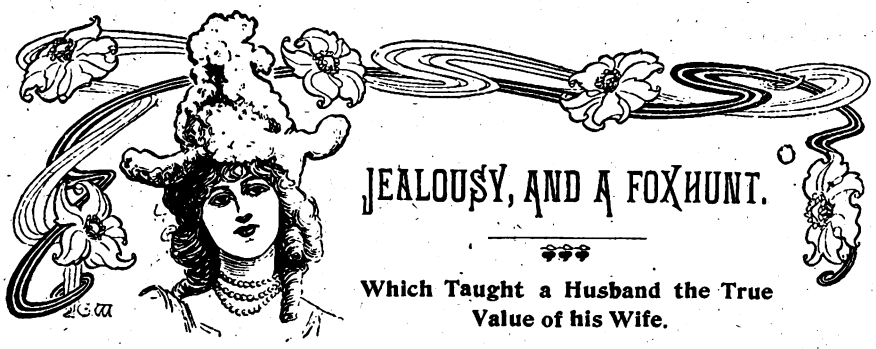
"I'm very sorry," he said, as they passed into the house. Somehow, whenever Dora was wrong it was always poor Jack who had to beg pardon. But that is quite the customary thing, as all engaged couples know. Wal Frank.

Result of the "Clergy Tartan" Competition.

The Gramophone prizes have been sent to:

J. Greenaway, junr., Baldwyns Hill, Loughton, Essex; H. W. Gallop, 144 Wantz Road, Maldon, Essex; F. Parker, Smedley's Hydro, Matlock Bridge; W. J. Humphrey, Oakwood, Outram Road, Addiscombe, Croydon; G. Bonnor, School House, Lesbury, Northumberland; Miss M. Grant, 8 Mary's Place, Edinburgh; A. S. Brothers, 14 Rye Hill Park, Peckham Rye, S.E.; W. W. Howells, 4 The Exchange, Cardiff; F. V. Smith, 99 Hill Street, Garnethill, Glasgow; A. Jackson, Billiard Room, Victoria Hotel, Manchester.

Digitized by Google



JEALOUSY, AND A FOXHUNT.

Which Taught a Husband the True Value of his Wife.

It was the last week in November—that month, of all others, the very name of which is suggestive of fogs and gloom, but which, nevertheless, occasionally belies its sinister reputation. It was also early morning, and the golden sunlight—marred not by so much as a single fleeting cloudlet—was over all.

It swept with lavish abandon across the broad expanse of softly undulating Sussex countryside, and up and over the aggressive tree-clad hill, near the summit of which stands Wynstay Towers.

Assisted by the gentlest of zephyrs it played a flickering game of hide-and-seek amid the myriad leaves of the ivy-mantle, which threatened soon to entirely envelop that historic pile, and—incidentally—flooded with a warm and shimmering glow the daintily-appointed breakfast-room, wherein were seated Sir Frank and Lady Boyda Wynstay.

Being there it set to work to heighten the effect of the brilliant polish on the gentleman's riding-boots, and to light a hundred thousand little glittering fires amid the massing coils of the lady's fair hair.

All this did the sunshine on this lovely November morn; but, alas, at the threshold of the hearts of these two humans was its triumphant progress stayed. No loophole of entry was there; all within was darkness and gloom.

Sir Frank Wynstay and little Lady Boyda, only daughter of Lord Balberris, of the Hall, Fairlight, had been married just six months, and this was their first quarrel.

On both sides it was the poorest attempt at breakfasting that could be imagined.

The man, shrouded in smoke from his Turkish cigarette, was apparently deeply engrossed in his morning paper. At the expense of his rapidly tiring arms he held it high, and fully opened, that it might serve to shield him from his wife's gaze.

She, in turn, had twisted her chair aside, and was seemingly buried in her correspondence. But, truth to tell, the elaborately scrawled page at which she gazed so steadfastly carried not an atom of meaning to her harassed brain, which was full to bursting of the quarrel of the night before.

That unspeakable woman! How she loathed her!

The sweet grey eyes steeled perceptibly at the recollection of that miserable dinner-party at the Hall. The veiled insolence of her rival—the little lady had been quick to fasten on that word, and still hugged it fiercely—and her husband's open admiration of the newcomer came back to her now with exasperating vividness.

"Ah, my dear Lady Boyda," came again the cool, contemptuous voice of her whom they called Vera Cloytharp, "so delighted to have met you at last. I knew your husband well some years back; in fact, we were the greatest of friends." And the poor young wife saw once again that mocking smile and the slight shrug of those regal shoulders, as the speaker had turned away with a little suggestive sigh.

And Frank—she writhed in her seat as the memory re-asserted itself—Frank had seemed only too anxious to renew this flaunted friendship of former years.

She had listened to their conversation—when they did not speak too low for her to hear—to the covert allusions to what must have been something more than an ordinary flirtation had watched the reciprocal play of their eyes; had even counted the smiles that had passed between them; and the monster, alert and green-eyed, had crept into her heart and made his home there.

Then that long, miserable drive home, during which Frank had seen fit to upbraid her for her "strange behaviour towards one of his oldest and best friends."

How the repetition of the term had stung her beyond endurance, and how she had retorted that she "should not have thought Vera Cloytharp so very old either, but that when a woman took to making up, why——"

And her husband's reply, made with considerable heat, rang again in her ears.

"I happen to know, Boyda, that Vera Cloytharp's complexion is quite her own, and one of the most perfect I have ever seen."

And was it for this that she had exchanged her peaceful life at The Hall, the doting affection of her father, and the undisguised adoration of every living soul about the place? Had she turned her back for ever upon this ideal existence only to discover how wayward even the most ardent of lovers can become—after marriage? Truly, it seemed so, and the hot tears welled up in threatening quantities behind the long silken lashes. Sir Frank, who had been darting furtive glances at his wife from behind the paper he was not reading, rose to his feet at last.

"I'm just going round to Platt's," he said airily, "to look at some beagles he has for sale; but perhaps I had better tell them to get the horses ready before I go. The 'meet' is at eleven, you know."

"Sorry, I can't come with you," she replied in a tone that was a veritable triumph of unconcern, "but, unfortunately, I have a prior engagement."

Sir Frank's face fell, nor could he control himself sufficiently to keep the ring of disappointment out of his next words.

"But, Boyda, think; it's the first of the season—the 'Dad' will be there, and—everybody."

"Then, no doubt you will enjoy yourself," she replied coldly. "I'm very sorry, but it can't be helped." And, gathering up her correspondence with one hand, and her skirt with the other, she swept out of the room without so much as a glance in his direction. In less than a minute, she knew, she would have been crying her heart out on his sleeve.

Some two hours later she caught a distant view of his broad back as he rode slowly down the hill. Once he turned his head, but, although a thrill of intense satisfaction shot through her being, she drew back quickly that he might not see her.

"Poor boy!" she mused; "he seemed dreadfully upset at my refusal. And, after all, why shouldn't I? Heavens! now I think of it, that hateful woman is certain to be there! I can't! I will! I must!" She gave a vicious tug at the bell-rope. "Henrietta, my habit! and tell Sadler to bring 'Gil Blas' round to the front door. Quick! I'm going to the meet."

The distinguished company which had foregathered outside the "White Hart Inn," was already on the move when 'Gil Blas,' with his fair burden, slackened down alongside the animal ridden by Lord Balberris.

"Why, Boyda!" exclaimed that much astonished and still more pleased nobleman. "Frank has been telling us that you were unable to come."

"Oh," she replied, with a light laugh, "I decided that I positively couldn't miss to-day's sport, so, at the last minute, I altered my plans. Quite simple, you see. But how's Daddy? and—oh, have you discovered the equal of 'Gil Blas' yet?"

Lord Balberris laughed.

Digitized by Google

"In reply to your first question," he said, "Daddy is as cheerful as he is ever likely to be now that a certain scoundrel of the name of Wynstay has stolen the sunshine out of his life."

A lump, big and distressing, rose in the little lady's throat, and the heavily-fringed eyelids fluttered convulsively.

"Poor Daddy!" she said, patting the glossy neck of the splendid animal beneath her; "but about the horse—tell me?"

Lady Boyda's prime object was to divert her father's attention from her tell-tale face, and in this she was immediately successful.

Lord Balberris was an excellent judge of a horse; indeed, it were well within the truth to assert that, in comparison with his very extensive knowledge of things equine, any other acquirements which he may have possessed paled into absolute insignificance. Under these circumstances Boyda's question acted as a stimulant, and the old man launched forth into a glowing eulogy of a mare in his possession, bearing the suggestive cognomen of "Maelstrom."

"There's not an animal within a fifty-mile radius that could hold a candle to her!" he declared proudly, "and I rather think that she could give points and a beating to old Gil Blas here, good horse as he is. A wonderful animal, my dear, wonderful!"

"And where am I to look for this paragon, Daddy?" inquired his daughter, trying to look interested.

"Here, Boyda, here! Miss Cloytharp has her. Splendid girl that. Bet Wynstay a pair of gloves that she would be the first in at the death; and, Gad! I believe she'll do it. By the way, they must have gone forward. I don't see them."

"They? Who?" The sweet mouth hardened visibly.

"Why, your devoted spouse and the lady of whom I spoke. Ah, Jove, here they are!"

"Good morning, Lady Boyda; this is a pleasant surprise." The black arched brows of the speaker were raised ever so slightly, and the stressed adjective rang discordantly in Lady Boyda's ears. Nevertheless she smiled radiantly, and replied with a laughing commonplace.

Sir Frank stared at his wife in wide-eyed astonishment. Poor deluded man, having lived with one woman for just six months, to imagine that he knew anything about her, or the sex in general. To add to his mystification his wife sent him a swift, bright smile and a nod, both of which she took elaborate care should not be lost upon the superb woman at his side.

"There she is, Boyda," interposed Lord Balberris, pointing. "That's Maelstrom. Isn't she a beauty? Stay for ever, and warranted to jump anything round here, bar the Devil's Leap."

"The Devil's Leap?" echoed Vera Cloytharp loudly. "That sounds interesting. Tell me about it, Sir Frank."

Thus enjoined, Wynstay began:

"The Devil's Leap is a natural fissure, about seventy feet deep, in the rocky soil of a field near Shornden Wood. Its position is a source of some danger to those having no knowledge of the neighbourhood, as the gorse has been allowed to grow around the opening almost hiding it from view."

"And its name," persisted his fair interrogator, "how did it come by it, do you suppose?"

"Ah," replied Wynstay, "I'm afraid I can't tell you that. Possibly," laughing, "it may really have been the scene of some daring exploit by the gentleman in question. Anyhow, certainly no human being, having his full complement of sense, would attempt to cross it, except by means of an improvised bridge."

And so the talk went on, Lady Boyda meanwhile continuing in the blithest of spirits, until Coghurst Wood—the first to be "drawn"—was reached, and the hunt began.

"The Hall" party stood together on a piece of rising ground commanding an extensive view and waited developments. Suddenly the familiar "view halloa" came ringing up to them.

"There he goes!" shouted Sir Frank excitedly. "He's heading Hastings way. Come along!"

The last two words were scarcely out of his mouth when the pack broke cover and went tearing across the open in pursuit of a dark something, which was plainly visible some distance ahead.

"This way!" cried Sir Frank again. "We may be able to head him off!" and in a moment the whole party had whipped up their horses and were following his impetuous lead.

The pace set, however, was, in hunting parlance, a "cracker," and soon the majority of those who had started were left far behind. Vera Cloytharp, riding hard, had drawn up to Sir Frank, and the two went on neck and neck, with Lady Boyda's white, set face not three yards behind.

From out of the chaos of the little lady's whirling brain a single idea had sorted itself. Vera Cloytharp positively should not win her wretched bet. She, Lady Boyda, would prevent her! Yes, even if in the doing the great heart of Gil Blas were broken!

The pace was almost phenomenal, and soon Sir Frank's mount began to hold out signals of distress. He kept his place, however, and presently the two leaders rose simultaneously at a grass bank topped by a wooden fence.

Both cleared well, but Sir Frank's mount, failing to sustain the shock of alighting, collapsed and rolled over. A swift glance in his direction sufficed to assure Lady Boyda that her husband was quite unhurt, and then she brought her hunting-crop down smartly on Gil Blas' steaming flank. The duel had begun!

At the sound of the fall Vera Cloytharp gave a quick look back, and, seeming to divine the other's intention, began to thrash her mount unmercifully. For some seconds there was no perceptible widening or narrowing of the gap between them, but at the end of a minute Lady Boyda saw, with a thrill of elation, that Gil Blas was slowly but surely drawing up to the leader.

Then, suddenly, she experienced a second thrill; but this time it was one of apprehension. Ahead of them, not three furlongs distant, a patch of gorse made a line of sombre green across their path, and Lady Boyda knew—none better—that behind those innocent-looking bushes yawned the Devil's Leap.

For a few brief seconds, as a kaleidoscope picture of the maddening events of the previous evening passed over her mental vision the little lady battled with an insidious prompting. Then it was down under, and she cried out shrilly:

"Bear to the left, in front there! The left, the left!"

But her only answer was a furious backward glance, and Vera Cloytharp's whip fell like a flail. A few more seconds, while the hoofs thundered, and their breath came fast, and then they were almost level. The patch of gorse was not twenty yards away.

"You fool!" screamed Lady Boyda. "Can't you understand? It's the Devil's Leap. Pull that rein. Pull it, I say!" and the little lady made a frantic snatch at Maelstrom's bridle. Seemingly blind with passion, Vera Cloytharp raised her crop and struck her would-be saviour a violent blow in the face.

It was then, in that supreme moment, that the true nobility of Lady Boyda's nature asserted itself. At any cost, she resolved, this mad creature should be stopped. At the sound of the swish which had accompanied the blow Gil Blas had swerved aside; but now, feeling an unusually fierce tug at the right side of his mouth, he swung obediently round, and charged headlong into the flying form of Maelstrom.

There was a thud and a sickening crunch as the animals came together, and then both went down, their riders rolling on the turf amid a whirl of flying hoofs.

With the instinct of self-preservation Vera Cloytharp rolled clear, and scrambled to her feet, dazed but otherwise unhurt. A few yards away a small white face, with a dark and growing stain of crimson upon it, was turned upward to the calm sky.

"My darling! My love! My wife! Speak to me, oh, speak!"

It was the agonised voice of Sir Frank Wynstay, who, having caught and remounted his steed, had followed them, and now pressed passionate kisses on a mouth that was bloodless, unresponsive, and cold.

Afterwards—a matter of hours—it became again as of old; but the time between sufficed to teach Sir Frank Wynstay many things. And among them was this—that in the possession of the heart of her whom he called wife, he was "lord of a mine of wealth untold."

William Scotcher.

Digitized by Google

She Felt it More.

Agatha: "Charley is tickled with his new moustache, isn't he?" Marie: "Yes, but" (with a sly blush) "not half so much as I am."

The March of Science.

Ardent Lover: "If you could see my heart, Belinda, you would know how fondly—" Up-to-date Girl (producing camera): "I intended to see it, James. Sit still, please."

His One Failing.

She: "But he has such a delightful way of saying things—quiet a poetic temperament." He (a rival): "Yes, he has soarings after the infinite, and divings after the unfathomable, but he never pays cash!"

A Gentle Hint.

She: "You say you love the very ground I walk on." He: "I swear it." She: "Will you prove it?" He: "Willingly." She: "Well, if you love the ground I walk on, you might run a lawn-mower over it."

Some Satisfaction.

She: "It is of no use, Mr. de Tone; in my present state of mind I would not accept the best man living." He (very coolly): "No; I see you won't; but, at any rate, you will have the satisfaction of knowing that he has offered himself."

Knew She Wanted Something.

Wife: "Come in, dear. Your supper's ready, your slippers are just where you can find them easily, and your pipe and tobacco are on the writing-desk, handy for you." "All right, Molly," groaned the tired, suspicious husband. "You can get that new bonnet to-morrow."

A Fair Deceiver.

Lord Percival Howard: "I am delighted to hear, Miss Bacon, that Chicago prides itself upon its high-toned society—so well-bred and well-read, don't you know?" Miss Bacon (lovely as an eastern dream): "Why, certainly, you just bet your boots we're a cultured crowd out there."

Didn't Want Him in the Family.

Her Father: "You say young Hankisson wants to marry you?" "He does, papa." "Does he know I haven't a penny to give you?" "Yes; he says he wants me for myself alone." "H'm! Has he known you long?" "Oh, yes! Years and years." "Then he's a bigger fool than I want in my family."

Preferred Papa's Cigars.

Miss Mary (innocently): "Here are two kinds of cigars—one papa calls 'his friends' cigars,' the other he calls 'his own cigars,' but I don't know which are the best." Captain Corkscrew (who does know which are the best, carefully selecting one from "papa's" own box): "As it would be almost presumptuous for me to call myself one of your dear papa's friends, Miss Mary, I think that I had better try one of what he so appropriately calls his own cigars."

Cool Wasn't the Word for It.

She: "Tell me, when you were in the Army were you cool in the hour of danger?" He: "Cool? Why I shivered!"

The New Trick.

He: "Nice dog—very. Have you taught it any new tricks since I was here last?" She (sweetly): "Yes; it will fetch your hat if you whistle."

No Making Up Required.

"Come, dear, kiss my cheek and make it up," she said forgivingly. "I'll kiss it," he answered, "but I don't think it wants any more making up!" And he was right.

The Light Went Out.

"I love you dearly, Jack," she said. "You are the light of my life." "I'm sorry," said her father, as he appeared in the doorway, "but I will have to put your light out."

All Policemen are Cousins.

Mrs. Nuwed: "Henry, that new cook of ours is some relation to the one we just discharged." Mr. Nuwed: "Great Cæsar! How do you know?" Mrs. Nuwed: "Well, the policeman on this beat is her cousin too."

To Insure Constancy.

Sweet Girl: "I am loved by two men, and I cannot make up my mind which to marry. What would you advise?" Old Lady: "Get both to insure their lives in your favour, and then wait until one of them dies. That will insure the constancy of the other."

He Puts It Down Now.

"George," she said, as she looked up from her paper, "you were always telling me before marriage how much you loved me!" "Yes." "And now you never mention it." "No." "Is it because—because—" "It's because I put it down in the cash book now instead of telling you."

Cure for a Broken Heart.

He: "I understand you have been attending an ambulance class. Can you tell me what is the best thing to do for a broken heart?" She: "Oh, yes. Bind up the broken portion with a gold band, bathe with orange blossom water, and apply plenty of raw rice. Guaranteed to be well in a month."

Ethel Wouldn't Have the Piano.

"I presume, Mr. Brown," said the young man who was about to marry into the family, "that Ethel will take her piano with her when we commence keeping house?" "Indeed she will not," answered his prospective father-in-law; "that piano belongs to her mother." "Thank you, Mr. Brown, thank you!" exclaimed the young man, grasping him by the hand; and the light of great joy shone in his eyes.

Not Very Complimentary!

Sympathetic Plain Friend (to inconsolable young widow): "The last time I met your dear husband he stopped and spoke to me with such a sunny greeting that I was the happier for it all day long." Young Widow (still oblivious to everything except her loss): "Yes, that was just like dear David. There was no woman so humble, or homely or unattractive, or dull, but that he could find something pleasant to say to her, and would take pains to say it."

Quite Unique!

The Salesman: "These goods are imported only in single dress patterns, madam; you purchase this six-yard piece and you may rest assured that no other lady in the land will have a dress like yours. In fact, we could not duplicate it if we wanted to." The Prospective Customer: "It certainly is pretty; but suppose there is not enough in this pattern for a dress for me?" The Salesman (reassuringly): "Oh, don't trouble yourself about that, madam; we will have no trouble in matching it for you."

SERIAL STORY.

THE ALBERT GATE MYSTERY.

A Romance of To-day.

By LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Final War," "The Lost Lady Delia," etc.

Mr. Winter Makes an Arrest.

Mr. Winter's indignation on finding that he had arrested a woman was painful. In his astonishment he released his grasp and turned to look at the disappearing vehicle containing the criminal he so ardently longed to lay hands upon.

La Belle Chasseuse, with the vicious instinct of her class, felt that Talbot's pursuit of her lover must be stopped at all costs.

She suddenly produced a revolver and levelled it at him. Fairholme and Edith alone noted her action. At the same instant they rushed towards her, but the girl reached her first.

With a frenzied prayer that she might be in time—for she had been told of this woman's prowess with a pistol—Edith caught hold of her wrist and pulled it violently.

Her grip not only disconcerted Mademoiselle's deadly aim, but also caused her to press the trigger. There was a loud report, a scream, and Edith collapsed on the ground with a severe bullet wound in her left shoulder. Even her cloth jacket was set on fire by the close proximity of the weapon.

It is to be feared that Fairholme flung La Belle Chasseuse from off the quay into the harbour with unnecessary violence. Indeed, the Italian onlookers, not unaccustomed to sanguinary broils, subsequently agreed that this was the finest incident in the spectacle, for the lady was pitched many feet through the air before she struck the water, whence she was rescued with some difficulty.

Careless how or where Mademoiselle ended her flight, the earl dropped on his knees beside Edith and quietly pressed out the flames of the burning cloth with his hands. He burnt himself badly in the act, but of this he was insensible.

Then he bent closer and looked desperately, almost hopelessly, into her face.

"Speak to me, darling!" he moaned in such a low, broken-hearted voice that even Sir Hubert, himself almost mad with grief, realised how the other suffered.

Edith heard him. She opened her eyes, and smiled bravely.

"I don't think it is serious," she murmured. "I was hit high up—somewhere in the shoulder. Don't fret, there's a dear."

Then she fainted.

Not knowing why Fairholme did not join him Talbot raced towards the carriage he had seen approaching.

It was a smart vehicle, with a sleek, well-groomed horse, and he guessed that it must be a private conveyance. Gazing anxiously around, he could not see another carriage anywhere in the vicinity.

There was nothing for it but the method of the brutal Saxon. Explanations would in any event need precious time and might be wasted.

So Talbot jumped into the victoria, hauled the coachman off the box, threw him into the roadway, seized the reins, and climbed into the vacant seat.

Brett, hurrying with the pilot from the Hotel de France, saw a veiled and curious-looking female vehemently urging the driver of a carriage to proceed up the main street of Palermo as fast as his horse could travel.

Even in the turmoil of thought caused by the pilot's intelligence he noted something peculiar in the lady's manner.

Half a minute later he encountered Talbot, driving an empty vehicle and furiously compelling with reins and whip a lazy animal to exert himself.

Brett shouted to him. He might as well have addressed a whirlwind.

"I saw them all together on the yacht when I came away, signor," explained the pilot. "That is, all except the old signor, who was walking with some Turks, a Frenchman, and another who looked like an Englishman."

"The old signor was walking with the Turks?" cried Brett.

"Without doubt. He conversed with them. I thought it strange that he took no notice of those on board the yacht, but just then the steamer——"

"Now," said Brett to himself, "Winter has arrested somebody. Talbot is on the right track!"

Yielding to impulse he stopped suddenly and called a cab.

"Here!" he said to the pilot, "ask the driver if he saw two carriages pass up the Corso just now at a very fast pace? Very well! Tell him to follow them if possible. Jump in with me. I may need your services as interpreter. We must overtake one or both of those carriages!"

The Fight.

Not often have the good people of Palermo seen three cabs pass through the Corso Vittorio Emanuele in such fashion. The sight made loiterers curious, drove policemen frantic, and caused the drivers of other vehicles to pull to one side and piously bless themselves.

Dubois had evidently offered his coachman a lavish bribe for a quick transit through the city, and the Italian was determined to earn it.

But although he had a good start, and his horse was accustomed to negotiating the main thoroughfare at a rapid pace, nevertheless the half-starved animal was not able to maintain a high rate of speed for more than a few minutes.

By the time they reached the Corso Catafini, which carries the chief artery of Palermo out into the country—crossing the railway and passing the magnificent convent of San Francisco de Sale—the horse was labouring heavily notwithstanding the frantic efforts of the cabman.

It was at this point, when mounting the bridge, Dubois knew for certain he was followed.

Three hundred yards behind, he saw Talbot whipping an equally unwilling, but better-conditioned steed than that which carried his own fortunes. At the distance he could not recognise the Englishman, but instinct told him that this impassioned driver was an enemy.

Digitized by Google

Brett, of course, was not visible, being far in the rear.

"My friend," said Dubois, standing up in the small carriage and leaning against the driver's seat, "I offered you twenty francs if you crossed the city quickly. I will make it forty for another mile at the same pace. See, I place the money in your pocket."

"It will kill my horse, signorina."

"Possibly. I will buy you another."

The cabman thought that this was a lady of strange manner. There was an odd timbre in her voice, a note of domination, not often associated with the fair sex.

But she had given earnest of her words by a couple of gold pieces, so he murmured a prayer to his favourite saint that the horse might not die until the right moment.

Thus they swirled on, pursued and pursuers, until the villa residences on the outskirts of the town were less in evidence, and fields devoted to the pepper-wort, alternated with groves of olives and limes, formed the prevalent features of the landscape.

Now it became evident that the leading horse could barely stagger another fifty yards, notwithstanding the inhuman efforts of the cabman to make the most of the poor brute's failing energies.

At last the poor brute stumbled and fell, nearly pulling the driver off his perch. It was sad, but he had more than earned his price, for Palermo lay far behind.

"My horse is done for, signorina," cried the cabman. "It is marvellous that he—Corpo di Baccho! It is a man!"

Dubois felt that his feminine trappings were no longer a disguise, only a hindrance. He had torn off jacket, skirt, hat, and wig. The frightened cabman saw his fare—changed now into an athletic young man, attired in shirt and trousers, the latter rolled up to his knees—spring from the vehicle and vault over a ditch by the roadside.

Some portion of the discarded clothing lay on the seat of the carriage, but Dubois had thrown the skirt over his arm.

"Here! Come back!" yelled the Italian. "What about payment for my dead horse?"

But Dubois paid little heed to him. He was fumbling with the pocket of the skirt as he ran. Not until he had withdrawn a revolver from its folds—whereupon he at once threw away the garment—did the maddening remembrance come to him that he unloaded the weapon prior to the Customs' examination, and had forgotten to re-insert the cartridges.

They were in the pocket of his serge coat, the coat which Mademoiselle wore. She, like a prudent young woman, had been careful to reload the revolver she carried, and which she transferred to her new attire when, at the last moment, Dubois suggested the exchange of clothing as a final safeguard in the most unexpected event of police interfering with their landing.

Henri Dubois could not afford to expend his breath in useless oaths. But his eyes scintillated with fiery gleams. He, the man who took no chances, who foresaw every pitfall and smiled at the devices of outraged law, to compromise his own safety so foolishly!

For an instant he was tempted to fling the weapon away, but he controlled the impulse.

"As it is," he thought," this fellow who is pursuing me may not be armed, and I can terrorise him if he comes to close quarters."

Moreover, this superlative scoundrel could feel tightly fastened around his waist a belt containing diamonds worth over a million sterling. Such a waistband was worth fighting for, whilst his pocket-book contained ample funds for all immediate necessities.

If the worst came to the worst he carried a trustworthy clasp knife, and he was an adept in the savate—the system of scientific defence by using hands and feet which finds favour with Parisian "sports."

(Continued overleaf.)

HEADACHE

"From my earliest days I suffered from sick headaches, biliousness, and debility," says Mrs. Charnock, Foster Street, Widnes, in course of conversation with a Widnes Weekly News reporter. "The attacks came on at regular intervals and lasted three or four days. They were marked by nausea, violent retching, racking pains in the head, dizziness, and utter prostration. I was completely helpless while they lasted, and could not attend to any of my domestic duties. My complexion became pallid, and the neighbours thought I was suffering from consumption. I was frequently under medical advice, but temporary relief only resulted. About three months ago, when my illness was at its worst stage—so that I could not even attend to my baby—I heard of Bile Beans for Biliousness, and I decided to undergo a course. By a little perseverance with the Beans I guarded against any new attack, and never since have I been troubled with my old complaint."

Bile Beans for Biliousness cure Headache, Influenza, Constipation, Piles, Liver Troubles, Bad Breath, Rheumatism, Colds, Liver Chills, Indigestion, Flatulence, Dizziness, Buzzing in the Head, Debility, Anæmia, and all Female Ailments. Of all Chemists, or post free from the Bile Bean Mfg. Co., Red Cross St., London, E.C., on receipt of price. 1/1½ & 2/9 per box.

BILE BEANS for BILIOUSNESS

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY

FOR HEADACHE AND Neuralgia.

Cures in TEN MINUTES.

For INFLUENZA.

KAPUTINE immediately relieves the distressing "Influenza" pains, and cures the fever.

KAPUTINE has the confidence of and is recommended by many eminent medical men. KAPUTINE is not a single dangerous crude drug, such as has been condemned by the medical papers, but is composed of several ingredients, first discovered thirteen years ago by one of our leading medical men. There is no other remedy like KAPUTINE, the SAFE remedy for Headache and Neuralgia. Ask for KAPUTINE, and see that you get it and not some dangerous substitute offered for the sake of extra profit.

KAPUTINE is the ONLY preparation of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and Infirmaries.

C. E. POPPLESTON, Esq., B.A., Mus. Doc., writing from Exeter College, Oxford, says:

"I have suffered continually from severe Headache. A medical friend advised me to try Kaputine. I did so, and in a few minutes my Headache had left me. It is a splendid remedy."

Packets of 18 doses 1/-,

of all Chemists, Stores, etc., or post free from

KAPUTINE LTD., Huddersfield

for 12 stamps.

Digitized by Google

On the whole, Henri Dubois made for a neighbouring wood in a state of boiling rage at his momentary lapse concerning the revolver, but conscious that he had many a time extricated himself from a worse fix.

A hundred yards in his rear ran Jack Talbot. The Englishman, notwithstanding his recent imprisonment, was in better condition than Dubois. He was a good golf player and cricketer, and although in physique and weight he did not differ much from the Frenchman, his muscles were more firmly knit, and his all-round training in athletic exercise gave him considerable advantage.

Thus they neared the wood, neither man running at his top speed, for both wished to conserve their energies for the approaching struggle. Talbot could have come up with his quarry sooner, were it not for the paramount consideration that he should not be spent with the race at the supreme moment, whilst Dubois only intended to seek the shelter of the trees before he faced his opponent.

The Frenchman did not want witnesses.

Neither was aware that Brett and the Italian pilot had by this time reached the place where the two leading carriages were halted in the roadway. Without wasting a moment the barrister leapt the intervening ditch and followed the runners across the field, whilst behind him, eagerly anxious to see the end of this mysterious chase, came the sailor.

On the edge of the wood Dubois halted and turned full upon his pursuer.

Instantly he recognised Talbot, and for the first time in his career a spasm of fear struck cold upon the Frenchman's heart, for in the young Englishman he recognised the only man who had cause to hate him with an implacable animosity.

But the unscrupulous adventurer quickly recovered his nerve.

"So it is you who follow me so closely," he cried. "Go back, my friend. This time I will not tie you on a bed. You are becoming dangerous. Go back, I tell you!"

And with these words he levelled the revolver at Talbot's breast, for the latter was now within fifty yards of him.

But Jack was animated with the mad elation of a successful chase, and governed by the fierce resolve that his betrayer should not escape him. For an instant he stopped. It was only to pick up a huge stone. Then he ran on again, and, careless whether Dubois fired or not, he flung the missile at him.

The Frenchman barely succeeded in dodging, as it passed unpleasantly close to his head. He instantly understood that here was a man who would not be deterred by idle threats. To attempt to keep him at arm's length by pointing an empty pistol at him would merely court disaster.

So now, with an imprecation of genuine rage, he flung the weapon at Talbot, who, in his turn, was so surprised at the action that he did not get out of the way in time. It struck him fair in the chest and staggered him for a moment, whereupon Dubois ran off again into the interior of the wood.

But Talbot's pause was only a matter of seconds. He did not trouble to pick up another stone. He felt with a species of mad joy that his enemy was unarmed—that he could throttle him with his hands, and wreak upon him that personal and physical vengeance which is dearer to outraged humanity than any wounds inflicted by other means.

Dubois reached a small glade among the trees before he comprehended that his ruthless adversary was still close upon his heels. He stopped for the last time, resolved now to have done with this irritating business, once and for all.

Talbot too halted, about ten yards from him. He felt that he had the Frenchman at his mercy, and there were a few things he wished to say to him before they closed in mortal combat.

"This time, Henri Dubois," he panted, "I am not drugged and strapped helplessly to a bed. You know why I am here. I have followed you to avenge the stigma you inflicted upon my reputation, and at the same time to recover the diamonds which you obtained by subterfuge and murder."

The Frenchman was now quite collected in his manner.

"I murdered no one," he answered. "I could not help the blundering of other people. If I am regretfully compelled to kill you to-day, it is your own fault. I am only acting in self-defence."

"Self defence!" came the quick retort. "Such men as you are a pest upon society. Like any wild beast you will strive to save your miserable life! But, thank Heaven, you must depend upon your claws. Lying and trickery will avail you no further!"

"How can we fight?" demanded the Frenchman calmly.

"Any way you like, you villain. As man to man, if you are able. If not, as dog to dog, for I am going to try to kill you!"

"But you are probably armed, whereas I am defenceless? My revolver, as you saw, was not loaded."

"We are equal in that respect, if in no other," retorted Talbot.

An evil smile lit up the Frenchman's pallid face. He pulled out his knife with a flourish and hissed—

"Then die yourself, you fool!"

He advanced upon Jack with a murderous look in his face. Talbot awaited him, and he, too, smiled.

"You are a liar and a coward to the end!" he cried. "But if you had twenty knives, Henri Dubois, I would kill you!"

At that instant a cold, clear voice rang out among the trees, close behind the two men.

"Halt!" it cried.

Both men involuntarily paused and turned their eyes to learn whence came this strange interruption. Brett quietly came a few paces nearer.

He held a revolver, pointed significantly at Dubois' breast.

"Drop that knife," he said, with an icy determination in tone and manner that sent a cold shiver through his hearers' spine. "Drop it, or, by Heaven, I will shoot you this instant!"

Dubois felt that the game was up. He flung down the knife and tried even then to laugh.

"Of course," he sneered, "as I am cornered on all sides I give in."

Brett still advanced until he reached the spot where the knife lay. He picked it up, and at the same instant lowered the revolver. Then he observed, with the easy indifference of one who remarks upon the weather—

"Now you can fight, monsieur. My young friend here is determined to thrash you, and you richly deserve it. So I will not interfere. But just one word before you begin. Two can play at the game of bluff. This is your own pistol, and is, as you know, unloaded."

Dubois' cry of rage at the trick which had been played upon him was smothered by his effort to close with Talbot, who immediately flung himself upon him with an impetuosity not to be denied.

Luckily for the Englishman he had clutched Dubois before the latter could attempt any of the expedients of the savate. Nevertheless the Frenchman sought to defend himself with the frenzy of desperation.

The fight, while it lasted, was fast and furious.

The two men rolled over and over each other on the ground—one striving to choke the life out of his opponent, the other seeking to rend with teeth and nails.

This combat of catamounts could not last long.

From the writhing convulsive bodies, locked together in a deadly struggle, suddenly there came a sharp snap. The Frenchman's right arm was broken near the wrist.

Then Talbot proceeded to wreak his vengeance upon him. Unquestionably he would have strangled the man had not Brett interfered, for with his left hand he clutched Dubois' throat, whilst with the right he endeavoured to demolish his features. But the barrister, assisted by the Italian pilot—whose after-life was cheered by his ability to relate the details of this Homeric fight—pulled the young man from off his insensible foe.

Talbot regained his feet. Panting with exertion, he glared down at the prostrate form, but Brett, being practical-minded,

(Continued on page 318.)

Digitized by Google

Influenza a Cause of Deafness.

Attempts have been made by medical authorities from time to time to associate some particular forms of deafness with Influenza, one aurist in fact going so far as to say that abscesses in the ears are especially likely to occur with this disease. The editor of the "Journal for the Deaf," however, takes up the matter in a statistical form, and points out that, without reference to any special form of ear disease, an average of 28 out of every 1,000 deaf people he has examined attributed the beginning of defective hearing to this cause. The majority of these suffered from dry catarrh of the ear and throat deafness, although some few were affected by running ears. The editor also illustrates the subject by publishing several cases of deafness produced by Influenza which were cured by the Drouet Method of Treatment by external applications. As many of the cured cases were previously pronounced incurable, deaf people will be interested in knowing that a copy of the "Journal for the Deaf" can be obtained free by post by addressing the Secretary, Drouet Institute, 10 Marble Arch, London, W. The "Journal" also contains a Special Report Form, by means of which anyone can obtain free advice. The editor, however, advises patients, whenever possible, to attend the Institute for a personal examination during the consultation hours, week-day mornings 10 to 12, afternoons 2 to 4. For personal consultations a fee of 5s. is charged.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(CLOTTED); absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil; invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1s. 4d.; 1lb. 2s. 4d; 2lbs. 4s. 4d., free. Supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by MRS. CONYERS, Horchard Bishop, Devon.

A PILE OF COLD!

SEE FOR YOURSELF THE ENORMOUS SAVINGS that will result from Dealing Direct with H. SAMUEL, Write now for his BIG FREE TREASURE GUIDE.

200 Pages. 3,000 Engravings. Startling Bargains in Watches, Clocks, Rings, Chains, Cutlery, Plate, &c. This Grand Money-saver is sent you FREE FOR A POST-CARD.

VALUABLE FREE PRIZES TO ALL BUYERS! Read particulars in Guide.

WRITE NOW!

H. SAMUEL, Dept. 29, MARKET ST. MANCHESTER

DO YOU WANT A GOOD CYCLE?

Write for my Lists. I deal only in the Best Coventry made Cycles, and by contracting for thousands annually, I BUY CHEAPLY and SELL CHEAPLY.

Premiers, Rovers Coventry Challenge, Triumphs, Swifts, Humbers, Centaurs, Raglans, Singers, etc. The QUALITY is there. Get my prices, save money and ensure satisfaction.

A High-Grade COVENTRY CYCLE for £6-0-0.

Two Years' Guarantee. Easy Payments without publicity. Cycle sent on receipt of first payment. EDWARD O'BRIEN, The World's Largest Cycle Dealer, COVENTRY.

GIVEN AWAY with this week's HOME NOTES (No. 477).

Paper Pattern OF THIS BLOUSE

Of all Bookstalls & Newsagents. PRICE 1d.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 2lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

ZOX for Neuralgic Troubles.

GIVES INSTANT RELIEF TO HEADACHE, TOOTHACHE, NERVE PAINS

Any Sufferer Sending Stamped Addressed Envelope May Try Zox FREE.

Neuralgia is a Disease of the Nerves, and most commonly attacks the nerves of the face. Its presence is announced by the most piercing darting pains, recurring in paroxysms, followed with brief intervals of relief; but hardly a moment elapses after a lacerating pain darts along the course of the affected nerve ere another shoots forth, inflicting pain equally distressing to the patient. The annexed cut presents in the prominent lines the nerves of the fifth branch, which are most liable to attacks of Neuralgia. All who suffer from this terrible pain, or from Headache, Toothache, or nerve pains generally, will be glad to know of ZOX, a Simple, Safe and easy Remedy certified free from injurious substance by no less an authority than Dr. A. B. Griffiths, F.R.S. The Proprietors offer to send Two Free Sample Powders to any reader of "Short Stories," who will send them a stamped addressed envelope.

ZOX is sold by Chemists, &c., at 1s. and 2s 6d. per box, or can be had post free from

THE ZOX COMPANY, 11 Hatton Garden, London, E.C.

"In pain? Try ZOX."

Digitized by Google

knelt by the Frenchman's side, tore open his shirt, and unfastened the precious belt. "At last!" he murmured.

Peering into one of the pockets, which by the way of its bulging he thought would contain the "Imperial diamond," he looked up at Talbot with the words:

"Now, Jack, we are even with him."

It was the first time he had addressed Talbot by his familiar and Christian name. The very sound brought back the other man to a conscious state of his surroundings, and in the same instant a great weakness came over him, for the terrible exertions of the past few minutes had utterly exhausted him.

"I cannot even thank you, for I am done up. But I owe it all to you, old man. If it had not been for you we should never have found him."

Brett's grave face wrinkled in a kindly smile.

"I think," he said, "we are even on that score. If you had not followed this rascal he might have escaped us at the finish, and my pride would never have recovered from the shock. However, go and sit down for a minute or two and you will soon pull yourself together again. I wish to goodness we had some brandy. A drop would do you good, and our prostrate friend here would be none the worse for a reviver."

The Italian pilot caught the word "brandy." Being a sailor he was equal to all emergencies. He produced a small flask with a magnificent air.

"Behold!" he declared. "It is the best. It is contraband!"

Brett forced his companion to swallow some of the liquor; then he gently raised Dubois' head and manged to pour a few drops into his mouth.

The Frenchman regained consciousness. Awakening with a start to the realities of existence, he endeavoured to rise, but sank back with a groan, for he had striven to support himself on his broken arm.

"Be good enough to remain quite still, M. Dubois," said Brett soothingly. "You have reached the end of your rope, and we do not even need to tie you."

With the aid of some handkerchiefs and a couple of saplings cut by the Italian he managed roughly to bind up the fractured limb. Then he assisted Dubois to his feet.

"Come," he said, "we are regretfully compelled to bring you back to town, but we will endeavour to make the journey as comfortable as possible for you. In any event, the horses will certainly not travel so fast."

In the roadway they found the carriages where they had left them, whilst three wondering drivers were exchanging opinions as to the mad behaviour of the foreigners.

Brett and the Frenchman entered one vehicle, Talbot and the Italian pilot the other.

"But, gentlemen," moaned the disconsolate cabman, who had headed the procession from Palermo, "who will pay me for my dead horse?"

"I know not," replied Brett. "In any event you had better occupy the vacant seat and drive those two gentlemen to the city, where you can secure the means of bringing back your carriage."

In this guise the party returned to Palermo, evoking much wonderment all the way through the Corso Vittorio Emanuele, whence no fewer than six outraged policemen followed them to the Hotel de France to obtain their names and addresses.

Piecing the Puzzle.

Palermo was in a perfect ferment. Not since the last revolution had people seen such a pitched battle in the streets, for Macpherson and his myrmidons had used no gentle means to pacify Grosjean and the Turks, whilst the crew of the Belles Sœurs would not be in a fit state to go to sea for many days.

An excited mob of people surrounded the hotel when Brett and Talbot arrived with their wounded prisoner. Fortunately the Chief of Police came in person to ascertain the cause of all this turmoil, for the first alarmist report that reached his ears made out that a species of international warfare had broken out in the harbour.

He told his subordinates to clear away the crowd, and explanations by Brett and Winter soon demonstrated the wisdom of an official intimation to the Press that the row on the pier was merely the outcome of a quarrel between some intoxicated sailors.

The Chief of the Police politely offered to place detectives at the disposal of the Englishmen for the proper custody of their captive.

Brett thanked him, but declined the proffered assistance, having decided to warn Winter not to interfere.

"The only prisoner of interest," he explained, "received such severe injuries during a struggle which he brought upon himself that he will be quite unable to be moved for several days. His right arm is broken, and his face has been reduced to a pulp. But there is a stout Frenchman named Beaucaire and three Turks who accompanied him, whom I recommend to your safe custody. We bring no charge against them, but it would be as well to keep them under lock and key until we have left Palermo."

"Do you mean the innkeeper Grosjean and the Turks who accompanied him from Messina by train to-day?"

"Yes,"

"You need not trouble about them. They have all been carried to the hospital."

"What!" exclaimed Brett. "How did they come to be injured?"

"I cannot tell you exactly, but they, together with some sailors from the fishing-smack, were knocked senseless by the crew of the steam yacht when the young lady was shot."

"What young lady?" demanded Brett and Talbot together. For this conversation had taken place in the entrance of the hotel, whilst Dubois was being carried to a bedroom by the servants.

"Did you not know?" inquired the official gravely. "The young lady was of your company who stayed here with you—the niece of milord, the elderly gentleman."

"Edith! Shot, did you say!" cried her brother, leaning against the barrister for support.

"Yes, but not seriously, I hope. She has been brought here. The doctors are now with her in her room."

"Who shot her?" demanded Brett savagely.

"The person who was flung into the harbour by the other milord. It is stated that she is a woman, but really at this moment I have not heard all the facts. For she was carried to the hospital with the others."

(To be concluded shortly.)

EVERY AMATEUR GARDENER
SHOULD PROCURE

Small Gardens
And How to Make the Most of Them.
By VIOLET BIDDLE.
Crown 8vo, Cloth, Price 1s., post free 1s. 2d.

This handbook teems with information, hints and wrinkles invaluable to amateur gardeners desirous of laying out their gardens and raising their plants to the best advantage.

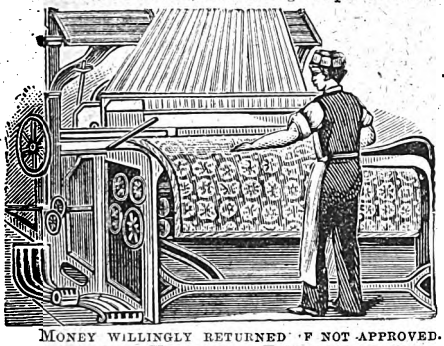
ORDER FORM.
To the Book Publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.
Please send me a copy of "Small Gardens," for which I inclose the sum of One shilling and twopence.
Name.....
Address.....

Digitized by Google

10,000 RUGS GIVEN AWAY

GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

This Phenomenal Offer is made to the readers of Short Stories (7/3/1903) only. On receipt of Postal Order for 5/-, or 62 stamps, we will forward, DIRECT FROM OUR LOOMS to your address, one of our 10/6 genuine SEAMLESS WOVEN, REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, etc., handsomely bordered and woven in 30 different patterns, and large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room. These Carpets will be sold as an Advertisement for our goods, below the Actual Cost of production. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained direct from our Looms, thus saving the purchasers all middle profits.



With every Carpet we shall ABSOLUTELY GIVE AWAY a very Handsome Rug to match, or we will send Two Carpets and Two Rugs for 9/6.

Money willingly returned if not approved. Thousands of Unsolicited Testimonials received.

GALAXY ILLUSTRATED BARGAIN CATALOGUES OF CARPETS, HEARTHRUGS, TABLE LINEN, CURTAINS, ETC., POST FREE,

if mentioning Short Stories (7/3/1903) while writing.
Cheques and P.O.'s payable to

F. HODGSON & SONS. (Dept. 5 H.T.) Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

CHILDREN'S COUGHS

RAPIDLY CURED BY

VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE.

An Eminent London Authoress Strongly Recommends It.

Ministers, doctors, and analysts, besides an army of less important persons, have written strongly recommending Veno's Lightning Cough Cure. The great reputation of this remedy is now too well-known to require much further proof of its vast superiority in all chest, throat, and lung diseases in children or adults. No more reliable authority on health subjects can be quoted than

Mrs. ADA S. BALLIN, 18 Somerset Street, Portman Square, London, W., Editoress of Womanhood. She writes:—"Veno's Lightning Cough Cure is an exceedingly successful remedy; it is very pleasant to take, and the relief it gives is very rapid. The preparation is perfectly safe for children."

GEO. KNOX, 256 Second Avenue, Pittsburg, writes:—"Veno's Lightning Cough Cure excels in children's coughs and bronchitis, and is especially good for children."

VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE is a new scientific remedy prepared in one of the most modern laboratories in the world from ingredients which are not generally known in Great Britain. It is most effective in both acute and chronic cases of coughs, colds, whooping cough, asthma, bronchitis, catarrh, influenza and weak lungs.

Ask for Veno's Lightning Cough Cure. Price 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. per bottle. Sold at all Chemists, or post free from

THE VENO DRUG CO., HULME, MANCHESTER.

MERLIN CYCLES

MARVELLOUS VALUE A HIGH GRADE £10 10 0 Cycle for £5 19 6. Free Wheel and Back-pedal Brake.

Brand New Guaranteed Pneumatic-tyred Cycles for £3 19 6

Merlin Cycles are always good, no matter what price you pay.

MERLIN CYCLE Co., Martineau St, Birmingham

CHICKEN HATCHING EXTRAORDINARY FOR 2/6

The Texas Egg-Hatcher and Rearer combined supersedes all incubators. Hatches above and rears little ones below simultaneously all the year round. A money-making home industry requiring neither capital nor labour. Turns 1d. eggs into valuable Chickens or Ducklings. Millions selling in America. 15-egg size 2/6; 30-egg, 5/-; complete for use. Address, AMERICAN POULTRY SYNDICATE (Room 101), 7 Albion Grove, Stoke Newington, London, N.

PIANO VAMPING (BOOK 16 PAGES.)

2/6 to £1 may be earned nightly by anyone having good knowledge of above. No knowledge of music required. A genuine work. Post free, 2/-; Co onies, 3/-.

Agent (Dept. A), 16 Eton Rd., Southsea, Hants.

To CURE Drunkards

Mrs. Geo. Fuller, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

FREE TO YOU

To advertise S.L.S Records, we are giving away our noted Phonographs for a limited time. Write, giving full address and nearest railway station; enclose stamp.

Symonds' London Stores, 128, City Road, London.

Order E. & T. PINK'S JAM

Undoubtedly the Best.

PURE.

No Artificial Colouring or Chemical Preservative.

Patronised by Royalty.

TRIUMPH Cycles

10 Guineas AND 15 Guineas Or from a Guinea per month.

The Best Bicycle that British Workmanship can produce.

TRIUMPH CYCLE Co., Ltd., COVENTRY.

& 5, Holborn Viaduct, E.C. 30, Deansgate Arcade, Manchester

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

To Make Up a Theatre Party.

EDITH will soon be twenty-one, and instead of celebrating her birthday by the usual party, proposes to get up an expedition to a West-End theatre. She writes: "What should I do as to the payment of the tickets, and the part of the house? We are not well off, so shall not have carriages or even cabs. There would be about six or eight of us."

* * * * *

Well, EDITH, I think you had better put the matter in the hands of your brother, or, if you have a male cousin, in his. I suppose you want to be all young people, or some older relative might have arranged the matter.

* * * * *

If you do not know any man who would fix it for you, decide how much each of you will spend on the affair—if you co-operate over it, as you should—and book the seats. The upper circle, which is at most West-End theatres four or five shillings, would be a nice part to go to, though, of course, the pit is almost as good.

* * * * *

As to getting to the theatre without cabs, you had better split up in couples, or threes, and if you cannot all get into the same 'bus or train, just arrange where you wish to meet, and travel separately. Upper circle seats can be booked reserved, but not those in the pit.

* * * * *

I hope your little scheme will be a success. I should recommend for you one of the musical comedies which you no doubt know of, or some other piece of an amusing character. You will not want to shed tears over a drama on your twenty-first birthday.

❦❦❦

Wants to be Popular.

S. W. is a young man who works in an establishment where there are a great many girls. For a long time he has tried being as nice as possible, but as yet has not got on to friendly terms with any of them. "How," he asks "can a young man make himself popular with girls without compromising himself with any particular one?"

* * * * *

By being uniformly agreeable to them all. If you are working in the same establishment, remember that your chief concern with them is business. You can be as agreeable and charming as possible, in business, but beware of making your relations too social. That is where entanglements begin, and one does not know where they may end.

* * * * *

One thing is worth bearing in mind. If a man has not it in him to be popular with a large number of women, it would be better for him not to try. Your own character will reveal itself to others, good or bad, no matter what devices you may employ to disguise it, and women, above all, hate anyone who pretends to be something that he is not.

Is It the Same Girl?

ABOUT six months ago PERPLEXED was introduced to a girl, and received her permission to renew the acquaintance when next they met. They parted, and six months later PERPLEXED saw a young lady who appeared to be very much like the other girl—perhaps it was she. She did not, however, notice him. Would it be ill-mannered for PERPLEXED to speak to this girl, and ask if she is the same as he met six months ago?

* * * * *

I think it cannot be the same girl. You say you have met her several times, but on no occasion has she recognised you. Well, girls are not usually so blind to men's faces as all that. They either recognise a man whom they have met, and give a glance to that effect, or they cut him dead. The girl you speak of has evidently no intention of doing that.

* * * * *

There would be no harm, however, if you really have reason to think she is the same girl, in your politely saluting her—in a gentlemanly manner, which is never mistaken for rudeness—and asking her if she is Miss ———. If she is not, apologise, and take a hurried departure.

* * * * *

If you do this, take care that you do not appear to be casually stopping a girl. As the first girl was agreeable to your resuming the acquaintanceship, there would be no liberty in your saluting her, should you be right in your speculation.

❦❦❦

Boy and Girl Friends.

S. D. has no brothers, but has a boy friend who walks with her very often. He is seventeen, she sixteen, and neither has ever mentioned anything about love affairs. The boy, in fact, says they are "all rot," and says he will never marry. At the same time, he treats S. D. just as a friend. Do I think this is wrong?

* * * * *

No, if your parents have no objection. As you have no brother you have practically no means of getting to know anything about the opposite sex unless you have such friends as you mention. A girl who is ignorant of men often forms altogether wrong impressions, and does foolish things.

* * * * *

Cultivate your boy friend as much as is permissible. But don't believe him when he says love affairs are "all rot." Most boys think that, only some recover from it sooner than others. Personally, though, I have rather more admiration for the boy who recovers later. It shows he is giving his attention to things which are better for him when young.

❦❦❦

Cross Words.

"I was at the theatre with my girl the other night," writes FORSAKEN, "and was not in a very good humour, I made some remarks which I have since regretted, as when next morning I apologised for them, she accepted the apology, but said she did not wish to continue the relationship. I am so miserable, and should like your advice."

* * * * *

It was quite right of you to write your apology, but I should have lost no time in seeing her, and practically making it up. Evidently your remarks showed you to her in an unpleasant light, which she had not before suspected. She thought the matter over, and decided that you were not so attractive as she at first imagined. Try to meet her again. If she has ever really cared for you, her attitude will soon get back to its original state, as I have never known true love affairs upset by a chance word or so.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Try also

FRY'S MALTED COCOA.

A combination of Fry's Pure Cocoa and Allen & Hanbury's Extract of Malt

Strongly recommended by the "LANCET" and "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL."

Digitized by Google

"G.P." ASK FOR "Government" Tea

Eighteenpence Everywhere.

RICH, RIPE, REFRESHING.

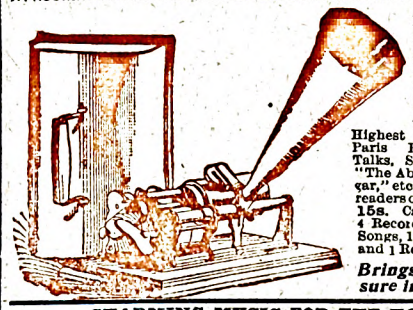
You May Know It by Its Red Tape and Seal.

WRITE FOR FREE SAMPLE TO G.P. GOVERNMENT TEA CO., 16 AMERICA SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

"THE MACHINE THAT TALKS."

CAMPBELL'S CRAPHOPHONE is the best Talking and Singing Machine in the Market at the Price.

A FASCINATING AND UNRIVALLED ENTERTAINER FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.

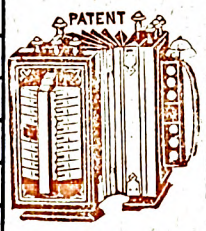


CAMPBELL'S HOME GRAND GRAPHOPHONE. This is no German manufacture, but the new American 20th Century Talking Machine, which gained the Highest Awards at the Paris Exhibition, 1900. Talks, Sings, and recites "The Absent-Minded Beggar," etc. Special price to readers of Short Stories, £2 15s. Carriage paid, with 4 Records free. 2 Vocal Songs, 1 Orchestral Piece, and 1 Recitation.

Brings Endless Pleasure into the Home.

CHARMING MUSIC FOR THE HOME.

CAMPBELL'S Gold Medal MELODEONS



With Organ and Celestial Tone, and Sweet Bell Accompaniments. No Home should be without one. No Knowledge of Music required. Used throughout the world.

200,000 TESTIMONIALS.

Special Offer to the Readers of Short Stories

Campbell's "Gem" Melodeons, price only 6/9
Campbell's "Miniature" Melodeon, „ 10/9
Campbell's "Paragon" Melodeon, „ 14/-
Campbell's "Favourite" Melodeon, „ 16/6

Cut out this and send P.O.O. for the amount

Either sent carriage paid to any address in Great Britain & Ireland.

All lovers of music should at once send for Campbell's New Illustrated Privilege Price List of all kinds of Musical Instruments for Season 1901-2, now ready. 200,000 sent out yearly. Send 1d. Stamp to—

CAMPBELL & CO., Musical Instrument Makers, 116 Trongate, GLASGOW.

Established 50 Years. BEWARE OF WORTHLESS IMITATIONS.

MACKINTOSH'S

IS DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!

PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.

A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

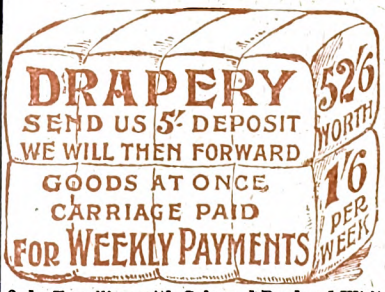
EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

5/- SENT TO-DAY WILL BRING 52/6 WORTH OF DRAPERY

TO YOUR ADDRESS.



THE BUNDLE CONTAINS:—1 Pair Full Size Blankets, 1 Pair Best Quality Twill Sheets, 1 Large Size Quilt (Red and White or Blue and White), 1 Full Size Coloured Striped Bed-Tick, 1 Bolster-Tick, also 2 Pillows to match, 4yds. of Oxford Shirting, 3yds. Good Flannel, (White, Scarlet, or Health), 6yds. Good Quality Flannelette, 2 Calico Pillow Cases, 1 Calico Bolster Case, 3yds. Towelling, with Coloured Border, 1 White Table-cloth. TERMS:—All you have to do is to send 5/- Deposit. We will then forward at once, Carriage Paid to nearest Station, our 52/6 Bundle of Drapery. You then pay 3/- Fortnightly, or 6/- Monthly, for the balance until paid for. However, should you wish to pay cash, the price is only 45/-

MAXEY & Co., Meadow Street, SHEFFIELD

Send for Cutlery, Jewellery, and Drapery Catalogue Illustrated.

Respectable Men wanted to get Orders on Commission. Write for Terms.

BRITANNIA CLEANS HER HELMET WITH "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH

AND EVERY BRITISH HOUSEWIFE SHOULD POLISH ALL METALS WITH IT, TOO.

Most foreign polishes set up acid, are sticky in use, and require much labour in cleaning. "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH spreads evenly over the metal, and produces easily and quickly a lasting brilliancy.

"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH is entirely made in England, and by using it you support British Trade.

Manufacturers: THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH Co. Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIAL JUST STARTED.

Short Stories.

No. 741.] Week ending March 14, 1903. [Price One Penny.

John Davenal put a hand to his throat. He seemed to be struggling for breath. "Dead!" he faltered. "Hannah dead! Hannah—murdered!" Then he fainted.

Digitized by Google

(A Dramatic Incident from our New Serial Story, "HELD APART." See Inside.)

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY

FOR HEADACHE AND Neuralgia.

Cures in TEN MINUTES.

For INFLUENZA.

KAPUTINE immediately relieves the distressing "Influenza" pains, and cures the fever.

KAPUTINE has the confidence of and is recommended by many eminent medical men. KAPUTINE is not a single dangerous crude drug, such as has been condemned by the medical papers, but is composed of several ingredients, first discovered thirteen years ago by one of our leading medical men. There is no other remedy like KAPUTINE, the SAFE remedy for Headache and Neuralgia. Ask for KAPUTINE, and see that you get it and not some dangerous substitute offered for the sake of extra profit.

KAPUTINE is the ONLY preparation of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and Infirmaries.

"Health," the well-known Medical Journal, Edited by Dr. Andrew Wilson, F.R.S.E., says of Kaputine:

"There can be no hesitation on the part of anyone suffering from Neuralgic troubles to employ this remedy, and popular experience of its use fully warrants the recommendations with which it is offered."

Packets of 18 doses 1/-,

of all Chemists, Stores, etc., or post free from

KAPUTINE LTD., Huddersfield

for 12 stamps.

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES' Cutlery

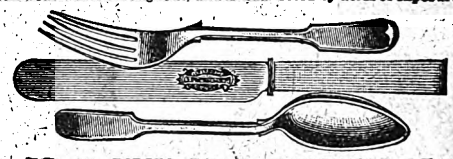
... THE ...

"ENTERPRISE" PARCEL, 25/-

Of Household Cutlery and Plate.

Containing: 6 Table Knives and 6 Dessert Knives, made of reliable Sheffield Steel and fitted with polished white 'Ivorette' Handles. "Ivorette" is the best substitute for genuine African Ivory. The Plate consists of 6 Table Forks, 6 Dessert Forks, 2 Table Spoons, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Tea Spoons, 6 Egg Spoons, 2 Mustard Spoons, 2 Salt Spoons, 1 Pair of Sugar Tongs, 1 Moist Sugar Spoon and 1 Pickle Fork.

The Spoons and Forks are made of "Columbian" Silver, a hard white metal. It is the finest substitute for Sterling Silver known, will wear white throughout, and is unaffected by acids or exposure.



51 PIECES FOR 25 SHILLINGS.

J. G. Graves is the only Manufacturer who supplies the Public direct, and the whole of the above Goods are made in the Firm's own factory in Sheffield.

TERMS. Send 5s. with order and complete purchase in five more monthly payments of 4s.; or HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT for full cash payment.

All orders are executed under Positive Agreement to refund the full amount of the deposit if you are not perfectly satisfied.

No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Cutlery and Plate, etc., Post free.

Good Agents Wanted in spare time. No Risk. Good Pay.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

Free Wheels, New Departure Hubs, Bowden Brakes. All Improvements—Lamp, Bell, &c. Carriage paid.

For Cash or 12 Monthly Payments of

£8 8s.	15/10	£9 10s	17/6
£9	16/8	£10 5s.	19/3

Juno Motor Cycle £32 or 60/- mo. Cycle and Motor accessories at lower prices than any other house; Acetylene Lamp, 2/11; Cycle Stand, 1/3; Motor Horn, 5/6. Write for New Season List, over 100 pages, sent post free.—METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co. Ltd. (S.S. Dept.), 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C., or Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

Beauty.

Icilma is the only absolutely safe Natural preparation for the Complexion. All who wish to keep a good complexion or who have any skin trouble, however slight, should send postcard, with address, for Hygiene of the Skin, containing advantageous offer to new clients, to ICILMA, Dept. 4, 142 Gray's Inn Road, London, W.C.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well.

TOWLE'S PILLS

have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

(The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

of all Chemists, or Post Free on receipt of 15, 34, or 5 penny stamps, or P.O.O. from the Sole Proprietors

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Nottingham, Eng.

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

PIANO VAMPING (BOOK 16 PAGES.)

2/6 to £1 may be earned nightly by anyone having good knowledge of above. No knowledge of music required. A genuine work. Post free, 2/-: Co onias, 3/-.

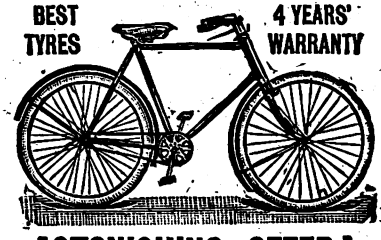
Agent (Dept. A), 16 Eton Rd., Southsea, Hants.

HALF PRICE

Greatest Cycle Bargain ever Offered

BEST TYRES

4 YEARS' WARRANTY



ASTONISHING OFFER!

To introduce Royal Duke Cycles, we will supply 2,000 now, for only half list price—£7 7s. each—with 4 years' warranty. Free wheel, choice of noted tyres, Crabbe brake, triple enamelling and many other important features.

PAY ONE SHILLING WEEKLY

On easy payments, you can send 1 shilling weekly, or any larger amount that suits your convenience. No guarantor, no unreasonable enquiries. Pay while enjoying the use of your machine. Ladies', gents', boys' and girls' models. Every penny of your money returned if not as represented. We point with pride to thousands of voluntary testimonials. Write for full particulars of Royal Duke Cycles, mentioning name of this publication. Enclose stamp. Address:

SYMONDS' LONDON STORES, 124-128, City Road, London, E.C. Also at 14, Peter Street, Manchester.

Short Stories.

No. 741.] Week Ending March 14th, 1903. [One Penny.

NEW SERIAL. START TO-DAY.

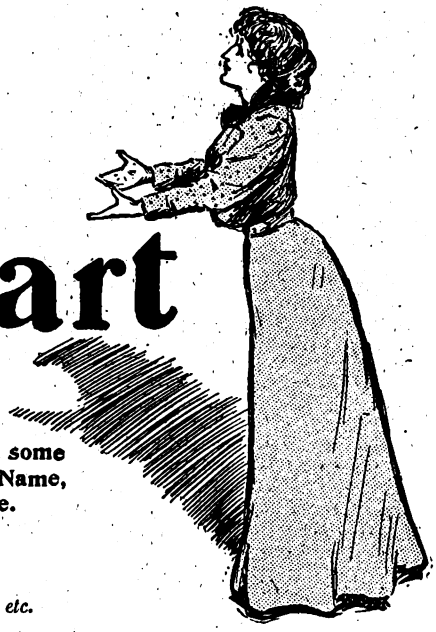
Held Apart



The Story of a Strange Double Fraud and its Influence upon some Young Hearts, a Great Name, and a Famous Fortune.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Author of "The Golden Dwarf," "A Daughter of Mystery," etc.

THE FIRST CHAPTERS.

Moira Davenal is sitting in the little cottage on Groudle Quay busy with her ribbon work. Sir Guy Vanbrugh is talking to her.

"Moira, have I the least little bit of a chance?"

"I—I don't know, Sir Guy," she falters. "I never thought about you seriously; and they would all say I married you for your money!"

"Then there is a chance for me," he says, biting his lip. "Moira, I love you so much. Won't you——"

He pauses. There is a heavy step in the hallway of the cottage, and a burly figure enters the room.

"Good evening, Mr. Davenal. I'm off to London for the week-end and was just leaving a message for you with your daughter. How goes on the task of raising the Sylph?"

"I've found the last hole, Sir Guy," says John Davenal, who is a diver engaged in raising Sir Guy's yacht. "She'll soon be afloat."

After Sir Guy has gone a sailor appears at the door singing in drunken tones the scrap of a chorus:

"Give my love to Nancy, the girl that I adore,
Tell her that she'll never see her—her sailor any more."

"I want to see Davenal—John Davenal," he says thickly.

The diver rises to his feet.

"Hullo, Hartigan!" he remarks loudly. "Glad to see you. Come in and make yourself comfortable."

While Moira goes out on an errand a conversation takes place between the two men, from which it appears that Moira is really Hartigan's daughter. Davenal agrees to pay him £50 a year so that he may keep her.

The sailor—really a ship's steward—sits back in his chair and begins to sing again the drunken chorus.

He halts abruptly, for the door slowly opens, and a blind woman comes in.

Dennis Hartigan recognises her as his sister Kate. She tells her brother that she heard the song he was singing—sung in just the same way—once when she was sitting on a breakwater at Groudle. She also adds that the man who was singing said, evidently to someone with him: "This is out far enough. In with it"; after which there was a splash.

Hannah Davenal (Hartigan's wife and the diver's sister) is maid to Lady Tarleton. She is possessed of a secret with which she continually blackmails her mistress.

"For nearly twenty years," says Hannah Davenal, "I have had your and your daughter's future at my mercy. The bubble I helped you to blow I could have pricked—how completely you cannot guess—at any moment."

Then she bends over her mistress and whispers in her ear.

Lady Tarleton pales. "It's a lie!" she says hoarsely—"a clever lie! The thing was impossible, impossible!"

Hannah Davenal smiles. "I did it, my lady," she answers. "You can have proof. Go down to Groudle Tower and look. My husband helped me."

That afternoon Lady Tarleton and Hannah Davenal go down to Groudle Tower, and together they make a mysterious journey at midnight.

The following day, at the Half Brick Inn at Groudle, Hannah encounters her husband, whom she advises to leave Groudle.

"You have considered my offer?" says Lady Tarleton to her maid, as the latter prepares her for bed.

"I am doing so, my lady," is the reply.

"Five thousand pounds," murmurs Lady Tarleton, "for the name and whereabouts of the child."

"I will think of it, my lady," says the maid.

In the early morning Lady Tarleton is aroused by persistent knocking at her door, followed by the butler's voice saying that her maid Davenal has been discovered dead in bed with a scent of chloroform in the room.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

FOURTH CHAPTER.

A Cry in the Dawn.

"A pillow—chloroform—Davenal!"

Lady Tarleton repeated the words mechanically. Wide-eyed and pale to the lips, she was staring at the agitated man-servant who had blurted out so abruptly the terrible intimation which still rang in her ears. The butler watched her anxiously—she seemed on the point of swooning, though the first cold light of the winter day, stealing lividly through the long and dusky corridors of Groudle Tower, showed that the colour was already returning to her blanched features.

"Yes, my lady," he said, "we've done our best to bring her round with hartshorn and brandy, but she's gone, my lady, quite gone—murdered in her bed and none of us the wiser."

His mistress shuddered. "Murdered!" she whispered. "Oh, it can't be, it is impossible!"

The butler shook his head. "It's too true, my lady," he rejoined; "we might have thought she'd accidentally taken an overdose of the stuff, for sleeplessness or toothache. But the pillow had been held down over her face, there were black finger-marks on it, and under it was a towel that smelt of chloroform. I went through an operation once at the Carlisle Hospital, your ladyship, you may remember, and I know the smell."

Lady Tarleton stood motionless in the doorway of her room. She had put her hand to her side and she was breathing heavily.

"It—it is most mysteriously horrible," she said; "who can have had any reason to do such a ghastly thing? Are there—are there any signs of robbery?"

"No, my lady," rejoined the man-servant, "the room is otherwise undisturbed." Lady Tarleton knitted her brows.

"You had better send for the police," she told him, "and I suppose, a doctor, immediately. Is there a maid in the house that can help me to dress?"

"I believe so, my lady," was the answer; "I will send one of the upper housemaids to your ladyship—a very neat, willing young person. Your ladyship's orders with regard to a doctor and the police shall be carried out. Will your ladyship wait for a fire to dress by?"

His mistress looked back into the vast, sombre bedroom, dimly illuminated by the candle she had so hurriedly lighted. A shimmer of the growing day penetrated the faded venetians that covered the windows, and added to the desolation of the feathery ashes that littered the yawning grate. She shivered again and replied in the affirmative.

The butler bowed and went away, an incongruous figure with his jacket buttoned askew about his collarless throat, and his trousers caught into the heels of his slippers. Lady Tarleton retreated into her room, shut the door, staggered to her bed, and sank down upon it. A hoarse, almost involuntary exclamation broke from her.

"Deliverance!" she said, "deliverance! If—if only she had told me the whereabouts of the child!"

The speaker put out a hand to a bedside table, on which she had set the lighted candle. A cut-glass flask of smelling salts lay by the latter. She opened the silver cap and inhaled the strong vapour. The cold of the raw morning had pierced her to the marrow, and she was shivering keenly. Yet a wan, mirthless smile lifted the corners of her mouth and flickered in her eyes. With an impatient motion she dragged the bedclothes about her, and sat thinking.

A tap at the door heralded the arrival of a trim, rosy-cheeked country lass, with the requisites for a fire. A little awed by her mistress's presence, which she acknowledged with a species of curtesy, she lit the gas, knelt by the bleak hearth, and speedily kindled a cheerful blaze.

"Did you hear any noise in the night?" Lady Tarleton asked her sharply, as she was rising to leave the apartment. The girl curtsied once more.

"No, your ladyship," she said, "not a sound—which is odd, my lady, for I sleep in the next room to that Miss Davenal had, it having been empty before she came to the Tower with your ladyship."

"Quite so," observed her mistress frigidly; "that will do, you can say that I am ready to dress now."

"Yes, my lady," she was answered, and the kitchen lass withdrew. A few moments afterwards a quiet, well-mannered girl, in a dark gown, entered, and, with deft movements, began to assist in the elaborate toilet by which Lady Tarleton habitually endeavoured to conceal the ravages that time had made in a once florid and imperious beauty.

When at length her attendant drew up the blinds and allowed the harsh light of the gloomy winter day to fill the room, the elder woman was her own suave self again. The air of the chamber had grown pleasantly warm, and she shivered no longer as she sat by the fire for the maid to fasten her shoes. Also the wan, mirthless smile had died away from the corners of her mouth. But it still lingered in her eyes. The tragedy whose shadow had fallen upon Groudle Tower meant to her a welcome, if mysterious emancipation from bonds that had chafed her for nearly twenty years.

FIFTH CHAPTER.

"I had a Message for you."

"Kit, dear, won't you put on a hat? It is very cold this morning, though there is a little bit of sun."

Moira Davenal was calling from the door of the diver's cottage towards the gate which opened on the quay. Beside it stood Kate Hartigan, the March wind fluttering her skirts and blowing over her sightless eyes the soft brown tendrils about her forehead. She turned with a rebellious gesture.

"I'm all right, Mollie," she retorted, "don't worry about me, please. Groudle air never does me any harm, I'm too used to it."

For answer Moira went back into the cottage and emerged with the gay woollen tam-o'-shanter she herself used occasionally. She brought it to the blind girl and put it on the latter's head with gentle fingers. Kate Hartigan caught her hands and gave them a remorseful squeeze.

"I'm a bit of a vixen, Mollie," she exclaimed, "and you are an angel. But I do wish he would come—he's only been twice since he came back to Groudle. He says he's looking up old chums—well, if his sister's not more to him than friends he's as good as forgotten for years and years. I—I wish he'd stopped away."

The blind girl shrugged her shoulders, her child-like petulance changing once more to contrition.

"There," she added, "of course I know I'm unreasonable, Mollie; men like to be with men, and smoke, and tell stories, and swear now and then. But I did want Dennis to be fond of me, and I don't believe he really is."

She put an arm round Moira's waist.

"Tell me, dear," she said, "is he what you would call handsome? Do you think all the Groudle girls will set their caps at him?"

Moira frowned and gazed out at the ruffled waters of the small harbour, flecked with touches of foam that flashed brightly in the fitful March sunbeams. She seemed suddenly to behold the face of the returned ship's steward. Tanned, square, bloated, with its animal jaw and bullying black eyes, it revolted her unspeakably. Yet she knew that his bold self-possession and swaggering demeanour, his broad, strong figure and air of disdainful experience, would be likely enough to impress the young womanhood of Groudle.

"I can't be sure about setting their caps at him, Kit," she replied evasively, "but I don't suppose it would be difficult for him to get a wife here, if he is in search of one. Though he may have no such idea, he must be used to being a bachelor by this time."

Digitized by Google

Kate Hartigan pondered. "I wish he'd come and live in Groudle," she declared, "and let me keep house for him. I could do it just as well as any sighted person——".

She broke off. Someone had stopped at the cottage gate. But her quick ear warned her that it was not the footstep for which she had been listening, and she waited for either Moira or the new arrival to speak.

Moira herself had glanced up. A youthful, stalwart groom, in a dark brown livery, with mauve facings, had halted at the wooden wicket.

"This—this is Mr. Davenal's place, isn't it?" he asked. "Mr. Davenal, the diver? Can I see him a moment?"

"This is Mr. Davenal's," said Moira, opening the gate; "but he is out at present, working over by the breakwater on a wreck."

She blushed a little, though there was no apparent call for it.

"On Sir Guy Vanbrugh's yacht," she added, "that was sunk there. But he will be back soon—for the tide is rising, and they can only work between the tides. Can I give him a message? Or perhaps you would like to wait, he may be in any moment."

The groom shook his head, and, with a glance at the blind girl, beckoned Moira aside. She stepped out of the gate a trifle puzzled.

"I'm from Groudle Tower," she was told, and the speaker lowered his voice; "Mr. Davenal has a sister who is maid to Lady Tarleton,"

"I believe so," said Moira; "my aunt Hannah. I have never seen her."

The other took off his hat and peered into it with an air of sympathetic embarrassment. "Nor ever will now," he replied; "leastways alive. There's been a sad business up at the Tower, and Miss Davenal—who was here unexpectedly with my lady—is dead. Killed, they say, that is—murdered!"

"I'm innocent of her death, and I'm here to prove it. I want one word—one single word—alone with her ladyship."

Moira recoiled, and the groom put on his hat again. "Mr. Davenal might care to come up to the Tower," he continued. "I must get back to the police-station round the corner, I was sent down in the dog-cart for a constable, and they're telephoning to consult the superintendent. I just slipped across meanwhile, thinking it was only right to let you know; there was talk up at the Tower, in the servants' hall, of Mr. Davenal being her only relation."

He scrutimised her with a sudden masculine interest, noticing her limpid grey eyes, her elastic figure, and the masses of golden-yellow hair that made a halo to her clear-cut features. Moira felt his scrutiny, and it annoyed her vaguely.

"I will see that father knows of it at once," she said curtly, and went in at the wicket, leaving the groom to make a somewhat lingering retreat. The blind girl was awaiting her; there was a look of pathetic alarm in Kate Hartigan's sightless orbs.

"What is the matter, Mollie?" she inquired tremulously. "Not—not anything wrong with Mr. Davenal? I fancied I heard his name."

Moira started. "No, dear," she said; "oh, I'm so sorry you thought it might be that! It was a groom from Groudle Tower to say that—that father's sister Hannah is dead. She was maid to Lady Tarleton. I don't believe father and she were friends—I have never seen her here. But the people at the Tower want father to be told; I suppose I had better run down to the breakwater and meet him. Then he can go straight up to the Tower."

She hastened into the cottage, to emerge with her hat on and a flapping cape thrown loosely on her shoulders.

The blind girl drew the gate wide for her, and Moira went down across the quay, fighting with the keen seabreeze to keep her cape from being blown over her head. The wind increased as she pressed forward along the edge of the harbour to gain the granite breakwater that ran out into the bay. The water on the seaward side of the breakwater was smooth with a sticky smoothness; the wind was in an unusual quarter.

At a point some twenty yards short of its extremity, and ten from its seaward edge, a stout vessel of the "smack" type lay off the breakwater, to which it was moored, lifting to the wash of the great eddy. A species of ladder descended into the water from the gunwale of the smack and the strong rope, electric-light wire, and substantial air-hose of a diver's equipment came out of the lapping wavelets at the vessel's counter. In the "waist" of the smack a man was turning steadily the handle of the air-pump that was connected with the hose. Another, and yet another man was busy with the rope.

Close to the smack was a squat, big-beamed steam-vessel, a wisp of smoke trailing from her dingy funnel. From her low hull there floated the monotonous jarring throb of powerful pumps. A foaming cataract of water over her side showed the task upon which she was engaged. A thick pipe of wire and rubber passed through a sling to plunge into the depths between the vessels.

Digitized by Google

Even while Moira paused to watch, the huge helmet of the diver rose out of the water at the smack's side, the sunlight glittering on its triple lenses and brass fittings. The men in her unhooked the leaden breast and back plates, helped the diver into the craft and unscrewed the great metal headpiece. The grave, flushed face and close-cropped head of John Davenal appeared.

His assistants relieved him of his heavy boots and he stepped into the after-part of the smack. Moira seated herself on a battered wooden bench near a flight of landing-stairs, and waited. Presently the small dinghy at the smack's stern was hauled round to her counter, and John Davenal, clad in his ordinary garments, got into it. One of his assistants followed, took up the sculls, and the dinghy shot towards the granite stairs. Moira got up and began to descend them.

The tide, though rising, was still low, and there were three long tiers of stairs. The dinghy reached the landing-platform as soon as she did. John Davenal was sitting in the stern-sheets, his head in his palms, allowing the rower to steer the boat with the sculls. As the dinghy touched the granite ledge he stepped out. Then, and not till then, did he see her. His face lit with a faint smile and he took her hands.

"Eh, Moira lass," he said, "so you wanted an airing and came to meet me. Well, you're a rare sight for a man to set eyes on who's been down under water for a couple of hours. But the job's practically done now and the pump's running free. The yacht's light, and lifting from the bottom like a cork."

A breath of relief stole through Moira's lips. "That is good, dad dear," she said; "then you won't have to go down any more."

"No," answered the diver slowly, "not again—bar accidents. Are you very glad, my lass?"

Moira sighed. "Oh, so glad," she answered, and put her arm through his.

The diver paused to give some instructions to his assistant, and then moved heavily up the landing-stairs. He had laid his great hand on Moira's and fondled it.

"You've been a lot to me all these years, Moira," he said hoarsely. "Down under the black water many and many a time when I felt as if I couldn't hold to my job any longer, I've remembered my little Moira, waiting at home for her old dad, and the thought of your golden locks was like a glint of sunshine in the dark and the cold. And I've gone on because being the best diver in England meant the best work and the biggest prices, and hastened the day when I could make my last dive. I've always been promising myself, you know, to settle down at home and build that new greenhouse we've talked about, or smoke my pipe by the fire and watch you come and go."

John Davenal's voice was trembling, and his big frame shook. He almost reeled as they gained the top of the breakwater and went along it. Moira hesitated to tell him her evil news.

"Poor dad!" she murmured soothingly, "you are so cold and tired. You shouldn't have gone out this morning so soon. You didn't have any breakfast."

The diver shook his head. "Better not," he said. "I wanted to go down at once. The tide served and the wind was in the right quarter."

Moira clasped his arm lovingly. "I'm glad it's finished, dad," she declared. "Don't go down any more, will you, for my sake, dad?"

John Davenal's broad chest heaved. "You—you wouldn't like the idea of leaving me, would you, Moira?" he queried huskily.

"Oh, dad!" began Moira, and checked herself. Had not Guy Vanbrugh asked her to be his wife! The diver did not notice the incompleteness of the sentence.

"I—I thought not," he answered, "I—I hoped not."

Moira wondered at his agitation and at the singular emotion that unsteadied his usually strong, deliberate tone. But she remembered her unfulfilled mission.

"Dad," she said shrinkingly, "I didn't come down only to meet you. I—I had a message for you—some news; not—not very good news."

The diver looked at her with a certain anxiety. "You're here and well, Moira," he responded, "and I won't rebel at aught else. What is it—not—not poor Kit—no accident?"

"No," Moira told him, "not to Kit. But a man, a groom, called from Groudle Tower to say that Aunt Hannah—it was Aunt Hannah who was maid to Lady Tarleton, wasn't it?—was dead. The man said—murdered."

John Davenal put a hand to his throat, he seemed to be struggling for breath. "Dead!" he faltered. "Hannah dead! Hannah—murdered!"

He stood still, swaying like a reed. His eyelids had drooped and his face grown suddenly florid. He leant heavily on Moira's shoulder; she strove in vain to steady his great bulk. The next moment she was supporting his head as he lay on the wind-blown granite of the breakwater. Big and powerful man as he was, he had fainted.

SIXTH CHAPTER.

Detective-Sergeant Ussher.

"No, I have absolutely no knowledge of anything that might have led to this extraordinary occurrence. Davenal was a most sober, respectable person. She had been my personal attendant from girlhood, and I should have thought it impossible that she had a single enemy in the world."

"Popular with the other servants, my lady?"

The question was put with a military abruptness. But there was a dry, deferential suggestiveness in the inquiry—a kind of confidential semi-secrecy that made the speaker's voice quite unlike the ringing, precise tones of the soldier. A projecting chin, blue with a closely-shaven beard, and marked with a deep, irregular dimple under the lower lip, a bushy, blunt-ended moustache sprinkled with grey, a long straight nose, and slowly-moving "bilious" eyes; these, with the addition of a loose, broadcloth suit, heavy boots, a stiff felt hat, and an open notebook completed his personality.

Lady Tarleton sank into a faded tapestry lounge in one of the great bare reception-rooms of Groudle Tower, and looked at the card in her fingers. It was marked:

Detective-Sergeant Ussher,
Criminal Investigation Department,
New Scotland Yard.

"I'm sure I can't say, Mr.—Mr. Ussher," she answered, a little haughtily; "I do not seek to penetrate the social mysteries of the servants' hall."

Mr. Ussher laid his hat, with a muttered apology, on a neighbouring chair, and jotted down a line or two in his notebook.

"In any case," added Lady Tarleton, "Davenal only came up to Groudle from town with me some thirty-six hours since. And she has never had much connection with the small household which is kept here to maintain the place in order."

Her interviewer rubbed his chin with his pencil, reflectively.

"Has your ladyship noticed recently any change in the demeanour of the deceased?" he asked; "any suggestion of mental worry—or anxiety?"

"None whatever," he was told; "even so late as last night her conduct and bearing were perfectly normal. I had spoken of returning to town to-day. She was to look out the first good train and make arrangements accordingly. I learn from the butler that she did so before retiring."

"Your ladyship's groom," said Mr. Ussher softly, "informed me during our drive here that the deceased was a native of Groudle and has relatives in the locality. Was she on good terms with her family?"

Lady Tarleton sighed impatiently. "I'm sure I cannot even venture an opinion, Mr.—Mr. Ussher," she retorted. "Naturally, I do not discuss with the servants either their own or my private affairs."

She had glanced at the card again to remind herself, with aristocratic languor, of his name.

"I see you are from Scotland Yard," she said; "are you temporarily attached to Groudle?"

Mr. Ussher put away his pencil and notebook.

"Not quite, my lady," he answered; "I have been engaged in a case with local ramifications, and being on the spot, the superintendent suggested my making—as rather an experienced hand, my lady—the preliminary inquiries into this unfortunate affair."

Lady Tarleton looked at him through a lorgnette that hung at her bosom.

"You are quite an expert, then," she observed; "how interesting! Well, I'm not vindictive, Mr. Ussher, but I have lost an excellent servant, and in a truly shocking fashion. I trust you will have no difficulty in bringing the criminal—or criminals—to justice. Pray give the superintendent my compliments, and say that I appreciate his thoughtfulness in intrusting the matter to a competent man like yourself."

The detective bowed.

"I am obliged to your ladyship," he said; "we shall, of course, endeavour to spare your ladyship as much as possible in connection with such public proceedings as may be necessary."

He took up his hat and retreated to the door. On the threshold he bowed again and stepped out into the hall. With a noiseless yet stolid stride, he crossed it, let himself out, and went down the avenue by which Groudle Tower was approached. His small hazel eyes, set in yellowish "whites," were fixed upon the ground, his head bent a trifle forward. Thus meditating, he gained the high-road and turned in the direction of the town. When he passed a chance wayfarer, his gaze lifted—and fell. He never looked at anyone twice, or for more than a fraction of a minute.

Paying no attention to the buffetings of the wind, he made his way through the cold, bright Spring weather into Groudle. He had chosen a roundabout route that brought him in at an extremity of the straggling sea-port. Noon was past, and the activity of the town was subdued by the quiet of the dinner hour. Mr. Ussher stalked thoughtfully along the main street, diving now and then into side thoroughfares until he had passed in review almost every shop in Groudle. Whenever he came to that of a chemist, and there were not more than three in all, he entered it, showed his official card, held a subdued colloquy with the tenant, and consulted a volume produced by the latter.

After emerging from one of these brief interviews—it was the last of his three calls—he passed onward for some half-dozen yards and then halted, to take out his note-book and write a name, that of the chemist he had just left. Under it he wrote a memorandum, "Sixpennyworth of chloroform, 20th March." He added another name and address, writing them with much deliberation, "Dennis Hartigan, Hawthorn Cottage, Groudle Quay."

This done, he turned his footsteps towards the waterside, and inspected methodically the buildings in its neighbourhood. A green-painted wicket caught his surreptitiously roving glance—a wicket inscribed in bold lettering, "Hawthorn Cottage—John Davenal."

Mr. Ussher went by it without faltering, to halt at a discreet distance, extract his note-book, and turn up a page. He had a memorandum on the sheet, "John Davenal, diver, of Groudle Quay—bro. of decd."

"Go slow, Tom Ussher!" he muttered, "Go slow! Is this a clue, or is it a booby-trap? John Davenal, brother of the deceased Hannah Davenal, who was chloroformed and suffocated. Chloroform bought yesterday by someone from J.D.'s address. Humph!"

He took a piece of dry, hard biscuit out of his pocket, broke it up and stood nibbling it. "Hartigan," he said, "who—is—Hartigan?"

Mr. Ussher reflected absorbedly for some moments, then threw away his biscuit, and, with an air of decision, went back to the diver's cottage, entered the wicket, and going through the neat garden, knocked at the door.

Moira answered the summons. The caller stepped in quickly.

"I want to see Mr. Davenal," he intimated; "I—I am from Groudle Tower."

Moira grew white.

"Oh, please," she said, "can't you leave it till another time? Father got such a shock this morning when he heard. We thought he was never going to come round. The doctor has only just gone. He says father must be kept very, very quiet. You see, father is a diver, and it is a strain on his heart—he had only just come up after two hours in five fathoms. Won't you call again, or tell me what it is?"

Mr. Ussher pondered.

"I think I had better call again, my dear," he replied paternally. "But can't I see Mr.—Mr. Hartigan now? He lives here, doesn't he?"

Moira answered in the negative, rather surprised.

"Oh, no," she said, "he's no relation to us, only to Kit, who lives with us! She is blind, you know, and Mr. Hartigan's sister."

"Dear me!" commented Mr. Ussher craftily. "I suppose that accounts for the mistake. I believe I used to be acquainted with Mr. Hartigan, though. Where is he living at present?"

"I think," said Moira doubtfully, "at the 'Half Brick,' on the Groudle Road. It's an old-fashioned public-house. But he's only just got home from sea!"

Mr. Ussher nodded. "Let me see," he murmured, "a week ago, wasn't it? A week or so yesterday—March the—twentieth—Wednesday, it was. I fancied I saw him. 'Dear me,' I said, 'that must be my old friend Dennis!'"

"Yes, it must have been," agreed Moira. "It was Wednesday that he first came to see us. He may call here at any time, though. Can I tell him your name?"

"N—no, thank you," responded

Digitized by Google

Edward Stormont

Mr. Ussher, "it doesn't matter. Well, I hope your father will soon be better. Good-day."

And he went out of Hawthorn Cottage, carefully shutting the door after him.

SEVENTH CHAPTER.

"Welcome to Groudle Tower."

"Get us a conveyance of some sort, porter, and help my man with the bag."

The functionary thus instructed was standing on the platform of the small local station, contemplating, with an air of detached interest, the departure of the early evening express. He glanced quickly at the person who had spoken, and with a startled "Yes, sir!" hastened off. His gait showed that he was both elderly and rheumatic. The station-master had just signalled the train off. As he turned towards his office the hurrying porter ran against him.

"Dear me, sir," exclaimed the offender, "I beg your pardon! But would you believe it, sir, Mr. Stormont's back. He came on the express just now."

The station-master, a hale and grizzled veteran of the line, started. "Mr. Stormont!" he ejaculated. "Not Mr. Edward Stormont—Mr. Stormont of the Tower?"

"Yes, sir," said the porter, "and rare and grey he has got, to be sure. But I knew him at once!"

His superior strode down the platform. A couple of men in travelling suits and tweed caps were strolling to and fro near the exit gates of the station. One was tall and broad-shouldered, with a cropped iron-grey beard and powerful, weighty frame, the other shorter, slighter and younger, with a nut-brown complexion, a small, fair moustache, and humorous, good-tempered eyes. His bearing was suggestive of military associations, and yet his expression was not that of the trained disciplinarian—it was too thoughtful, too reflective. The station-master touched his cap, and addressed the taller.

"Glad to see you home again, Mr. Stormont," he said deferentially, "it's a long time since Groudle had a sight of you."

The other smiled a grave, melancholy smile. "Or I of Groudle," he replied. "Well, we must try to remedy that. I'm a little tired of running about the world, and London was never a favourite abiding-place of mine. I fancy in future I shall spend a few months of each year at the Tower. By the way, I suppose no one is there now?"

The station-master looked serious. "Yes, sir," he responded. "Her ladyship came down only the day before yesterday. And this morning, to tell the truth, sir, they do say that something very strange has happened up at the Tower. Her ladyship's maid, sir; there is word of an accident—or—or worse. Some say foul play, but I should hope that's not true. Have you any luggage, sir? I didn't notice any carriage from the Tower."

"No," he was answered, "they don't know I am coming. There are only a few bags, your porter is helping my valet with them, I think. You might hurry them up."

"Certainly sir," rejoined the stationmaster, and went off, taking his dismissal a little reluctantly. The elder man turned to the younger.

"Jerome," he said, "there seems to be a fatality about my visits to Groudle. I have been here three times in twenty years, and each time there has been a death. My wife, my child, and now—some servant or other must needs keep up the depressing coincidence. Well, at all events, we shall not find the Tower empty, my sister-in-law is there."

He moved to the entrance-gate, his valet was showing the collector the tickets, a couple of "flys" had drawn up outside, the porter and a flyman were piling a half-dozen portmanteaux and kit-bags, supplemented by a brace of gun-cases, into the rear vehicle. The hotel and train labels on them were those of every big city and line in Europe, and not a few in Asia and America.

Their owners got into the first of the "flys," the station-master closed the door and lifted his cap. The vehicles drove off. The sun was sinking across the bay as they climbed the hill out of the town, and the evening breeze blew chill.

"A pretty place, Jerome," observed Edward Stormont, "and yet it has more sad than sweet associations for me." He pointed to the black silhouette of the Tower conspicuous against the sky.

"There," he added, "I spent my honeymoon, there my wife died, there my baby daughter drooped and faded. It is a landmark of sweet and bitter memories."

He relapsed into silence. His companion sat back in the creaking vehicle, and marked, with a shrewd, interested gaze, the sights and sounds about him. At last the "flys" drove into the shadowy courtyard of Groudle Tower, and Edward Stormont sprang out.

"Welcome to Groudle Tower!" he said. The valet had descended from the second vehicle and gone to knock at the massive entrance-door. It opened after a brief delay, and Edward Stormont, motioning to his companion to precede him, walked in. He stopped abruptly.

The heavy gas-brackets in the hall of the great house were lighted and their yellow radiance fell upon a singular group. A couple of uniformed policemen were guarding a handcuffed prisoner—a short, thick-set man, with tanned and bloated features. Near him stood a stolid personage trifling with a notebook and pencil. And, facing these four, her head thrown back haughtily, her jewelled fingers catching restlessly at a lace handkerchief, was a well-dressed, grey-haired woman. It was Lady Tarleton.

As Edward Stormont paused in the doorway of the hall, she glanced up and saw him. The handcuffed prisoner was speaking defiantly.

"I'm Dennis Hartigan all right," he said, "and Hannah Davenal's husband all right. But I'm innocent of her death, and I'm here to prove it. I want one word—one single word—alone with her ladyship."

(The conversation between Lady Tarleton and Hartigan will be given next Tuesday.)

Jack: "Her heart is as hard as glass. I've little hope of making an impression on it." His Sister: "Try a diamond."

Tom: "The management seem to have spared no expense for the production of this play." Kitty: "No, indeed; they have given each chorus girl at least three coats of paint."

"Dear girl!" he said rapturously. "If it is just the same to you, George, I would prefer not to have you use that adjective," she returned. "Why not?" he demanded. "It reminds me too much of what papa sometimes says to me."

Mrs. Smarte says her husband is the worst man that ever was to go shopping. He's almost sure to get swindled. "Why," she says, "it was only t'other day that he bought a flute, and when it came home, if you'll believe me, it was full of holes."

Magistrate (to women charged with drunkenness): "You must pay 5s. each." Prisoner: "Sure, then, I've but 2s., and my companion 1s. in the world." Magistrate: "Then you must go to prison. If you hadn't got intoxicated with your money you'd have enough to pay the fine."

"Young man," said the prosperous old gentleman, "you say you haven't had a good meal for a week?" "I have not, sir." "And you've seen better days?" "I have." "Used to move in good society?" "Yes, sir." "Then come along with me to a first class restaurant, and I'll pay for some quail on toast. I want to learn the correct way to eat the blessed dish."

Digitized by Google

A Photographic Exposure.

And How it Showed Up a False Lover.

Leo Fox was his name, and Fox he was by nature as well as by name, though how his parents could have saddled him with such a combination as "Leo" and "Fox" is a mystery, as they were people of good birth and education. But Leo was quite another sort, and I hope I may be forgiven if I describe him as a "regular bounder."

The characteristics of this species are pretty generally known, so I need not enlarge on them, but curiously enough there was in this young man also a vein of pure cunning; he thoroughly enjoyed deceit for its own sake, and was never so happy as when playing a double part.

You will say that I have given myself away now, and that I must have some reason for taking away another man's character.

For the best of reasons I could not do that—he simply had no character, but I admit I had good cause both to dislike him and for my poor opinion of him.

Leo Fox was engaged to Miss Angel—or, to be more correct, Miss Angela Devine—and cad as he was, I have heard him give as a toast, "The divine Angel!"

Miss Angel, as I always called her, was the only daughter of old Devine, a rich country banker, well known for his philanthropic work and temperance leanings—I had nearly said fads—but in spite of these little drawbacks he was a most charming old gentleman in all but one respect, and that was that he could not be brought to see the real character of the man to whom he had promised his beautiful daughter.

Leo's parents died when he was about fifteen. The whole of their fortune having been swept away by the failure of an investment for which Mr. Devine was responsible, he thought to make amends by adopting the lad, and in time making all fair and square by a marriage between his ward and his only daughter.

Leo was certainly as fond of Miss Angel as it was possible for him to be of anyone, and she had always looked upon him as "just Leo," and criticised him no more than we usually do those with whom we have been brought up. But after the engagement there came a change.

Perhaps I had something to do with it.

I had a considerable reputation as one of the coming men at the School of Art in the neighbouring town of Hampton, and having introductions to old Mr. Devine, I became installed as drawing-master-in-ordinary to his daughter.

My modest income was, however, by no means to my taste, and I determined to try for press work. Very soon I cut the School of Art altogether, but went over to Little Hampton village regularly to instruct my best pupil, for she had a clever turn for caricature and one day I came upon a collection of drawings in which her acquaintances figured.

There was a capital sketch of me as "Brer Rabbit," which I did not in the least resent, and Leo was "Brer Fox," and you will remember that "Brer Fox" always got the worst of it. It was a good omen.

"Miss Angel," I said boldly, "you have hit upon the truth; it is a fight between Leo Fox and myself, and I intend to win."

"To win!" she echoed, turning first red, then pale. "Win what, Mr. Rutherford?"

"You," I answered bluntly. "You, Angel. Leo Fox is not the man for you, and you shall never marry him if I can prevent it. I may not succeed in winning your love, and Heaven knows I am not worthy of it either, but at least I will save you from marrying a gambler and card-sharper who would break your heart before a year was out!"

"Do you not think," she interrupted, rising to her feet and looking down on me full of anger, "it would be well to defer these accusations till you can make them to Leo's face, instead of slandering him behind his back? Where are your proofs?

"We have known Leo all our lives, his character is safe in this house. But you, Mr. Rutherford, we have taken on trust. Are we now to search the town for testimonials to your honour, truthfulness and disinterestedness?" She turned from me and swept to the door.

"Stop!" I said, "you have given me a hearing, but only a partial one, you must hear me out. Leo may have a character in this house, but I'm hanged if he has anywhere else! Go and ask in the town if you like—let Mr. Devine ask what goes on at the 'Royal' five nights out of six.

"Proofs! Yes I have them and I mean to use them. But that is not all. You became engaged to Leo Fox to please your father. You do not love him—I guessed it before. Now"—putting my hand on the caricatures—"I am certain of it.

"Listen, Angel! You are not happy, if you were I would not speak yet. But I am going away. I cannot stand seeing that cad always with you. I have got work elsewhere, and I mean to get on. Then I shall come back and get my answer. I have loved you since you were a fifteen-year-old pickle, and I love you more than ever now you are in danger of making a ghastly mistake."

She smiled scornfully.

"Yes, Angel, in real danger; speak to your father use your eyes, your ears, you cannot, must not, marry this man."

* * * * *

I heard nothing of or from the Devines' for some months, and I settled down to my new work in London feeling a little sore that I could be so completely forgotten. And then I found that my memory was still kept green but not in quite the way I should have chosen.

Mr. Devine wrote that "he had made the inquiries I so disinterestedly had demanded, and that he was more than ever satisfied of the excellent character of his future son-in-law."

I felt the snub. Only the heroes of fiction are above snubs, but I still meant to win. Angel was not to be married till the following spring, when she came of age, and Fox might give himself away long before that date arrived.

My chance came sooner than I had expected.

Derby Day! Blazing sun, clouds of dust over everything, and a moving sea of people! What a scene! And how could any man convey any real notion of it on one small canvas. I stood chatting to a chum who had come down with me.

"Come and sketch old Greenwood," he said.

The old book-maker was at his stand and the usual types of the betting-man were round him.

Women were there too, and one gaudily dressed specimen of her class had her hand on the shoulder of a man who was entering a bet in his book. He looked up and our eyes met.

It was Leo Fox.

He tossed his hat on to the back of his head, tipped me an impudent wink, and went off with his companion.

"Nice subjects," said the pressman. "I've put 'em in—seen him before; goes the pace a bit too! Surely not a chum of yours, Rutherford?"

"He's a beast," I answered, "an unmitigated beast!"

Digitized by Google

How I wished Mr. Devine could have seen him! I would not give much for Leo's chance of marrying Angel after; the old man thought "the devil and all his works" were met with on a race-ground sooner than anywhere else. But he'd never know anything of Fox's ways, and was as likely to turn up at the Derby as I was to preside at one of his prayer meetings.

Nothing further happened till September, when I was down at Brighton. I was sketching the remains of the old chain pier when a lady passed me. I turned sharply and she started. It was Miss Angel. The strong wind had given her a touch of colour, but I could see how thin and changed she was.

"How glad I am to meet you," she began hurriedly. "Oh! Mr. Rutherford——"

She stopped as suddenly as she had begun. I took her hand and drew her away out of the wind.

"Sit down," I said. "What is it?"

"Help me, do help me, there is no one else, and—and I am frightened," she answered almost in a whisper.

"No one half so ready or able," I said. "Tell me. Is it Leo?"

She nodded, half-shuddering.

"Yes, Leo—I can't do it—I thought I could, but since you spoke to me I am afraid, and I can't marry him."

"Speak to your father, or to Leo," I urged. "They both love you in their own way—as for me, I am not disinterested, you know."

She turned her head away, but her eyes filled with tears, and I felt like a brute; after all she had come to me for help.

"Break it off," I repeated, "what is to hinder? You don't love him."

"Leo wants the money—he lost his through father, and——"

"And you are to be the compensation. I for one don't see it. Let him take the money, but break it off. Make them listen to you."

"I can't; I have tried."

"You can refuse to marry him, can't you, what is easier?"

"Yes. No. I can't; I mean I would do it, only—only they would think I have some other reason, and I can't speak because——"

"Well?"

No answer.

"Well, just because," I asked, bending over her.

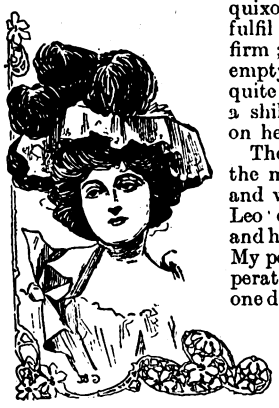
"Just because I do care," she whispered.

The dusk of the autumn afternoon closed in about us and we were alone together.

* * * * *

When I left Angel, it was settled that I was to go down to Little Hampton at Christmas.

Between now and then I was to devise some plan which would convince Mr. Devine of Leo's unsuitability as his son-in-law, and free Angel without my name being dragged into the matter. A nice task she had set me, yet it was the condition of my winning her, and unnecessary and quixotic as it seemed to me, I would fulfil it. For Angel, the darling, was firm; she would not come to me empty-handed, and Mr. Devine was quite capable of cutting her off with a shilling if she broke off the match on her own initiative.



The next thing I heard was that the marriage was being hastened on and was to take place at Christmas. Leo evidently suspected something, and had no intention of losing the cash. My poor little girl! I was getting desperate, barely a month to work in. Then one day in Regent Street a sudden idea struck me and I made my plans.

* * *

Everything was in train. I flattered myself that I was about to make it hot for "Brer Fox." I got off by the twentieth and went down to the village with Lee, my friend of the press.

There was little to amuse him except our grand annual entertainment, a sort of glorified tea-meeting, to which all the old people, the Temperance Society, Bands of Hope, and all Mr. Devine's friends who approved of philanthropic fads, were invited.

The village and the "Quality" made merry together, and the show included niggers, carols, recitations, the village choir, and, as a great and crowning finish, Animated Pictures.

Nervous old ladies predicted a second Paris fire; as for me, I shouldn't have minded a little flare up, which would enable me to rescue Angel while Leo ran away. But it might have been awkward if Leo rescued her instead, so on the whole I thought we would skip the fire.

The great evening came at last. Of course Lee and I were in the reserved seats, and I took care to sit just behind Mr. Devine and his party, but as we came in late while the gas was low, the old man had not the slightest idea that we were there.

Wild bursts of applause greeted the living pictures—a perfect hurricane of bravos, with stamping and clapping showed their appreciation of Jubilee Day.

"An' I shouldn't wonner," said a queer old biddy behind me, "if there worn't nobody so glad when it were all over, as pore ole Victoria 'erself!"

We were getting towards the end of the show now, and I held my breath as I waited. I furtively watched Leo Fox. He could not see me save by turning right round in his seat. He was between Mr. Devine and Angel, and he took advantage of the excitement to steal his arm round her waist and whisper in her ear. Of course it was pretty nearly dark, but I saw him, and saw also the shudder with which she drew herself away from him.

Brute that he was! How many other girls had he embraced in similar fashion. I could scarcely keep from hauling him out of his seat by main force. Then Lee chuckled in my ear.

"Time's up!" he said, with a sardonic grin, as he pointed to the screen.

The Derby Race-course was now to be seen. A horrified murmur broke from Mr. Devine; he had not bargained to be present at a Derby, but he could not help himself, it was too late to stop the show.

All at once the Squire, who was sitting on the other side of Angel, exclaimed in a loud voice:

"By Jove! There's Leo Fox!"

"Where? What? Bless my soul—so it is! To the very life!" stuttered the Vicar, as he nudged Mr. Devine. "I say, Devine, I never thought Leo——" He stopped short, remembering Angel.

"Cries of "Oh! I say, look at Mr. Fox!" "Who's the lady?" "I say, he's stuck fast." "Well, I never! Who would have thought it of Mr. Fox?" rang through the room.

One of the pictures had caught for a moment, and a corner of the race-course stood out distinctly; in the foreground was old Greenwood on his stand speaking to a man in a loud check suit. A woman at his side threw her arm over his shoulder. He was just entering a bet; as the obstacle was removed and the pictures glided on across the screen, he tipped his hat to the back of his head, winked to someone out of sight, and vanished.

The final scene where the crowd swarms over the course, flashed by as the murmurs of surprise went round the audience and the lights turned up with a glare, showed to all Angel's white face and Mr. Devine's look of fury.

It was a photographic exposure, and we had every reason to be gratified with the result.

On Christmas Day, Mr. Devine and Lee sat smoking together, and Angel and I were alone by the fire, she vowing that she never, never would be such a coward again; and I assuring her with equal emphasis, that she never, never would have the chance again.

N. Murrell Marris.

Digitized by Google

HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA.

By Lady Peggy Carstairs.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

LADY PEGGY CARSTAIRS. A widow, who, having lost all her money in a bank failure, undertakes to chaperon Belinda.

BELINDA NORTH. The beautiful daughter of Hardy North, an Australian millionaire.

DUKE OF EASTACRES. A comparatively penniless suitor for Belinda's hand.

DAVID CARR. A young engineer, with whom Belinda is in love.

LADY HONORIA. Sister of the Duke of Eastacres.

STANLEY FORBES. A famous barrister.

ALPHONSE HERVÉ. An eminent French artist in love with Belinda.

CRAWLEY DAVENANT. An old friend of Lady Peggy.

We Stop at Monte Carlo.

THE next day Belinda came to me in great distress about the loss of the medal. She explained that it had to her, a sentimental value, that she would take any trouble, go to any expense to secure its return.

"It may have fallen on the floor of the carriage," she said. "Lady Peggy, may we not drive back to Florence so that I can search for it?"

Her appeal convinced me that whoever had abstracted the coin from my jewel-case, it was not Belinda. I consented to the proposed search, and took advantage of her absence with Honoria to thoroughly overhaul the latter's luggage—Mark had forwarded his wife's wardrobe before we left Florence.

I guessed beforehand that my investigation would be fruitless; not for an instant was it possible to credit Honoria with sufficient ingenuity to have entered my room and abstracted the keys without my knowledge. All the same I thought it better to make assurance doubly sure, and, as I say, I turned out her ladyship's belongings, but to no effect.

Next, I directed my attention to the innkeeper and his household. Here I met with no better success. Mine host was an elderly man of immense girth, who could not go upstairs by reason of his corpulence. His mother, an aged crone, and two peasant women, formed the staff of the establishment. It was idle to imagine that any one of them could have taken the coin.

I had to leave the problem unsolved. It was a long time before I discovered the whereabouts of the bronze token. I paid dearly for the knowledge.

We journeyed but slowly through Italy. Belinda's health was flagging, and she could not stand prolonged fatigue. We arrived at Nice the end of October, putting up at an exquisite little villa which Madame D'Astrea had placed at our disposal.

Belinda cared but little for the town, she was inspired with a love for the blue waters of the Mediterranean, however, and spent all her time upon the water.

The young Earl of Carmegan, who, with his mother, was staying at Monte Carlo, placed his yacht at our disposal. Often of a night—one of those exquisite southern nights when the air, laden with a thousand perfumes, fans the cheek like a caress, when the sky of wonderful clearness is jewelled with stars—we would sit on deck watching the lights of Nice in the distance.

The town appeared in the form of a string of lights, and in the middle of this string the building called Gêtée Promenade, shone like a gigantic lantern. As we came nearer each of the lights changed into a fiery pillar shivering on the moving line of the shore.

Sometimes, with gradually increasing motion, we shot past luxurious private yachts, fitted with all the ease and elegance of a bijou residence in Mayfair; past ironclads, whose enormous bodies were outlined harshly on the opalescent sky.

The deck of H.M.S. Conqueror, decorated with multi-coloured lanterns, and wreaths of roses stretched from slim Venetian poles, shone in the distance.

The officers were giving a ball, the band was playing, the sound of soft music and gay laughter came over the water. Nice is the paradise of the yachtsman, there he will meet vessels, world-famous for their speed, the elegance of their build, the luxury of their fittings.

Nice is no longer a favourite with the best people in Society. The consumptives have invaded the place and cast a gloom that even the bright sunshine cannot wholly dispel. The British colony is made up of the great middle-class, with a sprinkling of third-rate titles, who eke out a wretched income by introducing parvenues into what they term Society!

The first week in November we arrived at Monte Carlo. We drove from Nice by the road called Old Corniche, which stretches along the rocky shore.

The view is wonderful; to the right one looks upon the blue depths of the Mediterranean, sparkling like an immense turquoise in the sun. The roofs of the villas scattered along the shore, peep through thickets of eucalyptus, masses of almond blossom, and green and leafy palms.

Huge bushes of heliotrope scent everything with an exquisite fragrance, the fragrance of the orange blossom is in the air, and the sun—the glorious southern sun—is above all.

And this in a month when the good people of London are smothered with fog, and mud, and misery. You may shake your head at us, my dear middle-class matron, but confess you envy us in November.

We stayed at the Hotel de Paris. The chef there is devoted to me. Ever since I paid him a special compliment upon his stewed ortolans—they really are divine—he has looked forward to my yearly visit with the pleasure a great artist feels for appreciative admiration. The hotel is like most others. Fashionable hotels differ very little—they are all well appointed, perfectly managed, and frightfully dear!

Digitized by Google

The chief employment or recreation at the charming little principality, is, as you know, gambling. Other amusements are pigeon-shooting, music—the orchestra at the Casino is world-famous—and the theatre. At a pigeon-shooting match Belinda made herself horribly conspicuous.

Why on earth those persons who eat and enjoy pigeon-pie should worry themselves, and other people, over the way in which the succulent birds are dispatched, I can't think. It seems to me that one half of the world is always annoying the other half with absurd theories. Actually I believe there is a Society for the Protection of Pigeons! Can anything be more ridiculous?

In accordance with my plan, Eastacres arrived at Monte Carlo shortly after us. I cautioned him to keep out of sight for the present as it would not do to give Belinda the least cause for apprehension. He obeyed my instructions, and neither Belinda nor Honoria had a suspicion he was there.

One afternoon, however, we sauntered down to the lawn, a large expanse of smooth, green grass running out towards the sea, where the shooting takes place. The cages with the pigeons are disposed on it in a half circle. Each moment one of them opens suddenly, and the frightened bird flies out; then the shot resounds and the pigeon falls either on the grass or into the sea, where on the waves small boats with fishermen wait expectantly for the prey.

Often it happens that the pigeon is missed, then it flies towards the sea, and, making a circle, returns, seeking shelter on the roof of the Casino.

Immense sums are won and lost over pigeon-shooting. I have seen a man miss one, two, three birds, and known that his lack of luck or skill meant the gain of twenty thousand pounds, to a stripling, fresh from Eton, who bagged his bird every time.

Pigeon-shooting certainly does not call forth what old-fashioned people name sportsmanlike behaviour. Men will turn white with rage and mortification and savagely blaze away at a wretched bird which, with broken wing, vainly tries to escape.

All the world goes to the pigeon-shooting at Monte Carlo. Great ladies, wives of the well-to-do tradespeople, and ballet girls jostle each other in rivalry for a good place. Lady Saxby insisted on entering for a match; she mauled her birds horribly but never missed a shot.

When we arrived on the ground she was finishing a match with the Hon. Ian McAlister. He had scored eighteen out of a possible twenty; her record at the moment we came upon the scene was just sixteen.

A bird flew high up over our heads. Ping—the shot flew home, the creature dropped, fluttering in agony. Another bird was loosed, and with the same result. Lady Saxby looked triumphant. Her next shot missed, however, the bird flew off unharmed. The next and last shot would decide the match. If she winged the pigeon she would win the stakes of five hundred pounds, if not the match would be a draw.

The cage was opened, Lady Saxby took aim, but the pigeon, as if dazed, remained on the spot. They tried to force the bird to fly by rolling balls upon the grass, whistling and screaming at it. The creature was panic-stricken, however, and cowered closer to the ground.

Lady Saxby called impatiently for another bird to be let loose. McAlister negatived the proposition, and declared she must shoot that one or not at all.

At the moment, Belinda, who had gradually edged near the cages, uttered a chirping sort of call. The pigeon looked about, then suddenly stretched out its wings and flew straight for Belinda, who caught and held it in her hands.

"Let it go!" shouted Lady Saxby.

"Let it go," a hundred voices took up the cry. Quite unmoved, Belinda shook her head, stroking the soft, downy feathers of the bird, its pretty head and throbbing breast.

The creature, startled by the tumult, struggled from her grasp and perched itself on her shoulder. It made a pretty picture; Belinda, with her fair hair and earnest face, turning her cheek to rest against the frightened bird.

The next instant there was a report—the bird dropped like a stone to the ground.

"They've killed Belinda!" shrieked Honoria. "Murderers! Villains!"

I put her roughly aside, and hurried to the girl.

"I'm not hurt," she said, "but the bird. Oh, the poor thing!" She stooped and picked up the mass of blood-stained feathers, and, as I live, there were tears in her eyes!

"A wonderful shot, whoever winged the bird," said McAlister. "It wasn't Lady Saxby, I am glad to say. Had the aim been the least little bit lower Miss North would have been hurt. I wonder who it was?"

As he spoke I glanced to the other side of the lawn, where stood a slight, fair man carrying a smoking revolver. I had guessed instinctively that it was he, but the emotion of the moment forced a cry of surprise from my lips. Honoria looked up, and, by a most horrible mischance, her eyes fell upon that figure also.

"Eastacres!" she said. "Eastacres!" and her face went the colour of ashes.

I gripped her tightly by the arm. "If you tell Belinda your brother's here, I'll telegraph for Mark. You hear me? Don't you dare to disobey."

She listened with the usual air of helplessness, and a sort of sullen apathy that had lately shown itself in her.

"I shan't tell Belinda," she said dully—"I daren't."

A moment later I caught a look upon her face that gave me an unpleasant thrill. She was gazing at me, at me, who had done so much for her, who had actually paid away a hundred pounds to her wretch of a husband, with an expression of the deepest malignity. I mean it, malignity. I had not thought that she possessed sufficient character to feel, much less to look, malignant.

Her face relapsed into vacuity as she met my eyes. For a moment I was puzzled. I had not injured her; even so, she was so weakly good-natured that she would have forgiven any injury to herself. Could it be that she resented my conduct to Belinda and hated me because of it?

I dismissed the suggestion and decided that Honoria's expression was one of the nervous grimaces which at times contracted her features.

I sent a message to Eastacres telling him to meet me that evening in the gardens of the Casino.

Crawley, who always used to follow in my wake, had arrived at Monte Carlo that same morning. I confided Belinda and Honoria to his care, and having left them fascinated with the roll of the roulette wheel and the monotonous cry of the croupier, "Messieurs, Mésdames, faites votre jeu," went to keep my rendezvous.

"Eastacres," I said sharply, "what possessed you this afternoon? It's the barest chance in the world that Belinda didn't see you. As it is Honoria caught sight of you, and I only just managed to stop her telling Belinda."

"Well," he said calmly—"what then?"

I could have shaken him for his assumed stupidity.

"Do you not realise that the success of our scheme, yours and mine, depends on Belinda's belief that she is free from your attentions? If she dreamt that you were here in this place she would refuse to stir out of her room. She has a dislike, a detestation of you that amounts to a mania.

"She always disliked you except at the very first, but lately, since, since"—my eyes wavered under his sneer—"well, for the past three months she has feared you. I tell you it is of the utmost importance that she should not know you are here."

Digitized by Google

"I should have thought you'd have had her under better control by this time," he said. "It doesn't say much for your system, Lady Peggy, if the girl has still sufficient will to defy you. Still, I'm glad to hear she's afraid of me. It was her defiance that used to so enrage me."

"Look here," he added quickly, "why not turn this fear to good account? I've an idea, risky, but not more so than yours. And it has this advantage, that I can put it into practice very soon. No, I shan't tell you what it is. You must wait—like Belinda."

He left me much perturbed. There was that in his manner which alarmed me. I profoundly mistrusted Eastacres.

On my way back to my charges I passed through the Casino; vast salons, each with their tables thronged and crowded, blazing with light, that fell upon the smooth green cloth—a strip of sward, where gamblers nightly fight a duel with Chance—the faces of the players and their hands.

Your habitués of the tables preserve calm, impassive faces, whether luck be for or against them; only by the tremor of the hands, the twitching of the fingers, do they betray themselves. There they sit, night after night, a crowd of Poles, Russians, British, French, men and women of every nationality, all going to conquer the bank that every day repulses and breaks the crowds as a rock breaks the waves of the sea.

Great ladies elbow women from whom, outside the Casino, they withdraw their skirts; delicate, high-bred beauties discuss the chances of the game with thick-lipped Jewesses, whose necks and arms blaze with diamonds, and whose breath reeks of garlic.

The atmosphere grows hotter and hotter, the faces of the players whiten in the heat of the air and their own passions, and over all, like the voice of Fate, sounds the cry of the croupier:

"Faites votre jeu, Messieurs et Mesdames, faites votre jeu!"

"On red, on black," the voices cry round the table, piles of gold, of notes are pushed in position, and then the roulette wheel revolves slowly at first, then quicker.

"Rouge gagne, rouge gagne," cries a little blonde who has staked her night's winnings upon red. And then the wheel slackens. "Rouge perd." With a cry that she cannot strangle the blonde hurries from the table. The croupier rakes in her gold, and a tall, sallow woman steps into her place.

Some of the players are to be found year after year at the Casino. The Countess of Carmegan is familiar as the roulette wheel itself. A tall, slim woman of eighty-five, she presents a wonderful spectacle.

As you enter the room the elegance of her figure, the distinction of her bearing, impresses you. Exquisitely dressed, as a rule in pure white, with costly jewels and rich laces, at first sight you take her for a woman in the twenties. Her face is pink and white as a girl's, her hair a pale gold, her lips and teeth fresh as youth itself.

But when she looks at you, you feel a shiver almost of repulsion. Out of that youthful face stare eyes that are so old that you have a longing to cover them. She has spent a fortune on her frail old body. A new skin has been grafted on her face, and her hair has been preserved to a marvel. But all the wealth, all the knowledge of the world, can't alter her eyes. They bring a shuddering sense as of death on the beholder.

Within a few feet of her used to sit the Marquess of Dalesford and his brothers, the three finest men in Warwickshire, all of them over six feet, handsome, and careless.

Since then, the time of which I write, two are dead, the third gone under. The Marquess broke his neck trying to jump the family vault in the old churchyard in Warwickshire; the second shot himself; and the third, worst fate of all, married a nursery governess!

When certain great personages visit Monte Carlo incognito or otherwise, the management arrange that they shall play in private undisturbed and undetected. The late Empress of Austria had a salon reserved for her exclusive use, none entered it but her Majesty and those guests she honoured by an invitation.

My dear friend, the Countess of Warminster—her husband's position in the Cabinet at home prevented her gambling at the public tables—had a delicious little cabinet in the Casino where she and her friends played baccarat and roulette till the sun was high in the Heavens.

It was an exquisite apartment, the walls lined with cream satin, with a moulded gilt arabesque along the top; the floor was of parqueted oak, with thick Persian rugs; on the mantelpiece was a silver clock which unceasingly told the hours.

To this salon the Countess had easy access. Her beautiful villa above the town was built at an angle of the Casino, and a little private lawn stretched down in front of it to a terrace overlooking the sea. Crocuses, narcissi, and daffodils were sown all over the grass, and in the early Spring it used to look like a foreground of a pre-Raphaelite sketch.

In the pauses of play one could hear from the terrace a troupe of minstrels, or a famous violinist.

I visited the Countess' cabinet on my way back to Belinda. There were some six or eight people present, four men and as many women. Most of them were known to me and returned my greeting with enthusiasm. One of the men who had been looking out of the open window, suddenly drew in his head and turned to me abruptly.

For a moment I was too astonished to speak. I had need to be—it was my son-in-law, Millicent's husband.

"My dear Eric," I said, "this is very nice. Where is Millicent?"

He made no offer to take my outstretched hand, but plunged his own deep in his pockets.

"I don't know," he said.

"Eric!" I glanced at him suspiciously.

He was a man of coarse tastes, and—so Millicent said—took more brandy than was good for him or agreeable to his friends. Brandy makes a man brutal. I could not detect any signs that he had been drinking, however, and decided he was sulky. Possibly Millicent had upset him. She was trying at times, and more than a little extravagant.

"Is Millicent in Monte Carlo, Eric?" I asked, under my breath.

"Is she at Monte Carlo?" he repeated, jeering. "Don't you know?" he turned upon me fiercely—"don't you know that she's here? She and that underbred cur of a musician."

I caught my breath and felt the blood rush to my cheeks. The women looked at me maliciously. Courthorpe had been one of the catches of the season, and they have never forgiven me for marrying him to Millicent.

"If you want her," he continued, "find her. Don't ask me about her, that's all." He lounged off in his ungraceful fashion. I turned, distressed, to the Countess of Warminster.

"What is it?" I murmured. "I cannot understand what he means?"

"If you asked me who it was, Peggy, the question would be more to the point. Millicent's intrigues are notorious. She has had more scandals since her marriage, not a twelvemonth ago, than I've concealed in my whole life.

"At present, my dear, I believe it's Felix, the singer. Eric takes it rather foolishly, doesn't he? All the same, I think she should be careful. Talk to her, talk to her, my dear. You never know what men will do. Courthorpe's an awful beast, he might put her in the divorce court."

"Where is Courthorpe staying? I suppose she—she hasn't left him?"

"I think not — yet. They're at the Hotel Anglaise, Millicent is here to-night. I fancy Courthorpe was watching her and Felix just now on the terrace."

I needed no second word, but hurried out to the terrace—that beautiful place where, at the time England is the home of snow, one can look upon orange groves, rose trees, gardens of lilies, groves of wild olives, with the sea like a lake of lapis lazuli beyond.

Digitized by Google

I found my daughter by herself. She had dismissed Felix, and was leaning moodily against the balustrade. Our interview was very painful. I urged upon her the foolishness, the wickedness of flying in the face of Society, and aggravating Courthorpe. She replied with an audacity worthy of Belinda herself.

"I am tired of Society and its subterfuges, its shams and its lies. I may do what I like it seems, so long as it is not done openly, in the light of day. I may have twenty lovers if I wish, so long as I behave discreetly, and do not endanger my marriage settlement. I have lived a life of torture since you married me.

"My husband is a brute—a brute, I say! Look!" She lifted the lace sleeve of her evening gown and pointed to an ugly bruise upon her arm. "Not only does he strike me, but he abuses me, hurls such names and epithets at me that no brave, no decent woman would endure. My life is one never-ending torment; not an hour, not a minute I am not subject to his insults, his abuse."

"You must have give him cause, Millicent. Eric is a jealous man."

"I have given him no cause!" she cried. "I am not like those other women, who smile to my face and vilify me behind my back. Felix is my friend, my best friend, no more."

"You will have to give him up, Millicent."

"Never!" she answered defiantly.

"What are you going to do, then, you foolish and misguided girl?"

"I'm going to leave my husband," she said proudly, "the man who has made my life a burden for the past year."

"Millicent!" I caught and held her tightly.

"Don't mistake me, mother. I shan't leave Courthorpe for any other man. I'm going to live by myself, that's all. I'm going to make my own way in the world, as I should have done long ago but for you."

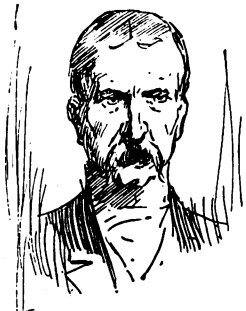
"You are mad!" I said, "quite mad!"

She laughed and shrugged her shoulders.

"I knew you'd say that," she returned. "Still, I mean it. I mean to study painting, to work hard, hard, and earn my own living. I shall study at Duran's Atelier in Paris. You know he told me as a little girl that I had talent, and Hervé will help me. I shall leave for Paris to-morrow. I have told Courthorpe my decision. And now," she turned to me, "good-bye." She kissed me lightly on the cheek, and, before I had time to stop her, passed out of sight.

The wretched, misguided girl kept her word. She left a splendid house, threw up an immense income, sacrificed a great position—to live in a condition little removed from a workgirl, in Paris. And all because she wouldn't try to manage her husband. In my hands he would have been as wax.

The interview not only upset me on her account, but on my own. If the worst came to the worst I always thought I could make my home with Millicent. Now even that refuge was denied me.



THE DUKE OF EASTACRES

My other daughters were quite estranged from me—their husbands even more so. The blankness of despair settled on me for a moment. Then I took courage once again—and sought Belinda.

I had expected to find her sitting pensive at the tables, looking as much out of place as a saint from the Middle Ages. To my astonishment I found her in the grip of the gaming fever. She was winning, and the pile of gold before her rapidly increased.

Her youth, her beauty, and the rumours of her wealth, had attracted general attention. Women stopped on the way to their seats to touch her dress and to ask her for a number—the custom in Monte Carlo, where a lucky player is regarded as a mascot.

It was getting late, and I was anxious to leave the Casino. I touched Belinda's arm and pointed to the clock, but she paid no heed to me.

With flushed cheeks and eyes dilated with fever, and with the drug of which she took increasing quantities, she fixed her attention on the spinning roulette wheel.

The crowd pressed nearer, commenting audibly upon her luck, her loveliness, her youth. There had been a masked ball that night at one of the hotels, and, in the interval some of the dancers came to the Casino to chat with their friends, and whisper unpleasantnesses to their rivals.

One figure attracted my attention. He was in black from head to foot, black domino, black mask, with a hood of the same sable hue.

He dropped into a chair close to Belinda, and started play at once with the coolness of a finished gambler. His hands were cool and steady as a rock, not so much as by the twitching of a finger did he betray emotion when he lost or when he gained.

He played on steadily until the rooms gradually thinning were almost empty. Once again I urged Belinda to retire, but with more than her usual obstinacy she refused. This time Honoria added her intreaties to my commands.

"Come, dear," she said, "I can't bear to see you in this place."

Belinda took no notice of her appeal, and shook off the timid hand that rested for a moment on her shoulders.

Honoria, much distressed, left the table to wander up and down the room, pausing every now and then behind the black domino, as if he exercised a fascination over her.

At last he and Belinda were the only remaining players. With a courteous gesture he bent forward and said softly—

"You have won largely to-night. Are you content with your winnings?"

"I could go on for ever," she said. "It is wonderful."

"Shall we have a game to ourselves, just you and I? It will be more exciting even than roulette!"

"If you like," she said eagerly.

I judged it time to interfere, but as I approached, a sudden movement of the black domino restrained me.

"See," he divided his winnings into three. "I will stake a third of my possessions that the card which I turn up will be higher than yours." He motioned the croupier for a pack. After a whispered colloquy that individual agreed to allow the informal procedure of a gamble without the bank!

Belinda, her eyes aflame, nodded, and separating a third of her winnings, signed that she was ready.

"Cut, mademoiselle," he placed the cards before her, "if you please."

With a catching of the breath she cut the pack and held up the queen of hearts.

The black domino bowed, lifted a single card—it was the king of the same suit.

Belinda pushed over her share, shuffled her cards, and cut again. For a second time the black domino's card was the higher.

"Bring me another pack!" cried the girl. "These are unlucky cards."

But the new pack brought her no better fortune. Again the black domino was the victor.

"I should like to beat you," she said. "I could in time. I have not yet lost my pluck. I will play for my pearls."

She put the necklace on the table. It followed her gold, as did her bracelets, and all the money she could get from me.

"I hate to own myself defeated," she said fiercely.

"We will try again," he said. "See, mademoiselle, I will stake," he paused, "a hundred thousand pounds against your hand."

He touched the third finger of her right hand as he spoke, the finger on which she wore a beautiful diamond. The girl was excited, and I think understood that he meant she should stake her ring.

Digitized by Google

"It's not worth a hundred thousand pounds, monsieur, but, such as it is, I'll risk it."

She placed her hand, palm downward, on the table; the diamond glittered on her slim finger.

The black domino bowed profoundly.

"Cut, Mademoiselle!" he said. For the last time Belinda raised the cards, turning up a two of spades.

"I think I shall win again," he murmured, and, with a deft movement picked up the lower portion of the pack.

Before he could deal out his card, Honoria, with a wild cry, flung herself upon him.

"No, no!" she cried, "you shall not, you shall never win." Panting, she tore off his mask and flung it on the table.

"Look, look!" she cried, and, with a gesture of contempt—contempt from Honoria!—she pointed at him, mocking, "My brother," she said, "look, it is my brother!"

(The conclusion of this series will appear next Tuesday.)

To Smoke or not to Smoke?

If a Girl Objects to Tobacco, Should she Ask her Fiancé to Cease Smoking?

"You don't care for me one bit, although you say you do!" said Nell indignantly. "You're like all the other men I know."

"I hope the other men don't say they care for you," said Jack. "If you'll give me the names and addresses of those who do, I shall feel inclined to go round and punch their heads for them."

"Yes, punch! That's another man's favourite expression."

"Another man altogether," he queried placidly, "or one of those who say they care for you?"

"You know what I mean. You think less of me than of your dirty pipe and your wretched tobacco!"

"Another girl's favourite expression!" said Jack. "If you will allow me to paraphrase your remark."

"Oh, don't consider me," said Nell, in rather a shaky voice.

"I could argue better if I didn't," he answered diplomatically.

"It doesn't matter so much now, because I can go into another room when you begin to smoke."

"Yes," groaned Jack; "and you do regularly, and I have to choose between two——"

"Two evils—the tobacco and me. Say what you mean, please."

"Two evils—giving up your society or putting my pipe aside. But you must admit that I never hesitate."

"N—no."

"And besides, I read somewhere that smoking is good for asthma."

"But you don't suffer from asthma?"

"No, because I smoke."

"I won't grumble if you'll promise not to smoke again until you have asthma."

"A man doesn't postpone saving until he's short of money," said Jack tentatively.

"But you really must choose between us. You know that wretched tobacco makes me quite ill. You're always saying you'd do anything to please me, and here's a chance. For it would please me a very, very great deal and I should think ever so much more of you, Jack. You don't want to give me up and make me miserable for ever, do you?"

"My ambition lies exactly the other way, and you know that, Nell."

"Then you'll give up tobacco to make me happy?"

"I—— Oh, I never said so, really."

"But you and I can understand each other without words. You know I think so much of you, Jack, that I can read your thoughts before you speak them."

"And before I think them too," groaned Jack to himself. "You don't mean it seriously, Nell?"

"Yes, I do."

"I'll agree not to smoke after we're married except in certain rooms hereinafter to be set forth and defined, coloured pink in the plan," and Jack smiled, though in rather a sickly manner.

"I didn't think you would try to dodge out of it like that," said Nell scornfully. "Which do you choose to give up entirely?"

"It's scarcely reasonable——"

"If you cared for me you wouldn't hesitate like this. Which is it to be, please?"

By this time they had reached the house where Nell lived.

He opened the garden-gate for her and rang the bell, then he turned to her for a last appeal.

"Do you really mean it, Nell?" he asked in trembling accents. "Do you mean to say 'Good-bye' because we don't quite agree on one subject, and that not an important one?"

"If it isn't important, you can give way. All right, Jane, I'll close the door."

"As a matter of principle I can't yield altogether. I've offered to meet you halfway."

"I don't care. If you cared for me really, you wouldn't find it so hard to choose."

"I want us to start fair when we're married," he said firmly, "And to give way to your unreasonable wish now would only cause trouble later on. You would always want your own way."

"Indeed, you shouldn't say such things. I never want my own way, and it isn't nice of you to say so. But, never mind. If you don't care sufficiently for me we'll say 'Good-bye.'"

"Good-bye, then," said Jack, as she hurried into the house.

She ran straight up to her own room, for her lips were quivering and the long-repressed tears were agitating to the surface.

As for Jack, he strode down the road in a regular tornado of rage, though he refused to admit even to himself that Nell had been more than unreasonable. But as it was necessary or him to find some outlet, he kicked savagely at every stone that lay in the path, and finally banged the garden-gate with an energy that was, somehow, very consoling.

Digitized by Google

* * * * *

Nell's three brothers were sitting in the dining-room, smoking the blackest of tobacco through the noisiest of pipes.

"Is she likely to come in soon?" whispered Tom, the youngest. "Because, if she doesn't, this pipe will get me down. It's frightfully strong."

"Hsh! I can hear her now."

"No, it's someone tapping at the window—it's Jack! You go to the door, Tom, and keep Nell out for a few minutes."

Then he opened the widow. "Just a moment," he whispered. "We've got the room to look like a condensed battlefield in the days of black powder. Nell's in the hall, wait a minute, old man, and then we'll give you a leg-up through the window."

"I came to say that it's off," whispered Jack. "I don't like——"

"Rubbish, old chap! We've taken this matter up now, so don't worry yourself."

"Hello! here's Nell!" said Tom, in a warning voice, and his elder brother left the window hurriedly.

"Oh, how dreadfully smoky this room is!" cried Nell, as she entered. "You boys shouldn't use such strong tobacco."

"Just what Jack would say," says Fred gravely. "He doesn't believe in these strong mixtures, prefers light flake or some such rubbish."

"It isn't rubbish!" she said, colouring furiously. "And it's a lot more gentlemanly than your 'strong mixtures' which are far too strong for boys. I'm sure Tom isn't well."

"Nonsense!" said that young man, drawing vigorously. "Never felt better in my life."

"Then your looks go by contraries," she said wickedly. "For you never looked worse in your life. But I'm going out. I can't stand this any longer."

"Neither can I," murmured Tom faintly, as she disappeared, "another two minutes would have finished me."

His two elder brothers ran to the window, opened it, and whistled softly. Next moment they had drawn Jack up to the sill. As soon as he had grasped this, he was right, for he gripped the projecting woodwork of the window-frame and swarmed up into the room in an instant.

"Now's your chance, old chap," said Fred hurriedly. "She's gone to the drawing-room and Elsie is there with the ladies' cigarettes. Choose your time and go in and win."

"I really don't like it," said Jack doubtfully.

"Rubbish," and they took him in charge and led him out into the hall. "We've picked you as a suitable husband for Nell, and marry her you must." And even Tom patted him feebly on the back as he passed.

* * * * *

"What have you got there, Elsie? Chocolates?"

"No," said Nell's younger sister. "It's—er—tobacco. It's a packet of cigarettes."

"What!" cried Nell. "You are going to smoke?"

"I don't know," said Elsie doubtfully. "But—but look here, will you swear not to tell anyone?"

"Yes, I can promise that."

"Well, those wretched boys are always talking about the pleasure they find in smoking, so I've determined to test it for myself. You won't tell?"

"No."

"I daren't try any of their tobacco, because it's too strong, and Jack isn't here. Oh, I beg your pardon—I——"

"All right," said Nell wistfully. "Jack wouldn't smoke such rubbish as the boys do. His tobacco's ever so much nicer."

"I bought this packet of American cigarettes some weeks ago, but forgot them until to-day. They're advertised as a cheap brand, twenty-five for threepence. It isn't very extravagant, is it?" she asked anxiously.

"Elsie! Elsie!" cried someone.

"There's someone calling me," she said, pretending to listen.

Then Tom stepped back from beside the door, where he had been standing, and ran into the room. "Well, you might come, Elsie," he grumbled, "when a fellow calls for you."

"Depends upon what a fellow wants?" said Elsie, going with him nevertheless. She turned to Nell for a moment. "Why don't you try one?" she whispered. "I know what Tom wants.

"I promised to go out with him on the tandem, and Fred and Charlie are coming as well. You'll have a splendid chance, for we shall be away at least an hour." And away she ran, followed by Tom, and waving her hand encouragingly to Jack as she passed him in the hall.

Left alone, Nell stood thinking deeply, with one foot tapping gently upon the fender. Already she realised that she had taken up a wrong position. The ultimatum which had seemed so heroic twenty-four hours ago, was now a memory of which she felt rather ashamed. "I'm very glad he didn't give way to me," she murmured, and it was a great pity she didn't speak a little louder.

As for poor Jack, by-the-bye, who had received strict instructions to count twenty after he heard the striking of a match, he was beginning to "wobble" as Tom would have said.

The idea that had been with him throughout the conspiracy, now recurred with still greater force. He did not like to regain his Nell by means of a trick. It was all very well for Elsie and her brothers, to whom the whole affair was in the nature of a joke.

"I won't do it," he muttered, and turned to go.

"I won't do it," said Nell, as though echoing his thoughts, and Jack came to a standstill in amazement.

Nell also had made up her mind. If Jack liked to smoke he had a right to do so and she had no right to prevent him, especially as he was willing not to smoke when she was present. On the other hand, Nell started with a prejudice against tobacco, and to smoke a cigarette would probably not alter her feeling in the matter.

"I'll write to him and tell him I'm very sorry," she said, and sat down to the table with that intention. Jack heard this remark, and resolved to wait no longer. He walked into the room and found himself standing behind Nell, who was leaning forward to dip her pen in the ink. Knowing that the letter was for himself, he had no compunction in reading.

"My dear Jack," she wrote, and then threw the pen down in dismay. "Oh, I don't know how to write," she murmured. "But if he were here I could soon tell him all about it."

"Proceed," quoth Jack, and leant over her shoulder and kissed her.

Wal Frank.

Result of the "Verse" Competition.

The Gramophone prizes have been awarded as follows:

W. F. Pearson, 15 Shafton Road, South Hackney, N.E.; J. Perritt, 19 Russell Place, Norfolk Street, Hull; Mrs. Brownlie, St. Margaret's Manse, Hawick, N.B.; Captain Malam, Little Clacton, Essex; J. M. Andsley, 39 Caird Drive, Partickhill, Glasgow; F. Woolfall, "Meadows Hotel," Conway Street, Birkenhead; Mrs. E. B. Christie, Middletown Rectory, Tynan, Co. Armagh; H. Jackson, 10 Hamilton Road, New Brighton, Cheshire; J. H. Edwards, Rawnsley, Hednesford, Staffs.; W. Roberts, 2 New Cottages, Priory Road, Tonbridge.

Result of the "Request" Competition.

The Gramophone prizes have been awarded as follows:

J. Braidwood, 6 Gladstone Terrace, Edinburgh; R. Wright, 10 Gloster Place, Maindee, Newport, Mon.; C. Phillips, 20 The Terrace, Penzance; Miss M. Roe, 49 Newton Road, Ashton, Preston; F. J. Smart, 198 St. Saviours Road, Saltley, Birmingham; Miss F. Macintosh, Ambrose Villa, Milton Street, Southend-on-Sea; E. Moore, 69 Hamilton Road, Handsorth, Birmingham; M. E. Roe, Vineleigh, Billingshurst; H. Apps, 4 Chapel Street, Off Willow Home, Carlisle; W. Parfitt, 55 Glandwr Street, Abertillery, Newport, Mon.

Digitized by Google

BRAND NEW COMPETITION.

Starts in Two Weeks.

Cash Down. Cash Down. Cash Down.

1st Prize, £50. 2nd Prize, £25. 3rd Prize, £10.

30 Prizes of 10s. Each.

An entirely new competition will be placed before the public for the first time in "Short Stories" dated March 28th. It will be exceedingly simple, and will be open to every person who reads "Short Stories."

WHAT YOU WILL HAVE TO DO.

The competition will consist of paragraphs containing the buried names of Railway Stations in the United Kingdom. You will have to write in the spaces given the names of the Railway Stations so indicated.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to Bradshaw's Guide, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The first prize of £50 will be given to the Competitor who fills in the greatest number of Railway Stations under the conditions stated.

The second prize of £25 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in the order of merit.

THE FIRST PARAGRAPHS WILL APPEAR IN SHORT STORIES DATED MARCH 28th. ORDER YOUR COPY NOW.

CHARLOTTE: "Oh, how slippery these rocks are. Take a good hold of my arm, John, and if I slip hold on like grim death; but if you slip, for goodness' sake let go."

PARVENU HOSTESS (to stable-boy, attired as waiter for the occasion of a dinner party): "James, why do you not fill Mr. de Gluttonne's glass?" James: "Lor', ma'am, what's the use? He empties it as fast as I fill it."

JONES: "I tell you, Miss Flywings is the most realistic actress I have ever seen." "How's that?" "Why, the other night, in the 'Maiden's Moon,' she laughed so bitterly that she had to eat a piece of sugar to get the taste out of her mouth."

MRS. WEATHERWAX: "I don't see where all the money comes from for these wars they are carrying on all over the earth?" Mr. Weatherwax: "I don't know myself, but it seems to me that map publishers ought to subscribe some of it, anyway."

"GOOD-DAY, Mrs. Brown, how is your husband this morning?" asked one countrywoman of another whose husband was ill. "Well, I think he's a bit better," was the reply. "He sat up for an hour yesterday, and had a little appetite. He ate a couple of chops, a veal and 'am pie, two helpings of apple pudding, and a snack o' cheese. I think by to-morrow he'll be able to swallow something substantial."

HE: "But couldn't you learn to love me, Ida?" She: "I don't think I could, George." He (reaching for his hat): "It was as I feared. You are too old to learn."

HER FATHER (coming suddenly into the room): "Eh, what is this?" Her Lover: "I was telling Miss Budd a story." Her Father: "With your arm round her waist? Her Lover: "Er—yes, sir. It was a love story."

"DON'T talk about life insurance companies to me," said Mrs. Waggles indignantly: "they aren't any good. Why, when my poor husband lay a-dyin' I sent word to the Profitable Assurance Company to come up and insure his life at once, and do you know the heathens wouldn't do it?"

LADY: "This house would suit me, but there are not enough cupboards." Landlord: "The number can easily be doubled." Lady: "Very well, then, I'll sign the lease." Landlord (half an hour later): "George, send a carpenter to that house to divide each of those cupboards into two."

A FRENCH lady who is on her first visit to England, was walking in Kew Gardens the other day. She was, on the whole, much pleased, but was greatly shocked at the notice, which she read at every turn, that "Birds-nesting is strictly forbidden." "How severe and cruel you are in this country," she at last sorrowfully exclaimed, "that even the little birds may not make their nests in your public gardens!"

Digitized by Google

GREAT NEW SERIES. YOU CAN BEGIN HERE.

Confessions of a Self-made Girl

The writer of these Confessions relates in this series of articles the true story of her life, from the time when she left Cornwall, an unsophisticated but ambitious girl, until she made her name and fortune. Her name is well known to you.

[For the purposes of these Confessions I am calling myself Maud Cardew, as my real name is too well known for me to wish to make the story of my life public in this manner.]

MY HEART'S DESIRE.

I AM a native of a seaside village in Cornwall. As I grew up I began to tire of the monotony of the life and determined to go out into the world and make a name for myself.

One day when I was in the ruins of the Old Keep, which is on the cliffs, meditating upon what I should do were I free to carve out my own destiny, two strangers appeared—evidently tourists, I thought. They told me they had decided to stay in the neighbourhood for a few days, and asked if I knew of any lodgings. I said that my father would be glad to put them up at the farm, and accordingly they came home with me.

I was delighted to find that they could tell me a great deal about the world I was so anxious to see. And you may be sure that I availed myself of every opportunity to learn what I could, and what they told me only fired my ambitions all the more.

Their names were the Honourable Robert Lestrange (commonly called Bobbie) and Di Northcote. Bobbie had just finished sowing an over-plentiful crop of wild oats, and had been sent off into the country under Mr. Northcote's care to be out of harm's way for a time.

I told these two Londoners of my desire to see the world. Bobbie encouraged me in my ambitions, but Di advised me to stay at home. This, however, was not at all in my line, as I told him, and when he saw that nothing would shake me from my resolve, he promised to try to find something for me to do when I arrived in the great city.

Though I did not like Di nearly so well as I did Bobbie, something instinctively seemed to draw me to him and caused me to look up to him.

I amused Bobbie and Di by my absolute ignorance of the world to which they belonged, and the latter warned me of some of the pitfalls into which a pretty girl—such as they told me I was—was liable to fall. I made up my mind that I would do marvellous things, and, if possible, become a great lady of the land—a duchess if possible.

First Experiences in London.

I HAVE only too great reason to remember my first arrival in London, for it was attended by very unlooked for, and none too pleasant experiences. The train was due at Waterloo about three, and as we drew near the city the atmosphere grew blacker and blacker, until it became as dark as night.

At first I was more curious than otherwise, this being my first glimpse of a genuine London fog, but when two other girls in the carriage began expressing anxious alarm as to whether certain of their friends would manage to get to the station to meet them, I grew frightened.

For I did not even know where I was going. In a letter, Bobbie had promised to get me lodgings and meet me, and I had simply left everything to him. Consequently, if anything happened to prevent his turning up, I should find myself in a very awkward plight.

Great was my relief, therefore, when, the moment I alighted, his well-known figure loomed out of the gloom and accosted me eagerly.

"How do you do, Miss Cardew?" he said, with evident pleasure. "This is a curious welcome and no mistake. London has put on one of her extra special best fogs in your honour. No doubt it is intended as a background to the brilliancy which she knows you bring with you," and he made me a little bow.

"I was getting so frightened lest you shouldn't get here," I said, not heeding his compliment. "Whatever should I have done?"

"It would certainly have been awkward, and I did have rather a bother. However, all's well that ends well—I've got you a comfortable bed-sitting-room in Bloomsbury, and Di has got you a job. He's going to call on you to-morrow morning. I hope you'll find plenty of soap, because he won't know you after this fog if you don't."

"Is Bloomsbury far?" I asked, beginning to choke and cough. "What a filthy atmosphere!"

"Oh, you'll get used to this," he laughed. "Sometimes we can't see each other in London for weeks on end. People come up from the country to live here because they love shops, and airing gay costumes—and this is what they get."

"When the fog lifts, you'll find you're nearly as black as a sweep. You had better take my arm, because if we got separated, we should not find each other easily."

"Where to, sir?" asked the porter carrying my box. "The underground railway is the best to-day, if it's at all in the right direction."

Digitized by Google

"Twenty-six Guilford Street, Bloomsbury," Bobbie read off a card. "It's the Russell Square end." He stopped to think a minute, adding, "No, we'll take a cab. The man who brought me here will manage it somehow."

We started off at a snail's pace, into what seemed a gulf of darkness, for the fog had come down suddenly, and very few of the street lamps had yet been lit. Bobbie chatted on, but I paid little heed to what he said, being far too anxious about our safe progress.

After some twenty minutes we came to a sudden standstill, and found two large drays had collided, blocking the whole road. The horses in both were getting unmanageable through fright, and we decided it was safest to alight for a few minutes.

I did not know Bobbie well enough then, but afterwards I understood how impossible it was for him to help going into the fray.

Whenever anything in any degree "untoward" happened in Bobbie's vicinity, he was bound to be in the thick of it, from a Royal procession to a street fight.

"Don't stir!" he exclaimed to me; "I must go to that horse's head."

It was all very well in theory, but when one of the dray horses appeared to be coming recklessly towards me, it was quite another thing in practice; and I turned and fled.

As a matter of fact it had merely been extricated from the harness, and a man was leading it; but, unnerved by the extraordinary darkness and half blinded by the fog, I imagined it had broken loose, and was coming straight down upon me. When I tried to get back a little later, I was hopelessly lost.

I tried a few steps first in one direction, and then another, without seeming to get anywhere, till at last I felt too frightened to move, and more inclined to sit down on the kerb and cry than anything.

While I stood trying to pull myself together and think of a plan, a tall, dark figure groped its way up to me, and turned to mount the steps of a house close by. At the top he paused, however, and finally came back.

"Are you lost?" he said politely, raising his hat. "Can I be of any service to you?"

"Oh, thank you!" I exclaimed, feeling as if an angel had dropped from the skies; "I am with a friend who is quite near, only I can't find him!" And I proceeded to relate what had happened, and explained my utter ignorance of London.

"Where is it you want to go?" he asked, and fortunately I remembered the address Bobbie had given the cabman, telling him at once. "Twenty-six Guilford Street, Bloomsbury."

"It is a long way off," he said. "I wonder if I could find your friend?"

"Oh, don't go away!" I cried; "you will never get back to me."

"I think the best plan for you will be to come in here, and see if the fog clears a little presently," he said at once, turning again to the steps; "you and your friend will never find each other as it is now."

I thought it was extremely kind of him, and followed gladly, too thankful not to be alone to care about anything else.

He led the way across the hall, and then ushered me into a small sitting-room, which was practically in darkness. When he had lighted the gas he turned and regarded me scrutinisingly with a pair of bold, black eyes.

I felt myself shrink a little, but attempted to appear at ease, and to glance casually round the room. Before I had got half way round, however, my eyes quickly sought the fireplace, and I felt my cheeks grow crimson. That was the first bachelor's den I had ever been into, and I had not yet learnt to appreciate high art.

"Won't you sit down," he said, pushing a chair towards the fire. "May I ring for some tea; the fog will not lift just yet, and it will help to drown the taste of it!" And he rang the bell without waiting for me to speak.

Not that I minded, for I was very tired and very hungry, and the idea of tea was most welcome.

When the servant came in, however, her expression as she glanced towards me, gave me an odd self-conscious feeling; and I remember I had a strong inclination to get up and box her ears. Why, I hardly know, but what with my host's continued scrutiny, and the maid's vaguely insinuating glance, I began to wonder what I had done.

On the chimney-piece were a quantity of photographs, chiefly of actresses, and, anxious to start a conversation, I picked one or two up and inquired about them.

My not knowing Ellen Terry when I saw her seemed to amuse him rather, and he asked me in a friendly way, where I came from. I told him "the wilds of Cornwall," and he bowed, remarking. "Very fair flowers grow in the wilds of Cornwall." Then he added: "May I ask why one of the fairest has been transplanted to this land of fog?"

"I have come to London to make my fortune," I said simply. "It is rather a weakness with the Cornish."

"It seems to me," he replied; "that if you are on a similar standing with a certain young lady in a well-known nursery rhyme, your fortune is already made."

Di coolly put on his eyeglass and looked at me again.

Digitized by Google

"It is what I have come to prove," I answered, and just then the servant entered with the tea-tray.

"You must do me the honour of pouring out," he said, and I did not know how to refuse, though I felt more and more that I was in a false position. At the same time my woman's love of pretty things was sufficiently strong to enable me to greatly appreciate the beautiful silver tray and tea service, and the exquisite china; and I could not restrain a certain pleasure at the prospect of dispensing the soothing cup under such circumstances.

I had never seen a silver tea-pot before, much less handled one, and this was dainty beyond words. I was much interested also in the crest and motto on the tray, and, curious to know the identity of my unlooked-for companion.

Tea proceeded pleasantly enough on the whole, except that I wished he would not stare so; but after tea he began to grow decidedly familiar. He talked to me in an easy, pointed way that I have since learnt how to take; but that afternoon I own I felt hopelessly at sea.

Meanwhile the fog continued in density, and the problem of my next move began to assume alarming dimensions.

"What shall I do if the fog doesn't lift?" I asked at last, unable to hide my anxiety any longer.

A curious expression crossed his eyes which frightened me a little, but he only said, "Oh, it is sure to lift presently. Are you tired of my company?"

I murmured something about being glad to get home, and then he produced a large album of photographic views, and asked me if I should care to look at it. I thought it would be an escape from a rather embarrassing conversation, and assented at once.

He then seated himself close beside me on the sofa, and opened the book upon our joint knees. I edged away at once; and he came a little nearer; and this continued at short intervals until I was on the extreme limit of the sofa.

Then my sense of humour saved the situation. I burst out laughing, and, getting up, crossed the room to the fire-place.

"I don't know much about London manners," I said, facing him squarely, "but so far they seem a little peculiar. If you want the whole of the sofa to yourself, why don't you say so, and have done with it."

He laughed too at that; then got up and came and stood on the rug beside me.

"I don't want it all to myself," he said, in a voice that I suppose was meant to be persuasive. "I don't want it at all without you, you little witch."

I made no reply, but I daresay I looked a little dangerous, for he added, in a conciliatory way—"But come! What would you like to do to beguile away the time?"

I crossed to the window and peered out into the fog. "I should like to try to get home," I said firmly.

Again he came and stood beside me, and again I was immediately possessed with a desire to get to the other side of the room.

At the first opportunity I carried out this desire. He followed me, however, and for about fifteen minutes we carried on a disjointed conversation, practically chasing each other round the room. Every time he came close to me, I moved away at once; and after a few moment's pause he followed me. At last I grew very angry, and giving my foot a little stamp, I exclaimed:

"Why can't you make up your mind where to sit, and stop there?"

"That is precisely the question I want to ask you," he said at once, with the utmost coolness.

"I think I will try to get home," I remarked, turning to pick up my coat, which I had taken off.

"It is quite impossible at present," he replied, and stepping forward hastily, put one hand over mine to prevent my getting into my coat.

I shook myself free angrily, and glared at him like some animal at bay. "I shall go at once," I said, "unless you sit down in that chair"—indicating the most distant one—"and stop there."

"In Cornwall," he said, with a slight sneer, "do the men take orders from strangers in their own homes?"

"In Cornwall," I retorted, "the men do not annoy a girl as you do. Had I known, nothing would have induced me to come in here."

He seemed amused.

"This is very mild," he said. "Personally, I consider that under the circumstances I have behaved remarkably well. Ninety-nine men out of a hundred would have kissed you before now."

"No, they wouldn't," I flashed out, "for I would have boxed their ears."

Again he was amused.

"They wouldn't have minded that," he said—"they like a bit of spirit. I've a good mind to risk it myself." And he took a step forward.

"If you dare," I gasped, and he halted.

"It isn't that I daren't," he said, "but you look so extraordinarily fine, I don't want to spoil the effect."

"You wretch!" I exclaimed, almost crying with rage. "I would rather be in a hundred fogs than here with you. I am going now."

But just at that moment there was a peal at the bell, and as I saw him glance towards the door wonderingly, I waited.

"If it is anyone to see me," he said, "you had better say you are my sister. I will introduce you so."

"You can please yourself about that," I said haughtily. "I shall certainly deny it at once."

"Don't be a little fool," he answered quickly. "It is the proper thing to do."

"I don't care in the least," was my retort. "I came here because I was lost in the fog, and if you don't tell the truth, I shall."

"Well, it won't make much difference," he sneered, "for they won't believe it."

I felt ready to fly at his throat for that, but just then the door opened, and in walked—Di Northcote.

For one moment I was delighted, and my immediate impulse was to dart forward. Suddenly, however, I felt myself grow hot with an unaccountable sense of guiltiness, and stood still silently.

"How do, Trevor?" he said, in his slow, lackadaisical fashion. "I though I'd——" Then he caught sight of me.

He made no exclamation at all, but he just stood still and looked at me. After the first few seconds, he coolly put on his eye-glass and looked again.

I grew hotter and hotter, though I was not aware that I had done anything to be ashamed of, and I tried to look straight back into his face.

"This is a most unexpected pleasure, Miss Cardew," he said sarcastically. "I did not know you had any friends in London."

"I had not," I blurted out. "I got lost in the fog, and this—this—gentleman," I hesitated purposely, "brought me in here."

"Oh, indeed!" with that same, delicate sneer, "And pray where is our friend Bobbie?"

"I don't know. We got separated, and I could not find him."

My rescuer then joined in.

"The lady was just outside my door," he said, "and I asked her to come in and wait a little, as it was impossible to find anyone, or get anywhere, just then."

Digitized by Google

"Oh, I quite understand," said Di, speaking very deliberately, "except that the fog has been practically nothing for quite half an hour."

"He said it was just as bad," I exclaimed. "I wanted to start long ago."

"Well you can do so now. I will take you to Bloomsbury myself. I just ran in, Trevor, to ask you to call at Queen's Gate to-morrow morning about those theatricals. There's a hitch somewhere, and the old Dowager wants to see you particularly."

"Right you are!" replied Trevor. "I'll go round early."

I had got into my coat by this time, and now turned at once to the door.

"Good-bye, Miss—Miss——?" said my late host, then paused and held out his hand.

"Good-bye!" I said frigidly, and with the slightest possible bow, hurried forward.

"I hope you will allow me the pleasure of seeing your fair friend again," he said to Di Northcote, as we stood waiting for a hansom. Something in his tone made me bite my lips angrily, and I saw Di flush slightly under his white skin.

"That will be entirely as Miss Cardew pleases," he answered coolly, and with a careless good-bye, escorted me down the steps.

"What a hateful man!" I exclaimed, as we drove off. "Are Londoners all like that?"

"I don't know that Londoners are very different from other men," he replied. "In most cases, what a man is depends a good deal upon whom he is with."

"Do you mean to imply?" I began indignantly.

"I don't mean anything," he said, "beyond a word of warning; but I should like to know what Bobbie is doing all this time? He ought to know how to take care of a girl better than this."

"It wasn't his fault. Besides, I am quite capable of taking care of myself."

"There I beg to differ. No girl who would go alone to the chambers of such a man as Cecil Trevor, or, indeed, to any strange man's chambers, is capable of taking care of herself!"

"You talk as if I went on purpose," I cried indignantly. "I believe you think——"

"Oh, no, I don't," he said carelessly. "I never think anything; it is far the wisest plan. Here we are, I daresay Bobbie is inside, awaiting the next turn of events."

He was quite right, for almost immediately his boyish form appeared in the doorway.

"Good Heavens, where have you been?" he exclaimed, grasping my hand. "I've had an awful time. It was no use looking for you in the fog, so I just came here and waited, hoping you would do the same. I never want such another hour in my life. And where, in the name of fortune, did you pick up Di?"

While he was still talking he led me into the room he had taken for me, and Mr. Northcote followed.

"I shall have to go," said the latter. "I have a dinner on to-night, and it is very late as it is. Good-bye, Miss Cardew, I will call to-morrow at eleven o'clock to tell you about the post I have secured for you." Then he nodded casually and hurried away.

"Well, what happened?" said Bobbie. "Sit down and tell me all about it."

He was lounging on the table himself, swinging one foot and regarding me questioningly. I told him how it was I got separated from him, and how I was frightened, and someone came to the rescue. When I related my going into the stranger's rooms, he muttered a surprised "By Jove!" then looked amused, in spite of himself.

"Mr. Northcote seemed angry," I said. "There was nothing very dreadful about it, was there?"

"Not under the circumstances, but it was rather rash. You don't happen to know who the chap was, do you?"

"Mr. Northcote called him 'Trevor.'"

"What! Cecil Trevor?" he cried quickly.

"Yes, that was the name—why?"

He gave a long, low whistle.

Then he threw back his head and burst out laughing.

"By Jove!" he exclaimed. "You have been into the lion's den. He's one of the worst men in London. I can't help laughing, it's really awfully funny to think of you going there. I'd have given a week's income to have seen Di's face when he found you. He simply hates Trevor—hates him like smoke. Oh, it's too funny!" and he laughed again. "I believe he would rather have found you at the police-station. Oh, good old Di! No wonder he looks distant and sarcastic!"

"Who is Mr. Trevor?" I asked, unable to resist a little curiosity.

"Not anyone who need interest you," said Bobbie, with boyish peremptoriness. "He's a bad lot!"

"He has some nice things," I said, a little mischievously.

"Oh, very likely! He's a duke's grandson, and he's got the 'oof,' but he's a low-down cad all the same. I don't think anything could have riled Di more than finding you with him."

"I don't see what it has to do with Mr. Northcote," I said obstinately. "I am not under his wing, and I am not going to be dictated to by him. He is very domineering. I don't like him."

"Oh, Di's all right! He's one of the best chaps going really, only he's a bit eccentric. He's beastly clever and philosophical, don't you know. That's why we call him Di—short for Diogenes. I don't know who Diogenes was, but he grew in a tub or something.

"I was so clever, you know, that they had to stop my studies for fear I learnt too much. They rather overdid it, because in the end I hardly knew anything at all."

"I don't think Mr. Northcote likes me," I went on. "He always makes me feel that he is sneering at me."

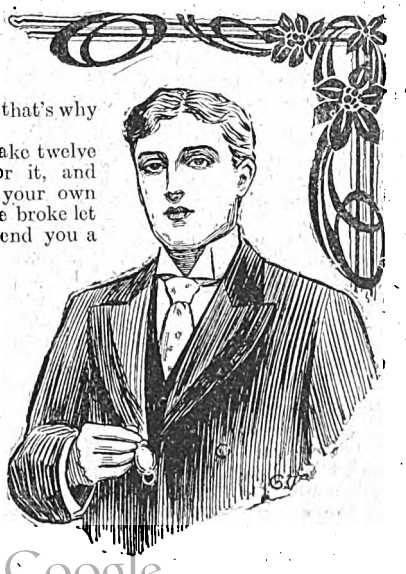
"Oh, that's only his way! He's just the same with everybody. You'll have to keep in with Di, you know, because he can do such a lot for you."

"Why can he do more than you?"

"Oh, well, you see, no one ever takes me seriously. I'm a kind of Society fool, whom they all pat on the back like a good little boy, and do just as they like with. The only marvel is no one has succeeded in landing me with a wife yet. Di, on the other hand, is a sort of high executioner. He tells everyone what ought to be done, and they do it. Even the mothers with marriageable daughters are afraid of Di."

"Why doesn't he marry?" I asked.

"Doesn't want to, I suppose! He'd take a bit of pleasing too, would Di. She'd have to be something very uncommon. Well, I suppose I ought to go now. A great pal of mine used to lodge in this house, and the landlady's rather a decent sort, that's why I took this room.



"She's going to take twelve shillings a week for it, and you've got to find your own grub. When you're broke let me know, and I'll send you a cheque to be repaid when you've married that nobleman you talked of," and he looked at me with a merry twinkle.

"You're awfully good, Bobbie," I said, not knowing how to thank him. "But I hope I'll soon earn some money, and not have to go to anyone. What is the occupation Mr. Northcote has got for me?"

Digitized by Google

"Oh, he'll tell you all about it to-morrow! That's his province entirely. Mine is to look after you generally and see that you don't starve. When I fancy you look hungry I shall take you to have a good 'blow out,' don't you know, and if you're cold I'll bring round a sack of coals.

"It's beastly jolly nice to see you here, you know," he said boyishly. "Will you come out to-morrow afternoon to explore a bit of London?"

I agreed readily, and he went off looking very pleased.

I remember that first night so well. I had practically forgotten the unfortunate incidents of the day, and was all eagerness for the future. The very last thing I stood before the glass and looked at myself for a long time.

"Maud," I said, addressing my reflection, and gazing hard nto my own eyes, "remember, you are never to lose heart. Whatever goes wrong one day, make the best of it, and begin again. Pluck is the best friend you can have just now. Never be afraid, and you are sure to succeed. You have come to London to be famous, and you've got to do it all yourself." I threw back my head and laughed—it was a laugh of triumph.

"You have beauty, Maud," I said to the girl in the glass. "Beauty and brains, you needn't be afraid.

"For beauty is power," I finished, "and power is the thing that matters."

Well, I am not a duchess yet, but I am not ashamed to look that eager, ambitious girl in the face to-day, and that is saying something. What happened when Di Northcote called the next morning I must leave until another day, for I am expecting Bobbie, and if I don't want him to make his fifteenth proposal, I must have all my wits about me.

Not that I don't love him, for I do very much; I think he is just the sweetest boy alive. If I could dig a big hole (it would have to be a big one), and throw all my ambitions and aims into it, I would go up to the altar some fine morning with Bobbie, and we should come away the veriest couple of careless children that ever entered the holy estate of wedlock.

For Bobbie never knows anything about his affairs, and I know still less about mine. One month he will spend like a millionaire, and the next he will not have sixpence.

As for me, Di Northcote manages my money affairs. I really don't know why he should, for we are often not at all good friends, but somehow it answers well, and we just let things bide.

Sometimes when I am very bitter, I say I will break away from him, and I hold forth to myself, or Bobbie if he happens to be there, at great length about my innate hatred of him.

Bobbie always laughs and tells me not to be a fool, and "myself"—well, I can't understand "myself," only I am inclined to think she likes the man better than he deserves or else she is afraid to risk doing without him.

Heigho, but it's a weary world sometimes, even in the midst of success! My room is still heavy with the odour of the beautiful bouquets I brought home the evening before last.

This morning I went round picking out the dead blooms, and doing what I could to encourage the others to live on. And I couldn't help thinking they all seemed tired, as if it were such an effort to bloom in this heavy London atmosphere.

I am sometimes very tired too, and I put my face down among them, feeling like a country flower pining for its native air. I wondered for one wild moment if I would throw it all up, and go away with Bobbie to be careless and light-hearted, to make cowslip balls like children in the sun, and clamber about on the rocks.

A sudden wave of passionate home-sickness swept over me. "Shall I go?" I kept saying. "Shall I go? Bobbie, shall I throw it all up, and you and I go away together, and be like happy children in the sun?"

Well, it passed off, and I sit here again, beautifully dressed, and sip my tea contentedly from priceless china. And, if Bobbie makes that fifteenth proposal presently, I shall laugh at him, and pat his cheek and say, "Win or steal a Dukedom, Bobbie, then come back and fetch me to be your Duchess!"

(Next Tuesday I will tell you about my work.)

Your Editor Chats.

At the time of writing it has not been possible for me to receive any opinions on the merits of the two new features of last Tuesday's Short Stories—"Held Apart" and "The Confessions of a Self-made Girl"—but I have no fears that they will not be well received, and if they give you so much pleasure in the reading of them as they gave the authors in writing and myself in getting them I shall be quite satisfied.

The new competition is announced on page 335, and, as you will see, it is very simple and pleasant. It is a most fascinating as well as instructive occupation for the long evenings, and the prizes offered will amply repay the winners for the time spent in finding the correct solutions. The Index to Stations in Bradshaw's Guide, in which all the solutions to the puzzles are to be found, is the one which is being used in the great Pearson's Weekly £5 a Week for Life Competition, so if you are going in for that you will not need to purchase a new Index.

Below will be found Lady Peggy Carstairs' reply to the lady readers who objected to the statements she made regarding middle class wives in the articles "How I Chaperoned Belinda":

"To the Editor of Short Stories.

"Sir,—Your correspondents seem more concerned to attack me than interested to defend themselves. The facts stated in the article complained of came under my notice while residing in middle-class homes. Since I fell into straitened circumstances I have lived exclusively among the middle class, and have thus enjoyed unique opportunities of studying their women. Your middle class matron may or may not be a good mother—I did not raise that issue—but I say, and most emphatically, that the great majority are neither cheerful, sympathetic, helpful, nor appreciative wives.

"Your correspondents prove my assertions to a great extent; one and all they write—not as an indignant wife whose deepest feelings have been called in question—but as wearily tired mothers, so weighed with cares for their children that they have not time even to mention their poor husband! They stand self-convicted when they plead maternal solicitude as a justifiable reason for wifely neglect.

"If the women of the middle-class would give more time to their own clothes and less to the children's, if they would expend more thought on their own households and less on their neighbours', concern themselves more with their own faults than with those of 'Society' women, their homes might prove more attractive and their husbands look less careworn. I notice that your men correspondents fully indorse my statements. Alas! They have proved to their cost the truth of what I say.

"Yours faithfully,

"(Signed) "Margaret Carstairs."

It is scarcely necessary for me to tell my readers that I do not at all agree with the views of Lady Peggy Carstairs on this subject. I publish her letter, however, to show how painfully ignorant a woman of her social status is of the genuine pleasures of life. She finds no happiness in middle-class homes—because her idea of happiness is one that does not appeal to the true British housewife. Nevertheless, I am sure that all those who have read "How I Chaperoned Belinda," will admit that money and gaiety do not bring true happiness.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

The Ghost of Gurnham Mine.

The Tale of a Narrow Escape.

He had failed! He stared at the girl, a savage glow in his dull eyes and his teeth set vindictively behind his red lips.

"I'll be even wi' ye!" he cried hoarsely at last, "I'll be even wi' ye, and that fool of a chap, as you've bin an' took up with o' late. Yo' shan't marry Tom Dashwood, not if I swings fo' it, yo' shan't."

He glared at her, his ugly, reckless face full of an evil light, and the girl fell away a little.

"Don't take it like that, Joe," she said gently. "I can't help liking him the best, and it's cruel to talk like that, even though you don't mean it——"

"But I do," he shouted hoarsely. "I do mean it. If yo' can't marry me yo' shan't marry 'im—a stranger as 'asn't bin in Gurnham six months. I tell yo' yo' shan't."

Bessie turned away and took a step across the dusty lane. Joe stopped her.

"Yo' hear what I say," he shouted again.

Bessie looked up. She was pale and trembling and afraid.

"Yes," she said unsteadily. "But I don't believe you. You wouldn't be unkind——"

He laughed hoarsely.

"Yo'll see," he cried. "It's toime 'e was gone, say I, and I tell yo' yo' ain't goin' to marry nobody but me."

She shrank from him again and this time he let her go, muttering hoarsely to himself as he watched her small, thin figure disappear round the bend of the lane.

She was met at the corner by a man, and Joe Ramsy's dark face grew still darker as he saw who it was.

"It's that chap agen," he muttered, and turned sharply on his heel and went back towards the village.

His face was very dark and hard when he came in sight of the irregular patch of small cottages at last.

He stood for a second, his eyes fixed savagely on the outbuildings and the tall chimney which stood between him and the mine in which he and most of the men in Gurnham worked. His brows knit together savagely as he looked. His teeth set.

"I'll 'ave 'im," he muttered. "'Im an' me's workin' together there a'most by ourselves in the shaft. There's on'y Bill, an' 'e'll 'elp me. 'E's got a grudge agen 'im' isself, an' I'll be even wi' 'im."

He ground out the last words aloud and as he did so a figure rose up from behind the hedge.

"Even with who, might I ask?" he said.

Joe started, turned sharply on his heel and flung out an oath.

"Mind yer own business," he shouted, and turning again strode quickly away.

Will Medwin stared after him.

"He means Tom, I'll bet," he said to himself. "He means mischief to Tom or my name's not what it is. Well, he'd better look out. Tom did me a good turn once and I shan't forget it—even though he wins the girl I love."

Her face flashed for a moment before his eyes—Bessie's face, girlish and bright, that he loved better than his life. He remembered, too, a certain look he had seen upon it, and the pain settled at his heart again. She loved Tom and what did his own pain matter? Tom once saved his life.

They had only been six months in Gurnham as Joe had said. They had come together and had remained there working shoulder by shoulder in the mine in which most of the Gurnham men earned their bread — Will, moody and taciturn, Tom, always cheerful, eager and happy.

But then he well might be, for the girl he loved loved him!

* * * *

It was black in the mine and Joe's lantern sent dim, dark shadows dancing over the dusky walls of shining coal. A narrow rail ran past him and bent away to the right. He walked along it for a little way and then turned in the other direction, followed by a man who had an uneasy look upon his sallow face.

Joe stopped at the narrow entrance and looked round furtively. They were alone at the end of the mine. He flashed his light along the narrow corridor and into the hollow cave. There was no one about. He could say what he had to say there without fear of anyone hearing, but all the same he lowered his voice and spoke in a whisper as he lifted the light of his lantern to the black roof above his head.

"Look," he whispered, "see that?"

Bill lifted his head and stared upwards. A long, narrow, uneven crack ran along the roof and down part of the wall, just at the entrance to the cave.

"See?" Joe whispered.

Bill stepped backwards.

"It wouldn't tak' much to mak' it coom down," he said, "a shout maybe 'ud bring it."

Joe nodded.

"That's it," he whispered. "Dy'e see now what I meant?"

There was an instant's silence. Bill stared hard into Joe's face, into his odd, dull eyes that were alight and glittering now.

"Not Tom Dashwood?" he cried. "You doan't mean as yo'll——"

He stopped short. He dared not speak the thought that rose to his mind, but Joe laughed.

"You'm mighty nash," he said. "Yes, it's Tom Dashwood I mean. 'E's to come in 'ere and that bit o' the roof's got t'fall on 'im and shut 'im in. D'ye see?"

Bill shivered. His face had whitened and his eyes glanced uneasily about the empty blackness. He wetted his dry lips and stepped a little farther away from Joe.

"Yo' cawn't mean it," he gasped.

"I tell yo' I do," said Joe, "and yo'll 'elp, or it'll be a bad look out for yer."

He stared steadily into Bill's terrified eyes, and Bill remembering certain unpleasant things that Joe knew, cringed suddenly.

Google

"Oh, let us off this, Joe," he cried wildly. "Yo' doan't want me to 'elp—I couldn't do yo' no good—yo'll let me off, Joe?"

Joe set his teeth.

"Yo'll 'elp," he said doggedly. "Yo'll get Tom Dashwood inter this 'ere place to-morrow night, jest afore we go up, an' I shall be 'ere ter see as 'e is shut out o' the way. It's you as'll 'ave to bring 'im 'ere. 'E won't trust me, but 'e'll come for yo', and yo'll do it I tell yo', Bill."

Bill hesitated.

"It's all for nought," he whispered after a minute. "There ain't nought t' be got out o' it. An' us might swing fo' it."

"Us might," said Joe grimly, "but us won't. An' I tell yo' if 'e's once out o' the way Bessie'll marry me, and 'er uncle's got a bit o' money saved. There'll be a bit fo' yo' on our wedding day, Bill."

Bill's eyes hovered, wandered uneasily into the blackness of the pit and came back again. From the distance came the slow click click of a pick against the coal and the rattle of a car as it rolled along the rail.

"'Ow much would it be?" he asked at last.

"I'd promise yo' ten pun," Joe said, "ten pun an' p'raps more, an' we should be married afore Christmas."

Bill's eyes brightened and grew greedy. He looked back at the corridor and away from the cave.

"I'll do it," he said slowly, and then he began edging rapidly away from the yawning cave with the loose coal hanging over it.

It would be easy enough—ten pounds easily earned—to bring a man to that spot and push him in!

* * * * *

Bessie stood with her hand on Tom's shoulder, with her eyes looking up into his.

"Oh I don't trust him, Tom. He means ill to you. Promise me you'll take care, Tom?"

Tom laughed down at her. His face was full of the morning sunshine and he showed no trace of fear.

"Oh, you're a regular woman, Bess—full of fancies. But I'll take care, sweetheart. Never fear. He won't harm me."

"But he was so savage, Tom." Her eyes were serious and she refused to smile. "He frightens me. He swore he would marry me and he swore he would be even with me. Tom, darling, promise you won't even speak to him?"

Tom hesitated.

"It might make bad blood," he said, "but I promise if you're so set on it. I could manage to work away from him—at the far end of the shaft, and I will if it will make you feel happier, little woman?"

She sighed and he bent and kissed her and then set out for the pit.

It was early morning and there was a scent of hay and summer roses in the air, and the dreary blackness of the pit as he descended depressed him that morning. It seemed to him too that Joe, as he stood opposite to him in the "cage," had something ugly in his look as Bessie had said. Perhaps it was not all her imagination after all.

Still, Joe said nothing and the day passed without a word being exchanged between them. They worked in the same shaft, almost side by side.

They were expecting the whistle to sound every moment, when Bill edged up to Tom. His eyes, shifty and blood-shot, sank uneasily as Tom turned.

"Coom awa' from th' rest," he whispered. "I want t'speak t'ye."

Tom threw down his pick and straightened himself.

"What's the trouble now, Bill?" he asked.

Bill shuffled uneasily away from him, and shut his eyes and thoughts to the easy good nature of Tom's face, and the happy ring of his voice. He shut from him the thought of how soon that voice was to be silenced, and strode up the narrow corridor with his eyes on the black ground.

"Coom right away from them," he whispered again. "Right away so's they cawn't 'ear."

Tom obeyed unsuspectingly and they turned the bend out of sight, and went on up to the little cave where they were out of earshot too.

There Bill stopped.

"Hark ye, what was that?" he said abruptly.

It was the signal he and Joe had agreed upon, and as he spoke a dark figure sprang from the ground and tried to throw something over Tom's face. As he did so Tom staggered backwards, and his lantern which he had in his hand was dashed from him against the black wall.

There was a crash and then utter darkness, and Tom felt himself flung suddenly savagely to the floor.

He fell blindly, with a stunning crash, against a hard corner, and immediately everything grew confused. He was conscious of a dull rush of falling coal—instinct made him spring to his feet, and then a sudden blackness swept down upon him.

* * * * * *

When he opened his eyes it was to look round upon utter blackness. He drew a deep breath and tried to lift his head, but it was curiously heavy and ached maddeningly. He tried to cry out and could not. His lips were parched; his throat was dry and even to swallow was painful.

He lay still for a minute or two, and then made another effort and sat up. Where was he? His eyes strained through the darkness and could discover nothing. He put out his hands and groped blindly until they came in contact with a rough, dusty surface. Coal!

He caught his breath. He remembered now, and his heart began to beat. He remembered the struggle at the mouth of the cave—he remembered Bill and the face of Joe who had sprung at him suddenly out of the darkness. He remembered the rush of coal before he had become unconscious, and a sudden fear seized him. He was still in the mine, but where?

With an effort he raised himself to his knees and began groping painfully and blindly along. He crawled forward, his eyes trying to pierce the blackness ahead and seeing nothing!

He went on—on and on—his hands and knees blundering painfully over the uneven floor, and his heart throbbing—throbbing until it seemed to him that a thousand machines were at work within it.

How long he went on he did not know, but he fell exhausted at last with blackness still around him and machines still hammering at his head.

* * * * * *

A fall of coal in the mine and some men reported buried underneath!

A crowd of people stood at the pit's mouth, waiting with anxious faces for some further news. No one could tell as yet who had lost a husband, father or brother in the cruel pit, and they were waiting.

The report came soon enough. A fall of coal had completely blocked up the mouth of a small cave and part of a shaft, and men were required at once to set to work to force a way through.

There were plenty of volunteers and they worked all night through, without success. The fall had been heavier than had been supposed and it seemed almost hopeless to find an entrance through the dead weight of solid coal.

Digitized by Google

But they worked hard and pluckily and they were still chopping at the black blocks when the men went down again next morning.

Joe and Bill were amongst them, Bill staring down into the black depths as if he were afraid, and Joe with an odd light in his eyes.

They were to work in a different place this morning—in a shaft at some distance away from the one in which the fall had taken place, and Joe, at least, was relieved.

He and Bill were side by side, and they had been working for some time with the other men at a short distance from them, when a sound made him look up. It was a sound like the shuffling of feet on the coal.

The sound came on, slowly, hesitatingly—scrape, scrape, over the rough floor. It made a weird accompaniment to the chip of the men's picks farther down the corridor, and a strange thrill ran down Joe's spine. Bill shrank back against the wall. He was afraid.

Joe stood, lantern in hand, waiting. And as he waited, peering into the darkness it seemed to him that there was an echo somewhere—a whisper that was carried from side to side of the shaft.

He drew a deep breath and something cold and clammy broke out upon his forehead. The light of the lantern began to shake and dance upon the shining black walls as his hand began to tremble, and there came to him a wild longing to scream.

Still he stood, and the slow shuffle of footsteps came nearer. Bill retreated backwards as it came. Then suddenly Joe dashed his lantern to the ground and turned.

His face was livid, his eyes were starting from his head.

He had seen the ghost of Tom Dashwood!

He turned and ran, shouting as he went. The other men who had been working with him ran too—back to the entrance and shouted wildly up the mouth of the pit.

When they got them up at last Bill was insensible and Joe was muttering something incoherent about Tom Dashwood—that he was lying buried underneath a heap of fallen coal—that he himself had pushed him in with his own hands and that his ghost was walking the mine!

The news circulated like wildfire—that the mine was haunted, and for some time none of the hands would venture down. A panic threatened, and then at last came a cage full of men bearing two bodies—the unconscious one of Will Medwin, and the half-fainting one of Tom Dashwood.

Will was carried straight to the hospital five miles away and Tom went to be tended by Bessie.

He was not hurt seriously, and in a day or two he was himself again, but with Will it was different and for weeks he hung between life and death.

When at last he was able to speak things became clear. He had been suspicious and afraid of Joe and he set to work to watch him, and when he saw him make for the cave he had followed him and lain in wait and watched.

When they had sprung upon Tom he had sprung too, dashing the lantern to the ground with the result that in the confusion Joe pushed him in the cave instead of Tom.

It was a narrow escape—so narrow that for many months afterwards Will felt the effects of it, and when Bessie and Tom came to see him she looked at his bandaged face with a shiver.

"You've saved my Tom's life," was all she said, but she could say no more for her heart was full, and she was thinking of Joe raving about his ghost in the county asylum.

Will looked up at them.

"It was only tit for tat," he said, "he saved my life once. And I knew Joe meant mischief."

Bessie's eyes were full.

"I shall never forget," she said. "It was my life as well as his for I couldn't ever live without him"—which flattery was enough to spoil any man, as Will told her.

But she says it hasn't spoilt Tom.

Annie O. Tibbits.

The Literary Editress.

And her Reply to the Humorous Editor.

The office boy came into the room of the Literary Editress, placed a letter upon her table, and quickly retired.

The busy little lady opened it mechanically, shaking it a bit as she did so and looking into the envelope for stray stamps.

The contribution was written in pencil upon a single sheet of "copy paper," and was as follows:

Office Humorous Editor,
Weekly Insanity.

Dear Miss Crit,—Please allow me to offer to you my Heart and Hand. Will you kindly consider as favourably as possible and accept if you find available, unless you are already more than supplied with offerings of a similar nature.

Very sincerely yours,
A. Blue Jester.

The little lady sat looking at the MS. for a long time, with a more pleased expression upon her face than was usual with her while examining the communications which came to her during office hours. At last she took from the pigeon holes in her desk two little printed forms, laid them side by side upon the desk before her, and gazed at them for a long time, with more interest than she usually bestowed upon them. They were inscribed as follows:

The Literary Editor of the Weekly Insanity takes pleasure in informing you that your..... is accepted with thanks.

The Literary Editor of the Weekly Insanity regrets that your.....is not available at this time. Rejection does not necessarily imply lack of merit, or that acceptance in some other quarter is improbable, but simply that what you offer does not just now seem desirable.

Neither of the forms seemed to fit the case exactly, and drawing a pad of paper towards her, she dashed off the following:

Office Literary Editor,
Weekly Insanity.

Dear Mr. Jester,—In declining unsolicited offerings, it has not hitherto been my custom to give any reasons for so doing—the great number received rendering individual comments impossible—but in the case of your "Heart and Hand" I feel that some explanation is due to you.

I have never before had occasion to consider a MS. such as yours, and, for once in my life, I am obliged to confess that I am somewhat at a loss. However, I think it best not to accept anything of the kind—for some time to come, at least.

There is, no doubt, good material in what you offer, but there are a hundred reasons, any one of which would prevent acceptance. True, I have not on hand, or engaged, anything of a similar nature, but at the same time the demand does not seem very pressing just at present.

Thanking you for the privilege of being allowed to consider your offering, and with regret that I do not find it available,

I remain, yours very truly,
Laura Crit.

P.S.—On sober second thoughts and a second reading, I have changed my mind; and, though not available just at present, if you care to wait a year or so for publication, will accept, with thanks, the "Heart and Hand" you offer. L. C.

And Miss Crit folded the sheet methodically, frowned slightly because Mr. Jester had neglected to inclose a self-addressed envelope, and a moment later the office boy was speeding down the corridor with a message which made the Insanity's humourist happy.

Arthur Worksop.

Digitized by Google

A 'Bus Driver's Story.

A Romance from Real Life of which he was a Witness.

THE other day I overheard a lady say to her companion as they sat on the front seat of my 'bus: "Dear me! how very monotonous the life of a 'bus driver must be!"

Her friend agreed with her, and they fell to thinking of other things. I couldn't help smiling to myself as I slowed up for a fat woman in blue, who was running frantically down a side street to catch my 'bus. I remembered the lady's remark as the fat woman climbed pantingly up the step and found a seat inside.

Monotonous? Well, yes, I suppose so, in a way. Day after day, week after week, month after month, and year upon year, I see the same streets, the same houses, the same people.

Long ago it got to be second nature for me to put on the brake, to stop and start, to wait for frantic fat women in blue, for feeble old men with canes, for worried mothers with their brood of half a dozen youngsters.

In my dreams I hear my conductor's short, sharp whistle, or his "All right," or his "Wait till the 'bus stops, lady!" which, by the way, always makes the lady cross—I wonder why?

Yes, I suppose a 'bus driver's life might be considered monotonous, but—well, we don't have much time for reading except the daily paper, but we sometimes see, lived out before our very eyes, a love story—a comedy—sometimes a tragedy.

It is more interesting than all the novels in the bookseller's shop!

They are live men and women—human, oh, how human!—creatures of flesh and blood, of joys and sorrows, of ups and downs; in fact, just commonplace, everyday people—like a 'bus driver, for instance. It is the best reading in the world, and books like these a fellow can read and earn his bread and butter at the same time.

When I first began to notice her she was a modest, brown-eyed little girl of perhaps seventeen, with an armful of dreary-looking books, going to school.

She always rode on my 'bus in the morning. There were always several school girls on the 'bus laughing, chattering, eating sweets—some of them—and casting coquettish glances—some of them—at my conductor, a good-looking young fellow.

They never gave me any of those laughing glances out of the corner of blue eyes or grey, for I'm old enough to have a girl of my own at school. God bless her! and there is a good sprinkling of silver in my hair.

But the little brown-eyed girl I'm telling you of—the other girls called her "Ruth"—was modest and quiet and well-bred—always.

You couldn't look at her without thinking of something pure and clean—a wild rose or a violet, or some such thing.

You wanted to pat her shoulder, or smooth her brown hair, or be good to her in some way or other. Now, you wouldn't believe a 'bus driver would be so susceptible to the charms of a simple little schoolgirl, would you?

When I first began to notice Smith, he was a clear-eyed, laughing-faced young fellow of about twenty-two. He worked in the City in one of the banks.

I don't know just what he had to do, neither do you care, but he always took my 'bus, and after a little I noticed him looking a good deal at Ruth.

Well, you know how such things will go on and on. It went on for a whole year right under my eyes. Neither of them dreamt the 'bus driver was watching and listening.

Smith was in love with the girl—that was as plain as she was pretty. Blame him? I'd have blamed him if he wasn't.

Well, it was as pretty a little romance as you ever read in a popular novel. She wasn't the flirty kind, you understand—just a dear little, commonplace, everyday sort of a girl that loved her mother and wasn't ashamed of her father!

One morning someone introduced them, and after that everything went on as smooth as glass. At the end of a year they were married.

In the first weeks of their honeymoon she often rode down on the 'bus with him in the morning, and if ever I saw a happy pair it was that pair! You'd think there couldn't a thing happen to cast a shadow on such happiness, but——

Well, they hired a pretty house on the line of route, and almost every time my 'bus passed I could catch glimpses of the little bride. Sometimes with a big, white apron on, sweeping the steps, sometimes picking violets from the bed in front of the house, sometimes chatting with a neighbour over the fence, as women dearly love to do.

Whatever she was about she was sweet and dainty and fresh as a wild rose.

I grew to look for her whenever my 'bus drove past, and somehow the house didn't look just natural when she wasn't in sight. Now, you wouldn't believe, would you, that a commonplace 'bus driver could be so sentimental?

That shadow I was speaking of a while ago—well, it came.

Smith was a jovial young fellow, and I suppose he couldn't say "no" when the gay set he fell in with said 'Come on Smith, it's my treat!"—much less when they said, "Smith, it's your treat this time!"

I suppose he began just like ten thousand other fine fellows, a little at a time, until—well, this isn't a temperance lecture, just an everyday sort of story of a man named Smith and the best and dearest little woman who ever bore that familiar name.

One night he rode home on my 'bus at 11 o'clock. I slowed up in front of the house and watched him get off. He was—well, he wasn't himself, that's all.

The front door was open and the red-shaded lamp shone out its bright welcome. A girlish figure ran down the steps and out to the gate. She had on a white dress, and her brown hair was hanging in one long braid.

She ran up to him and held out her hands.

Digitized by Google

"Jack! Jack!" she cried; "oh, I've been so anxious——"

I could hear Jack's thick voice trying to tell her something as he staggered in at the gate. And then I went on and left them. Do you know, I had a real heartache? Honestly, I did. That little girl—that tipsy fellow——

When my 'bus came back past the house, the red lamp was out. I wondered if she wasn't crying somewhere alone in the dark!

I wished I had hold of Smith; it seemed to me as though I would give a month's wages to shake him till his teeth chattered! And still—poor fool! his worst fault was his unfailing good-nature and his weakness of will.

Often and often after that I had to see the little tragedy played over again. She would come out to the street to meet him—always. Once, when he was worse than usual, she turned up to me such a white, pleading little face that I choked all up. I tell you, if ever there was heartache in a pair of brown eyes, I saw it that night.

After a while Smith lost his position at the bank, and hung about at home for a while with nothing to do. When he kept away from the city and his gay friends, he seemed to do better.

I saw him at work, mowing the lawn in his shirt sleeves, tying up her rose bushes and making lettuce and onion beds in the small garden at the back of the house.

She was sometimes out with him in her pink sunbonnet, helping here and there, and watching him with sad, brown eyes. Strange how two short years can take the sparkle out of a pair of brown eyes and the rose colour out of a face!

One day the doctor's horse and trap stood at the gate, and it looked strangely quiet about the place.

A few days later my heart gave a sudden jump as I went by, for out on the line, at the back of the house, hung a lot of snow-white baby clothes—little shirts and dresses, you know, and all that sort of thing—and there was a motherly old face at the window, smiling over a little bundle of white flannel on her lap. You see, the house is near the street, and a fellow can't help seeing.

Well, do you know, it's a fact that what even those soft, brown eyes couldn't do with that fellow Smith, a pair of little red fists did do. It's a fact that Smith braced himself up and became a good deal of a man.

When the baby was a week old he swung himself on to my 'bus and went back to his work in the bank. It seemed the bank folks liked him, and were willing to take him back on trial.

I smiled at the happy-faced young fellow as he sang out "hello" to me, as usual, and I said "there never was another like it, I suppose?"

He grinned all over, and blushed like a girl.

"You just ought to see him!" he said. "He's a fine, big fellow—weighs ten pounds. She's named him 'Jack,' after his dad! Original-sounding name, isn't it?—Jack Smith." He laughed. Smith always had a wholesome laugh.

Well, that was three years ago. Smith is all right yet, and I've got over worrying about him.

For a time I'll own I was pretty anxious about the chap. I've seen so many cases of relapse, and all that, you know, but Smith held out and behaved himself, like the fine fellow he is.

Smith and his wife and little Jack ride with me pretty often. On Sunday afternoon they go to the park. At Christmas-time they take the youngster to town to see Santa Claus at the big shops.

They always have a pleasant word for the driver as they sit down on the front seat of my 'bus, and more than once the little fellow has handed me down a bunch of violets with his father's own smile—a smile that shows the nicest little white teeth and two dimples in a pair of rose-tinted cheeks.

His eyes are brown—like hers—but he is his father's image in everything else. And that little woman—well, well, the happiness of that honeymoon wasn't a patch to the happiness of to-day, and I know it!

Yes, I think there are few things more monotonous than the life of a 'bus driver, but—well I don't know!

H. F. Crocker.

Better be sure than sorry.

Take BOVRIL

and prevent

INFLUENZA

Digitized by Google

SERIAL STORY.

THE ALBERT GATE MYSTERY.

A Romance of To-day.

By LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Final War," "The Lost Lady Delia," etc.

Piecing the Puzzle.

THE two waited to hear no more. They ran upstairs and Talbot would twice have fallen had not Brett supported him.

Reaching the corridor which contained their apartments, they found Sir Hubert, Lord Fairholme, Daubeney, and Mr. Winter, standing silently, a sorrowful, motionless group, outside Edith's room.

"What terrible thing has happened?" Brett asked them. "Surely Miss Talbot cannot be seriously hurt?"

The only one who could answer was Mr. Winter.

"We hope not sir," he said, "but the doctors will be here in a moment. They are extracting the bullet now."

Before the bewildered barrister could frame another question the door of Edith's room opened noiselessly, and two Italian gentlemen emerged. One of them spoke English well.

He addressed himself to Sir Hubert Fitzjames.

"I am glad to tell you," he said cheerfully, "that the young lady's wound is not at all dangerous. It looks worse than it is. Most fortunately, the bullet first struck a large bone button on her coat. This, combined with the thick woollen material, and some small amount of padding placed beneath the collar by the maker, offered such resistance that the bullet lodged itself against the collar bone without breaking it. Consequently, although the wound has a nasty appearance, it is not at all serious. The young lady herself makes light of it. Indeed, she thought that an anæsthetic was unnecessary, but of course we administered one prior to extraction and she is now resting quietly."

"You are not deceiving us, doctor? Tell us the truth, for Heaven's sake." It was Fairholme's voice, broken and hollow, that so fiercely uttered these words.

The kindly doctor turned and placed his hand upon the earl's shoulder.

"I would not dream of such a thing," he answered. "It would be cruel to raise false hopes if the young lady's condition were really dangerous. Believe me, there is nothing to fear. With the careful attention she will receive, she will be well able to travel within a week, though, of course, the wound will not be fully healed for a lengthy period."

Sir Hubert managed to stammer:

"When can we see her?"

"As soon as she wakes from sleep. We have given her a small draught, you understand, to secure complete rest after the shock of the operation. My colleague and I will return here at eight o'clock, and then there will probably be no reason why you should not speak to her. Meanwhile be confident; there is absolutely no cause for alarm."

With this reassuring statement they had perforce to rest content. The medical men were about to take their departure when Brett intervened:

"There is yet another patient who requires your attention, gentlemen," he said. "You will find him in room No. 41. He is suffering from a broken arm and other injuries."

The doctors hurried off, and it was not long before they were able to make a satisfactory report concerning Dubois.

"The fracture of the ulna is a simple one," said the spokesman, "and will become all right in the ordinary course of nature. But what happened to the man's face?"

"He settled a slight dispute with my friend here," said Brett, indicating Talbot, who was leaning with his head wearily resting upon his hands, for the accident to Edith had utterly unnerved her brother.

"Then all I can say," remarked the doctor, when he took his leave, "is that the settlement was complete. Whatever the debt may have been, it is paid in full!"

The Englishmen were now safe in the seculsion of a private room, so Brett resolved to arouse Talbot from the stupor which had settled upon him.

"Listen to me, Jack," he said. "You must pull yourself together. Don't forget you have an important trust to discharge. Our first duty is to ascertain whether or not the diamonds are intact."

He laid on the table the belt taken from Dubois, and lifted out its precious contents with careful exactness.

The men crowded around, for even amidst the exciting events of the hour, the sight of the fateful stones which had caused so much turmoil and bloodshed could not fail to be deeply interesting.

Predominant amongst them was the Imperial diamond, luminous, gigantic, awesome in its potentialities. Its size and known value rendered it one of the most remarkable objects in the world, whilst even in its present unfinished state the facets already cut by the workmen gave evidence of its brilliant purity.

Pulling himself together by an effort, Talbot advanced to the table and slowly counted the stones. There were fifty-one all told, and even the smallest of the collection was a diamond of great value.

"Yes," he said, "that is the correct number. I cannot be certain, but I believe they are the originals. The big one certainly is. It will be one of the happiest days of my life when I see the last of them."

"That day will arrive soon," remarked Brett quietly. "You and I, Mr. Winter, must sail on the Blue-Bell to-night for Marseilles. That is, if Mr. Daubeney is agreeable," he added, turning to that worthy gentleman, whose face was a trifle paler than it had been for years.

"I am at your service, gentlemen," he announced promptly.

"But what about Fairholme and the young lady?" he went on, turning to Sir Hubert.

"I think I understand," replied the baronet. "Mr.

Digitized by Google

Brett means that these wretched diamonds should pass officially out of the control of the British Government as early as possible."

The barrister nodded.

"That being so, no time should be lost. Edith, should all go well, will in any event be compelled to remain here for several days before she can be removed. You, Jack, and you, Mr. Brett, should you so desire, can easily return here from London, after having fulfilled the trust reposed in you."

"Then I only make one stipulation," put in Daubeney quickly. "The Blue-Bell will remain in Marseilles and bring you back."

Dubois Explains.

His eagerness evoked a quiet smile all round, and it was generally agreed that this programme should be followed. In the brief discussion which followed, Mr. Winter explained his earlier movements. The detectives attached to the British Embassy in Paris told him of Dubois' journey to Marseilles.

Learning that Brett was staying at the Hotel du Louvre et de la Paix, he went straight there on his arrival, only to learn that the barrister and some friends had quitted Marseilles that day on a private yacht bound for Palermo. The local police filled in some of the details, but chance did the rest.

Going to the P. and O. office to book his passage to Messina on the Ganges, he heard of Grosjean and the Turks, and then knew that he was on the right scent.

There was a touching meeting between Edith and the others that evening. She was naturally pale and weak, but her buoyant spirit triumphed over physical defects, and she made light of her injuries.

Even Fairholme was restored to a state of sanity by his brief visit, a fact that was evidenced by his quiet enjoyment of a cigar when he walked down to the quay to witness the departure of the Blue-Bell.

Before leaving Palermo Brett had another interview with the Chief of Police, the result being that unobtrusive but effective means were taken to safeguard the different members of the gang which had caused so much personal suffering and diplomatic uneasiness.

The reception of the party in London may be detailed in a sentence.

The Turkish Ambassador was specially instructed from Constantinople to take charge of the diamonds, and Talbot had the keen satisfaction of personally handing them over to the Sultan's representative, in the presence of his chief, at the Foreign Office.

The unlucky gems were forthwith taken back to their owner, and no doubt repose at this moment in a special reliquary, together with other mementoes of the Prophet, for the project which led to their first visit to London was definitely abandoned.

Meanwhile daily telegrams from Palermo assured Talbot and Brett as to the continued progress of the fair sufferer, who had so nearly sacrificed her life in her devoted championship of her brother's cause.

At last a day came when the Blue-Bell again steamed into the harbour of Palermo, and the manner in which Fairholme shouted when he caught sight of Daubeney standing on the bridge was in itself sufficient indication that all had gone well during their absence.

The travellers were surprised and delighted to find Edith herself seated in a carriage with her uncle on the wharf. Were it not that she was a trifle pale, and her right arm was tightly strapped across her breast to prevent any movement of the injured shoulder, no one could have guessed that she had recently undergone such a terrible experience.

But Brett, delighted as he was to meet his friends again under such pleasant conditions, experienced the keenest sentiments of triumphant elation when he entered the apartment where Dubois was still confined under the watchful guard of two detectives.

Talbot accompanied him. The young Englishman had by Life Was a Burden.

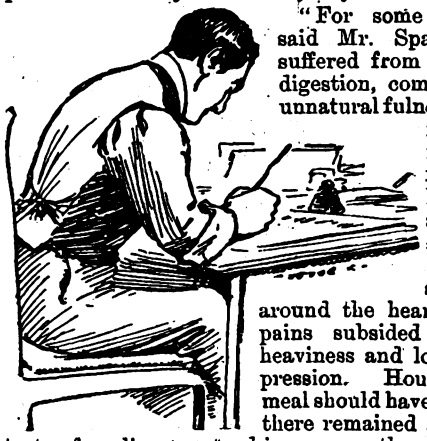
A TICKET WRITER'S AGONY BANISHED BY BILE BEANS.

INDIGESTION, CONSTIPATION, AND BAD BREATH CURED.

To all sufferers the story of how Mr. Frank John Sparks, of 76 Middle Street, Southsea, was cured by Bile Beans for Biliousness should appeal with overwhelming force.

Mr. Sparks communicated with a representative of the Southern Daily Mail, to whom he stated that he was employed as a ticket and show-card writer at an establishment in Russell Street, Southsea, and his occupation kept him in confined space and a sitting position for many hours every day without a break.



"For some years past," said Mr. Sparks, "I have suffered from attacks of indigestion, commencing with unnatural fulness after meals, followed by flatulence, a feeling of a heavy weight at the chest, sharp pains between the shoulders and around the heart. When the pains subsided they left a heaviness and low-spirited depression. Hours after one meal should have been digested there remained a disagreeable taste of undigested food in my mouth. Meantime the flatulence increased, gases seemed to accumulate, giving me severe pains moving about the lower part of the body, and a heavy, sinking sensation in the pit of the stomach. I was stubbornly constipated, and believing this to be the secret of my whole condition, I tried various opening medicines. The effect of these were only momentary and left me soon after more costive than before. I gradually became worse, until it was impossible to take an interest in my work—life, in fact, was a burden.

"A pamphlet about Bile Beans fell into my hands, and I found in it descriptions of cases so like mine that had been cured that I was led to try the Beans. They quickly rid me of constipation, and kept me free from wind and disagreeable sensation. A few weeks' continuance of the use of Bile Beans completely changed me into a bright, healthy, light-hearted fellow. Though I have been cured months now I take a Bean occasionally, as I find they keep me in splendid form. They are, indeed, a wonderful medicine."

Again and again Bile Beans have been shown to be an absolute specific for indigestion, constipation, fulness after eating, bad breath, heaviness, drowsiness, biliousness, headache, weakness, liver and kidney disorders, pains in the side, loins, and back, piles, dizziness, sleeplessness, anæmia, and all female ailments. Also for colds, chill, neuralgia, lumbago, rheumatism, and influenza. Bile Beans may be had of all chemists, or post free from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., Red Cross Street, London, E.C., on receipt of prices, 1s. 1½d. or 2s. 9d. (2s. 9d. box contains three times 1s. 1½d. size).

Digitized by Google

this time quite forgiven his enemy. He felt that he was more than quits with him. Indeed he was the first to speak when they came together.

"I am sorry to see it is your turn to be trussed up in bed, Dubois," he said. "How are you feeling now? Getting along all right, I hope."

The Frenchman did not answer him directly. A faint smile illumined his pale face. He turned to Brett with a nonchalant question:

"Mr. Brett, have you any influence with those two worthy Italian doctors?"

"Perhaps," said the barrister. "What is it you want?"

"I want a cigarette. They won't let me smoke. Surely to goodness, a cigarette won't hurt my arm."

The barrister turned a questioning glance towards the male nurse in charge of the patient, but the man did not understand what had been said.

Brett, who spoke no Italian, indicated by pantomime what it was the Frenchman required, and the attendant signified his sentiments in silent eloquence—he turned and looked out of the window. So Dubois enjoyed his cigarette in peace. He gave a sigh of great contentment, and then said, lazily:

"Now, ask me anything you like. I am ready."

"There is only one point concerning which I am really at fault," began Brett. "How did your Turkish associates manage to murder Mehemet Ali and his secretaries so quietly?"

"Oh, that was easy enough," declared the Frenchman. "You understand I was in no way responsible for the bloodletting, and indeed strongly disapproved of it."

"Yes," replied the barrister. "I believe that."

"Well, the rest of the business was simplicity itself. Hussein—the Envoy's confidential servant—was in our pay. It was, of course, absolutely necessary to have an accomplice in the house, and his price was a small one—five hundred pounds, I think. The credentials we brought, which you, Mr. Talbot, examined were not forgeries."

"How can that be?" cried Jack. "The Sultan would never be a party to a plot for his own undoing."

"Don't ask me for explanations I cannot give," responded Dubois coolly. "The exact facts of this story can only be ascertained at Yildiz Kiosk, and I do not suppose that anyone there will ever tell you. No doubt you saw for yourself that Mehemet Ali was convinced. Were it not for you, he would have given up control that night. But you and your policemen, and your confounded English notions of right and wrong, rendered necessary the adoption of the second part of the plan we had decided upon, in case the first by chance miscarried. After I left the house with you, Hussein brought in more coffee. That which he and my Turkish friends drank was all right. The beverage given to Mehemet Ali and his secretaries was drugged."

"Ah," interrupted Brett, "that explains everything. But why was Hussein killed?"

"That is another matter, which only a Turk can explain. These fellows believe in the knife or a piece of whipcord as ending unpleasant difficulties most effectually. You see they were not ordinary rogues. They pretended to be conspirators actuated by pure political motives—motives which a common servant like Hussein could not really be expected to understand. So to close his mouth thoroughly they stabbed him whilst he was taking some loose cash from his master's pockets. Then it occurred to them that when Mehemet Ali and the others recovered from the effects of the drug, they also would be able to throw an unpleasantly strong light upon the complicity of certain high personages in Constantinople. This was sufficient reason for the adoption of strong measures, so they also were peacefully dispatched."

"But where did the knife come from?" pursued Brett. "It was not in their possession when they entered, nor when they left."

"No; of course not. Hussein brought it himself, to be used in case of necessity. He also brought the pliers, which cut the wire blinds, and the material used for concealing the broken strands subsequently. Hussein was really an excellent confederate, and I was furious when I heard that he was dead. You know how the diamonds were abstracted from the house?"

"Yes," said Brett. "They were made up into a parcel and flung through the window into the park. The knife and pliers accompanied them, I suppose?"

"The third Turk—the gentleman who pulled you down on to the bed so unceremoniously, Mr. Talbot—was waiting there for the packet. But he had to hide in the park all the night, until the gates were opened in the morning. It was a ticklish business right through. I did not know at what hour the police might discover the extent of the crime. The diamonds did not reach me until seven o'clock. And then I had some difficulty in persuading the Turks to give them up to me. You see, I had my own little plan, too, which these excellent gentlemen never suspected, as they already had paid me £5,000 for my help. But the real heads of the party were in Paris, Hussein ul Mulk and that gang, you know, and by representing the danger to their cause which would result from any attempt on the part of the Turks in London to reach France, they were at last persuaded. By nine o'clock that morning I got them safely off to the docks, where they boarded a vessel bound for Smyrna. Their passages were already booked in Armenian names. Grosjean, who had no connection with the affair personally, stayed at a small hotel in Soho in order to report all clear during the next few days. He happened by chance to travel with you and the other man. It was a clever scheme, I assure you, from beginning to end. By the way, may I trouble you for another cigarette?"

(To be concluded next week.)

HOW and WHAT to DANCE.

By W. LAMB.

Containing complete instructions in the Art of Dancing, including all the latest and fashionable square dances and skirt dancing.

Price 1/-, Post free 1/2.

PEARSON'S FORTUNE TELLER.

BY

Prof. P. R. S. FOLI.

Some of the subjects in the book are:

What birds foretell—Gipsy fortune-tellers' card reading—Charms—Crystal gazing—Psychometry, advice and hints for beginners—Lucky tars, etc., etc.

Crown 8vo, Cloth, 1/-, Post free 1/2.

ORDER FORM

To the Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of
"How and What to Dance," for which I inclose 1s. 2d.
"Pearson's Fortune Teller" " " " 1s. 2d.

Name.....

Address.....

Digitized by Google

HYPNOTISM

Its Increasing Use in Daily Life, by English People.

No Longer a Secret Art, But Now In the Hands of Thousands.

A London Publishing House Distributing Free Books on Hypnotism.

Some Strange Secrets of Personal Influence Laid Bare.

The London office of a well-known publishing house is creating a deal of surprised interest here in the subject of hypnotism and allied science by the novel method of giving away books absolutely free. By merely writing to the Psychic Research Publishing Company, Temple Chambers, Temple Avenue, E.C., you can, according to their advertisement, receive by return post a most remarkable, fascinating, and instructive illustrated book called "The Power Within." This book and accompanying literature contain some most startling information, setting forth not only how to set about it to learn hypnotism at your own home, but revealing the fact that this mysterious art is now actually being used to advantage by English people in daily life.

According to the publishers, the aim of this startling little free book is to answer such questions as occur to all interested in the mysterious relation between mind and matter.

Such questions as these, for instance:—Can I learn how to hypnotise? Why is the art not more widely known? Just how should I set about it to learn at home, and practise it? Is instantaneous hypnotism possible? What is "personal magnetism," and how is it acquired? What is the mysterious secret of the wonderful success and influence of certain people who seem most ordinary in other ways? Is there really a scientific mode of life or thought which attracts health, success, and happiness? Is it possible to thus radically change one's whole life in a few days, as many claim to have done? Is it true that humanity in general is, in a sense, hypnotised by conventionality and thus blinded to splendid opportunities for success and happiness which lie on every hand? What can I do to arouse myself from this "hypnosis of custom," and rise to the attainments which my natural ability would warrant? What must I do to become a hypnotist? To develop a magnetic, attractive, forceful character? To acquire courage, ambition, cheerfulness? To kill fear and worry? To make myself a source of happiness and inspiration to my friends?

The reader will readily see that a book, especially a free book, dealing with such vitally interesting subjects as these is arousing a lively demand, and the edition provided by the Company is being rapidly exhausted. To obtain this book, which is entitled "The Power Within," it is only necessary to send your plainly written name and address, enclosing a penny stamp for return postage, to the Psychic Research Company (Dept. 437), Temple Chambers, Temple Avenue, E.C.

As the nature of the contents of this book is of such vital interest and importance to many, it is requested that no one write out of mere curiosity. It is desired to supply the book only to those having a genuine wish to be informed on these subjects.

BORAX
DRY SOAP.

You can always tell the house in which Borax Dry Soap is regularly used. There's a pleasant healthy sweetness pervading it which is distinctive. No other powder soap has the desirable antiseptic quality of Borax Dry Soap—a quality which cannot be overrated now that epidemic disease is rife.

Servants prefer it because it helps them wash clothes perfectly with the minimum of effort.

It restores the sparkle to grubby plate and culinary utensils, the lustre to glass, the freshness to woodwork and paint, and brightens all the house like a flood of sunshine.

Particular housewives buy no other.

Why not say: BORAX, and get the best?

Sold at usual dry soap prices by Grocers and Stores everywhere.

FREE SAMPLE PACKET AND SOME NOVELTIES if you name this paper and your grocer.

Facsimile Packet.

By Special Appointment Makers to the King.

The Patent Borax Co. Ltd., Birmingham.

SMART JACKET

Direct from the Actual Maker.

NOTE the Excellence of the STYLE
NOTE the Excellence of the MAKE NOTE the Smartness of the CUT and if the value doesn't satisfy, ask us to return your money—we'll do so with pleasure.

This Smart Chesterfield
MODEL 1735.
has the new wide sleeves and full sac back, supplied in Grey Tweed only. Length 36 ins. Price 10/6. Carriage 6d. extra. 10/6

A Full Dress Length of J.N. Cheviot Serge (6 yds., 52 ins. wide) for 7/6. Carriage 6d. COLOURS: Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Fawn, Grey, &c. 7/6

10/6

JOHN NOBLE LTD
148 BROOK ST MILLS MANCHESTER

MACKINTOSH'S
IS DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!
PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.
A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.
EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

CHILDREN'S COUGHS

RAPIDLY CURED BY

VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE.

An Eminent London Authoress Strongly Recommends It.

Ministers, doctors, and analysts, besides an army of less important persons, have written strongly recommending Veno's Lightning Cough Cure. The great reputation of this remedy is now too well-known to require much further proof of its vast superiority in all chest, throat, and lung diseases in children or adults. No more reliable authority on health subjects can be quoted than

Mrs. ADA S. BALLIN, 18 Somerset Street, Portman Square, London, W., Editoress of Womanhood. She writes:—"Veno's Lightning Cough Cure is an exceedingly successful remedy; it is very pleasant to take, and the relief it gives is very rapid. The preparation is perfectly safe for children."

GEO. KNOX, 256 Second Avenue, Pittsburg, writes:—"Veno's Lightning Cough Cure excels in children's coughs and bronchitis, and is especially good for children."

VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE is a new scientific remedy prepared in one of the most modern laboratories in the world from ingredients which are not generally known in Great Britain. It is most effective in both acute and chronic cases of coughs, colds, whooping cough, asthma, bronchitis, catarrh, influenza and weak lungs.

Ask for Veno's Lightning Cough Cure. Price 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. per bottle. Sold at all Chemists, or post free from

THE VENO DRUG CO., HULME, MANCHESTER.

There is a crisp £5 note waiting for the reader who displays most interest and energy in Masters' Novel Birthday Booklet Competition.

There is no element of chance!

There is no guessing!

Masters' Bridal Birthday Book

is a Free Gift, and is in itself a perfect Gold-mine of information as to Lucky Birthday Gems and their significance, and valuable hints to lovers as to Secret Posies, and other circumstances of courtship, whilst the £5 note is an actual and genuine prize to the fortunate individual who succeeds simply in obtaining the greatest number of bona-fide Birthday Signatures of friends and aquaintances in the spaces provided. The object of the Prize being to make Masters' name known as widely as possible amongst your friends.

Masters' Beautiful Birthday Booklet, a charming Natal Souvenir, is sent free to anyone applying for a copy and kindly mentioning that you saw the advertisement in Short Stories. Address your application (a post-card will do) to MASTERS LTD., 157 HIGH STREET, RYE, SUSSEX, ENGLAND.

MERLIN CYCLES

MARVELLOUS VALUE A HIGH GRADE £10 10 0 Cycle for £5 19 6. Free Wheel and Back-pedal Brake.

Brand New Guaranteed Pneumatic-tyred Cycles for £3 19 6

Merlin Cycles are always good, no matter what price you pay.

MERLIN CYCLE Co., Martineau St, Birmingham

CHICKEN HATCHING EXTRAORDINARY FOR 2/6

The Texas Egg-Hatcher and Rearer combined supersedes all incubators. Hatches above and rears little ones below simultaneously all the year round. A money-making home industry requiring neither capital nor labour. Turns 1d. eggs into valuable Chickens or Ducklings. Millions selling in America. 15-egg size 2/6; 30-egg, 5/-; complete for use. Address, AMERICAN POULTRY SYNDICATE (Room 101), 7 Albion Grove, Stoke Newington, London, N.

INCREASE YOUR INCOME.

SEND us your name and address, and you will receive Free on approval 24 of our Silver Aluminium 1903 Novelty Thimbles. Each one is prettily embossed with the inscription "Remember Me," "Forget-me-not." They are lighter and tougher than silver, never tarnish, and will last a lifetime. One million sold already.

WE TRUST YOU—
NO MONEY REQUIRED.

Sell the thimbles at 2d. each, making 4/- altogether, which forward to us, and we will send you at once the Guaranteed Thimbleoscope or other Presents of High-class Jewellery you have earned, and which you can select from our list sent with the "Sell-at-Sight" Thimbles, and we will also tell you how you can make a regular income of £2 10s. per week. Write to-day and we send to-morrow.

GOLD & Co., No. 37 THE WATCH HOUSE, Delamere Crescent, London, W.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

FREE TO YOU

To advertise S.L.S Records, we are giving away our noted Phonographs for a limited time. Write, giving full address and nearest railway station; enclose stamp.

Symonds' London Stores, 128, City Road, London.

RUN NO RISK

KEATING'S LOZENGES CURE

THE WORST COUGH

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½% repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

DO YOU WANT A GOOD CYCLE?

Write for my Lists. I deal only in the Best Coventry made Cycles, and by contract buy for thousands annually. I BUY CHEAPLY and SELL CHEAPLY.

Premiers, Rovers, Coventry Challenge, Triumphs, Swifts, Humbers, Centaurs, Eagles, Singers, &c.

The QUALITY is there. Get my prices, save money and ensure satisfaction.

A High-Grade COVENTRY CYCLE for £6-0-0.

Two Years' Guarantee. Easy Payments without publicity. Cycle sent on receipt of first payment. EDWARD O'BRIEN, The World's Largest Cycle Dealer, COVENTRY.

Doctor's Orders.

She: "The doctor said you must not call any more." He: "Did he say that?" She: "Well, he said that I needed eight hours' sleep."

Hopeless.

"Tom has proposed, and asks me to give him his answer in a letter." "Shall you do it?" "No; I will be more liberal, and give him his answer in two letters."

A Deep Laid Plot.

George: "Who is that beautiful girl over there?" Amelia: "Why, George, that's a mirror—it's me!" George: "————?" Amelia (blushing): "Yes, George."

Love, Indeed!

She: "Darling, do you love me?" He (kissing her rapturously and repeatedly): "Do I? I wish you were a two-headed girl. That's all I can say." And she believed in his love.

The Engagement is Off Now.

He (pleadingly): "Why can't we be married right away?" She (coyly): "Oh, I can't bear to leave father alone just now." He (earnestly): "But, my darling, he has had you such a long time." She (freezingly): "Sir!"

Certain Proof.

He: "You are the only woman I have ever loved." She: "Do you expect me to believe that?" He: "I do. I swear it is true." She: "Then I believe you. Any man who would expect a woman to believe that cannot have been much in the company of women."

Unlucky Mrs. White.

He (reading paper): "Here's a note about an accident at White's house. The servant girl put some gunpowder into the fire, and was blown through the roof." She (sympathetically): "Poor Mrs. White has so much trouble with her girls! They are always leaving her without giving notice!"

Wanted To Make a Decision.

Girl: "Papa, I wish you'd lock up your money and pretend to fail, there's a good old dear. It needn't last more than a week or two, and there are so many failures now no one will find fault." Father: "Of all things! Wha——" Girl: "Oh, it's all right. You see, I'm engaged to nine young men, and I've got to get rid of at least eight of them somehow."

She Was Flattered.

Mrs. Sansom: "I understand, sir, that you have secretly been making love to my daughter, and I must forbid an acquaintance begun in that way. You should have seen me first." Shrewd Suitor: "Madam, had I seen you first I should have forgotten your daughter and fallen in love with you." Mrs. Sansom: "Um—the informality of the proceeding was all I objected to. Come with me and I will introduce you."

A Fair Question.

He (bitterly): "Pshaw! All women are alike." She: "Then why in the world do you spend so much time trying to find the one you want to marry?"

Papa's Match-box.

"This," said the dear girl, as she led the way into a secluded little nook in the conservatory, "is what papa calls his 'match-box.' Everybody comes in here to propose."

Her First Chance.

He (accepted): "You say you were never engaged before?" She: "Yes." He: "How does that happen? I thought all women usually had three or four engagements." She (guilelessly): "Well, I presume I shall, too. You see, this is the first chance I've had."

Appropriate Title.

He: "I wonder what the meaning of that picture is? The youth and the maiden are in a tender attitude." She: "Oh, don't you see? He has just asked her to marry him, and she is accepting him." "Ah! how appropriate the title." "I don't see it." "Why, that card at the bottom says 'Sold.'"

What We Are Coming To.

Boothby: "What are you thinking about, Ethel?" Miss Warringford: "About our wedding. I wanted to ask a favour of you." Boothby: "Anything, dearest." Miss Warringford: "Well—I don't want to change my name to Mrs. Henry Boothby. I want you to change yours to Mr. Ethel Warringford."

She Might be Engaged Then.

"I'm so glad you have come, Miss Morrison! I have so longed for a dance with you. May I have the fourth waltz?" "You may if I am not engaged." "Your card shows that you're not." "Yes—but I'm going to sit out the third waltz with Jack, and—well, I may be engaged when the fourth comes."

Her Revenge.

"Why were you so cross to your husband at breakfast?" "I couldn't help it. I felt as if I must scold somebody or burst. Just physical irritability, you know—and then everything went wrong. Breakfast was late, the bacon burnt, the coffee thin, and the bread stale." "Then why didn't you scold the cook?" "Oh, I daren't. She'd leave."

A Cool Reception.

There were plenty of empty seats in the 'bus, but the smiling youth who wore his hat on the back part of his head, stopped opposite the handsome young woman in the red hat, and said in his most engaging manner: "Can I take this seat, Miss?" "I have no objection, sir," she said, in a tone that froze the smile fast on his face, "but I think it's nailed down."

Her Share of Economy.

"My dear," said Mr. Darley to his wife, "we shall have to economise." "Very well, love," replied Mrs. Darley cheerfully. "Suppose you resign your club, give up smoking, and shave yourself." "That's a pretty programme, I must say. And what will you do as your share of our economy?" "I will cut your hair."

Only One Arm Necessary.

Jack Fiancé (gushingly): "Darling, you must not refuse me the pleasure of taking you to ride in my new horseless carriage." Daisy Hugger (apprehensively): "But—er—Jack, don't you—er—(blush)—have you to use both arms to steer those horseless carriages?" Jack Fiancé (rapturously): "No, dearest. Mine is a new pattern of pedal-steering attachment, and——" Daisy Hugger: "Oh, Jack. Say to-morrow night."

Digitized by Google

IN CONFIDENCE

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Home Duties Versus District Visiting.

I am very glad to hear, Stella, that you take so much interest in parish work, and do so much for the poor. You say that your father objects to you spending so much of your time visiting, and says that you should be more at home. He has, you add, often complained of the way his meals are served up, and does not accept your excuse that you are busy with your parish work. What do I think of his attitude? Do I not think that the poor people are entitled to more attention than one's own well-to-do relations?

* * * * *

Now, work among the poor is very, very good. There are many women who can rightly spend all their time at it. But I take it that every women puts her duty to her own folk first, as she was intended to do. When a girl has a father, as you have, who expects a little proper attention, it is her first duty to give it. If the world were run on any other lines, it would be a more miserable place than it is. Do as much parish work as you can—in your spare moments—but first of all do the duties at home to which you should, as a woman, give first place.

❦❦❦

About Novel Reading.

Flo is sixteen, and is fond of reading. But her people tell her it is wrong for her to read novels. Do I agree with this?

* * * * *

While you are young, you must do as your people wish. I do not know their views on the subject of reading, but no doubt they know your tendencies better than I do. Some girls may read every book ever written, and their minds will remain as pure as if they had never read a line. Others will seek out unhealthy reading, and perhaps be injured much by it.

* * * * *

Your parents know your own nature, and no doubt are acting in your own interest in restricting your reading. A very good way out of this difficulty would be for the mother or father to read to their children. It is generally much nicer to hear someone read a story than to strain one's eyes wading through it oneself.

❦❦❦

Unnecessary Requests.

Yes, B. M., I do occasionally advise readers by post, but unless the communication is of an exceptionally private nature, prefer to do so in this column. In most cases there is very little advice which I can give clients that needs privacy, seeing names are concealed; so will those readers who constantly request private answers to the most ordinary questions please remember that in the offices of a paper time is a precious commodity, and that a lot of letter writing occupies a great deal of it.

"Gadding About" at Seventy-One.

"At what age should a woman give up gadding about?" F. R. is seventy-one, and has several grandchildren. But she does not feel any older than she did twenty years ago, and finds she can get about and visit as well as a young woman. Her children, however, reproach her for this, saying that at her age she ought to stop quietly at home, and leave "gadding about" to the younger ones.

* * * * *

They are all quite wrong, F. R. So long as you feel you can get about, do so. I know many ladies of three score who are even healthier and stronger than young girls, and so long as they can enjoy life, let them do it. That notion about "giving up" on principle is nonsense. So long as one can take exercise, one should do so. It prolongs life.

❦❦❦

Is It Flirting?

Snowdrop knows two young men, and is not sure which she likes the better. Both have a habit of waiting for Snowdrop outside her church after service, not by arrangement. She confesses that she likes the company of either, but is not sure that she is in love. Would it be flirting for her to accept the attentions of both, as she is at present doing?

* * * * *

Well, I do not know that I should call it flirting to a very serious extent. Assuming you have not led either young man to suppose that you regard him other than as a friend, there could be no objection to your continuing on friendly terms with either. Besides, it is only right that you should give both of them a trial, in order to test which you really do like the better.

* * * * *

Another important fact will be the effect on either of them of the knowledge that you treat them both equally. If it does not lead to some declaration on the part of each, I should be surprised. I must repeat, however, that to avoid being called a flirt, you must not allow your conduct with either man to go beyond the limits of friendly acquaintanceship. If you do, then you may rightly be accused of double-dealing.

❦❦❦

Wants to be a Waitress.

Sophie has an unpleasant time at home, as she belongs to a large family, and has to do most of the housework. In fact, she tells me she is little more than a drudge. Supposing she could get employment as a restaurant waitress, do I think the money she would make would justify her in going out? She thinks the life could not be harder than her present one.

* * * * *

I would not recommend any girl who has parents able to keep her to take work such as that of a waitress. A very pretty girl sometimes meets the right man at a restaurant, but, generally speaking, those affairs are little better than dangerous flirtations.

* * * * *

Besides, the wages of restaurant waitresses are very, very small. Most of them start with 8s. a week, which rises to 12s. If they are promoted to behind the counter, they may in time rise to 23s.—or more. A manageress gets about 28s.—and half-pay in case of illness.

* * * * *

If a girl really needs the money, it would not be bad for her to take such work, as later on she will be independent. But I think Sophie will find even the drudgery of home life better than the worry and very hard work of waiting on busy diners with bad tempers.

Cynthia

Printed by Horace Cox, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

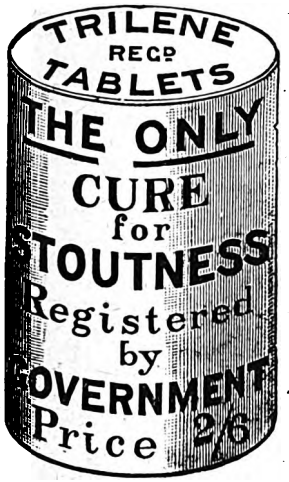
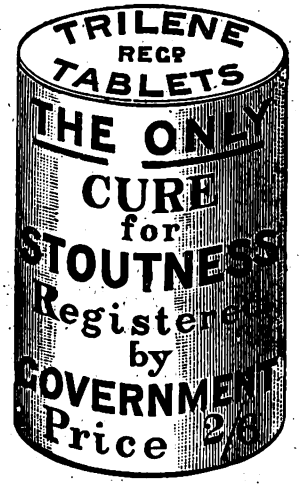
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."



Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.
Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely.
"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

Miss CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.
Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

COUNT EHRENWAUD, of Listorp, Sweden, writes, 9th Oct., 1899: "The person who took Tablets lost 18lb. during the cure.

Mr. GIBBS, 147 Richmond Park, Kimberworth, Rotherham, says: "Since I began with them they have reduced me 2st. 3lb., and I am pleased to say I am a great deal better in health and in every way."

Mrs. FENTON, 11 Wood Street, Tyldesley, writes: "Been fat all my life, but now your Tablets tell a tale. I have lost 17lb. already and am delighted."

Mrs. MARY WILLIAMS, of Old Yard, near Redol, Bagillt, Wales, writes Nov. 22nd, 1898: "Your Tablets reduced me 2st., and have benefited me greatly."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mrs. PEARCE, Armstrong Road, Benwell: "Reduced from 12st. to 9½st., and do not get any heavier."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs. ROLLITT, of North Farm, Letwell, says: "Tablets have done a world of good—reduced 14lb. already without altering diet."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets.

Miss JANE CARTER of Forthampton House, Tewkesbury, says: "The Tablets are of the greatest valu I am reduced many stone, and shall be pleased to recommend them."

Mr. THOS BLAKELY, of 37 The Grove, Bedford, writes: "I have lost a little over 42lb. since taking your Tablets, and my case causes much local interest."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

Have You Indigestion?

Have You Sick Headache?

TAKE

BEECHAM'S PILLS

To Avoid Indigestion

That distressed feeling is simply a poorly-working stomach—it needs a little help—but no matter how bad it may be, a dose of BEECHAM'S PILLS will speedily give relief. Take BEECHAM'S PILLS for a few days and the trouble will disappear.

To Cure Sick Headache

Sick headache means an overtaxed stomach and a derangement of the digestive Organs. BEECHAM'S PILLS have proved themselves a boon for removing that distressed feeling and discomfort. A dose will remove the immediate cause, and if repeated for a few days will enable your system to work normally.

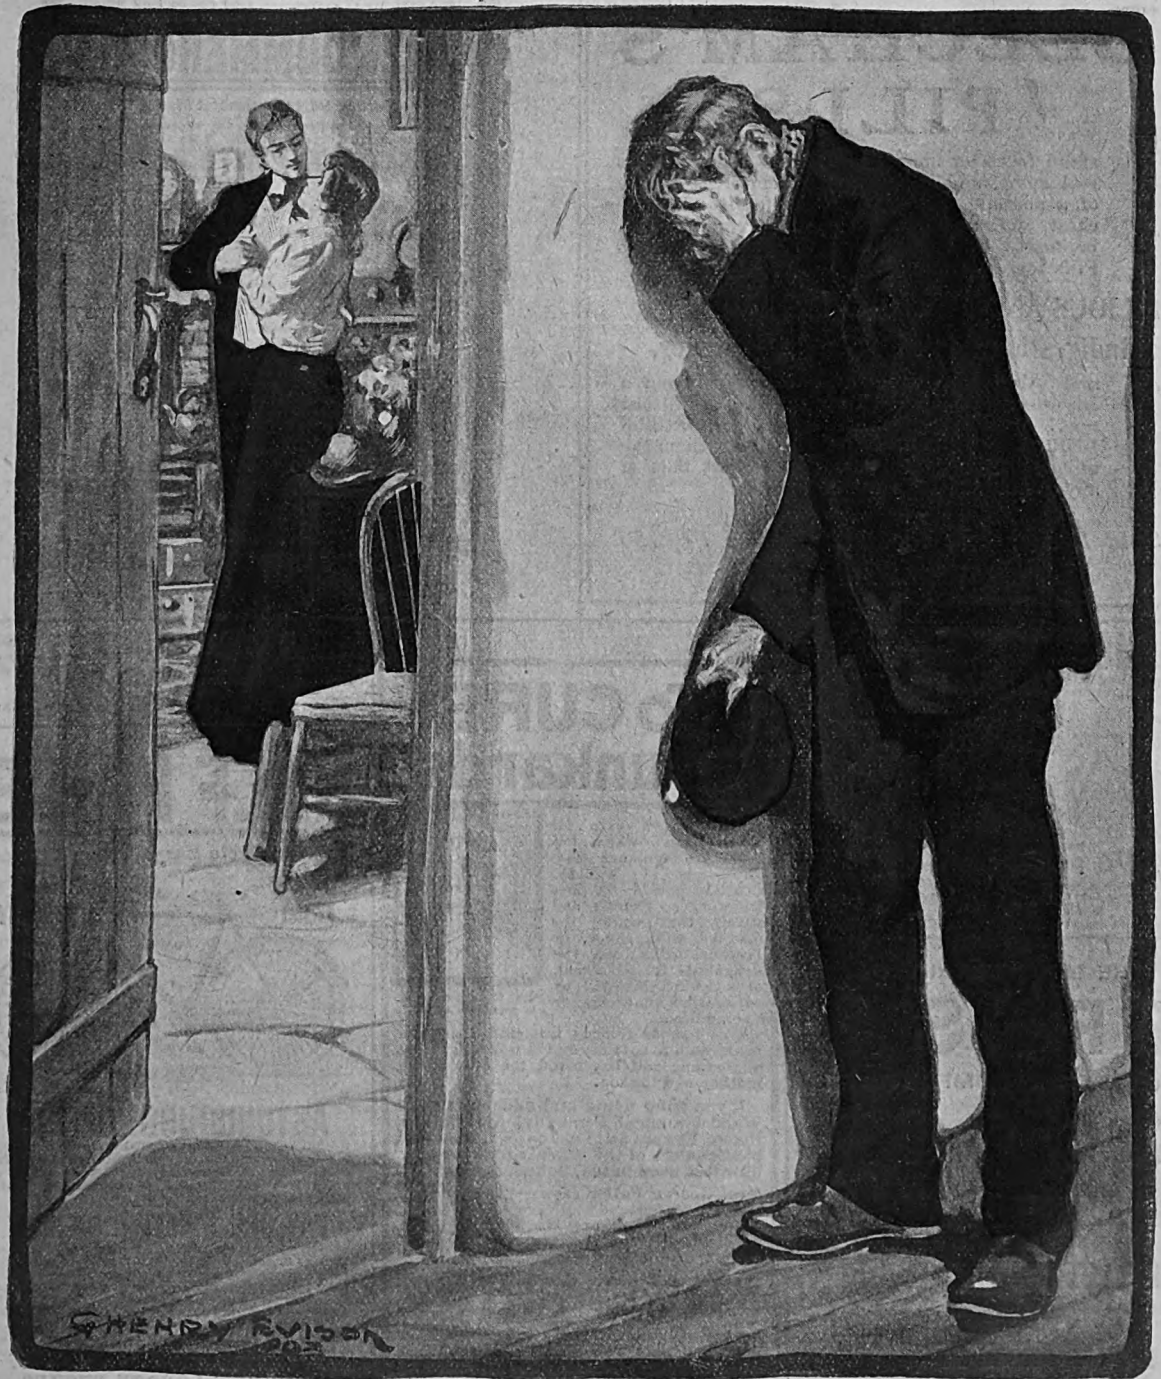
Sold Everywhere in Boxes.

Price 1s. 1½d. (56 Pills) and 2s. 9d. (168 Pills).

Powerful New Serial Just Started.

SHORT STORIES.

No. 742.] Week ending March 21, 1903. [Price One Penny.



The diver covered his face with his hand. "Sir Guy loves her," he whispered, "and she—she loves him. I have lost her—lost her after all!" * * * *

(A Dramatic Incident from our New Serial Story, "HELD APART." See Inside.)

Digitized by Google

TO BE FIRST

Is to occupy an enviable position. Many aspire for first place, but few attain it. To acquire the lead, aspiration and push alone are not sufficient. Merit is required. This is exactly why . . . .

BEECHAM'S PILLS

stand foremost among medicines. They possess real merit, and have proved themselves worthy of a permanent position in the family medicine chest. Trial purchasers become regular users, because they find nothing to equal Beecham's Pills for dispelling

BILIOUS AND NERVOUS DISORDERS,

Indigestion, Sick Headache, Languor,

and other such troubles which arise from a Disordered Stomach. They regulate and tone up the entire system. The genuine worth of BEECHAM'S PILLS has obtained for them the unique position of having the Largest Sale of any Patent Medicine in the World.

Sold Everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills) and 2/9 (168 Pills).

GRAVES'

"SAFE AS THE BANK OF ENGLAND."

This is the feeling of those who deal with the firm of J. G. Graves, because all goods are sent out to handle and examine at leisure, and need not be kept unless they give the fullest satisfaction.

THE 'COMMERCIAL'

Sterling Silver Horizontal Watch,

will be forwarded Post Free to any address on receipt of a deposit of only 2/6; the balance can be remitted in nine more MONTHLY payments of 2/6; or, HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT for full cash payment. 25/

LET'S TALK OF GRAVES

. . The Largest . . Watch-Sales Firm in the World.

SPECIFICATION. Horizontal Movement, Rim Cap, Fully Jewelled Escapement, White Enamelled Dial, Extra Strong Sterling Silver Cases.

This Watch is Warranted for Five Years and will give Perfect Satisfaction.

You would be pleased with our No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Cutlery and Plate, and Fancy Goods, which we supply GRATIS and Post Free to all applicants. Please send Post Card for a copy.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in every town and village. No Risk. Good Commission.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

WATCHES

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

Free Wheels. New Departure Hub, Bowden Brakes. All Improvements—Lamp, Bell, &c. Carriage paid.

Carr. Paid.

For Cash or 12 Monthly Payments of

£8 8s.	15/10	£9 10s	17/6
£9	16/8	£10 5s.	19/3.

Juno Motor Cycle £32 or 60/- mo. Accessories at lower prices than any other house; Acetylene Lamp, 2/11; Cycle Stand, 1/8; Motor Horn, 5/6. Write for New Season List, over 100 pages and 500 illustrations, sent post free.—METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co., Ltd. (S.S. De t.), 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C. West End Showrooms: Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

E·P PS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½% repayable on demand.

The Birkbeck Almanack, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

To CURE Drunkards

Mrs. Geo. Fuller, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

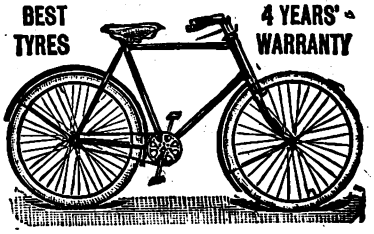
PIANO VAMPING (BOOK 16 PAGES.)

2/6 to £1 may be earned nightly by anyone having good knowledge of above. No knowledge of music required. A genuine work. Post free, 2/-; Colonies, 3/-. Agent (Dept. A), 16 Eton Rd., Southsea, Hants.

HALF PRICE

Greatest Cycle Bargain ever Offered

BEST TYRES 4 YEARS' WARRANTY



ASTONISHING OFFER!

To introduce Royal Duke Cycles, we will supply 2,000 now, for only half list price—£7 7s. cash—with 4 years' warranty. Free wheel, choice of noted tyres, Crabbe brake, triple enamelling and many other important features.

PAY ONE SHILLING WEEKLY

On easy payments, you can send 1 shilling weekly, or any larger amount that suits your convenience. No guarantor, no unreasonable enquiries. Pay while enjoying the use of your machine. Ladies', gents', boys' and girls' models. Every penny of your money returned if not as represented. We point with pride to thousands of voluntary testimonials. Write for full particulars of Royal Duke Cycles, mentioning name of this publication. Enclose stamp. Address:

SYMONDS' LONDON STORES, 124-128, City Road, London, E.C. Also at 15, Peter Street, Manchester.

Short Stories.

No. 742.] Week Ending March 21st 1903. [One Penny.

NEW SERIAL. START TO-DAY.

Held Apart

The Story of a Strange Double Fraud and its influence upon some Young Hearts, a Great Name, and a Famous Fortune.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Author of "The Golden Dwarf," "A Daughter of Mystery," etc.

THE FIRST CHAPTERS.

Moira Davenal is sitting in the little cottage on Groudle Quay busy with her ribbon work. Sir Guy Vanbrugh is talking to her.

"Moira, have I the least little bit of a chance?"

"I—I don't know, Sir Guy," she falters. "I never thought about you seriously; and they would all say I married you for your money!"

"Then there is a chance for me," he says, biting his lip. "Moira, I love you so much. Won't you——"

He pauses. There is a heavy step in the hallway of the cottage, and a burly figure enters the room.

"Good evening, Mr. Davenal. I'm off to London for the week-end and was just leaving a message for you with your daughter. How goes on the task of raising the Sylph?"

"I've found the last hole, Sir Guy," says John Davenal, who is a diver engaged in raising Sir Guy's yacht. "She'll soon be afloat."

After Sir Guy has gone a sailor appears at the door singing in drunken tones the scrap of a chorus:

"Give my love to Nancy, the girl that I adore,
Tell her that she'll never see her—her sailor any more."

"I want to see Davenal—John Davenal," he says thickly.

The diver rises to his feet.

"Hullo, Hartigan!" he remarks loudly. "Glad to see you. Come in and make yourself comfortable."

While Moira goes out on an errand a conversation takes place between the two men, from which it appears that Moira is really Hartigan's daughter. Davenal agrees to pay him £50 a year so that he may keep her.

The sailor—who is a ship's steward—sits back in his chair and begins to sing again the drunken chorus.

He halts abruptly, for the door slowly opens, and a blind woman comes in.

Dennis Hartigan recognises her as his sister Kate. She tells her brother that she heard the song he was singing—sung in just the same way—once when she was sitting on a breakwater at Groudle. She also adds that the man who was singing said, evidently to someone with him: "This is out far enough. In with it;" after which there was a splash.

Hannah Davenal (Hartigan's wife and the diver's sister) is maid to Lady Tarleton. She is possessed of a secret with which she continually blackmails her mistress.

One afternoon Lady Tarleton and Hannah Davenal go down to Groudle Tower, and together they make a mysterious journey at midnight.

The following day, at the Half Brick Inn at Groudle, Hannah encounters her husband, whom she advises to leave Groudle.

The next morning Hannah is found dead in bed, a towel smelling of chloroform is on her face, and over that a pillow on which are some dirty finger marks.

The police are informed of the tragedy, and Detective-Sergeant Ussher is sent down from Scotland Yard to investigate. The information he obtains decides him to arrest Dennis Hartigan.

Edward Stormont, the owner of Groudle Tower, and Lady Tarleton's brother-in-law, now arrives at Groudle with his friend Paul Jerome, a war-correspondent. When they enter the Tower Lady Tarleton is observed facing four men, who are Hartigan, Ussher, and two policemen, guarding the ship's steward.

As Stormont pauses in the doorway of the hall Lady Tarleton glances up and sees him. The prisoner is speaking defiantly.

"I'm Dennis Hartigan all right," he says, "and Hannah Davenal's husband all right. But I'm innocent of her death, and I'm here to prove it. I want one word—one single word—alone with her ladyship."

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

Edward Stormont

SEVENTH CHAPTER.

"Welcome to Groudle Tower."

Lady Tarleton gazed irresolutely at the handcuffed captive. Dennis Hartigan, standing passively between the two country policemen, answered the gaze with a stare of grim and significant defiance. Lady Tarleton's gaze fell, then travelled to the stalwart figure of Edward Stormont, checked on his own threshold by so singular a spectacle. She moved with eager steps towards him. She was very agitated.

"Edward!" she exclaimed, "is it really you? Good Heavens, and I did not know you were in England!"

Her brother-in-law took the hand she extended to him.

"I only landed at Hull last night, and the whim seized me to see Groudle once again before coming south. I had no idea you were in residence, till they told me at the station that some more or less tragic event had occurred here. You are, I gather, in the throes of a police investigation. But I am forgetting. Allow me to introduce you to Mr. Jerome."

He turned to his companion. "Jerome," he observed—"Lady Tarleton, my sister-in-law. Jerome, my dear Adeline, has plucked a peaceful laurel-wreath out of the perils of modern warfare. In other words, he has scored the latest success in war-correspondence. Notwithstanding which, he remains the most modest of men."

Lady Tarleton forced a smile. "I am very glad to make Mr. Jerome's acquaintance," she replied, giving the war-correspondent the tips of her fingers, "but I wish that he had reached Groudle Tower at a juncture not quite so melancholy. Davenal, my maid, was found this morning dead in her room, under circumstances, that point, almost conclusively, to murder. Mr. Ussher!"

She motioned to the detective. He crossed the hall to her side, closing his note-book; he had been writing in it.

"Mr. Ussher," she said, "this is Mr. Stormont, my brother-in-law. Mr. Stormont, as you may know, is the owner of Groudle Tower. Will you please explain to him why you arrested this man, and particularly why you have brought him here."

"Certainly, my lady," answered Mr. Ussher blandly, and drew a pace nearer to Edward Stormont.

"You see, sir," he pursued, "the woman Davenal had evidently been chloroformed and then suffocated—with a pillow. The pillow had apparently been handled by a person of the lower class—it was much finger-marked, showing that the murderer's hands had been the reverse of clean. That was one clue. I ascertained without delay what purchases of chloroform had been lately made in Groudle. I discovered that a quantity had been sold to a certain Dennis Hartigan, who wrote in the poison-register of the chemist from whom it was bought the address 'Hawthorn Cottage, Groudle Quay.' Hawthorn Cottage is the residence of John Davenal, the brother of the deceased. That was clue number two."

The detective started. His glance had encountered that of the war-correspondent. Mr. Ussher bowed and lifted two fingers to his forehead. Paul Jerome nodded familiarly.

"Don't let me interrupt you, Ussher," he remarked, "though I was wondering how long you would be in recognising a friend. You are in excellent hands, Lady Tarleton," he added; "Mr. Ussher and I met often at one time—drawn together by the bonds that unite the police and the press—and I can assure you that he is a most zealous and considerate officer."

Mr. Ussher coughed modestly.

"Mr. Jerome is too kind, my lady," he declared. "But I was about to inform Mr. Stormont, my lady, that on finding chloroform had recently been supplied to a person apparently connected with the Davenal family, I traced that person, and learnt that he was lodging at an inn just outside Groudle town."

Edward Stormont chafed visibly.

"May I remind you, Mr.—Mr. Ussher," he remarked, "that your prisoner, whom I conclude to be the Hartigan you speak of, has offered to prove his innocence, and has asked to have a moment's conversation with Lady Tarleton. That is a most extraordinary request. Perhaps you would be good enough to say exactly what accusation is made against him. I believe he said something about being 'innocent of her death.'"

The detective regarded the speaker tolerantly, yet with a distinct air of reproof.

"The prisoner," he rejoined, "undoubtedly lies under suspicion in connection with the murder of his wife, although I have not yet formally charged him. Not only, however, did he purchase the chloroform to which I have referred, but he is known to have quarrelled with the deceased at the 'Half Brick'—the inn in question—over a kiss, begging her ladyship's pardon, given to a serving-maid. An ostler at the 'Half Brick,' returning from town, saw and recognised Miss Davenal—that is to say, Mrs. Hartigan. She was with the prisoner. They were then at some distance from the inn, and she was heard to say: 'If he happens to have a wife like me, Dennis!'"

Lady Tarleton was plucking at the lace handkerchief in her fingers; she turned her head to glance at the short, thick-set form between the constables. Dennis Hartigan was looking at her, his bold blue eyes anxious yet vaguely cruel.

"Mr. Stormont has reminded you, Mr. Ussher," she said, "that this person has asserted his desire to prove his innocence, and has asked for a single word—by which I presume he means a few minutes' conversation—alone with me. Did you bring him here in order to suggest that I should grant this request?"

Mr. Ussher rubbed his deep and dimpled chin with the butt of his pencil.

"Well, my lady," he responded, "I was in somewhat of a quandary. The prisoner asserted that your ladyship could prove his innocence, and demanded to be confronted, if I may use the term, my lady, with you. Naturally, I shrank from lodging a definite charge while there was any possibility, however remote, of my being on the wrong track."

The detective coloured slightly and he averted his glance from that of the war-correspondent. For some reason or other Paul Jerome had been unable to repress a smile.

"But it was not until he got face to face with your ladyship," continued Mr. Ussher, "that he blurted out the request for a private interview. I am bound to confess, my lady, that that would be a most unusual proceeding, and for the life of me, my lady, I fail to see how it can help him. Any facts which might be within the present knowledge of your ladyship, could not be affected—at all events, legally—by such an interview."

Lady Tarleton waved him aside and stepped past him. A close observer might have doubted if it were by accident or with intent that she had moved to a position where, though she faced the policemen and their captive, her features were in shadow. She directed herself imperiously to Dennis Hartigan.

"What do you want with me," she asked—"tell me frankly? If you are an innocent man, you have the right to claim our sympathy under this terrible charge. You say you are the husband of my maid, Hannah Davenal?"

Dennis Hartigan studied her expression; his eyes seemed to be reading her very soul.

"Yes, my lady," she was told, "as you know, my lady, she was married. I am aware your ladyship wasn't acquainted with my name, but she explained, I believe, that I was a ship's steward; you remember, my lady, when she warned you she'd be wanting to leave, as I was giving up the sea and planning to take a country public-house with her. Now what I want your ladyship to tell the police is that you promised Hannah a money-present when she left—a very handsome present, my lady, but she'd been your maid for over twenty years. I won't be particular to the exact amount, but it was enough to buy us a very good business, my lady."

"Yes," said Lady Tarleton slowly, "that is so. I promised to give her some hundreds of pounds, and—to lend her as much more as she needed."

Digitized by Google

The other straightened himself, shrugged his shoulders, and looked round at his captors—at the imperturbable Mr. Ussher, at Edward Stormont, and Paul Jerome, at the curious servants who lingered about the extremities of the great hall.

"So she told me, my lady," he answered, "and what I ask is, would I have been fool enough, for a few words over a chance peck at a pretty mouth, to do away with my poor Hannah and lose myself three fat figures in solid cash? For it stands to reason that you weren't going to give me the money, my lady, if anything happened to Hannah before she left your service."

Mr. Ussher wrinkled his brows and bit at his pencil. But he gave no other sign of interest in his prisoner's observations.

"And as for the chloroform I bought," added Dennis Hartigan scornfully, "I got it for John Davenal's ear-ache; he's a diver and suffers with his ears. But the stuff I used there and left there, and there's witnesses to that."

Lady Tarleton put the twisted handkerchief to her lips, she had scarcely marked the latter portion of Dennis Hartigan's defence.

"There is common sense in what you say about your monetary loss by your wife's death," she observed, "and so far I can support at least the probability of your innocence. But I can do nothing more."

Dennis Hartigan sprang suddenly clear of his flanking guardians, fell at her feet, and clutched her gown. His tanned, bloated face peered up into hers with a pretended frenzy.

"Don't desert me, my lady!" he cried. "I am innocent!" He dropped his voice to a whisper and a sentence reached her, and her alone, an instant before the two constables, darting forward, had pinned and dragged him up. Lady Tarleton staggered. His fierce words rang hissingly in her ear.

"The child, you fool! Save me, or I speak!"

She felt a strong arm about her shoulder. It was that of Paul Jerome; he had noticed the sick spasm that had swayed her. He drew her aside.

"Permit me," he said, "this is all rather trying, isn't it? But I don't think the fellow meant you any harm—he was only unstrung. After all, I fancy Ussher is on the wrong track, and not for the first time. Stormont!"

The war-correspondent was calling to his host, who, irritable and amazed, watched the abruptly metamorphosed scene.

"Lady Tarleton is a little agitated," he added; "if you will stay with her I will go and talk to Mr. Ussher, whom I know of old. He is a little afraid of me; as a young and enthusiastic journalist I upset one or two of his best 'clues' in a famous criminal case."

He resigned Lady Tarleton into the care of the elder man, and went across to the detective, who was superintending an alteration in his prisoner's fetters. Dennis Hartigan's hands were being secured behind his back.

"Ussher," said the war-correspondent, "one moment." The detective spun about, a look of veiled hostility on his bland, secretive countenance. Paul Jerome regarded him amusedly.

"You spoke of a soiled and finger-marked pillow," he continued in an undertone. "Now surely those finger-marks will soon show you if you ought to charge this luckless wretch with the murder or not."

Mr. Ussher's jaw dropped. The war-correspondent smiled at his change of demeanour.

"If I might suggest," he said, "your prisoner could be taken to the station and detained for an hour or two. That will enable you to make at your leisure the necessary examination of the finger-prints—any ordinary magnifying glass will serve your purpose. Some trifling expedient will allow you to compare them with your prisoner's finger-tips, and you'll act accordingly. But understand, I do not advise, I merely suggest. Good night, Mr. Ussher."

He nodded pleasantly and withdrew a few paces. The detective pulled himself together and gave the order to his men. Then the three marched off with the handcuffed ship's steward. Dennis Hartigan glanced back. Lady Tarleton saw the look, and leant heavily upon her brother-in-law. The war-correspondent went up to them.

"I perceive," he observed, "that Lady Tarleton has a certain sympathy with that poor beggar. So have I, I can't tell why. But in any case, if he is innocent, he will soon be free. I have provided Ussher with an infallible test."

Edward Stormont gave an arm to his sister-in-law, and led her out of the hall. Paul Jerome followed.

"I'm afraid, Jerome," said the elder man, "that this is rather an unexpected kind of welcome."

"Don't mention it," answered the war correspondent; "I'm only wondering if I shall turn out to have travelled three thousand miles for the especial purpose of—to put it vulgarly—'wiping Mr. Ussher's eye.' However, in a few hours his prisoner will be either free or else as good as found guilty."

Lady Tarleton opened her lips as if she would have answered. But she closed them again abruptly. When she spoke it was to remark that they must be both hungry and tired, and to suggest their dining forthwith.

EIGHTH CHAPTER.

Mr. Jerome was Quite Right.

"Yes, it's a fine old place, but dismal, my dear fellow, dismal! Even to a tenant who had not, as I have, the saddest of recollections associated with it, Groudle Tower would soon reveal itself as an excellent residence to live out of."

Edward Stormont, the war-correspondent at his side, was strolling through the long corridors of the ancient country seat upon which he had just passed so disparaging a criticism. He returned an unlighted cigar to its position between his sensitive, melancholy lips, and plunged his hands once more into the deep pockets of his loose lounge coat.

With his pointed, iron-grey beard, his dreamy blue eyes and negligent, abstracted bearing, Edward Stormont was a man of striking, almost poetic appearance. Few would have taken him for what he was, a daring explorer of the earth's wildest and most desert corners.

Pushing open a door, he ushered Paul Jerome into the apartment beyond, a huge, bare chamber with a high roof, carved oak wainscoting, and small, latticed panes in the big mullioned windows.

"Once upon a time," he said, taking the cigar from his mouth, "when the owners of Groudle Tower were great lords, and judges in their own right of half the county, this room was their court of summary jurisdiction. To this day it is called the justice-room. The roof is a splendid specimen of Jacobean vaulting."

He drew out a tiny gold case, raised the spring lid, and snapped it again.

"Have you a match, Jerome?" he asked; "I have not one left."

Jerome offered him a battered metal box, the explorer lit his Havana, and going to the window, flung the casement wide. It gave upon the large central square of the Tower. The sunshine of the spring morning lay across it, and the March wind whistled sharply past the stone framework of the window.

Edward Stormont stepped out, and glanced up at the ruinous, ivy-grown keep that rose at an angle of the square. The war-correspondent had followed him out.

"Twenty years ago, Jerome," remarked the elder man slowly, "I climbed that tower at night and, alone with the wind and the stars, fought my way back to sanity and self-control. Fate had dealt me a cruel blow, Jerome—a lovely young creature, whose heart and mind were stamped with a rarer charm than even her outward beauty, lay dead within these walls. A little baby girl was motherless, I, her father, robbed of an idolised wife that Death had scarcely spared to me for eighteen months."

Digitized by Google

His strong, grave voice faltered, and he was silent, his breast heaving.

"When we drove up the hill yesterday evening," he added abruptly, "the sight of the Tower brought it all back, and though I am a score of years older, Jerome, I could have wept aloud."

Edward Stormont's white teeth closed upon his cigar, a puff or two of smoke escaped from his lips. He sighed and walked onwards.

"I wish the little lass had lived," he exclaimed; "I have wanted something to love all these years, and though I have made friends with many a loyal brute and many an honest fellow, it has not filled the void in my heart. The wound death opened still bleeds, a daughter's hand might have—would have healed it. But a truce to this womanish talk—who comes yonder, is it not that solemn plain-clothes policeman whom we found in possession here last night?"

He shaded his eyes with his palm, and gazed across the courtyard. Paul Jerome glanced in the same direction. Mr. Ussher's large and stooping figure was passing through the massive entrance which gave admittance to Groudle Tower. His note-book was in his hand—he paused to make a memorandum in it, then looked up and saw them. Putting away the oblong red volume, he came forward athwart the smooth turf that occupied the middle of the square.

"Good day," he said, addressing Edward Stormont before recognising, with dry politeness, the presence of the war-correspondent. "I was about to seek a brief interview with you. An inquest will be necessary, but any wish that her ladyship or yourself may entertain as to time and place can, no doubt, be met. I have just left the coroner's officer, who will be here in the course of the morning."

Edward Stormont made an impatient gesture.

"Arrange it as you will, Mr.—Mr. Ussher," he answered; "I am quite indifferent. Naturally I shall remain with my sister-in-law until the unpleasant business is settled and shelved. But as I know nothing whatever of the affair, you will not want me. By the way, how about your prisoner, the man Hartigan—is he to be charged?"

Mr. Ussher's ruddy countenance grew a shade more crimson.

"I merely detained him a few hours," he responded, glancing down at his large and polished boot toe. "Mr. Jerome was quite right; a comparison of the marks on the pillow and Hartigan's finger tips was, in one respect, conclusive. It was not, at all events, Hartigan who actually committed the crime. Also, on inquiry at Hawthorn Cottage, I found corroboration of his assertion as to the cause for which he had purchased the chloroform."

"So," said the war-correspondent provokingly, "the poor fellow was allowed to slip through the meshes of your terrible net? Well, well, Ussher, I thought somehow you were on the wrong track. But there, to err is human."

The detective rubbed his chin with the back of a forefinger. "The coincidence was obviously a remarkable one, Mr. Jerome," he rejoined stiffly, "and it was my duty to follow the clue. It is only the amateur who starts with a theory, we professionals go over the ground bit by bit, and allow the facts to suggest their own explanation."

He turned to the elder man. "Perhaps, sir," he observed, "you would ascertain if Lady Tarleton has any objection to the inquest being held here and to-morrow. It is not strictly in my province, sir, but I fancy I can arrange for her ladyship's convenience to be consulted."

Edward Stormont moved from the neighbourhood of the justice-room and towards the great nail-studded hall doors of Groudle Tower.

"I will see if my sister-in-law has any views," he rejoined; "but I rather expect her wish will coincide with mine, to get the whole thing over as soon as possible."

He rang at the door as he spoke. It was opened by a male servant, who started at the sight of his master and the war-correspondent, hatless, and accompanied by the redoubtable Mr. Ussher.

"If you please, sir," he said, "a person is inquiring at the kitchen entrance for Mr. Ussher—a person of the name of John Davenal—brother of the—my lady's late maid, sir."

Mr. Ussher nodded. "With your permission, sir," he remarked, "I will go through and see him while you are consulting her ladyship."

"Certainly," began Edward Stormont, then stopped, Paul Jerome had touched his arm.

"I say, Stormont," murmured the war-correspondent in his friend's ear; "I'm beginning to be interested in this domestic tragedy of yours. I think I shall try to fathom it. Besides, I want to worry Ussher a bit. Let us suggest his having this fellow through, and see if we can pick up a thread or two of the mystery."

"By all means, if it interests you," said Edward Stormont, and added aloud, "Mr. Ussher, I think I should like to ask this man Davenal some questions. Suppose we have him in?"

Mr. Ussher sighed inaudibly, and shot a rebellious glance at the war-correspondent. "As you please, sir," he answered.

Edward Stormont gave an order, and the three men waited. A moment later, and then a burly, powerful form passed into the hall from the servants' quarters beyond. The diver walked with a stick, slowly, almost unsteadily. His face was pale, his expression heavy and spiritless. His eyes wandered from one to another of the trio who stood in the hall. Mr. Ussher stepped forward.

"You wished to see me, I believe, Mr. Davenal," he said. "I called at your cottage yesterday, and again at night, but you were in bed, I believe, indisposed."

John Davenal bent his head. "I was," he replied; "I heard the news of my—my poor sister's death"—rather abruptly—"after a long spell of work under the water; I am a diver, as you may know. It gave me a queer kind of heart shock, the doctor says."

He drew himself up, standing with a hand on his stick.

"You are Mr. Ussher, I reckon," he continued; "and a detective."

Mr. Ussher assented. John Davenal put a finger and thumb into a vest pocket, and pulled out a small, two-ounce bottle. It was partly filled with a colourless fluid, and bore a red poison label.

"There's the chloroform bottle you were asking about," he proceeded, in the same brusque fashion, "I had laid it by myself, after Dennis had used it for my ear, it being dangerous stuff. Moira said you had been rare and set on her finding it. And now you have it I shall be glad to learn why you wanted it, and why you came troubling my Moira with so many questions. There's something I hear in Groudle about Hannah having been chloroformed to death. Surely, surely you can't think——"

The detective had taken the small phial, uncorked it, and sniffed at it.

"I'm obliged to you, Mr. Davenal," he said, interrupting the diver, and returning him the bottle, "but it's of no importance. No charge whatever is being made against your brother-in-law in connection with his wife's death."

John Davenal recoiled. "Dennis!" he cried, "his wife—then you know he was her husband?"

Mr. Ussher got out his note-book. "We do," he rejoined, "will you be good enough to tell me when she was married, and why she lived apart from Mr. Hartigan?"

The diver hesitated. "I don't understand how it's come out," he said; "nor what it—it can have to do with her death, but she was married to Dennis going on for twenty odd years ago. He was a wild sort, and she found it out and decided to stay on in service. They had been married before he went away on a voyage, and were intending to settle down when he got back. But meantime she learnt too much about him, and they never did settle down."

Digitized by Google

A hand was laid on his arm and a chair was set behind him. Paul Jerome had moved it considerately from its place against the wall.

"Sit down, Mr. Davenal," he suggested kindly, "you are not yet, I fear, quite as completely recovered as you think."

The diver sank into the chair and looked up at the shrewd, pleasant visage of the war-correspondent.

"Thank you, sir," he said huskily. Paul Jerome stepped back to Edward Stormont's side and they continued their silent study of the colloquy. Mr. Ussher had been making a series of memoranda.

"Any children of the marriage?" he queried. John Davenal answered with a scarcely perceptible pause.

"No," he said; "none." The detective added a fresh memorandum to his previous ones.

"When did you last see your sister—alive?" he asked. The diver folded his arms upon his stick.

"Two days ago," he replied; "she came to Groudle Quay to see me."

"Were you in the habit of seeing her often?" pursued Mr. Ussher.

"No," said John Davenal, "it was the first time in—in many years. Though she wrote—at times."

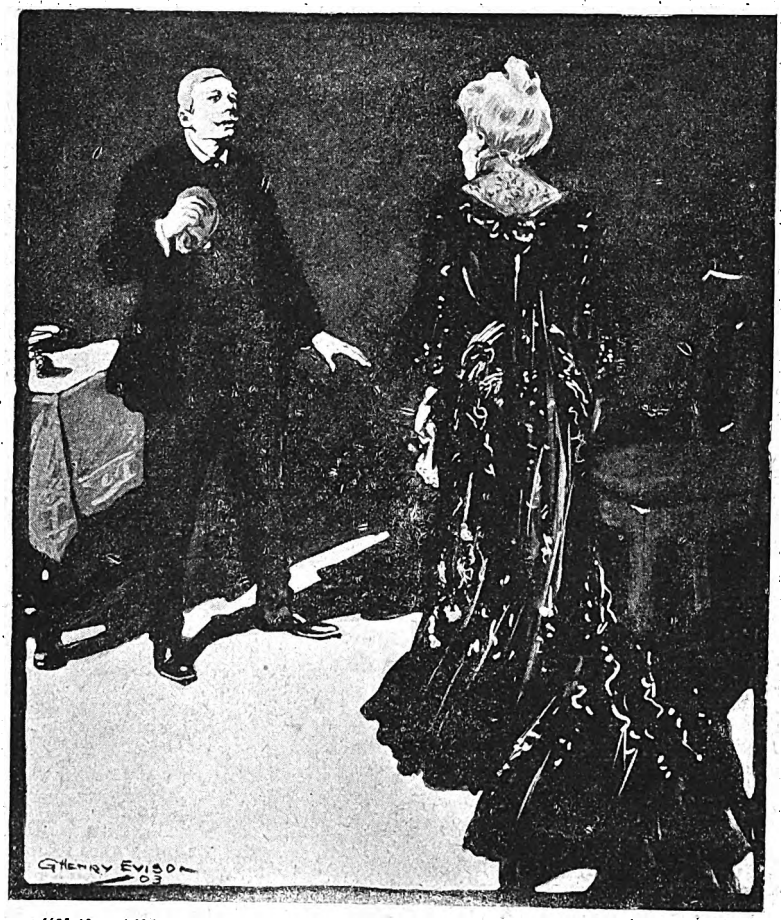
Edward Stormont intervened. "Mr. Davenal," he remarked, "you seem to have been acquainted with her private affairs—this marriage, for instance. Can you suggest anything that might lead some person to desire her death?"

"I cannot, sir," said the diver; "it is a mystery to me. But then I had known nothing of her and her doings for—for more years than I can count on my fingers."

Mr. Ussher closed his note-book. "Well, Mr. Stormont," he observed, "I will not trouble Mr. Davenal any further. If you have any additional questions to put——"

Edward Stormont shook his head, but Paul Jerome struck in quickly.

"This visit of your sister to you, Mr. Davenal," he said; "it was the first in many years. May we ask the reason of what must have been to you a highly unexpected visit?"



"If the child were no longer in my path," she murmured," I would give ten thousand pounds—to the man who told me so!"

The diver sat motionless. "It—it had to do with the family affairs," he answered sternly—"old family matters, dead and buried long ago, except between her and I. I cannot speak more of them, sir, than that."

Paul Jerome bent a keen glance upon him. "It could have, of course, nothing to do with her painfully sudden death?" he said.

"No, sir," responded the diver deliberately. He sat and waited, and then, as no one put a question, he rose.

"I suppose," he added, "now that her marriage is known about, that you will look to Dennis to bury her. If—if he's not able, I will. You will let me know, I hope, when the law is satisfied, and she can be taken away."

Edward Stormont answered gently. "It shall be done," he promised.

"Thank you sir," murmured John Davenal, and moved to leave the hall, by the rear exit. Edward Stormont signed to a footman and the hall-doors were thrown open. John Davenal turned towards them, and, walking slowly, passed out of Groudle Tower.

In the same halting, uneven fashion, he retraced the route to the little seaport below, and gained the entrance to his little cottage. He raised the latch and stepped into the tiny square lobby, or ante-room, that lay beyond. The door into the kitchen was half open and voices came to him. Both were familiar. One was that of Moira, one that of Sir Guy Vanbrugh.

The diver made a motion as if to enter the room when a word, more clearly uttered than before, arrested him. The word was spoken tenderly, yet in firm, masculine tones, and it was the single sacred syllable "wife"!

"Say you will let me hope, Moira," Guy Vanbrugh was pleading; "say that you have missed my daily visit one tithe as much as I have missed my daily glimpse of your sweet face, and I will be patient, if you keep me in suspense a whole year. Can you not hold me out a little hope, dear, it is not such a terrifying word, is it—my 'wife'!"

John Davenal held his breath, yet his big frame was trembling in a pitiable excitement.

A soft murmur—the sigh of a woman's heart surrendering to its own weakness—reached his ear, and he heard Moira's voice. But he had never heard so sweet and childish a thrill in it.

Digitized by Google

"Oh, Sir Guy," she said, and her voice was muffled suddenly as though she had sunk upon her lover's breast, "I think I have loved you all the time."

The diver drew himself up, and his face distorted as if he were in agony. A moan broke from him.

"Him, him!" he whispered. "Sir Guy loves her—and she—she loves him. I have lost her; lost her after all!"

NINTH CHAPTER.

Two Meetings and a Crossing.

"Indeed, Miss Irene, and we're rare glad to see you at Groudle Tower again, though it's a sad reason that keeps my lady here and brings you to her instead of her to you. But you're looking both well and bonny, for all London is such an unhealthy place."

The speaker was a fresh-coloured, North-country woman, whose smooth and snowy tresses, showing beneath her white lace cap and black ribbons, betrayed that she was far advanced in years. Yet the figure in the plain, dark dress was upright and sprightly. Irene Tarleton had taken her withered hands impulsively.

"Yes," she said, "isn't it horrible about poor Davenal? If it wasn't for that I'd be charmed to be back in Cumberland, dear Mrs. Lintot. I do manage to keep fit in London, somehow, but it's a hard task. Give me a wet morning on the breakwater, with the wind blowing half a gale off Groudle Head, and you can take all the Rows and Bond Streets in the world. But I must go and pay my respects to the mater—you and I will have a long gossip later on."

She crossed the gloomy hall—at whose wide entrance the servants were bringing in her bicycle and travelling-bags. As she neared the foot of the great staircase, someone flashed down it, someone clad in a tweed riding suit, and carrying a light, silver-mounted switch. Irene gasped and coloured up to her eyebrows.

"Mr. Jerome!" she exclaimed, "is it you—or your ghost? And if you are real, how on earth did you get here?"

The war-correspondent laughed, and took the gloved hand held out to him.

"I came from Copenhagen with Mr. Stormont," he said. "We met at Petersburg—I on my way from the Turkish frontier, he from Thibet. We went on to Copenhagen with a Danish friend, and then made for Hull. Our visit to Groudle was due to a whim of Stormont's. So now you have it all in a mouthful."

He was still holding her hand—she released it gently, stealing a shy, feminine glance at his tanned features.

"So you have been making yourself famous," she observed.

"Thank you for the papers you had sent me, but I always bought the Gazette, and felt quite proud to think you were a friend of mine."

Paul Jerome fingered his riding-switch. "I—I thought about you often when I was writing for the Gazette," he said; "pictured you drinking tea in Bond Street or waltzing at Lady Somebody's and all that sort of thing. I liked to believe you'd be sorry if I went under, and so I—I didn't."

Irene smiled. "Then I'm glad you believed it," she retorted and coloured again. The war-correspondent stepped aside.

"What a clumsy beggar I am," he said, "here I'm yarning on when you've only just arrived, and are no doubt tired and hungry. Well, I will possess my soul in patience till we meet again."

He stood to watch her as she ran upstairs. The shy, girlish smile lingered about Irene's lips as she went to her mother's room, and her eyes were both soft and bright. And she was singing a snatch of song that Mr. Paul Jerome would have given a good deal to hear.

"The pibroch is sounding o'er valley and scaur,
'Tis Allen, my own, coming home from the war."

She blushed at the second line, and only hummed the last two-thirds of it.

Lady Tarleton encountered her on the threshold. "Oh," she observed petulantly, "so you've got here at last. If you're hungry, you'd better tell Lintot to give you a little cold chicken and a cup of chocolate; we have lunched."

She swept by her daughter and vanished down the stairs. At its foot she paused and motioned to a footman.

"Where is this person?" she asked.

"In the small drawing-room, my lady," responded the servant and went to a door hard by. He threw it open and Lady Tarleton entered. At her appearance a lounging figure rose from a chair. It was Dennis Hartigan.

Lady Tarleton waited till the door had reclosed. Dennis Hartigan waited also. Yet the eyes of each were studying the other.

The woman was the first to speak. "Well," she said, "I expected this visit when I heard that you had been released. Let me spare you the clumsy diplomacy of your class. Blackmail is written in your face. I have read the word too often in your wife's not to know it by now."

Dennis Hartigan raised his brows. The decision of her attack had disconcerted him, as it was meant to.

"I am not a rich woman," went on Lady Tarleton. "Though I am, of course, the heir to the estate, my brother-in-law has an exclusive life interest. My husband left me a beggar. You cannot get out of me what I have not got."

The other grinned. "That is just what I can do, my lady," he said, lowering his voice, and coming close to her. "You haven't got these estates and the fortune that goes with them. But though you haven't got them I can take them off you. Mr. Stormont's heir is not you, my lady. One lives that can take the property from you, and, at her majority, from him—his daughter."

Lady Tarleton gazed at the speaker, and a spasm passed over her worn, selfish countenance—a spasm that might have been either hate or alarm.

"I must try to borrow," she answered coldly. "If you can tell me the child's whereabouts, you shall have, by hook or by crook, a thousand pounds."

Dennis Hartigan shook his head. "You offered Hannah five," he said. "I must have five at least. But what good will her name and whereabouts do you? You don't suppose I should let you put her out of the way, do you, and rob me of my trump card?"

Lady Tarleton hesitated.

"If—if the child were no longer in my path," she murmured, "I would give, not five, but ten thousand pounds—to the man who told me so."

The steward started. Lady Tarleton played with the rings on her fingers.

"Does anyone but you know of the—the proceedings that followed the child's supposed death?" she asked.

"N—no," said Dennis Hartigan, "that is, no my lady, no one."

Lady Tarleton took out her purse and gave him a note for a hundred pounds. "If I judge you rightly, Mr. Hartigan, she remarked, "you are a bold, a ruthless, and a discreet man. Go away and think over what I have said to you."

She snapped the clasp of her purse and turned away.

"Think it well over," she said, glancing back at him as she reached out a hand to the bell. Dennis Hartigan folded up the note.

Digitized by Google

"I—I will, my lady," he answered, "and thank your ladyship."

He moved towards the opening door and passed out. From the threshold he looked round reflectively. Lady Tarleton met the look with cold directness.

Reaching the high road he turned along it in the direction of Groudle, past the 'Half Brick.' Between that point and Groudle Town, he became aware of an approaching figure, slight, girlish, and moving with a curious caution along the edge of the kerb. He saw that she was blind before he had recognised her as his sister, Kit.

He muttered an expletive under his breath as he went to meet her. His step attracted her attention and she stopped, listening. Then she laughed happily.

"It's you, Dennis, I know your walk. For shame, you selfish fellow, where have you been all this time? Thinking of anything but your poor little sister, I'll be bound! Well, I was just coming up to the 'Half Brick' to ask about you, for all the world as if I were your wife."

"And if you were," grumbled her brother wrathfully, "I'd break every bone in your body, to teach you better manners!"

"No, you wouldn't," Kit said, "for if I were your wife I should know how to coax you. There, I forgive you, Dennis, dear, but I have wanted you really. Moira says I do nothing but sing—

"Give my love to Nancy, the girl that I adore, Tell her that she'll never see her sailor any more."

"Stow that!" cried the ex-steward, for she had broken into an imitation of his own drunken accents. "Come on, I was just going down to the cottage, let's go together."

Kit put her arm in his, and they passed on side by side.

"Do you know, Dennis, dear," she remarked, "I was dreaming about you last night. Oh, such a queer dream."

"Was it?" said her brother, morosely.

"Yes," continued the blind girl. "I dreamt I was down on the old breakwater, sitting on the steps as I used to. And I dreamt I heard someone come along the breakwater—someone singing 'Give my love to Nancy,' and I got up and ran up the steps. And as soon as I reached the top I recognised the walk. It was you, Dennis, and I said, 'Oh, then it was you all the time!' Wasn't that a silly dream?"

The ex-steward showed his teeth in a silent snarl. "Yes," he answered, "a foolish dream enough."

Kit laughed. "I asked Moira this morning," she added, "if she had ever heard that song about Nancy. She said, 'No.' And Mr. Davenal hadn't either."

Dennis Hartigan's eyes flashed. They had come to a winding, sequestered lane that crossed their road. He turned down it—it had high, over-grown banks and deep, brim-full ditches. Dennis Hartigan looked before and behind him with a singular anxiety.

"No, not that way," said the blind girl, "that's the level crossing, Dennis, and I hate the trains."

An expression of grim intelligence flickered over the other's features. "Oh, nonsense," he said, "I'm with you!" And he drew her forward along the lane.

From the first bend in the narrow thoroughfare he could see the level crossing. And the great central gates were shut. The ex-steward's glance went to the distance signals of the neighbouring station. They were down, a train was almost due. He led the blind girl onward, and piloted her through the the small side-gate. Already his ear had caught the rumble of the approaching train. He passed on to the level crossing, leading the blind girl.

The shriek of a whistle sounded, and the funnel and buffers of a locomotive showed round the distant bend.

Dennis Hartigan loosed his hold of his sister's arm, and sprang over the wooden flooring of the crossing. "Stand there," he said, "you are quite safe."

The blind girl, left standing alone between the metals, extended her hands gropingly; the ground was shaken by the tremendous vibrations of the oncoming express.

(Another instalment next week.)

Your Editor Chats.

An announcement of the new competition which will start next week appears on page 367. If you carefully read all the particulars you will see what a simple and pleasant occupation it will afford for the long, dull evenings. The prizes, too, are well worth winning. The Index to Stations in Bradshaw's Guide, in which all the correct solutions are to be found, is the one which competitors in the Pearson's Weekly £5 a Week for Life Competition are using, so, if you are going in for that, there will be no need for you to purchase a new index. To prevent disappointment you should at once order a copy of next Tuesday's Short Stories—it is dated March 28th—to be reserved for you; there is sure to be a big demand for that number. If you have not already got an Index to Stations, it will be as well to send for one now, so as to be able to start the competition without any delay.

In addition to the valuable money prizes offered in the new competition, we are giving away twenty-five of our plendid Gramophones. A large number of these have been awarded already in various competitions, and all the lucky recipients have expressed their very great delight at getting such handsome presents. There may still be a few persons who do not know what a Gramophone is, and perhaps think that it is an intricate machine which requires very careful handling, if it is not soon to get out of order. Such, however, is not the case. The Gramophones which we are giving away are very simple in construction, and they reproduce perfectly whatever is on the records, whether it be a song, recitation, or instrumental music. All you have to do is to place the record in position, and then set the machine in motion. It will continue to reproduce the sounds as long as you wish it to do so. Each instrument is accompanied by two records and is fitted with a concert sound-box, which greatly increases the volume of sound.

The last of the series of articles by Lady Peggy Carstairs on "How I Chaperoned Belinda" appears on page 375 and the four succeeding pages. I am sure that all my readers will be sorry that they have come to an end—I myself most certainly am.

"The Confessions of a Self-Made Girl," on pages 368-372, are well worth perusal, and I would recommend my readers—especially the members of the fair sex who have to earn their own living, and are hoping to make a name in the world—to read them carefully, and endeavour to profit by the experiences through which Maud Cardew passed before she attained her present position.

I have been glad to receive a large number of favourable criticisms of the new serial story, "Held Apart," and strongly recommend those who have not yet started to read it to do so at once.

In a few weeks' time I shall publish reproductions of a number of heads of men of various nationalities. They have taken a considerable time to get together owing to the difficulty of obtaining the correct national costume, and even now the number is not quite so complete as I could wish, but I think I have managed to find the most picturesque ones.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

The Story of a - - Masterful Woman.

Miss Elizabeth Morant was impatient; that was rendered perfectly clear by the contraction of the brows and the firmly-closed lips, and it was further indicated by the quick, intermittent tapping of the fingers on the little rosewood table.

Her dress and surroundings denoted ample means, while the strong, imperious face bore proof of the exceptional character of the woman. People who knew her said that, given the regal power, she might have become a modern Queen Elizabeth, for she was a woman born to command.

She had reached the age of thirty without marrying—not very surprising, remarked the gossips with a smile. The number of men who could love such a woman was small; some might have married her for money, being satisfied to play second fiddle in order to better their social position, but she had not encouraged any advances so far.

It was an open secret that she had come into her wealth unexpectedly; an elderly great-uncle had died intestate and she was the only relative; she had not even known of his existence and the inheritance was a great surprise for her, but she entered into her new life with the utmost composure.

She appeared quite unmoved by the sudden change from genteel poverty and drudgery to affluence and ease, a fact which testified to her almost unwomanly strength of mind.

Of her career prior to her elevation to fortune, her few friends had learnt nothing; she told them nothing about it and she ignored all "leading" questions and broad hints. They felt that there was something in it that would have interested them, but their curiosity was not satisfied.

The contracted brows were drawn still closer to the half-closed eyes and the tapping became more impatient. At that moment the timepiece chimed three o'clock, ending with three musical notes to indicate the hour, and Miss Morant's brow cleared as she uttered a low laugh.

"How foolish of me!" she exclaimed. "I remember now! I said a quarter-past three, not a quarter to three. Of course, I altered to into past! I was afraid that he was behind the appointed time, which would have been an indication that he was not much disposed to—to be my tool!" she concluded with a quiet significance that was calculated to produce an uncanny feeling in the person who heard it had there been any one present to hear it.

She rose and went to a larger table, from the drawer of which she took a thin packet. It contained two photographs.

"The dead love and the living!" she murmured. A softened expression crept over the imperious features, effecting a great change in the woman. "Perhaps I ought not to call Ralph Seton my dead love," she continued reflectively. "He is dead, but I still have a place for him in my heart, and I am proving it by remaining true to the vow I made to repay him who made Ralph suffer, flee and die of malaria in a foreign land before I could scrape together the money to follow him.

"And you"—addressing the other portrait—"I love you now, and I know that Ralph would approve, for you are bold and determined, as he was and as I am. Yes, I love you, I love you!"

She raised the senseless card to her lips and kissed it in the way that one would expect such a woman to do it, passionately, as though her whole being were condensed into that kiss. As she took the card from her lips a maid entered with a message. The girl stopped in confusion, but Miss Morant remained unabashed and haughty.

"Yes, show Mr. Poole in here!" she commanded.

She replaced the packet in the drawer and seated herself to receive the expected caller. Mr. Poole was a man of medium height, clean-shaven, alert; his eyes were of extraordinary keenness, which he tried to repress. He took in the general aspect of the room and its contents in one swift glance, and stepped towards the chair to which Miss Morant motioned him.

"Well?" she inquired.

"I'll do it!" replied Mr. Poole, with just a trace of hesitation. "Business in the private inquiry line is bad and——"

"The Maxham case did not help you much?" she queried, with the faintest of smiles.

"No!" admitted Mr. Poole with a flush. "That was a bit awkward, but I did nothing shady. Over zealous, that was it. Served my client too well! But this job of yours—you see, it might be necessary to trump up something. I think it's worth more than you offer!"

"I'll add £250!"

"Then it's a bargain!" said Poole. "It won't be my fault if it doesn't come off. Give me the full particulars."

"Here they are!" returned Miss Morant with her usual calmness. "Ralph Seton and I were engaged. He was employed in the firm of Masters & Co. One day it was discovered that someone had been embezzling some money—a large sum. Ralph was suspected, and, to avoid prison, he fled.

"He hoped to get away till the hue and cry had subsided and then return and work quietly till he had gathered the evidence necessary to clear himself. He died of malaria in South America. I hadn't enough money to go out to him. I have visited his grave since then and have vowed to repay the debt incurred by the one who accused Ralph."

"It's revenge, that's what it comes to when you put it in plain language!" said Poole bluntly.

Digitized by Google

Miss Morant winced and frowned; she always spoke out unequivocally herself, but she resented this bluntness on the part of another.

"Call it what you like; I call it justice!" she answered frigidly. "Now you know what to do. I have given you the name of the firm and of the accused man, the unjustly accused man. It occurred nearly seven years ago, and I have been hoping to—to avenge Ralph myself. I use your own word, for avenging is to have revenge! I have not done it; the task is not one for a woman unaided. I want you to do it."

"You want to ruin the man who accused Ralph Seton, if I can find him! And if Ralph Seton was guilty, really?"

Poole was amazed at the effect of his words. Miss Morant's eyes seemed to flash fire, she sprang from her seat and stood before him with clenched hands.

"He was innocent to me, and I care not what the world thinks! He was taken from me, our happiness was wrecked, and it is but justice that the life of the one who brought this upon us should receive the same fate. Your instructions are to ruin the man who ruined our lives; do the work and receive the pay!"

Poole left the presence of Miss Morant about ten minutes later with £250 in gold in his pockets, the first instalment of his pay. He was hard up and this liberal treatment, before he had done a stroke, won him over.

"She will part with even more than she said if I work the thing all right!" he muttered. "I don't want all this heavy stuff about me though; I'd sooner have paper. I shan't bank it; that might lead to something against me later on.

"She's artful! No cheque, no paper, but gold, so that there's no tracing it back to her! I'll bet that she has collected this money now and then, so as not to draw on a big cheque!" He meditated further. "Can't understand a woman like that being capable of the tender passion that love is supposed to be! Still, love works wonders."

Mr. Poole would have seen the confirmation of his concluding remark had he been present at the Tristam ball that evening.

Miss Elizabeth Morant, attired in a manner that became her to perfection, was attracting general attention and a certain amount of envious admiration. Was she not beautiful and was she not receiving marked attention from Lord Alminton?

Younger ladies saw with sorrow their chance of capturing this eligible young man vanishing before their eyes. There had been some gossip about these two; rumour had said that Lord Alminton had paid Miss Morant much attention during a stay in Nice, but the matter had not been taken seriously.

A particularly delightful waltz had just terminated and Lord Alminton was escorting Miss Morant to a seat. The dreamy music and the enjoyment of the dance had exhilarated both; he was flushed and entranced, while her face wore an expression that no one had seen on it before. It resembled the look that overspread her countenance when gazing at the portraits, but nobody in the ball-room had seen that.

"Miss Morant, may I take you to a seat and get you an ice or—or will you walk with me through the gallery? This is the interval, and—it would give me great pleasure to spend a few minutes with you apart from the crowd!"

It was curious that each should lose some of his or her individuality when with the other. He was not usually so hesitating, and she almost blushed at her action in securing his portrait unknown to him. It was so unlike her to feel abashed!

"I prefer a walk along the gallery," she said, not daring to look up.

His heart gave a great bound. He conducted her to a quiet corner and, forgetful of the supposed desire to walk through the gallery they sat down.

"Miss Morant, I have been waiting for this opportunity ever since we met in Paris. I have tried to get near to you, I have haunted the places where I expected to find you. I have been tormented when I saw you surrounded by others or when I could not find you, and I have been transported with joy when I could get near you for a moment

"I was determined to bring matters to a climax to-night. Elizabeth"—taking her hand in his—"it may be presumption but I must tell you to-night that I love you! I must learn my fate. Dare I hope that I am not to go from here with the sadness of disappointment—dare I hope that my love is returned, even in some slight measure?"

She kept her eyes lowered for a moment; she could not look at him till she had controlled her emotion; she must not betray the depth of her passion immediately. With an effort she repressed the feeling which she knew was gleaming in her eyes; then she looked up at him, with something like composure and replied softly: "You may hope!"

"Elizabeth! Those words bring happiness to me!" With a swift movement he bent forward and kissed her. The kiss was returned with a warmth that sent him into the seventh heaven of a lover's paradise. He would have repeated the caress, but another couple came into view.

"Why did you say that you must learn your fate to-night, Robin?" she asked as they went back to the ball-room, the happiest of mortals. "You seemed to lay special stress on the word."

"Ah! The remembrance makes me unhappy, for it brings me back to earth!" he cried. "I must be off to-morrow on business, and it will be a month before I return—I am going to Egpyt. But the time will pass, and when I come back, our engagement shall be announced!"

The idea of parting so soon was not pleasant, but Elizabeth was strong-minded enough to make the best of it and be happy. She was simply brilliant during the rest of the evening, eclipsing all the members of her sex and enchanting all the members of the opposite sex.

He had told her to call him by his family pet name of "Robin," and she had not thought to ask him for any other. Letters could be addressed with his title, and she could wait to learn the other; she might find out from a book of reference, but she would not buy or borrow one, or seek the information through a third party. "He will tell me, and it matters nothing!" she declared, with a mixture of loving confidence and queenly dignity that befitted her. So she waited.

Mr. Poole called a week later, and he found Miss Morant as hard and haughty as on the previous occasion.

"Yes, I'm on the track, well on it!" he replied, in answer to her question. "I've got my hand on the man who shouted the whole thing from the housetops, so to say."

"Well?" said Miss Morant, in a tone of sarcastic inquiry. "You know what to do, I think? Why trouble me? Your money is safe when you have finished! Or do you want some more on account?"

"I'll take it, although that is not what I came about!" retorted Poole, with a slight flush. "I've come to ask if I shall go on, because I've heard a rumour—about you—and I thought it would—might, I mean—alter your plans!"

Mr. Poole was not easily embarrassed, but this woman was so different from others. If she had been a man, she would have been one of those who rule an Empire or a Government, dragging subjects or colleagues wherever she pleased. Miss Morant wanettled that this fellow should mention that he had heard her name coupled with that of Lord Alminton, and she crushed him.

Digitized by Google

"Never mind what you have heard! I have not engaged you to play the spy on myself!" she said icily. "Devote your attention to the work for which I am paying you!"

There was a sting in that little speech that pierced its way deep into the sensitive portion of Mr. Poole's anatomy, and he shut his teeth hard as he rose to go.

"Then Basil Westerham is to be made to go through it, that's the programme?" he said rather insolently. "Very good! I have my finger on the whole thing, and I can make the transaction look shady for him by just a little juggling with this or that, I fancy.

"Most people believe that the other fellow was guilty, but it is a bit involved, and it's a toss up whether he wouldn't have cleared himself, or got off for want of absolute clear proof, if he hadn't scooted! I suppose you are playing your own little game, and if you don't like to let me into the know, I can do without it! Yes, I'd like another instalment, a good one!"

Another payment was made, again in gold.

"She's a demon!" mused Mr. Poole, as he went homewards. "I must get some more out of her in a week, so that I'm pretty safe if the thing doesn't succeed! It'll make a stir, and he may have a tough job to clear himself, but I'm inclined to think that it isn't possible to push it so far as she wants. But I'm not going to concern myself about her; she is pretty artful in keeping clear, and I must be the same. That last move of hers is smart, if it's true!"

Mr. Poole kept his word, and demanded another instalment of his pay at the end of seven days. Then he set to work, and Miss Morant followed his request to watch the newspapers for news of Basil Westerham.

Miss Morant began to grow impatient as the days passed without news. Lord Alminton was expected back, and would arrive in Southampton on the 27th, and she hungered for her triumph of revenge before she enjoyed the triumph of love.

Occasionally she felt uneasy, a strange sentiment for her; if Lord Alminton should know of her action in crushing Basil Westerham and avenging Ralph Seton, would he approve? He might, for he was a strong man, and he was the soul of honour, and if Ralph had really been guilty? She laughed mirthlessly; could it be that she was becoming a prey to remorse?

She had believed that Ralph Seton was innocent. Stay! Had she believed it or had she been blinded by the love of a strong woman, as she was? Had she blindly followed the rage which the destruction of her happiness had aroused in her?

"A good lover can be a good hater," says the old saw; this is true from the very fact that anyone who is capable of deep feeling must have intense sentiments of all kinds, good or bad.

Elizabeth Morant had allowed this intensity of feeling to have full play, and she had hated the man who had brought the embezzlement to light, hated him with an intensity that would not allow her to think of anything else than the fact that he had ruined her happiness.

She tried to shut out the disturbing thoughts, but they forced themselves upon her, day by day, till she grew nervous. Her old calmness was deserting her. She thought of sending for Poole, and telling him to desist, but this was such a turnabout that she could not at first reconcile conflicting feelings.

At length she resolved to undo all that she had done. "I have the prospect of being happier than I dreamt of!" she said. "I must not endanger that happiness! I will let the other pass!" So she sent for Poole.

He was gone and his office closed! That accounted for the absence of news! Miss Morant hardly knew whether to be angry or pleased, but Lord Alminton was to arrive that day and he would visit her in the evening.

She waited for him, but he came not. Perhaps the vessel had been delayed; he would come on the morrow. She passed a restless night, full of foreboding, and read the confirmation of that presentiment of evil as soon as she opened her newspaper on the following morning.

A most sensational affair, the newspapers called it. Young Lord Alminton, on arriving at Southampton late in the evening, the vessel having been delayed by stress of weather in the Bay of Biscay, had been charged with being concerned in the embezzlement of a sum of money from Messrs. Masters and Co.

The actual theft had been committed years ago, when Lord Alminton, then Basil Westerham, a clerk with small prospects, had brought the charge of embezzlement against Ralph Seton, a fellow clerk. Seton was believed to be guilty, and he confirmed this opinion by fleeing the country.

Lately, however, a younger member of the firm had been going over the old papers at the instigation of one of his staff, and had, it was alleged, found evidence enough to support a charge of complicity, if not one of embezzlement itself.

Basil Westerham was well connected, but did not dream of succeeding to the title; fate had removed those who had stood nearer to it, and he had suddenly found himself heir. He adopted the family name of the Almintons, calling himself Basil Casselton, and had finally succeeded to the title. There was a rumour that further revelations were to be expected.

Elizabeth Morant knew very little of what passed that day. A telegram arrived from "Robin" after midday, saying that he would be with her in the evening. She waited for him with a dull sense of annihilation. He was coming to her, liberated on bail, and suffering under the charge which she had brought upon him! Now she understood what Poole had begun to tell her! Oh, why had she been so haughty, so vindictive! Had she been less imperious, she might have averted the consequences of her acts!

He came, and she retreated from him.

"My darling!" he cried in anguish. "Surely you do not think me capable of such a vile thing!"

He had misinterpreted her movement. No! She could not believe him capable of it! Yet—was Ralph really guilty? She was torn by opposing sentiments, but the sight of Robin's face threw the weight of conviction into the scale that stood for him.

"I shrink from you because I am unworthy of you, Robin!" she cried, calling him by the name that had become so dear to her. "It is not you who are guilty; it is I. I have brought this upon you!"

"You!" he exclaimed incredulously.

"Yes! I will tell you!" She cast aside all reserve; standing erect and scorning to spare herself one iota of the shame, she confessed what she had done—confessed it humbly and fully.

"I will make it all plain and clear you!" she cried, when she had finished the wretched confession. "Then I will go from you to prison, if it be my lot. All I ask is—do not despise me too much, for I love you, and your condemnation of me will be the bitterest part of my punishment!"

"It is dreadful, and it might have been impossible to undo all this wrong! No, I will not blame you more!" he said, as she cowered before him. "Your punishment is great."

"And you share it! I have brought it upon you!" she wailed. "My wickedness has recoiled upon me, but you suffer as well. I cannot bear it!"

"The happiness of the past month will help me to bear the pain of separation," he said sadly. "I forgive you!"

She glanced at him with yearning, her eyes lighted by a resolve that had just sprung up within her.

"We must part, but before you go, grant me one favour!" she pleaded.

He seemed to divine her wish. Their lips touched, and she kissed him with passionate fervour, as she had kissed his portrait. Then she saw him go, slowly, reluctantly.

Lord Alminton was cleared of the charge, but no scandal resulted. To the public, it was treated as a grave mistake, and in private the wrongdoers were let off lightly at Lord Alminton's request, whereby he saved the woman he loved. She lives quietly in a little village now, and once a year she receives a specially printed card with good wishes, over which she always weeps.

George Day.

Digitized by Google

AN ATTEMPTED ELOPEMENT.

Telling of One which had a Happy Ending.

"We hadn't much money, but weddings are cheap,
So, while the old fellow was snoring asleep,
With a lad and a ladder she managed to creep
Over the garden wall!"

"Don't endure it, Ida, darling!" cried Frank.

"I won't!" cried Ida. She swallowed hard, and looked very determined. She was always brave when she was with Frank. "If I hadn't money do you suppose my step-father would want to keep me? I have to be governess and nurse-maid in chief for his impertinent children five hours out of every day.

"I wouldn't mind if they were my own half-brothers and sisters. I don't see what possessed mamma to marry a man who had two stupid boys and three cross girls for her to wait upon!"

Frank Keith prided himself upon his strict sense of justice.

"Jasper Rayforth is a handsome man still," he said.

"Handsome!" Ida Sitwell's voice was contemptuous. "He looks like a brigand! Exactly like the brigand of a story-book—black, pointed beard, black eyes, sham courtesy, and deference that is a cloak for scheming insolence. Oh, why did mamma ever listen to him? She and I were so happy together!"

They were walking through Hyde Park, which was overwhelmingly majestic and beautiful in its royal ermine and innumerable glittering frost jewels.

"Not so happy as you and I shall be together, Ida, if only——" Not even the snowflakes heard the remainder of the softly-spoken words. But Ida did; Ida, listening with bright head bent and soft cheeks flushing.

Many walking briskly across the short cut to Rotten Row—there were no saunterers in the park that cold, bracing, midwinter day—looked with eyes lenient or envious at the two who seemed so completely oblivious of all save each other.

He, tall and vigorous, straight-striding, and manly—she, fair and girlish and fur-clad as a princess of the Russias.

"Oh, I—I couldn't, Frank! I wouldn't dare to!"

"I suppose I'm a fool to hope you would!" he returned bitterly. "Your people would put me down for a fortune-hunter; but even if I should not succeed in my profession—I've got enough to take good care of you, and——"

Ida drew a quick little breath and turned suddenly.

"Now—Frank! Don't be unjust! I haven't any people—as you say. Only a person. That's my mother. And I haven't all of her since she married Rayforth. And if I knew you could give me only a third-storey flat and two pairs of gloves a year I'd marry you just the same, because——"

"My dear little love!" he murmured. "I can't bear to see you unhappy there, Ida—and Heaven knows I'm not half the fellow I might be if I had you beside me! Your mother——"

"Oh, my mother," said the girl, with a piteous touch of finality in her tone. "She is changed. She is no longer like a gay elder sister as she always was before her second marriage. She is controlled by that man. His influence dominates her. But still for her sake I would not like——"

"She loves you—desires your happiness?"

"Above all things."

"Then——" he began. And once more he spoke so low that only she heard. He pleaded well. He was no laggard in love. His passionate protestations reached the depths of the girl's soul and rang there like inspiriting music. "If brave heart were to win fair lady——"

Suddenly, with a little swift, impulsive, gracious motion she swayed slightly towards him, slipped her hand within his arm. And she said just one word.

The bare, black-limbed trees of the park were silhouetted against a sky of pallid gold when Ida Sitwell reached home.

The house of Jasper Rayforth was a grim, square, old-fashioned mansion set back among dense shrubbery, and having for its nearest neighbour another house equally grim, and, if possible, more quaint of outline and aspect.

Supper was on the table when the girl entered. Rayforth, having eaten a comfortable midday meal in town himself, frowned upon the idea of dinner in the evening. A shrill babel of young voices arose:

"Ida, I've got to have you play over that fantasie for me to-night!"

"Ida, you must help me with my German!"

"Ida, mamma says you'll trim my hat for me."

"What kept you so long, any way?"

The girl made no reply; no comment. She took her accustomed seat. The rose colour which the cold had brought to her cheeks did not fade; indeed, it deepened. But when her mother spoke to her in a low voice she listened attentively, replying with a quick, warm smile.

"That old chap next door is becoming more of a crank than ever," remarked Rayforth. "I met him to-day and he looked at me as though I were an utter stranger."

"He is always very polite to me," Mrs. Rayforth declared.

Ida laughed.

"Oh, that's because you admired the flowers he grew in the back garden last summer," she said.

When the tasks of the evening had been accomplished and Ida was alone in her own little room looking out on the garden which had been so gay a few months before she set deliberately to work.

First she put on her best dress. Then she packed her portmanteau. After that she got together in a handbag such necessaries, valuables, and papers, as were of especial worth to her. There was the writing of a note remaining.

Digitized by Google

The little blurred, loving letter written, she turned out the gas, softly opened the window, and, warmly wrapped up, sat down by the sill—listening, waiting.

The night air came to her crisp, sweet, invigorating. Stars twinkled down in quite a sociable and conniving fashion.

Even the man in the pearl-white moon that went sailing up into a sapphire vault, seemed to wink with friendly and comical appreciation of a romance the like of which he had aided or defeated many a time in his innumerable experiences as spy or conspirator.

"Hark!" Ida started up as a sound came to her. She leant forward. "Frank."

"Sh—h! Yes!"

A wavering black object slowly upreared itself, resting against the window-sill. Ida lifted her handbag out of the window, lowered it to the ground by the cord to which it was attached.

The next instant, trusting to the consideration of the moon which had momentarily disappeared, for all the world like an accommodating chaperon, she stepped out on the ladder, began her light, sure-footed, confident descent.

She was half way to the ground, to her lover, freedom, happiness, when the side door of the house next door was flung wide—a billow of light streamed forth.

"Hold on, there!" cried a cracked voice. "Oh, I say Rayforth—Rayforth!"

The next instant a gaunt old figure, attired in pyjamas, a flapping dressing gown, and a skull cap, came flying down the steps leading from his library, darted across the space intervening between the houses and pounded upon the nearest window of the house Ida had just quitted.

"Burglars!" they heard him quaver in shrill accents. "Burglars!"

Ida felt her courage oozing out at her finger tips.

"They will find us! He will make me go back! Oh, Frank!"

But Frank was not to be baulked of his bride. He seized the ladder, carried it a few feet, propped it against another window.

Already there was movement and clamour inside. Lights flashed up over the house. They could hear the excited tones of Rayforth as he sent someone for the police. Frank grabbed up Ida's bag—caught her by the hand. "Run!" he whispered, "we've got to rush for it!"

A swift dash, then they paused, dismayed. There was no scaling the high wooden fence at the rear. And in front the light from a gas lamp made the street as bright as day.

The open door to the left caught Keith's eye; to see was to act. A whispered word—a rapid scamper—and the two, panting, laughing, breathless, faced each other in the cosy den of the recluse neighbour of the Rayforths.

Even as they stood so, they heard sounds as if the police had arrived. Quick as thought Ida turned out the light. Unseen they peered out. They saw dancing lights, dark, moving forms, heard sharp inquiries.

A cordon of police surrounded the house. Sudden excitement stimulated the searchers. The ladder had been discovered! He of the skull cap was pipingly reiterating how he had seen the burglary attempted.

"They're in my house, too!" he shrieked suddenly. "The light has been put out!"

He made a dash across the snowy lawn. A couple of brawny policemen outstripped him. Ida and Keith, fled towards the door opening into the hall, out in the darkness, came crash against a book-case. Lanterns flashed. Electricity flared up.

Keith, his arm flung round Ida, stood defiantly facing the burglar-hunters. At sight of the tenant of the house he gave a violent start. "Uncle Hugo!" he cried.

"Frank Keith!" The old man was smiling grimly. "I didn't think I was interrupting an elopement!"

Furious with rage Jasper Rayforth tore in. He was waving a letter wildly. His wife timidly followed.

"You must come back, Ida!" he shrieked. "You are under my control. You——"

"Don't get excited!" counselled Hugo Bertrand, gravely. His skull cap and wig set rakishly over one eye gave him a grotesque appearance, but he was quite serious.

"I knew my nephew here was in love with your pretty step-daughter. I knew also you would permit no suitor of hers to enter your house, so strong," smiling satirically—"was your desire to keep her. As he is my nearest relative, and will be my heir, I decided to find out for myself what kind of a girl she was, and so took this house near you."

He crossed the room and took a hand of Ida and of Frank.

"I've found out," he said. "She is sweet and good and patient. She watered my flowers when I was ill last summer—every evening! Oh, I knew! And if I had known that the ladder was lifted to-night that she might leave your house forever, Jasper Rayforth, I—I——" The old voice quivering—"I'd have held it—yes, sir!"

The police withdrew, Mrs. Rayforth, pleased and secretly rejoicing, kissed her daughter and Frank. Rayforth gasped out apologies to the eccentric old millionaire whom he would fain conciliate.

"We will have a grand wedding," began Bertrand, "and——"

"A wedding reception if you will," faltered Ida. "But—but Frank and I were married this afternoon!"

"What! You sly young rascals! Well, so much the better! And now you'll live with me; I'm all alone except for the servants. You'll be mistress here, and you'll brighten an old man's life—eh, little girl?"

For answer the bride lifted her pretty lips to the kind old face bent down to kiss hers.

W. T. Miller.

Digitized by Google

CONCERNING TUCKS.

The Story of a Girl who Wasn't Allowed to "Grow Up."

"Netta, are you ever going to grow up?"

The question was asked in a bantering tone, but the eyes of the man who asked it were serious and searching. They were met by one swift, questioning glance in return.

"I am thinking of letting out a few tucks for my birthday," Netta said, with an exaggerated sigh and surveying the pair of slender black legs swinging from the low bough of the apple-tree upon which she was perched.

"Oh! So tucks do it, do they?" Harold Longden said, smiling up at her from his horizontal position on the grass.

Netta looked down into the bronzed face with a curious intentness. It was a good face to look into, not particularly handsome, but a face to trust instinctively, with kind eyes and a firm mouth.

"Tucks and hair," she replied, see-sawing the bough by kicking her foot against the trunk.

"I see. Down with the tucks and up with the hair. A sort of pulling-out-at-both-ends business."

Netta nodded.

"Then on Thursday we shall expect an elongated edition to dinner?"

"Don't be too sure," Netta retorted, see-sawing violently. "No tucks mean no football, no tree-climbing, no fun of any sort."

"You will be eighteen on Thursday," Harold reminded her with a frown.

Netta suddenly stopped see-sawing.

"Harold, do you want me to grow up?" she asked.

"Yes," Harold replied, raising himself on his elbow.

For a long, sweet second through the golden-green twilight of the orchard the blue eyes looked up into the brown. Then the bough bent with a creek and a jerk, and Netta's black legs began to vanish up the tree.

"I can get to the very top, Harold!" she cried in a curiously high-pitched shaky voice.

"Come down!" Harold exclaimed almost roughly, raising himself with a quick movement which was checked by a sudden painful contraction of his mouth. "You know I can't come after you with this lame leg."

"'Nobody asked you, sir, she said,'" Netta cried shrilly, waving a hand from between the topmost branches.

A hurt expression came into Harold's eyes.

"Aren't you coming down?" he asked in a stern voice.

"'We won't go home till morning,'" Netta sang, shaking the branches, but keeping her face hidden.

Harold limped silently away to the sound of the mocking song. He did not see a tragic, tear-stained face thrust from between the leaves to watch him out of sight even when the song was at its shrillest, nor that Netta swung herself swiftly from the tree and knelt to kiss the mossy mound which had been his pillow.

"I'll do it! Those tucks shall come out!" she exclaimed, hurriedly wiping away her tears.

Harold Longden closed the gate of the orchard behind him, cut across a corner of the huge kitchen-garden and through an arched door in the high, grey wall, reached the west terrace of Winstone Manor, his beautiful old home.

A lady sat in the shadow of the long, low house with some needlework in her hand and a book on her knee. She looked up at the sound of Harold's halting step on the stone flags and a spasm of pain passed swiftly across her stern, handsome face. As the daughter, wife and mother of soldiers, Mrs. Longden knew as much as most British women of the cost of serving Britain, and had paid it bravely, but the maiming of this, her youngest, last, and dearest cut her to the quick. She was smiling, however, when Harold dropped listlessly into a wicker chair at her side.

"What have you done with Netta?" she asked, when she saw that her son was alone.

"Netta is at the top of an apple-tree singing 'We won't go home till morning,'" Harold replied in a studiously level voice.

"What is worrying you? Can I help?" Mrs. Longden asked quickly.

"You are too sharp, mother," Harold said, smiling.

"What is it?" Mrs. Longden asked.

"Is eighteen and thirty-five a ludicrous combination? I want to marry Netta. She loves me, perhaps only with a child's love, though. Do you think that it would be taking an unfair advantage to marry her?" Harold asked slowly.

Mrs. Longden looked a little startled, and then laughed a little.

"I am so relieved. I feared it might be the mother!" she said.

"Mrs. Carylon? Oh, no! She is a very fascinating little woman, but I don't want to marry her," Harold replied, with some surprise.

"Have you been saying something to Netta this afternoon, then?" Mrs. Longden asked.

"N—no—er—I said nothing, but she is perhaps going to let out a few tucks for Thursday."

"I shall be much astonished if her mother allows any tucks to be let out," Mrs. Longden said quietly.

"But Mrs. Carylon has often assured me that Netta simply won't grow up," Harold objected.

"Mrs. Carylon is uncommonly fond of assuring people that Netta simply won't grow up," Mrs. Longden replied shortly.

"You have always been prejudiced against Mrs. Carylon, mother," Harold said, smiling. "Surely you cannot imagine that she does not want Netta to grow up."

"That is just what I do imagine," Mrs. Longden said calmly. "I think you must be mistaken."

Mrs. Longden was silent.

"Sometimes when Netta is in a serious mood," Harold continued, after a brief silence, "she seems almost a woman in her thoughts. There have been times when I could have told her—everything. But how can one make love to a child in short frocks? It seems—well, brutal. Have you noticed how like she is growing to poor Carylon?"

"Yes. She is very like her father. I am glad."

"Would you be glad to have Netta for a daughter, mother?" Harold asked wistfully.

"There is no one whom I should like you to marry more than Netta. I have grown to love the child very dearly during your absence. Mail days always found her here on some excuse or other. She has adored you all her life," Mrs. Longden said, rising and folding up her work.

Harold knew that his mother never said what she did not mean, and was satisfied, all unconscious of the agony of renunciation which so many mothers bear in smiling silence.

* * * * * *

"Netta, what can you be doing?"

Mrs. Carylon stood on the threshold of Netta's bedroom, her small, dainty figure suddenly rigid with anger and a steely look in her pale blue eyes.

Digitized by Google

"I know that it is mean and horrid of me, mother, to be altering this on the sly," Netta said, holding up the blue dress at which she was sewing, "but you know how I begged and prayed to be allowed a longer dress for my eighteenth birthday, and you would order me this just as short as ever. Fortunately, it has endless tucks, so I have let a few out and run ribbon over them to hide the stitching."

"How dared you!" Mrs. Carylon exclaimed furiously.

"Mother," Netta said, with trembling lips, "you cannot keep me pretending to be a child any longer. I have romped and played when I hated it just to seem what you tell everybody I am, but I won't do it any more. There are many people here who know my real age, if I am so small."

"Really, Netta, are you mad?" Mrs. Carylon exclaimed angrily, but with scarlet face. "And it is unpardonable of you to spoil this entirely new dress," she continued. "Give it to me. The tucks must be run in again carefully by hand."

"Oh, mother, I want to wear it to-night," Netta cried, clutching the dress to her breast.

"To-night! And why to-night, pray? There will be no one at the Longdens' save ourselves. It is only Harold's usual whim that you should go to dinner on your birthday."

Netta's face crimsoned and she held the frock tightly.

"And are you going to do up your hair to-night?" Mrs. Carylon asked, her eyes gleaming with a hard, fierce light.

"Yes," Netta replied, shrinking away from her mother. "It won't really make you look any older, mother, if I am grown up."

Mrs. Carylon suddenly bore down on Netta and snatched the dress from her clasp.

"If you act the naughty child, you must be treated as such," she said vindictively, turning to the door with the dress in her hand, furious that Netta had fathomed her selfish dread.

"Oh, mother, you can't love me a bit! I don't believe you ever have loved me. You have always thought me a nuisance," Netta wailed, the tragedy of her short life at last breaking into speech.

A few minutes later Harold Longden with a fat parcel under his arm crossed the road from his own park-gates to Mrs. Carylon's cottage, also his, and let at a merely nominal rent to the widow of his old friend, Dick Carylon, who had died on a far-off frontier battlefield, begging Harold to look after his girl-wife and baby child. Harold had almost reached the house when Netta cannoned wildly against him in her headlong career along the winding path.

"Why, Netta!" he exclaimed, at the sight of her tear-stained face. "What is the matter?"

"I—I simply can't grow up. There will be no tucks let out!" Netta sobbed, breaking away from him and rushing to the gate.

Harold was on the point of limping after her, when Mrs. Carylon's gay voice called him from an open window.

"Are you wondering if Netta has suddenly taken leave of her senses?" she asked, as Harold approached. "It is only the result of a little argument concerning tucks. The funny child simply will not grow up, but I don't suppose a mere man can connect tucks with growing up, can he?" and Mrs. Carylon smiled bewitchingly upon Harold, who, for once, responded but feebly to her chatter. He was intent upon following Netta and getting to the bottom of this tuck mystery, but Mrs. Carylon had not done with him yet.

"I am thinking of ceasing to be your grateful tenant shortly, and going abroad," she said, watching Harold covertly.

"Indeed! We shall be sorry to lose you," he said quietly, making up his mind that Netta should not accompany her mother, if he could help it.

Mrs. Carylon's face hardened, and the hopes which she had never quite ceased to entertain of remaining as mistress of Winstone Manor, finally vanished. Harold left his parcel for Netta, and took a speedy departure. Two hours later he reached home tired and aching after a long, vain hunt. None of Netta's usual haunts contained her, and it had begun to rain heavily. Harold felt anxious, and waited impatiently for the evening, after describing to his mother his encounter with Netta in the cottage garden.

Mrs. Longden had an appointment with her dressmaker, and drove into the neighbouring large town during the afternoon. As the carriage splashed along a muddy country road on its return, the two fat, grey horses came up with a little, dripping figure plodding wearily along by the hedge. Mrs. Longden pulled the check-string sharply, and put her head out of the window.

"Netta, what are you doing here? Get in at once," she said.

Netta obeyed meekly. She was worn out by this time by sheer physical fatigue. Slow, heavy tears rolled down her cheeks, but she said nothing, nor did Mrs. Longden question her. The carriage entered the park on the side furthest from Mrs. Carylon's cottage.

"You had better stay on for the evening," Mrs. Carylon said, when they stopped. "I will send a note to your mother."

Netta got out obediently, too limp and miserable to care what happened. But an hour later, after a hot bath and tea, when she lay on the sofa before the small, bright fire in Mrs. Longden's bedroom, a sudden burst of laughter escaped her.

"Oh, Mrs. Longden, do you think me quite demented?" she cried.

"No, my dear. I have tried to literally tramp out of worries myself," Mrs. Longden replied tranquilly from the depths of her deep, soft chair.

"Oh, then, you know how it hurts," Netta said tremulously.

Mrs. Longden suddenly slipped to the floor and took the girl in her arms.

"I don't believe you are half as stern as you look," Netta whispered, clinging to her wildly.

"Harold didn't see me looking like a drowned rat, did he?" she asked presently.

"No, I don't suppose that he knows you are here. I merely sent word that I was having tea in my room," Mrs. Longden replied smiling.

"I expect mother will send me some clothes," Netta said, with a heavy sigh.

"Suppose I lend you some old finery of my young days. Girls usually like to dress up," Mrs. Longden said, going to a high, oak press. A brilliant flash of hope filled Netta's eyes.

"Oh, Mrs. Longden, how lovely! Please let me get dressed at once! What fun it will be!" Netta cried excitedly, springing from the sofa.

Mrs. Longden laughed softly, as she bent over the drawer and raised a fold of rustling tissue paper. A faint fragrance of lavender stole through the room.

* * * * *

Harold went into the library before dinner, intending to read until his visitors arrived. A small fire had been lit here as elsewhere on account of the rain, and there was somebody standing before it on the hearth-rug, her head and shoulders indistinct in the dusk.

The firelight played upon a faded purple skirt with a flowery pattern running over it. The figure was far too slender for his mother. Who could it be? Harold paused in surprise. A burst of merry laughter made him tingle from head to foot. Whose laughter save Netta's had that peculiar thrilling note?

"I don't believe you know me, Harold. What fun! Your mother found me out for a walk wet through, and brought me home by the south gate? This is one of her old gowns. Isn't it a beauty? And Betsy has done up my hair in a quaint fashion to match. How do I look? I am quite grown up and without letting tucks out either, but the tucks have done it after all," Netta wound up incoherently.

Harold was striking a match. What he saw by the candle-light made him suddenly shy and dumb. Such a dainty

(Concluded at foot of next page.)

Digitized by Google

BRAND NEW COMPETITION.

Starts next Tuesday.

Cash Down. Cash Down. Cash Down.

1st Prize, £50. 2nd Prize, £25. 3rd Prize, £10.

25 Splendid Gramophones.

An entirely new competition will be placed before the public for the first time in "Short Stories" dated March 28th, which will be on sale next Tuesday. It will be exceedingly simple, and will be open to every person who reads "Short Stories."

WHAT YOU WILL HAVE TO DO.

The competition will consist of paragraphs containing the buried names of Railway Stations in the United Kingdom. You will have to write in the spaces given the names of the Railway Stations so indicated.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to Bradshaw's Guide, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or No. 8 Room, 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The first prize of £50 will be given to the Competitor who fills in the greatest number of Railway Stations under the conditions stated.

The second prize of £25 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in the order of merit.

THE FIRST PARAGRAPHS WILL APPEAR IN SHORT STORIES ON SALE NEXT TUESDAY. ORDER YOUR COPY NOW.

old-time figure stood revealed, with such a delicate, quaint charm about it, a woman where he had looked for a child. A brilliant colour flooded the thin, young face, and the dark eyes were starry with the hint of recent tears.

"I suppose you are not really grown up. It is only a mere frolic," Harold said hesitatingly at last.

Netta's lips opened, then closed again. She looked away from Harold restlessly, and seemed more than once on the point of speaking. A fierce battle between love and loyalty was going on within her.

"Tell me why you want me to grow up," she said at last with a crimson face.

"Dear, I want to ask you to marry me. I'm thirty-five and a broken-down old soldier, but——"

"Don't! I won't hear such rubbish! That is, I mean the 'broken-down old soldier' is all rubbish!" Netta cried, throwing her arms round Harold's neck. "And I am grown up if you want me to be," she whispered a few minutes later.

* * * * *

"And so you found my little, lost birdie out in the rain, dear Mrs. Longden. Was it not foolish of the funny darling to go for a walk on such a day? But I am never anxious about her. She is such a Wandering Jew. It is so good of you to have kept her, and thank you so much for sending the carriage for me. And where is the truant now?" Mrs. Carylon asked, looking round the long south drawing-room as she greeted her hostess.

"In the library with Harold, I believe. Here they are!"

"Netta!" And Mrs. Carylon's silvery-sweet voice acquired suddenly a harsh, angry note, which made Harold give the hand he held a close grip.

"Doesn't she look nice?" Mrs. Longden said. "We had just dressed her up when her own clothes came, and we were too charmed to undress her."

"Will you give me Netta for my wife, Mrs. Carylon?" Harold asked with soldierly promptness, holding Netta's hand fast.

"My dear Harold," Mrs. Carylon exclaimed staccato fashion, "to-morrow she will be a romping tomboy again."

"I don't think so, but I am quite willing to risk it," Harold replied.

"The child does not possess a single long frock! The thing is preposterous," Mrs. Carylon continued, with a violent attempt at laughter.

"Let a few tucks out," Mrs. Longden suggested, with secret malice, and Mrs. Carylon's face flamed.

"Ah, Netta, you won't quarrel with me about tucks again!" she exclaimed boldly, confident of Netta's loyalty.

"No, mother," Netta murmured, shrinking towards Harold.

H. Ward.

Digitized by Google

GREAT NEW SERIES. YOU CAN BEGIN HERE.

Confessions of a Self-made Girl

The writer of these Confessions relates in this series of articles the true story of her life, from the time when she left Cornwall, an unsophisticated but ambitious girl, until she made her name and fortune. Her name is well known to you.

[For the purposes of these Confessions I am calling myself Maud Cardew, as my real name is too well known for me to wish to make the story of my life public in this manner.]

MY HEART'S DESIRE.

I AM a native of a seaside village in Cornwall. As I grew up I began to tire of the monotony of the life and determined to go out into the world and make a name for myself.

One day when I was in the ruins of the Old Keep, which is on the cliffs, meditating upon what I should do were I free to carve out my own destiny, two strangers appeared—evidently tourists, I thought. They told me they had decided to stay in the neighbourhood for a few days, and asked if I knew of any lodgings. I said that my father would be glad to put them up at the farm, and accordingly they came home with me.

Their names were the Honourable Robert Lestrange (commonly called Bobbie) and Di Northcote.

I told these two Londoners of my desire to see the world. Bobbie encouraged me in my ambitions, but Di advised me to stay at home. This, however, was not at all in my line, as I told him, and when he saw that nothing would shake me from my resolve, he promised to try to find something for me to do when I arrived in the great city. I made up my mind that I would do marvellous things, and become a great lady of the land—a duchess if possible.

There was a thick fog in London the day I arrived. Bobbie met me, and we started off in a hansom to my lodgings in Bloomsbury. On the way we encountered a dray drawn by some restive horses. Bobbie alighted to give what assistance he could. In the meantime I got frightened and left the cab, of which I soon lost sight in the fog, which was getting thicker.

While I stood on the steps of a house I heard a man's voice asking me to come inside and wait until the fog cleared. Feeling that I couldn't find Bobbie again I accepted the invitation.

We had tea, after which the man became rather familiar, and I had had about enough of him when Di came in, looking very surprised to find me there. He took me to my lodgings, where Bobbie was waiting, and the latter told me that the man in whose rooms I had been was Lord Cecil Trevor, one of the worst "men about town."

MY FIRST SITUATION.

AT eleven o'clock the next morning I was all ready for Di. By a most ingenious arrangement of screens and art serge, the fireplace end of my apartment was easily transformed into a sitting-room, and on the whole I was rather pleased with it.

True the window looked out on to a backyard, and a hideous grey building effectually blocked all chance of seeing the sky, except by flattening your nose against the glass; but I could easily rise above such drawbacks at that period, by the simple process of listening to the distant rumble of vehicles, that hummed "London, London, London," to my enchanted ears.

The pictures and books in the room also, I remember, left a good deal to be desired; and one of the former particularly—a large portrait of an eminent divine—had a most annoying habit of following all my movements, with a pair of condemning eyes.

I hated that picture, yet I never had the courage throughout my stay to ask the landlady to remove it.

The expression gave me a feeling that he spent the time cheerfully consigning me to a certain hot region, along with all the rest of humanity except a few favoured saints of whom he was the honoured head.

Bobbie, on the other hand, was fascinated by him. He would even stand and look at him with a familiar smile, and once he remarked, with a nod: "I say, old chappie, mind that fire doesn't get too low."

Well, to proceed, by a somewhat grotesque ordering of events, it was with the little backyard behind, and this hated picture, which was supported by a fearful and wonderful copy of "The Pilgrim's Progress," that I, the ambitious worldling, stood to receive Di Northcote.

He came into the room, leaving the door wide open, just the quiet, deliberate, business-like man he had always shown himself. It was a manner, that to me, in those days, was most irritating.

I fancied he was patronising, that he regarded me as a little country girl full of ridiculous notions only to be cured by experience; and I went very near to hating him. For, as you have probably observed, I am a young person with a very high opinion of myself, and not in the least addicted to crying small.

"How do you do?" he replied to my greeting. "I hope you are rested, and none the worse for your adventures yesterday."

I thanked him, and remarked that they had not been very serious, then took the seat opposite to him. He got to business immediately.

Digitized by Google

"As I daresay you can imagine," he began, "it is anything but easy for a young stranger to come up to London and find occupation at once. As a matter of fact, it is exceedingly hard."

He paused a moment; but, as I had nothing to say, he went on:

"Of course influence is the great thing in this, as in all else, and because I have a particular weakness for our friend Bobbie, I have promised to exert mine on your behalf."

I thought he need not have been so impressive about his help being for Bobbie's sake; but I had the sense to realise that it mattered little enough so long as he exerted it for me.

"I have, in consequence," he continued, "managed to secure you a post as 'trier on,' I think that's what they call it, at Philips and Philips."

"Trier on!" I repeated vaguely, no doubt looking my astonishment. I don't know what I expected him to get for me, possibly I imagined myself private secretary to the Queen already, but I know the idea of being a 'trier on,' came as a considerable shock.

"Yes," he said, without moving a muscle of his face. "You try on mantles, and jackets, and those kinds of things, to show customers how they look."

I gazed at the fire for a few moments and wondered whether he was teasing me.

"Does a post like that require much influence?" I asked at last, with a touch of sarcasm.

"I secured this one through a Duchess," he replied.

Again there was a pause, then I said:

"Is the shop hers?"

"No," he told me, "but it is quite a usual thing for a good customer to be able to get these posts for girls at the best shops." He regarded me coolly in that slow way of his. "You don't much fancy it?" he said.

"I should not imagine it gives much scope," I replied, and doubtless my lips curled a little as they will at times.

"Scope for what?"

"Anything."

"There I think you are wrong. It will probably prove a useful means of discovering in what particular direction your talent lies. Meanwhile it is good pay. You begin in a fortnight, and it will be best for you to live in."

"Live in?" I repeated. "What does that mean?"

"Live on the premises. It is always usual for girls holding these posts to live in, but if you like to try to make your salary enough to live out, I believe it is possible to get permission. As I said before, I strongly advise your doing as the rest do."

"I should prefer to remain here," I said promptly. "How much salary am I to have?"

"Two pounds a week. Why do you wish to stay here?"

I found myself confronting Di Northcote, with an angry gleam in his face such as I had never seen before.

"I like to feel independent and I can manage quite well on that. Thank you very much indeed for being at so much trouble on my account."

"Not at all," he answered, rising to go. "I hope you will like your new post." Before leaving he stood for a few moments and looked at me hard. "I hope you will be very careful," he said, "where you go and with whom you associate in London. A young girl living alone cannot be too careful."

I bit my lips and made no reply.

"And don't do just whatever Bobbie wants you to," he went on in the same cool manner. "He's very hot-headed and foolish sometimes."

I glanced up indignantly. I could not let anyone slander Bobbie. At that moment my landlady passed the open door.

"He is just splendid!" I said shortly.

"You are quite right, he is," he answered, with perfect equanimity, "but he is also very young, and all young men are foolish. If you will let him, he will spend a great deal of money on you, but at the same time he cannot afford it."

"Really, Mr. Northcote!" I exclaimed hotly, "I cannot understand your speaking to me like this. I do not want Mr. Lestrange to spend sixpence on me, or indeed anything. Your advice borders upon insult."

He shrugged his shoulders in a way that made one want to shake him.

"My dear Miss Cardew," he said, "as I only know you so very slightly, circumstances compel me to judge you at present according to my knowledge of your sex generally. If my warning proves to have been unnecessary, I can only say that I shall be extremely glad."

"Then you may be glad now," I said haughtily, and, half-turning away, stared at the wall in front of me.

Unfortunately I hit just the right angle to catch the eye of that horrid divine, and if I had not been so indignant I must have smiled, and spoilt my admirable pose. For it seemed to me that he winked deliberately, then rubbed his hands together with a grin of anticipation.

"Good-morning," said Di cheerfully, taking up his hat.

"Good-morning," I replied, just glancing at him. For one second as our eyes met, I saw a gleam of admiration pass through his; then it was gone again almost instantly, and he bowed himself out, the careless, apathetic man of the world.

When Bobbie came a little later, I was still feeling very sore.

"Why," I said, "does your friend, Mr. Northcote, seem to make a special point of insulting me?"

"What's he been saying now?" he asked, looking amused.

"He took upon himself to give me advice concerning you. Told me not to do just what you wanted, and said that you would spend a lot of money on me, if I let you. Ridiculous! As if I should dream of such a thing! Why, how could you spend a lot of money on me in a few days, as he seemed to imply."

Digitized by Google

Bobbie put his head on one side whimsically, and looked plaintive.

"There was one girl," he said slowly, "who got through one thousand, three hundred pounds, eighteen shillings and sixpence in five weeks."

"Impossible!" I ejaculated. "Were you very much in love with her?" I added.

"I suppose I thought I was," he said, with that same whimsical air. "She had beautiful auburn locks, which took off, only I didn't know it then, and big blue eyes and tiny little feet, and—well—and—anyhow, that's what she got out of me."

"You must be very rich, Bobbie," I said wonderingly.

"It just depends," he answered, with a solemn air. "Some weeks I'm not badly off at all; and others I'm obliged to be very polite and nice to anyone who would be likely to lend me a 'pony' in a needy moment."

"A pony!" I asked in surprise. "Do you mean to run away on?"

Bobbie shouted at that.

"Oh, you little innocent!" he cried, enjoying it immensely, "what a lot I shall have to teach you. I'll tell you what, we'll go and spend one now as I happen to be pretty flush, and then you'll understand all about it."

I put on my hat, and then he called a hansom and directed the driver to the Savoy Hotel, where he ordered a reckless lunch, including some expensive champagne and liqueurs. I enjoyed it immensely, for Bobbie was always good company, and I quite forgot Di Northcote's injunctions.

What that day cost Bobbie, I am afraid to think in the light of my present knowledge, but at the time ignorance was bliss, and I agreed to all his extravagant proposals without a word.

The people everywhere interested me immensely, but I did not like the way the men stared. My first impulse was to stare them out, but when I communicated this to Bobbie, he seemed highly tickled, and told me it would be most unwise.

I asked him why they stared so, and he said they always did at beautiful girls. Personally, I was more conscious of my countrified, ill-fitting costume than anything, and fancied they were criticising that, for I was convinced I did not look at all nice.

"My dear girl," Bobbie remarked, when I mentioned the fact, "if you went about dressed in sackcloth the men would still stare at you. Nothing, in fact, short of a mask, could prevent it."

I am disposed to think if anyone went about dressed in sackcloth, be their faces what they may, they would get stared at; but evidently that escaped Bobbie's observation at the moment.

After lunch we went to a matinée, and that was my first introduction to a London theatre. We sat in the stalls, and before we had been seated many minutes, someone suddenly tapped Bobbie on the back, and said in tones of huge enjoyment:

"What ho, Bobbie! At it again!"

Bobbie turned sharply, looking a little annoyed, but immediately his face broke into smiles, and he grasped the other man's hand.

"Harcourt! By Jove!" he exclaimed. "What the dickens are you doing in London? I thought you were in India."

"I'm home on sick leave," said the other man. "Had malaria, and was packed off on the Victoria. Bobbie," he added solemnly, with a twinkle as irrepressible as Bobbie's own—"The Wednesday before I sailed you were at a matinée, and that time it was very small, and dainty, and dark."

"Yes," said Bobbie sadly, "and very expensive."

Then he turned to me.

"Miss Cardew," he said, "let me introduce you to the bravest soldier in the British Army, and the biggest scoundrel out of it. He stands—or I should say, sits here—and his name is Nelson Harcourt.

"We were boys together," he went on sentimentally—"when we were young we loved the same girl, ate the same sweets, were ill over the same first cigar, and were generally caned for the same reason.

"Since then we have cut our wisdom teeth, and now we love different girls, drink each other's wines, smoke each other's cigars, and can give David and Jonathan points in loving. If Nelson, or Flip, as I always call him, has a fault, it's turning up when he isn't wanted; but he's a good chap to take a hint." And he winked in the most bare-faced manner.

I shook hands with Captain Harcourt, and from that moment until years later he fell trying to save a wounded trooper at Spion Kop, we were the greatest of friends. Indeed, all my life I must ever have in my heart a specially tender spot for those two handsome, careless-hearted boys. As a matter of fact, they were about my own age, but they were such thorough children by nature, I could never help mothering them.

All they did for me, and for each other, and for anyone they cared about who happened to be down on his luck, would fill a book, although one young life was cut short so early gloriously winning his V.C.

Whenever I think of Flip, there is something in my heart that seems to snap, and the tears fall inwardly. He was so brave, so beautiful, so lovable.

I do not know if his mother broke her heart when she heard he would never come back to us again, but I know that she wears the Victoria Cross awarded by a gracious sovereign to his memory tied round her throat, although it bruises and scars her delicate flesh.

After the matinée we went to Bobbie's club to tea, and then, because he wanted to make a day of it, nothing would do but he must buy me an evening blouse to go to the theatre in at night.

Flip did not come with us this time, as he had another engagement, and Bobbie frankly confessed that he was not sorry.

During the next few days I went out with the two of them several times, and we all enjoyed ourselves immensely. Then they went away together to Bobbie's country home, and I had two days alone, before going to Philips and Philips.

My first day was not a happy one. I was hopelessly at sea, and the other girls, instead of trying to help me, regarded me with a cold, quizzing air. The head of the department did her best, but I was never cut out for a saleswoman, and she began to grow impatient before the day was over.

I remember there was one mantle she particularly wanted to get rid of, a hideous, gaudy thing, with a lot of gold beads on it, and when a dressy, common little woman came to buy, she said to me: "Sell her that."

I put it on and thought what a sight I looked, and when the little woman asked me if I thought it would suit her, I said frankly that I thought not. However, she put it on and seemed rather to like it, turning and twisting about before the glass in order to see it on all sides.

"It is rather nice," she said. "Do you really think it doesn't suit me?"

"I think you would much prefer this," was my answer, and put on one of the newest and prettiest we had.

Digitized by Google

She exclaimed with delight, and bought it on the spot; and I got into trouble with the principal.

"What does it matter what a person like that wears?" she answered to my attempted explanation. "You could easily have persuaded her to take the beaded thing; she was the very customer for it; and now you have let an article go that would have satisfied someone who knew how to dress."

After a few days I understood that the cleverest saleswoman was the one who succeeded in persuading customers to buy the things least likely to sell.

Not that I ever became a success in the slightest degree; and after a little I was specially reserved for the few tall, exacting young ladies who knew just what suited them and were totally deaf to persuasion.

To my surprise Di Northcote met me that first evening when the day's work was over.

"How do you do?" he said simply, accosting me as I stood a moment wondering which 'bus to take.

A little fat man near by, who had been watching me closely, was just advancing as if to speak, so I was very relieved at the sound of Di's voice.

"I'm very well, thanks," I answered, "which 'bus ought I to take?"

He pulled out his watch.

"I have an hour to spare," he said, "will you come with me and have some dinner?"

I went at once, feeling rather pleased, for it was the first time he had suggested taking me anywhere.

At first we talked about my work, and I think he was a good deal amused at my description of my own selling experiences. I told him that I had made friends with one of the girls—a new girl—who had agreed to share rooms with me.

"Why did you make up your mind to live out?" he asked at last, going suddenly to the point.

"How did you know that I had done so?" I retorted.

Something about Di's way of questioning always made me put my back up and feel prickly, so to speak.

"Bobbie told me," he answered, adding: "I was sorry to hear it."

"Why?" I asked.

"Oh, various reasons. For one thing you will probably meet with a good deal of unpleasantness when you start home in the evening. That is partly why I met you to-night."

I remembered the little fat man, and asked: "What kind of unpleasantness?"

"There are a great many men," he replied, "who wait about near the big shops for the girls like yourself to come out in the evening. They are a class of men that you will do well to systematically avoid."

"And do you think I should be inclined to do anything else?" I asked, looking straight into his eyes.

He looked straight back at me. "That is what I have to learn," he said.

I felt angry, but it was no use losing my temper, for already I began to realise nothing would make the slightest impression upon him, and he would only preserve the same unruffled calm. Instead I determined to try to meet him on his own ground, so to speak.

"It is good of you to take so much interest in me," I said sarcastically.

"Not at all," he replied. "I am doing it entirely for my own amusement."

I could have shaken him for that, but instead I bit my lip and went on with my dinner in silence.

I felt he was watching me closely, and when at last I looked up that odd gleam of admiration shot through his eyes again. At the same time I think he annoyed me purposely.

"Don't ever go to dinner with any man unless you know who he is," he said, "and it is better not to dine alone at a restaurant in the evening. If you have made up your mind not to remain in, go straight home to your room, or else join another girl who is above cheapening herself by dining with a stranger. It is a sensible plan to share rooms with another girl."

I still went on with my dinner in silent disapproval, feeling, in spite of myself, like a schoolgirl being lectured.

"And be on your guard," he continued with emphasis, "against any such men as Lord Cecil Trevor, otherwise you run a serious risk of a soiled reputation, however groundless. It is very likely he will attempt to meet you again; but if he does have nothing whatever to do with him."

"I did not know he was a lord," I said with interest.

"It is a mere detail," Di answered. "What need concern you most is that he is a scoundrel."

We had finished dinner then, and the subject dropped; but in spite of my own experience and Di's warning I could not resist a certain curiosity about Lord Cecil Trevor. I felt as if I should like to meet him again just to see how he would treat me now.

The opportunity occurred in a most unlooked-for manner. A week after I went to Philips and Philips, a ball was arranged by the employees in the large recreation room.

These balls took place often, and were usually very good fun. We gave sixpence each towards the refreshments, which consisted of cakes, coffee, and lemonade, and provided our own music; in fact, the whole thing was got up entirely among ourselves, and we usually spent the evening before waxing the floor and getting the room ready.

Although I scarcely knew any of the men at the first one I attended, I had no lack of partners, for there was not much ceremony of introduction, and a pretty face needed no other advancement. At about ten o'clock Lizzie Brown—my friend—told me she felt tired and was going home. I told her I would follow as soon as the dance was over.

When the evening was nearly over I sat for a short time alone in a little alcove watching, rather glad of a rest, and not anxious for a partner. The dancers looked very pretty, and I was too engrossed in them to notice that a tall new-comer had made his way to the alcove, and now stood beside me.

In consequence, when he suddenly remarked, "This is a most unexpected pleasure, Miss Cardew," I started violently, and on turning to face Lord Cecil Trevor, much to my annoyance coloured to the roots of my hair. I felt that it rather pleased him, and was furious with myself.

"May I sit down?" he said, and without waiting for me to speak took the vacant chair beside me. "You are looking extremely well," he next remarked. "London evidently suits you."

By this time I had regained my composure, and I now turned to him carelessly and asked, hoping to annoy him—

"Do you serve in Philips and Philips too, then?"

"Well no, not exactly," he answered, looking amused. "Not that I should mind," he added, "if my counter were opposite yours; but I should certainly have neither ears nor eyes for customers."

"Hooks and eyes, I suppose you mean?" I put in.

"Good!" he remarked. "You're evidently a smart little girl."

I suddenly became engrossed in the dancers, but at the same time was most curious to know how he came to be there.

"You did not expect to see me here to-night, I daresay," he said next.

"I did not think about it," I answered.

"Probably not. I however, knew I should in all likelihood see you."

Digitized by Google

"How did you know?" I inquired, unable to conceal my curiosity.

"Oh, it was simple enough. You told me your address, you know, and I easily discovered you were going to Philips and Philips. Young Fred Philips was at Oxford with me, and I know him well, so I asked him to send me word when the next dance was on. I have been to several before with him.

"I got a line this morning, but I had to show myself at a big 'At Home' at the Duchess of Rowney's to-night, and that made me late. Otherwise I should have come early, and tried to fill up your programme."

"And supposing I had objected?" I said.

"But you wouldn't. I'd soon have talked you round. Did you think I behaved very badly the other afternoon?"

"Yes," I said coolly. "Very."

"Well, I'm awfully sorry," he answered at once. "You're not quite like the ordinary run of girls, and I ought to have seen it sooner. A man can't do more than apologise. Will you be friends?"

"I don't know," I replied warily, leaning back and assuming a somewhat grand, indifferent air.

"Why don't you know? I suppose Northcote has been painting me very black. It's a favourite trick of his, and he's no saint himself, either. I shouldn't take you for the kind of girl to believe just what she is told about a fellow without finding out for herself."

Now had it been anyone but Di who had warned me I should probably have held my ground; but because it was he, and I had in my heart a perpetual antagonism against his domineering sway, I decided to act for myself and risk the consequences.

"I don't mind being friends," I said at last, "so long as you treat me properly; but if you transgress in any way I shall drop you at once."

He promised, and we had the next two dances together, and I am bound to confess I thoroughly enjoyed them. He was a perfect waltzer, and knew how to be a pleasant companion; and although he still persisted in looking at me in a way that made me feel embarrassed, I was sure Di had judged him too harshly. They were the last dances, and when the music stopped he asked me if I had anyone to see me home.

I told him I did not need anyone, but he insisted upon coming.

We went out together, and there being no vacant hansom about we walked a short distance in search of one.

At the corner of Oxford Circus we stood a moment under a gas lamp waiting. A hansom came in sight, and Lord Cecil had just hailed it, when someone touched my arm, and remarked in most cutting tones—

"What a fortunate circumstance, Miss Cardew. I am just in time to see you home."

I turned sharply, and found myself fronting Di Northcote, with an angry gloam in his face such as I had never seen before.

(Next Tuesday I will tell you of my interview with a theatrical manager.)

Result of the "Same Letter" Competition.

A Gramophone has been sent to the following competitors:

A. Earney, Earldoms, near Whiteparish, Salisbury, Wilts; Miss F. Selby, 137 Queen's Park Road, Brighton; A. J. Wilson, Manchester Stores, Main Street, Kimberley, Notts; H. Gale, 54 Elder Road, Bramley, Leeds; G. H. Wilshire, Fore Street, Newquay, Cornwall; A. Mitchell, 131 Easter Road, Leith; Miss M. Davies, 107 Camden Street, Birkenhead; E. Payne, 1 Hilsea Terrace, Lower Clapton, N.E.; W. Powell, 35 Church Street, Blaina, Mon.; E. C. Rudge, Abbey Manor, Evesham.

His Last Request.

The Tale of a Man, a Woman, and a Kiss.

"George Ferguson, you have gone a little too far."

Pale with indignation and outraged pride, the young woman looked him sternly in the face.

"Why, Laura," he stammered, in a helpless confusion, "I—I—ah—er—I didn't think you would care."

"Didn't think I should care!" she echoed, with freezing mockery. "Did you think, sir, that an acquaintance of ten or twelve months entitles you to a privilege unasked, that my most intimate friends of many years' standing would not have dared to claim? Have you no conception of the meaning of the word presumption?"

What had this young man done? Intoxicated by her beauty, and fancying he saw in her glorious dark eyes a challenge, half coy, half saucy, he had rapturously kissed her.

Dumb with astonishment, George Ferguson now quailed before the lightning-like indignation of the high-spirited girl.

He saw he had made a fatal mistake.

"This must end our acquaintance, Mr. Ferguson," she said.

"In many respects it has been a pleasant one. I had come to esteem you highly—to regard you as a young man of high and noble impulses, free from the trivialities and weaknesses, the inordinate self-conceit and assurance that the spirit of the age seems to infuse into the mental constitutions of the young men of modern society.

"You have thrown yourself down from the pedestal upon which I had mistakenly placed you. Mr. Ferguson," she continued sadly, "hereafter we meet as strangers."

"Be it so, Laura Jones," replied he, with recovered self-possession. "I shall not presume to question your right to dismiss me thus summarily, however strongly I might feel inclined to protest against the injustice of your act in so doing. I bow to your mandate.

"Henceforth we are strangers. But before I take my last farewell of you, as I am now about to do, and go out into the world to struggle with it as only a sorrowing, lonely man, deprived of his last earthly hope, must struggle to keep bitter despair from knawing his heart-strings asunder.

"Before I leave for ever the presence of one with whom I have passed so many pleasant hours, whose memory will cling to me through all the cheerless years that may yet drag their weary length over my head, I have one last request to make of you."

"What is it, sir?"

"Please get off my lap."

Audrey Wrexford.

She: "If you could have one wish, what would it be?" He: "It would be that—that—oh, if I only dared to tell you what it would be!" She: "Well, go on. Why do you suppose I brought up the wishing subject?"

Digitized by Google

A FALLEN IDOL.

The Tale of a Love that was Lasting.

"Shall I write now or wait till to-morrow?" Miss Irene Meredith's maturely beautiful face assumed a more thoughtful expression. "I shall see him to-night, and——"

Another pause.

"Is it true that there is still an open door at the back of my heart to admit that which I thought was shut out for ever? I scarcely know; I do not like to admit, yet why have I waited all these years, why have I persistently refused for months to give Cyril his answer? I will wait! So Cyril must be patient yet another day, and this evening I shall see and talk with Randall Atherton!"

She replaced the addressed envelope and the blank sheet of notepaper in her writing-case, and gave herself up to reminiscent meditation till her maid warned her that it was time to dress for the grand reception and private theatricals at Lady Hindford's.

Irene Meredith was a woman of thirty, with a maturely beautiful face and the sedate, almost queenly bearing of one who has left the lightness of girlhood far behind but yet possesses youth; a strange admixture that makes a charming whole.

The face, if studied, would have revealed to the student a character ennobled and rendered more attractive by suffering.

She moved about among the other guests of Lady Hindford with an easy manner that delighted all; the younger members of the party discovered that she could be as youthful as they, and they marvelled at the merry twinkle that passed over those usually serious eyes, while the older ones enjoyed her society just as much and found that she could converse entertainingly on subjects fitted for riper years.

Men and women alike admitted that she was a charming woman, and rather lazily wondered why she had not secured an eligible partner long ago.

"Miss Meredith!"

The name was uttered in a tone of surprise.

"Mr. Atherton!"

In this case the tone was slightly sarcastic, and a malicious gleam appeared in Miss Meredith's eyes. A mocking glance was directed at him.

"How strange that we should meet again here, is it not?" she asked. "This was where we last met, you remember, Mr. Atherton; or perhaps you do not remember? It is so long ago!"

"Was it really here?" he asked, his eyebrows slightly lifted in surprise. Then, as he observed the curl of the lips, he hastened to add: "Yes, of course it was!"

He was nettled at having betrayed his forgetfulness, and he fancied that he had easily undone the blunder by his last remark.

She laughed.

"I ought to feel flattered by your recollecting anything about me! And you really did recognise me after a round dozen of years, Mr. Atherton? Eighteen plus twelve, that is thirty! Yet there was no good reason why you should remember me, was there?"

He avoided the question.

"Oh, it all comes back to me very vividly now!" he rejoined uneasily. "We talked and walked about, and you wore something white and—and—yes, you had a flower in your hair!" He looked relieved; this woman was so entrancingly beautiful and he was glad to retrieve his character by remembering something.

"That is a very graphic description of me and of our doings," she laughed. "I recollect more than that about that evening, and about other occasions, but that is probably because I was young—eighteen, you see!—and impressions sink deeper into one's inner consciousness at eighteen than at twenty-seven.

"You were half as old again as I was then, but twelve years added to both totals make a difference in the disparity of age, do they not?

"Yes, I was eighteen, and I wore a rose in my hair; now I am thirty and the rose has given place to gold and that is worn on my dress, not in my hair. Very symbolical, is it not? Youth and rose-colour—youth sees everything rose-coloured! Age and pale-gold; that is expressive of more sober and more solid ideas!"

They had walked unconsciously together to an ottoman and he had listened uncomfortably to this speech without daring to interrupt. Memory was asserting itself, and the "other occasions" became more clear; he compared the other occasions with that evening when they last met, and he felt awkward.

"It is so pleasant to recall old times, Mr. Atherton, that you ought to be ever so grateful to me for giving you the opportunity!" she said with pretended earnestness. "I should like to hear your version of that far-away evening, to see if it coincides with mine!"

He was doubtful about the earnestness of the first portion of this remark, but there was a suspicious wavering about the concluding words that made him catch at the chance they offered.

"Youthful impressions are not always correct, Miss Meredith, and things are not invariably what they seem! If, as I fancy, there was something during that evening which—which seemed to jar, it may have been a wrong impression!"

He was conscious that his pleading was not clever; it might even have damaged his case; yet he cherished the hope that it had been successful.

"Come now! I fear your recollection is not so vivid as you suppose it to be, Mr. Atherton!" she retorted with a quiet smile. "Was it with me or with someone else that you 'walked and talked' so much on that occasion?"

He leant back to hide the embarrassment that was showing plainly in his face. He wanted to get away, but the old fascination had been reawakened and intensified by the meeting with this superb woman and he could not move. Nay, he was irresistibly drawn nearer to her, as the moth to the flame.

"Shall we saunter through the rooms, Miss Meredith?" he asked, again ignoring her question.

"No, it is pleasant here!" she responded, and the sarcastic tone gave place to one of yearning for a moment. "Let me beguile the time by telling a story. I used to be a dreamer in the old days and fond of weaving such fabrics. Those had reference to the future—castles in the air, they might have been called. This one will have reference to past time."

It was a cosy corner and they were not likely to be disturbed. She sat with her hands in her lap, toying—sometimes idly, sometimes nervously—with her fan; her head was inclined and her eyes fixed with a distant expression on the floor a yard or so in front, as though studying the pattern and trying to compare it with another that she had seen.

"There was a girl," she began in a soft voice, full of sad tenderness—"a girl of eighteen. She was of a warm, not to say passionate disposition; sensitive to a degree and full of trust and confidence in her fellow-creatures.

Digitized by Google

"At eighteen a girl is susceptible to the tender passion to a far greater degree than a youth, despite the fact that we hear of 'lad's love.' This girl 'came out,' and, being pretty, was the object of much admiration.

"Being of a simple, trustful nature, she failed to understand some of this attention; she was a devotee of the cult called hero-worship; she admired the noble and was ready to fall down, figuratively, and worship the man who should nearest resemble her ideal. She was foolish, of course!"

The tone changed to one of flippancy and Atherton started. Before he could speak, Irene Meredith continued:

"One day she met this man. He was older than her by nine years, as she afterwards discovered, but that was a matter of small moment. He seemed to her to be the man for whom her young soul had been longing; he appeared to represent all that was good and noble. He was her ideal, her hero, come at last.

"She worshipped him from afar, and then he approached her. It was like the sun drawing near and dazzling her; all the secret fear of expectancy was melted, her heart grew light—so light that it tried to lift the girl above earth. She was glad, happy, for he, her hero, had come to her!

"This hero spoke soft words to her, and the trustful girl believed that they came from his soul. They entered her soul, and her love was satisfied. She gave her whole being to him; he loved her, for did he not continually seek her and say those sweet things to her—the sweet things that are so dear to a woman in love?

"So she believed, and was enchanted; she lived in a fool's paradise, for she did not understand the ways of some men, who can amuse themselves with a girl's heart and then throw it aside."

"Perhaps the girl was mistaken!" interrupted Atherton eagerly. "She may have thought that a few commonplaces were intended for love speeches."

"She was not mistaken in that!" returned Irene Meredith bitterly. "There are men and women who will deal with the hearts of others as though they were senseless toys. He spoke words of love to the girl, I say! And she suffered.

"So the days passed, and then came the evening of Lady Hindford's great social function. The girl looked forward to it with a pleasure so keen that it resembled pain. She felt her breath coming in quick gasps as he approached her; but oh, the misery that enshrouded her a few seconds later!

"He muttered some commonplaces and left her. She knew the differences between commonplaces and the honeyed words he had spoken before!

"With a pain at her heart that seemed like to kill her, she watched him by the side of the lovely Sybil Barran; she saw him whispering to Sybil as he had whispered to her, but probably Sybil was not a hero worshipper, and she did not care!

"The girl waited, waited for him to return, but he did not seek her again. With a sentiment of numbness the girl went home and——"

Irene Meredith drew a deep breath.

"That part of the story is vague. I know that the girl passed the night kneeling by the side of her bed, her face buried in her hands on the coverlet, sobbing, sobbing!"

"As you—I mean the girl—did not know exactly what happened," said Atherton slowly, his face white and haggard, "it is possible that she did not suffer like that!"

"She did!" cried Irene fiercely, and Atherton shrank before this vehemence. "I think," continued Irene more calmly, after a pause, "that the girl died that night.

"The next scene in the story shows a figure that is girlish, but with a face that indicates the woman, and behind that face were the feelings of a woman.

"The girl had passed through the experience that changes from one state to another; she had learnt that her hero was only mere clay, after all, and worse clay than many, for he amused himself by toying with a heart and then threw it away.

"The experience embittered her, but she gradually recovered. In spite of herself, she——" Irene stopped abruptly; she had said more than she intended. "This is the story; what do you think of it?" she asked, half defiantly.

Atherton drew a deep breath.

"Perhaps the man was in reality more than mere clay. Perhaps he suffered more than, or as much as, the girl did. Suppose that he was dazzled by another light, a light which, like the will-o'-the-wisp, led him astray without his knowing it. Suppose——"

"That is rather difficult to imagine, is it not?" she inquired scornfully. "The marsh light does not dazzle, and a man would hardly leave a bright light to follow that. It demonstrates the truth of the girl's notion; he was playing, and——"

It was his turn to interrupt now.

"Hear my story," he pleaded, and she let him go on.

"Suppose that the man was as the girl thought, let us go even so far as that. Imagine his feelings when, years afterwards, he realised what he had lost!

"He met the girl, and found her more lovely, more worthy to be loved than she had ever been before, and there arose within him an awakened love, a flame that developed from a spark of recollection into a fierce flame of present love, all-consuming, all-absorbing! How he hated himself for having been so blind in the past, and now he begged for forgiveness!

"With the fuller knowledge gained in those twelve years he recognised how priceless is the love of a good woman, and he would have done everthing to win it. The man wonders whether there is any hope for him?"

It was a passionate appeal. He waited breathlessly for the answer. Irene maintained the fiction of the story, which she had adopted and he had followed. A great struggle had been going on within her while he was speaking; her bosom heaved and her breath came hard, but she was calmer now.

"The girl says it is impossible to alter the past," she said decisively. "The love which the man offers is a sudden impulse, and may die out as rapidly as it arose.

"All these years he has not thought of her or he would have sought her and have tried to make amends. Yet she has all through retained a faint hope that her hero was a hero after all, although she knew not how the fact could be demonstrated.

"Yes, she will admit it! She has lived with an undefined, secret hope that she was mistaken. They met, and the man proved that he retained nothing of the past, and so her faint spark went out! The man offered the love of to-day, whereas the girl was looking for the love of yesterday, only to find that it had never existed, and that her worst fears were correct!"

Irene Meredith rose. She was smiling with the mocking expression of a few minutes previous.

"Come," she said, jestingly, "we have had our own private theatricals; we must now go to witness those provided by others for our edification!"

"I cannot go without one final appeal!" cried Randall Atherton desperately. "I was a fool, but should a man's folly be punished all through his life, even when he sees and admits the fault? Irene, tell me that you will try to love me! Do not send me away from you, for I cannot be happy now without you! Do not be hard! As you are beautiful, enchanting, so be merciful! May I not hope?"

Oh, the irony of Fate! The man who has trifled with her young heart was now pleading for the love that was given to him so freely years before and cast aside! Irene shook her head.

"The idol is shattered!" she said coldly. "Let it rest, let us both forget! The man I loved was twelve years younger than you are! I could not love you! That man is dead, as is the girl! Come, or we shall be late!"

On the following morning Irene Meredith sat at the table with her writing case in front of her. She had arrived home late, but she had slept well, and her face was tranquil in its expression.

"Yes, I can give Cyril his answer now!" she murmured. "I feared that something of the past might remain to make us both unhappy, but that is gone now. I can honestly tell Cyril that he may marry me whenever he likes!"

F. Brewster.

Digitized by Google

HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA.

By Lady Peggy Carstairs.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

LADY PEGGY CARSTAIRS. A widow, who, having lost all her money in a bank failure, undertakes to chaperon Belinda.

BELINDA NORTH. The beautiful daughter of Hardy North, an Australian millionaire.

DUKE OF EASTACRES. A comparatively penniless suitor for Belinda's hand.

DAVID CARR. A young engineer, with whom Belinda is in love.

LADY HONORIA. Sister of the Duke of Eastacres.

STANLEY FORBES. A famous barrister.

ALPHONSE HERVE. An eminent French artist in love with Belinda.

CRAWLEY DAVENANT. An old friend of Lady Peggy.

I Make My Last Bid for £20,000.

It was no use wasting time in anger on Honoria; that could come later. I turned my attention to Belinda, who was gazing with horror-stricken eyes at the Duke.

"My pearls!" she cried suddenly, lifting her hand to her throat. "My pearls! I have lost them, my father's gift, here"—she glanced round the salon with a shudder—"to that man!"

"Here are your pearls, Belinda," I said, snatching them from the table. "The Duke was only in fun, he did not mean to keep them. There is nothing to make a fuss about!"

"Nothing!" she repeated dully.

Then, with a sudden flush of passion, she threw the pearls upon the floor, and stamped upon them viciously.

"I can never wear them again," she said. "He has touched them, they have become vile!" and she ground the pearls into powder under her feet.

"What I have done with my necklace, you have tried to do with me," she said. "You would have destroyed all truth, all purity of mind and purpose in me. You would have staked my soul as carelessly, as callously as I my beads. You would have given me into the possession of that man, have set me in the mud for him to trample under foot.

"Why should you wish to wrong me, why should you try to wreck my life, to break my heart, to perjure my soul? Have you no pity, no softness?" She came close to me, her eyes, unnaturally bright, burnt into mine, her hands, hot and feverish, grasped my own.

"You have parted me from the man I love!" she cried. "You have taken the brightness from my life, you have weakened my will, you have taken my strength. But, while I live, I swear—I swear that man shall never touch me!"

For a moment she stood tall, strong, defiant in her youth and beauty; the next she weakened, raised her hands to her head, gazed round bewildered, with a little helpless cry.

"My head," she said, "I—I——" She glanced round as if to seek protection. I hastened to her side, but, with an unlooked-for courage, Honoria stepped between me and my charge.

Winding her thin arms about the girl, she drew her close, and murmured loving words. Think of it! This weak, this most contemptible of creatures, gathered Belinda to her heart like a frightened child and stood defiant—she, who had never dared call her soul her own!

Never shall I forget the scene. The salon, brilliantly lit, gorgeous with gleaming marbles and rich hangings, and, in the midst of all the luxury, the centre of the feverish excitement, stood Belinda, beautiful exceedingly, her fair hair dishevelled, her young face distressed, clinging, aye, clinging, to the woman with the lean figure, the ill-fitting gown, the foolish face—to Honoria!

I motioned to Eastacres to leave the place; with a struggle he accepted the inevitable and disappeared. Honoria and I—chiefly Honoria—induced Belinda to come from the Casino to the hotel. She was in a high state of fever, and I had to administer a double dose of opium before I got her quiet. I left her sleeping soundly, and turned my attention to Honoria.

Before I could open upon her she commenced to weep in her old, abject, disjointed sort of fashion. Would I forgive her this once? She had obeyed me implicitly, carried out all my instructions in regard to Belinda, had posted no letters without bringing them to me, sent no telegrams without my permission.

"Look," she added, "here are three letters Belinda gave me two days ago—to Stanley Forbes, her father, and to Lady Farringdon." I took them from her eagerly, and glanced, half relenting, at her face, red and disfigured from her tears.

"So long as Eastacres isn't here or anywhere near, I will do all you tell me, Lady Peggy. I know you are fond of Belinda and wish to make her happy. But Eastacres," she shuddered, "he is a bad man, a cruel man, worse than anyone I know, worse even than Mark!" She clenched her hands and her features worked convulsively.

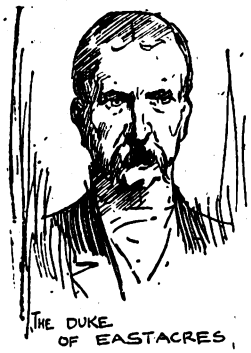
"Keep Eastacres away, Lady Peggy," she repeated, "and I'll do all you wish. I'll watch over Belinda, keep her quiet, give her medicine, bring you her letters. Everything, but," she clutched my arm, "don't send me away," she moaned, "don't, don't send me away."

Truth to tell, I could not, at that moment, have well spared her.

Belinda had of late evinced a strange dislike for me. She had refused on more than one occasion to take her sleeping draught, and I had had to rely on Honoria to induce her to do so.

That Honoria was in the main faithful to the trust I reposed in her was proved by her bringing me the letters Belinda had given to be posted. There was nothing much in any of the letters. She said she was not well, and that she longed for the spring. No more; but Honoria was not to know that. Her intentions were perfectly good.

Digitized by Google



THE DUKE OF EASTACRES.

As matters stood, it was evident that if I could assure her that I had no desire to force Belinda into marriage with Eastacres, convince her, in fact, that I wished to get rid of him, Honoria would be a safe ally.

I decided to take her apparently into my confidence.

"Honoria," I said, "can I trust you?

"If I tell you of my hopes and plans for Belinda, will you swear not to break confidence; will you swear not to let out a word?"

She nodded, dried her tears, and tried to look sensible.

"Very well," I said. "I believe you, and I will trust you. I don't want Belinda to marry your brother, I gave up that idea a long time ago. I only want her to be happy. But Eastacres, as you know, is a very determined man. He has made up his mind that, come what may, he will win Belinda for his wife.

"Her father, as you know, sanctions the match, and Belinda, at one time, was not averse to it. I cannot break with Eastacres openly. At one time I was his friend, and if I seem to turn against him he will not forgive me. You know what an enemy he can be?"

She shuddered and hid her face.

"As I tell you, I don't mean him to marry Belinda, but he must not suspect it. I shall tell him we are leaving here for Mentone, and that he had better precede us. In reality, as you know, we are going to Rome, where I shall hand over Belinda to her father's care. He, not I, will have the responsibility of settling her love affairs in future."

"Do you really mean it, Lady Peggy, do you really mean it?" she gasped.

"Of course I do. I shall be only too glad to get her off my hands. She's been a terrible care to me. Meantime, you must not say a word of this to Belinda. She's so impulsive that she will tell somebody or other that I have sent Eastacres away, it will gradually work back to him, and then——" I gave a little shiver and looked tragic.

"Belinda shan't hear a word from me," she said. "So long as Eastacres doesn't worry her, she won't ask any questions. I'll do just as you tell me, Lady Peggy, and thank you very much."

I dismissed her much relieved, and lay down for an hour or two's sleep. There was much to be done in the morning. I should have to be up betimes.

I was up and dressed by nine o'clock next day waiting to see the Duke. He came in answer to my note at once, and remained till after eleven.

We had many things to discuss, much to arrange. I was mapping out the details of the scheme by which I should make sure of the £20,000 promised to me on Belinda's marriage. It was a bold scheme, and, with care and caution, must succeed.

"Eastacres," I said gravely, "before we go further into this business, you must assure me of your good faith. Will you bind yourself to act as we decide this morning, not to run foolish and unnecessary risks such as last night? Above all, will you promise not to approach Belinda till I give the word? The whole success of the scheme depends on this, that you disappear from view, and neither speak to her, nor see her, until"—I paused—"until the moment when you claim her as your wife. Only on these conditions do I carry the matter through."

"I agree," he said sullenly. "I can't manage the thing by myself, that's evident, at any rate while that confounded Honoria is about. Why don't you send the woman off, confound her?"

"I can't manage Belinda without her assistance. I have explained that already."

He laughed in a sneering, contemptuous sort of fashion that made my blood boil.

"Stop that," I cried indignantly. "Stop, I say, or I will——"

"What will you do?" he said. "What can you do? You're at your last gasp, fighting for dear life to keep your head up in the world. Do you suppose I haven't made myself acquainted with your circumstances? That old fool Crawley let it all out to me one night. He told me that you hadn't a penny, and that unless you got Belinda off your hands you'd be in the workhouse, or—or prison," he added malignantly, "it's a toss up which."

For a moment I could not speak, rage and indignation choked me. That I—that I should be spoken to like this!

"Go!" I said, storming at him. "Go at once! I will have no more to do with you. I——"

He cut me short with a gesture of contempt.

"You can do nothing," he said, "nothing. If you back out of this affair, I shall cable to Hardy North, and I shall tell him enough of you and your history to make him fetch his daughter home at once. You've one chance, and one only, of winning this deal. I'm that chance, you know it, without me you're lost. And so," he scowled, "keep a civil tongue or I'll cry off the business altogether."

I could not contend with him. I was not so strong as I had been, and his insolence seemed to shatter my nerves. I collapsed into a chair and pointed to the bell.

"Brandy," I said feebly, and waited like a dead thing till the garçon reappeared with the stimulant.

When I had swallowed the cognac I felt better.

"Now," I said calmly, "if you can speak without sneering and insulting me, I will hear what you have to say. Do you promise to keep out of Belinda's way?"

He nodded.

"Yes," he said, "that's settled, now get to business."

Long and earnestly we discussed, and at last we had arranged the scheme that was to bring about such great results.

"We leave Monte Carlo in a few days," I said, "arriving in Rome the beginning of December. Belinda will go for a drive most afternoons in the Corso. She will, as a rule, be accompanied by Honoria. On the afternoon that you see me lean from the carriage and drop a bunch of violets on the ground, you will know that is the day appointed, and," I glanced at him fixedly, "you will have everything in readiness."

He nodded, and turned towards the window.

"I cannot say how soon it will be after we arrive in Rome," I said, dropping my voice. "It will, as you know, depend on circumstances. But remember this. You must be prepared on any day to—to——"

"Pick up the bunch of violets, Lady Peggy?" he said grimly.

He turned as he spoke and made me a low bow and left the apartment.

We did not leave Monte Carlo so soon as I anticipated. Belinda fell into a sort of low fever and had to remain in bed. I did not send for a doctor. I had reliance on the remedies prescribed by the old man in Russia, and in a week or so she rallied.

We arrived in Rome on a clear, beautiful afternoon. The air was crisp and held a touch of winter, but it was fresh and exhilarating on the Campagna.

I had arranged to stay in the palace where in the old days I had a suite of rooms ready at any moment for my occupation. Belinda seemed brighter than I had known her for some time, and insisted on a tour of inspection the next day.

Willing to humour her, I ordered the carriage—the Duc di Rocca had placed his stables at our disposal—and to her great delight we set out to see the City of the Seven Hills. It was an exquisite morning. The Corso—Rome's fashionable thoroughfare—was crowded with pedestrians, elegant equipages, whose occupants shook hands with the promenaders on either side.

Digitized by Google

So great was the number of vehicles that both lines were absolutely unbroken; the coachmen could do no more than walk their horses. All Rome—worth knowing—gathered together in the smallest possible space—the Corso is not so wide as Bond Street—talking, laughing, chatting, as in a friendly drawing-room.

Belinda created a stir with her big eyes and exquisite pallor, but she was too cold for the taste of the Romans. They like a more volcanic beauty—poor Vera they worshipped.

From the Corso we passed through Piazza del Popolo—the square of the people—white and dazzling in the sunshine. Everything amused and interested the girl, and she cried out like a child at the sight of the gigantic shaft of marble gilt with the sun's rays—the Column of Trajan.

The Romans themselves—I speak of the old families—regard the enthusiasm of the English and the foreigners generally for the city as a little childish. For them the Corso, with its scandals, intrigues, and pretty women, and for all in it they search, is the only Rome worth knowing.

One gets into their way of regarding things. During the many months I had spent in Rome I had seen less than Belinda in her youthful enthusiasm got through in a week.

Her enthusiasm left her as suddenly as it had kindled. She became moody, depressed, not even the approach of Christmas could rouse her. Worse than any of these things, she became more and more irritable, and her dislike of me came back in full force.

I increased the opium daily—I had been decreasing it of late—and waited anxiously for results. Each afternoon we drove through the Corso. Sometimes the three of us, at others Belinda and Honoria—never Belinda and I alone. Things were not yet ripe for that. Each day I cast a furtive glance to where, hidden in an angle of the Palazza Brandini, a fair, slight man watched and waited for our coming.

One afternoon he was not there. It wanted but a week to Christmas, and I was excessively anxious. Hardy North had shown signs of relenting, and had written that he would be with us at the New Year. By that time I hoped to be in possession of his cheque and have Belinda off my hands.

That night Eastacres came to the Palace. I saw him from the window and stole down to meet him in the great courtyard.

"How much longer?" he said impatiently.

"I like delay as little as you, Eastacres."

"Well," he said roughly, "I can wait no longer. The third day from now, that is the last minute!" And despite myself I shuddered.

"You remember the route?" I asked. "You meet the carriage outside Rome, at the little inn where you and I and Carstairs used to breakfast—how long ago!"

He nodded, and drew closer; the shadow of the night enveloped us.

"You change horses and coachman there," he whispered, "and take the road that leads to Acqueto. Three hours' drive will bring you to the Chapel. I shall be there."

"I cannot say which day, Eastacres, but one of the next three—we shall also be there," I murmured.

As I passed up the staircase it seemed to me I heard the rustle of skirts entering the room above—my own. When I looked in no one was there, however, but the two girls. Belinda was asleep, and Honoria the picture of misery with a bad headache.

The incident disquieted me as did something else the following day. I met Honoria creeping up the Palace stairs early—before eight.

"I've been to get some flowers," she stammered, and held up a bunch of violets.

I glanced at her sharply, I could have vowed I saw a letter in her hand; but the vacant stare with which she regarded me caused me such irritation that I angrily dismissed her.

That afternoon I received a telegram I had been waiting for. It ran as follows:

"I shall be in Rome to-morrow as arranged.—Mark Striven."

I gave a sigh of relief, and calling my dear Honoria, propounded my scheme to give her pleasure and Belinda joy!

"Belinda's father is coming to-morrow, dear," I said. "I've just had a wire from him. I fancy," I smiled facetiously, "that someone else is likely to arrive to-morrow also—a friend, a dear friend of Belinda's."

To my astonishment Honoria's face grew ghastly. For a moment I thought that she was going to faint.

"Do you mean David Carr?" she asked, with a terrified glance at the door.

"We won't mention names, Honoria, for fear of disappointment. Anyway, in case the friend should come I want you to be here to receive him. Belinda and I will be gone to the station to meet Mr. North at the time he may be here. I shall trust to you to entertain him till we return."

"To-morrow!" she repeated. "I—I——" And then to my astonishment the foolish woman broke into tears. "It's my head," she said—"my head. I think I'll go and rest a bit."

She went out of the room crying and, I could see, distressed. Now what could it matter to Honoria whether Belinda's father—and the friend—arrived the next day or the day after? I puzzled over the problem, but dismissed it as too trivial. That is the worst of dealing with an idiot like Honoria, you never know when to suspect them.

In the course of the day, however, her ladyship recovered her spirits. She was under a solemn promise to reveal nothing to Belinda, but had not the girl been very dazed and sleepy from the drug she would, I am sure, have guessed something was in the air.

Honoria laughed and joked—rather tried to joke—in a way that was absurd to witness. The poor fool imagined that that time to-morrow she would be entertaining Carr, and that Belinda, her beloved Belinda, would be clasped in her father's arms.

If she had only known that Mark Striven was the man she had to entertain the following afternoon—Mark, who was to take her then and there to Paris, to that house in the Rue Burgoyne, safely out of the way.

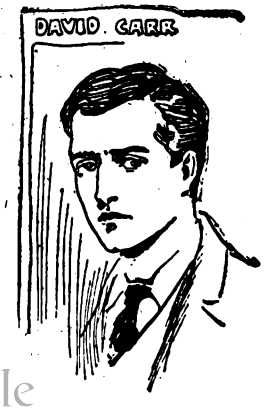
The next morning Belinda slept late; we roused her with difficulty at lunch-time and induced her to take a little food. She was quite dull and apathetic; wanted to go to sleep and feebly resisted Honoria's efforts to dress her. Time was going on, and, feverishly impatient, I came to offer my assistance. At the sight of me the girl commenced to cry in a whimpering sort of fashion that maddened me.

"Go downstairs, Honoria," I said. "I'll dress Belinda."

She screamed out as Honoria left the room, but I cared little for her screams. I had a long account to settle with Belinda; she should learn once and for all I was to be obeyed.

I stopped her cries, shook her into acquiescence, and hurried on her clothes. A long, dark cloak was the first thing I laid my hands on in the way of an outdoor garment; that, and a black hat pulled low over her eyes, and a thick veil, completed her costume. The girl looked ghastly indeed, and I did not care for her to be remarked on.

As a last thought I wound a fleecy shawl about her neck and shoulders.



She sat, a strange, dull-looking figure in the chair where I had placed her. Something—what, I can't say—conjured before my eyes the vision of Belinda as I'd seen her first. A tall, straight slip of a girl, with the face of a Greek goddess and the figure of a wood nymph; not much of the wood nymph in that apathetic face and figure!

I laughed as I looked at her—a hard, bitter laugh. She should not have set her will against mine, defied me, made light of me, beggared me of my future.

Digitized by Google

And yet——I went back to the figure and laid my hand upon her shoulder.

"Belinda," I said, her listlessness frightened me.

Through the dark veil her eyes stared at me, dull, apathetic, indifferent. I turned from her room into Honoria's, a smaller chamber opening out of it.

"Belinda's not well to-day," I said to Honoria. "She seems to have a slight return of fever. I half think she ought to stay at home. Still, Mr. North will be so disappointed that I think I'll risk it. It's getting on for three o'clock." I glanced at my watch. "It's five minutes past," I said. "I had no idea it was so late."

Time had gone quicker than I thought; Belinda's obstinacy had hindered me. I could risk no further delay, it was imperative we should start at once.

"I'll get ready while you take Belinda down, Honoria. Just put her in the carriage, that's all, you needn't stop."

I laid emphasis on the last direction. It was possible Mark Striven, with his usual cunning, might put in an appearance before the hour named, in which case it was not advisable Honoria should meet him in the street. It might cause a scene and lead to unpleasant explanations.

"Very well, Lady Peggy," she answered. "I shall lie down when you're gone, my head's so bad!" She raised her face as she spoke. I could tell she was suffering, and felt a twinge of compunction at the thought of her forthcoming interview with Mark. Still, it was none of my business, I had always treated Honoria with kindness.

I went up to my room on the next floor and hurriedly commenced to dress for my journey. I could hear voices coming from the room beneath, and once I thought I heard Belinda cry. I judged it best to leave her to Honoria, however, and continued my preparations.

My boxes, corded and packed, stood in the corner, addressed to me at the Hotel du Nord, Paris. My jewellery and valuables were in my dressing-bag. I had dismissed my maid some few months back. Her presence would have rendered my scheme difficult to carry out.

With a last look round the apartment I went to the door.

My heart beat fast. I felt the blood rush through my veins with the force, the tumult of my triumph! At last, at last the goal was in sight, the prize at hand!

I had fought hard for the money that was to keep my old age free from poverty; again, and yet again, I had plotted and planned to win it, plotted and planned in vain. Now there was no chance of losing it.

To-morrow, to-morrow I should cable the news to Hardy North that would bring me £20,000! Within a week I should be back in Paris, dear, delightful Paris, my future assured, my troubles over, my days as a chaperon at an end, and Belinda—Belinda would be off my hands!

I looked in at Honoria's room as I came down. The shutters of the window were closed, and she was lying on the bed. I did not disturb her—the poor thing, I thought, might as well enjoy what peace she could. She'd have little enough when Mark Striven came.

Down the stairs and through the courtyard I went, murmured directions to the coachman, and took my seat beside Belinda. She had drawn the white shawl tightly round her and seemed very cold. I wrapped a rug about her knees and offered her brandy.

She shook her head, through the dark veil her face looked white and shadowy. Her eyes were closed, her features, blurred under the thick net, sharp and careworn. I turned my head away and looked out of the window.

We drove rapidly, past splendid buildings, side by side with mean hovels, stately palaces and churches within a stone's throw of mean streets and noisome slums. Past the Jesu Church, one of the most beautiful in Rome, past the wonderful gardens of the Quirinal—the King's palace, odorous with pines centuries old. Past St. Peter's, and the terrace where the band plays of an evening and the fashionable loiterers congregate to see the sunset.

As we turned up the Corso I grasped the bunch of violets that I carried, and with a nervous tremor I could not conquer flung them through the window on the road. A moment and the slight figure of the Duke stepped forward.

He lifted the flowers, glanced with a swift and evil smile towards the carriage, and disappeared in the crowd. From there until we reached the little inn some miles beyond Rome we drove in silence. Belinda, in her corner opposite me, slept, so still, so white she looked that I grew fearful and laid my fingers on her pulse. It beat quickly but distinctly. I sat back reassured.

We changed horses as arranged at the little hostelry, and I sent back Di Rocca's coachman with a bonus large enough to stop him asking inconvenient questions. All the time Belinda drowsed, curled up in the corner, dull, apathetic, motionless.

The Chapel where we were to meet the Duke was one of those wayside places of worship one constantly comes across in Italy. Mass was solemnised by an ignorant priest little better than a peasant, who lived in a cottage near the Chapel. Eastacres had arranged he should perform the marriage ceremony.

Eastacres was himself a Catholic, and the fact that Belinda was a Protestant could easily be got over. Under the influence of opium she would be sure to go through the ceremony, too apathetic to realise what was happening. The marriage would be legal. Against her will Belinda would be made Duchess of Eastacres, Hardy North would be triumphant—and I—I should have £20,000!

The road which led up to the mountains was uneven, we jolted over stones perpetually, and more than once I feared we were upset. We kept up our pace, however, and arrived without mishap at the Chapel just after six.

Eastacres had passed us on the road, he was talking to the priest as we drew up. I got out first and hastened to meet him.

"Is everything ready?" I asked.

"Nearly," he returned. "Bring Belinda into the sacristy. Then when the priest is ready to commence you can take her straight to the altar."

I motioned to the coachman and moved towards the Chapel. He paused close to a door in the wall that opened into the room that served for what we should call a vestry.

The evening was fine and light and the glory of the day still lingered in the sky; the white road up which we had just come stretched like a ribbon, winding in and out the hills. Immediately below us, the road dipped lying on a level for some way.

"Look, Eastacres," I cried, pointing to the straight stretch. "Look——" A horseman was urging his steed to the utmost along the road. His figure stood out against the background of the hills.

"It's—it's—Carr!" I screamed and clutched Eastacres tightly. "Ah, I see it now. Honoria, your sister, stole the medal, the bronze medal that David gave Belinda. She was to send it to him as a token when she was in danger and distress. I took it from her, meaning to throw it away, but in the night it was stolen from me, stolen by Honoria, and she has sent it to him, to David Carr, and he is here, here!" I shrieked, and pointed to the horseman rapidly drawing nearer.

"Calm yourself," said Eastacres, "he cannot reach here under twelve minutes. By then it will be too late."

He turned on his heel and entered the Chapel. Meanwhile, shaking Belinda by the arm, I tried to rouse her. She woke up after a while and followed me submissively into the sacristy. When there, however, she persisted in standing by the door, her back to me, her face turned to the white road, the road up which David was spurring for dear life.

I wrung my hands in an agony. Would that dull priest never have finished his droning? Would Eastacres never give the sign for us to come?

At last, pale and anxious, but composed, he appeared at the door which opened into the Chapel, and signed to us to enter.

"Come, Belinda," I said sharply, and turned to help her take off her veil.

She shook me off, fumbled over the fastening for a moment,

Digitized by Google

then; with a quick movement, turned round and faced us both.

And as I looked I felt the blood within me turn to ice. For it was not Belinda! My God! Not Belinda, but Honoria, who stood before me!

She, the idiot, the fool, had tricked me, tricked a clever woman of the world, who had held her in such utter and supreme contempt as something only to be tortured, harried, laughed at and despised.

Oh, my God! it was too much! She had placed Belinda in her bed, and muffling herself in the girl's clothes, had sat dazed and stupefied at her own courage, daring the journey, though she had heard my talk with Eastacres.

I could have killed her in my rage, and stepped forward, shaking with passion.

But Eastacres was before me. Lifting his arm, with his full strength he struck her face, her head, struck her again and yet again until she lay a quivering heap upon the floor.

"And now," he said, "there's you to settle with, you, the smart woman who was cheated by a fool."

God knows what he meant to do. There was murder in his face, murder in his heart. The priest long since had fled in terror from the place. There was no one——.

A tall figure strode between me and the Duke. A turn of the wrist, a movement of the powerful arm, and Eastacres was writhing in the grasp of David Carr.

He took him outside, and for the next ten minutes I listened to the shrieks of a man in horrible physical pain. David was flogging him. The lash of his riding whip sounded like a flail in the keen air. It was awful to hear—awful to see. The room grew misty before my eyes, my heart was galloping; somewhere, somewhere in the distance I seemed to hear the words "You'll never get the twenty thousand now. You'll never, never——" With a hoarse cry I threw up my arms. It was over, done with—I was beaten.

* * * * * *

I should like to have ended this series with these last words. The bitterness of failure is made yet more bitter knowing as I do that not one of you that read but will rejoice. I am compelled, however, in accordance with the conditions under which I wrote these articles to furnish the following facts.

Belinda recovered from the effects of the opium I had administered, and with her father's sanction married David some six months later. The young man is doing well in his profession, and I believe some hopes are entertained that in course of time he'll receive a title; so will Hardy North's ambition be partially gratified.

Honoria never went back to Mark Striven. That astute scoundrel made terms with North, and promised certain information—about me—in return for a lump sum, and gave an undertaking not to molest his wife. Honoria lives to this day with David and Belinda, as idiotic, foolish, and deceitful as ever. She was always ungrateful, and will doubtless serve Belinda as she served me.

Hardy North declined to pay me a penny for my care of his daughter, and threatened what he called "proceedings" if I ever broached the subject again.

Eastacres has left the country. Stanley Forbes gave him his choice of prosecution for forgery—he'd been imitating people's signatures—or voluntary exile.

He chose the latter. His mother, the old Duchess, still lives, and is doubtless as confirmed a kleptomaniac as when she stole Belinda's pearls. Crawley is the only one of the old set I ever see, and even he has forsaken me of late.

But I don't want them. I hate and despise them all. Not one among them but would have acted as I acted, struggled as I struggled, not one but would have welcomed and have fawned upon me had I been successful.

As it is I have my revenge. Of the people mentioned in this series all but two are living. You can identify—with very little trouble—the prototypes of the women and the men—their doings, their faults, their foibles and the dark secrets of their lives set forth in the account of

HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA.

Nearly a Tragedy.

A Story in Three Chapters.

CHAPTER I.

George Beswick, a young sailor on his Majesty's ship Marquess of Hartington, had served a long apprenticeship to the sea, and at length, after being in many climes and passing through many hardships, he found himself a full-blown A.B. He had set his heart upon this kind of life work, and got on very well until a blight fell on his career.

CHAPTER II.

One of his duties was to go aloft, and he began to find that when at the topmast head he would be attacked with dizziness, until he had a regular fear of climbing. When sailing in a high sea he had a peculiar swimming sensation in his head, and the vessel seemed to be spinning round. He also had an intense burning sensation in the stomach. It might have been thought that this was sea-sickness; but it was not. It was simply chronic biliousness.

The medicine chest was brought into requisition without any effect. The burning sensation in the stomach became gradually more severe, and lasted for longer spells. He had dreadful pains in his head, and also in his joints, and even on shore had attacks of faintness and blurred sight. His food seemed to do him no good, and after each meal he felt heavy and exhausted. Walking became painful, and, no matter how careful he was as to what he ate, he was subject to continuous constipation.

When he put into port he used to see doctors, but they were unable to do him good; until, in addition to the daily risks he was running when up aloft, he began to fear he would have to give up the sea altogether, which was a serious matter for him after having served his apprenticeship to it.

CHAPTER III.

Reduced to such a plight, he was considering what he would do to gain a livelihood ashore, when a friend insisted on his trying bile beans for biliousness. This friend told him that for biliousness, dizziness, headache, constipation and its accompaniments, there was nothing like bile beans; so he got a box. Soon after he began the dull, heavy feeling left him, and for the first time for eighteen months he found himself free from constipation. He began to enjoy his food; and now, thanks solely to bile beans, he is entirely cured, and able to do his work well and vigorously. Bile beans cost one and three-halfpence and two and nine a box, of all chemists, or from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., Red Cross Street, London, E.C. Insist on seeing the name "Chas. Forde" on every box. In addition to the ailments mentioned above, they are a certain cure for indigestion, liver and kidney troubles, piles, anæmia, and all female ailments, colds, chill, rheumatism, and influenza. It was a London Sun reporter who gleaned this story, and he learned it from George Beswick himself.

Digitized by Google

Hard on the Artist.

She: "I wonder why they hung that picture?" He: "Perhaps they couldn't catch the artist."

Just as Easy.

She: "Do you think there is any reason why a young lady should not ride a bicycle as well as drive a horse?" He: "Not at all. It's just as easy to dodge a bicycle as a carriage."

She'd Tell All She Knew.

Lulu: "We girls are getting up a secret society of our own." George: "Indeed! What's the object?" Lulu: "I don't know yet, but I'll tell you all about it after I'm initiated."

His Proper Sphere.

Author: "Mary, I've made a mistake in my calling. I'm not an author, but a born chemist." Author's wife: "What makes you think that, Horace?" Author: "Well, every book I write becomes a drug in the market."

Couldn't Afford Such Extravagance.

"You are worth your weight in gold to me, darling!" he murmured. "Then do go home early, George, dear," she replied wearily. "I've lost ten pounds since we became engaged, just sitting up late with you. We can't afford such extravagance."

Her Love Explained.

He: "If you did not love me, why did you encourage me?" She: "Encourage you?" He: "For two seasons you have accepted every one of my invitations to the theatre and concerts." She: "That was not because I loved you; it was because I loved the theatre."

Wanted to Keep Him in the Family.

"Reginald," she said, to a wealthy young dandy, who had been paying his attentions to her, "I should like to ask you a very serious question." "What is it, my dear?" he replied. "Would you object to marry mamma if I refused you? You see, we really don't want to lose you."

Rural Ignorance.

"Your trip to Italy must have been very pleasant," said one of the most intelligent young ladies in a Wiltshire village to Simpson, who had just returned from foreign parts. "Very interesting indeed," answered he. "Now, tell me," said she, "does Italy look like a boot? You know that's the way it looks on the map."

What is Sisterly Love?

"Do I love George?" mused Clara softly, "or is it simply a sister's affection that I feel for——". Just then Bobby burst noisily into the room, and interrupted her sweet meditations. "Get out of here, you young ruffian!" she shouted, and, seizing him by the arm, she shot him through the door. "Ah, no!" she sighed, as she resumed her interrupted train of thought, "my love for George is not a sister's love. It is something sweeter, purer, higher, and holier!"

Very Probably He Would.

He (seriously): "Do you think your father would object to my marrying you?" She: "I don't know; if he's anything like me he would."

An Old Hand at it.

"Miss Swift is learning to ride a bicycle, she tells me." "But she rode one last year. Why does she have to learn again?" "Another fellow is teaching her."

The Meanings of Names.

Mother: "Every name means something—Harry, the bold; Charles, the brave; William, the good; Harold, the——" Helen (starting from a reverie): "Harold—oh, yes, Harold means business; he told me so last night."

Not a Good Place.

Captain Ardare: "Just one kiss before I go, just one to soften the bitterness of parting." Miss Prudence: "Captain Ardare, I am pained by your request. I thought you knew I never permitted such liberties—besides, this isn't a good place."

His Potent Virtue.

"Why does she consider her husband a model? He smokes, and is fond of wine?" "Yes." "Plays cards and scolds?" "So they say." "Never gets home till one?" "Yes, but——" "But what?" "He never gets a spot on the table-cloth when he carves."

Strong Circumstantial Evidence.

"Young man, what right have you to kiss my daughter on such short acquaintance?" "What proof, sir, have you that I have done any such thing?" "No positive proof, young man, but that hairpin in your moustache is strong circumstantial evidence."

Woman's Thoughtfulness.

"How lucky," said Mrs. Nuwed, "that I happened to pass that cigar sale this morning! These cigars are exactly the shade of George's new smoking jacket, and the smart little green bands round them will go with the lining beautifully. Men never think of these little things!"

The Difference Age Makes.

A girl's taste differs according to her age, says a cynic. At sixteen she wants a masher with toothpick shoes and microscopic moustache; at twenty a nobleman with a pile of gold; at twenty-five, she'll be satisfied with a Member of Parliament; at thirty a country doctor or a curate will do, and at thirty-five anything in the male line, from an editor down.

Waiting for Him to Go.

"Young man," said the stern parent, with the accent on the young, "do you intend to stay here all night holding my daughter's hand and looking her in the face like a sick calf?" "No, sir." "What do you intend to do, then?" "Well, I had thought when you did us the kindness to retire, I would put my arm round her waist, and if she did not object too forcibly, I might risk a kiss."

Instinct or Experience?

"Maud," he said, as the carriage entered the shadowy lane, "Maud, are you sure you—you never had any man's arm about your waist, as mine is?" "No, George, I never did," she murmured; "I never, never did! Why?" "Oh, nothing," he replied, "only I wondered whether it was instinct or experience that made you take the reins from my hand just as soon as we reached this secluded spot!"

He Wasn't Asleep.

Scene: Newly-married pair on bench in park. Old gentleman supposed to be asleep. She: "My darling!" He: "My dove!" She: "My dearest!" He: "My pussy!" She: "My duck!" He: "My pretty birdie!" She: "My goosie!" He: "My kitten!" She: "My chickee!" He: "My lambkin!" Old gentleman (interrupting brutally): "Can't you call each other Noah's Arks, and have done with it?"

Digitized by Google

ALFOSCO REGD

Call or Write.

Allen Foster & Co

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

47 GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

BUY DIRECT BY PARCEL POST FROM THE LEADING FIRM OF LONDON MANUFACTURERS.

Call or Write

ALFOSCO REGD

10/6

Design No. 743. 10/6.

Ladies' Costume Skirt in Grey Mixture Tweed — neat bird's-eye effect. Skirt is lined throughout and trimmed strappings of same material, nicely stitched. Price 10/6; carriage 5d. This skirt can be ordered in black if desired. Ladies need have no hesitation in ordering one of these Skirts. Money returned if not approved.

Design No. 743 10/6

Design No. 443. 10/6. New Design for Spring.

One of ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'s latest productions, and by far the cheapest and smartest Half-Guinea Costume on the market. Made in A. F. & Co.'s new Zibeline Cloth (a material with a silky surface and carrying a splash effect) or in either their Specialite Serge or Venetian Cloth—all colours. The bodice is lined and made in the Russian style. New collar and cape tastefully trimmed braid. Well finished Skirt trimmed round hips with braid; very stylish. Price only 10/6; carr. 6d. ex. Skirt alone 6/6, carr. 5d.

Design No. 1019. 4/11.

Costume skirt in good wearing Black and Navy Serge, trimmed two flounces and braid. Price only 4/11; car. 5d. In ordering give length of skirt in front and size of waist. Post orders receive prompt attention.

Write for our SPRING SKETCH BOOK and CATALOGUE of BARGAINS.

Hundreds of Illustrations of the Latest Novelties in Costumes and Jackets sent post free.

Design No. 760. 10/6.

Chesterfield Three-quarter Sacque Jacket. This Jacket is produced in Grey and Black Vicuna Coating; also in pretty Grey Tweeds. Price only 10/6; carriage 6d. extra. This Jacket can also be ordered 33in. long, 11/6; 36in., 12/6; 39in. 13/6; and 42in., 14/6; carriage, 6d. extra. Patterns Free.

Design No. 443

10/6

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,

47 GOLDEN LANE, BARBICAN, LONDON, E.C

DO YOU WANT A GOOD CYCLE?

Write for my Lists. I deal only in the Best Coventry made Cycles, and by contracting for thousands annually, I BUY CHEAPLY and SELL CHEAPLY.

Premiers, Rovers Coventry Challenge, Triumphs, Swifts, Humbers, Centaurs, Raglans, Singers, etc.

The QUALITY is there. Get my prices, save money and ensure satisfaction.

A High-Grade COVENTRY CYCLE for £6-0-0.

Two Years' Guarantee. Easy Payments without publicity. Cycle sent on receipt of first payment. EDWARD O'BRIEN, The World's Largest Cycle Dealer, COVENTRY.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 57 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Walmall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

Patronised by Royalty.

TRIUMPH Cycles

10 Guineas } Or from a
AND } Guinea
15 Guineas } per month.

The Best Bicycle that British Workmanship can produce.

TRIUMPH CYCLE Co., Ltd., COVENTRY.

4 & 5, Holborn Viaduct, E.C. 30, Deansgate Arcade, Manchester

CHICKEN HATCHING EXTRAORDINARY FOR 2/6

The Texas Egg-Hatcher and Rearer combined supersedes all incubators. Hatches above and rears little ones below simultaneously all the year round. A money-making home industry requiring neither capital nor labour. Turns 1d. eggs into valuable Chickens or Ducklings. Millions selling in America. 15-egg size 2/6; 30-egg, 5/-; complete for use. Address, AMERICAN POULTRY SYNDICATE (Room 101), 7 Albion Grove, Stoke Newington, London, N

ZOX for Neuralgia at Any Time.

GIVES INSTANT RELIEF TO HEADACHE, TOOTHACHE, NERVE PAINS

Any Sufferer Sending Stamped Addressed Envelope May Try Zox FREE.

Neuralgia is a Disease of the Nerves, and most commonly attacks the nerves of the face. Its presence is announced by the most piercing darting pains, recurring in paroxysms, followed with brief intervals of relief; but hardly a moment elapses after a lacerating pain darts along the course of the affected nerve ere another shoots forth, inflicting pain equally distressing to the patient. The annexed cut presents in the prominent lines the nerves of the fifth branch, which are most liable to attacks of Neuralgia. All who suffer from this terrible pain, or from Headache, Toothache, or nerve pains generally, will be glad to know of ZOX, a Simple, Safe and easy Remedy certified free from injurious substance by no less an authority than Dr. A. B. Griffiths, F.R.S. The Proprietors offer to send Two Free Sample Powders to any reader of "Short Stories," who will send them a stamped addressed envelope.

ZOX is sold by Chemists, &c., at 1s. and 2s 6d. per box, or can be had post free from

THE ZOX COMPANY, 11 Hatton Garden, London, E.C.

"In pain? Try ZOX."

Digitized by Google

THE ALBERT GATE MYSTERY.

. . . Conclusion. . . .

What the Cockatoo Said.

"These cigarettes are not so good as Hussein ul Mulk's," said Brett, producing his case.

"No, he has an exquisite taste in tobacco. But I nearly fooled him with the dummy diamonds. I would have done so if it had not been for you. Do you know, Mr. Brett, I have always underrated Englishmen's brains. You are really stupid as a nation"—here Talbot almost blushed—"but you are an exception. You ought to be a Frenchman."

"I suppose I may regard that as a compliment?" remarked Brett casually.

"Take it as you like," said Dubois. "And now that I have told you all that you want to know, I suppose, may I ask you a question of some interest to myself? What is to become of me? Am I to be hanged, or imprisoned, or passed on to the Sultan for treatment?"

Brett was silent for a few moments.

"How much of the five thousand pounds given you by the Turks remains in your possession?" he demanded.

The Frenchman hesitated before replying:

"There is no use lying to you. I have not yet expended the first thousand, although I had to pay pretty dearly for a good many things."

"Why did you come here?" asked the barrister.

"Because I would be safe for some months with a few hospitable gentlemen whom I know up in the hills."

"And then?"

"Then Marguerite and I were going to the Argentine, to dwell in rural felicity, and teach our children to bless the name of Mahomet and Abdul Hamid."

"Marguerite is Mademoiselle Beaucaire?"

"Yes, poor girl! I hear she is ill and in prison, together with her excellent father. Really, Mr. Brett, I cannot help liking you, but I ought to feel anxious to cut your throat."

"In that case you would certainly be hanged. Are you married to Mademoiselle Beaucaire?"

The Frenchman darted a quick and angry look at his inquisitor.

"What has that to do with you?" he snarled.

Dubois' future had already been determined. The rascal was more fortunate than he deserved to be. Owing to the lucky chance that his crime had a political significance he would escape punishment.

The slightest public reference to either the theft of the diamonds or the Sultan's original intentions with regard to them would create such a storm in the Mohammedan world that no man could prophesy the end.

Brett knew exactly how to deal with Dubois. But a fantastic project had arisen in his mind, and he determined to graft it upon the drastic expedient adopted by the authorities.

He abruptly broke off the conversation and told the Frenchman that he would call again during the afternoon.

True to his promise, Talbot and he visted the injured man some hours later. This time they were accompanied by a stout individual and a closely-veiled lady—Grosjean and his daughter.

The meeting between Henri and Marguerite was pathetic. It was at the same time exceedingly French, and somewhat trying to the nerves of the Englishmen.

At last the couple calmed their transports, and Brett promptly recalled them to a proportionate sense of their surroundings by reminding them that there was serious business to be discussed.

"I am commissioned to inform you," he said, addressing Dubois, "that if you proceed direct to the Argentine, never attempt to revisit France, and keep your mouth closed as to your attempt to purloin the Sultan's jewels, you will be set at liberty here, and no effort will be made by the French or British police to arrest you. The infringement of any of these conditions will lead to your extradition and a sentence of penal servitude for life."

"Ma foi!" cried the Frenchman, looking intently into the barrister's inscrutable face. "Why such tenderness?"

Brett would not give him time for prolonged reflection.

"I have not yet finished," he said drily. "I imagine that Mlle. Beaucaire cannot produce a marriage certificate. She will be supplied with one, to permit her to travel with you as your lawful wife."

The pair were startled. They somewhat relaxed the close embrace in which they sat. The man's handsome face flushed with anger.

La Belle Chasseuse sat mute and downcast. This personal development came as a complete surprise to her.

Dubois glanced at her covertly. He was still annoyed and defiant; but even he, hardened scoundrel and cynic though he was, could not find words to contest Brett's decision.

The barrister deemed the moment ripe for his final smashing argument. He came somewhat nearer to the bed, and said with exasperating coolness:

"There is a secret room in the Cabaret Noir, the contents of which have not yet been too closely examined by the police. It is in their charge. At my request, backed up by the British Foreign Office, they have thus far deferred a detailed scrutiny. Perhaps if the external influence is removed they may press their investigations to a point when it will be impossible to permit your contemplated voyage to the Argentine. You know best. I have nothing further to say."

Dubois looked at him in moody silence. The Argentine—with £4,000? Yes. But a wife!

In a few moments the Frenchman drew Marguerite closer to him, with his uninjured arm, and said—

"Let us get married, ma p'tite. It is essential."

And married they were forthwith, a priest and an official from the Mayor's office being in waiting at the hotel.

Whilst they were signing the register Grosjean motioned Brett to one side.

"Allow me to thank you, M'sieu', for the kindness you have shown," he murmured. "Touching that hidden room in the Cabaret, now. Do the police really know of it?"

"They do."

"Then, M'sieu', I accompany them to the Argentine," and he jerked his thumb towards Dubois and his wife.

Six months later, when the Earl and Countess of Fairholme returned from their wedding tour, Brett was invited to dinner.

Talbot was there, of course, and Daubeney, and Sir Hubert.

"Constantinople must be a queer place," observed Jack after the first rush of animated converse had exhausted itself.

"Surely there are no more diamond mysteries on foot!" cried his charming sister.

"Not exactly; but I made some inquiries through a friend of mine in the Legation. Hussein ul Mulk and his two Paris friends are quite important functionaries in the palace. The other pair of scoundrels came to a bad end.

"Is there any news of Monsieur and Madame Dubois, and the fat man Grosjean?" asked Edith.

"You will receive some in the drawing-room, Lady Fairholme," said Brett.

In the drawing-room her ladyship was delighted to find a splendid cockatoo.

"The happy couple in the Argentine sent him to me to be presented to you on your return," explained the barrister. "He is named 'Le Prophète,' and he talks beautifully—indeed, his language is most emphatic, but it is all French."

"What a darling!" cried Edith. "I do wish he would say something. Cher Prophète, parlez avec moi!"

And immediately the cockatoo stretched out his wings and screamed—

"Vive Mahomet! Vive le Sultan! A bas les Grecs! à bas! à bas!"

Finis.

Digitized by Google

Catarrh a Constant Cold in the Head.

The medical explanation of the causes and symptoms of catarrh is an interesting item of a quarterly medical Journal just at hand. The Editor is anxious that people should understand the serious consequences which may result from neglect of a cold or of a series of colds in the head. In fact, the beginning of many of the most obstinate forms of catarrh can be traced to what the patient thought a simple cold. This fact is emphasized by a series of cases taken from the records of the Drouet Institute. These cases also serve to illustrate the treatment of catarrh by the Drouet Method, which the Editor points out has been successful in a large proportion of instances after operations and other special procedures have failed. Names and addresses being given, this issue of the "Journal for the Deaf and Review of Diseases of the Nose, Throat and Ears" will be of use to everyone who has any form of catarrh. A free copy of the Journal can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, Drouet Institute, 10 Marble Arch, London, W. The "Journal" also contains a Special Report Form by means of which anyone can obtain free advice as to treatment. The Editor, however, advises patients, whenever possible, to attend the Institute for a personal examination during the consultation hours, week-day mornings, 10 to 12, afternoons, 2 to 4. For personal consultations a fee of 5s. is charged.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM
(CLOTTED): absolutely pure: no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil; invaluable for children and invalids: ½lb. 1s. 4d.; 1lb. 2s. 4d; 2lbs. 4s. 4d., free. Supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon.

Sovereigns In your bank

ARE BETTER than in the pockets of ordinary retailers.
WRITE NOW FOR
H. SAMUEL'S Big Prize Guide,
200 Pages, 3,000 Engravings, Bargains in Watches 8/6, Clocks 1/6, Real Gold Gem Rings 3/6, Cutlery, Plate, &c.
This Grand Volume is Sent you Absolutely
FREE FOR A POSTCARD
Shews how by dealing direct at factory prices
YOU SAVE HALF YOUR USUAL OUTLAY.
VALUABLE FREE GIFTS TO BUYERS.
TEN LISTS TO CHOOSE FROM IN GUIDE.
DON'T DELAY! WRITE NOW!
H. SAMUEL, DEPT. 29, MARKET ST., MANCHESTER.

Order
E. & T.
PINK'S JAM
Undoubtedly the Best.
PURE.
No Artificial Colouring or Chemical Preservative.

Ten Days Free Trial
is allowed on every cycle we sell. The full price and all carriage charges returned if unsatisfactory in any way.
1903 Models, fully warranted,
£3.10 to £6.10
New Departure Coaster Brake Front Rim Brake and highest grade genuine British made fittings and accessories.
200 Good Second-Hand Cycles £1.10 to £2.10
Don't Fail to get our big illustrated catalogue before deciding on your 1903 machine. We save you money.
Rider Agents Wanted in every district to buy sample cycle at special price and take orders for us. Large profits easily made in spare time. Address Dept. 44A,
MEAD CYCLE CO. Liverpool.

TOOTH-ACHE
CURED INSTANTLY BY
BUNTER'S NERVINE
Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.
Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.
"As a specific for Toothache it has no equal. I have used it successfully for years."—Prof. W. WILSON, M.D.

MERLIN CYCLES
MARVELLOUS VALUE
A HIGH GRADE £10 10 0 Cycle for £5 19 6. Free Wheel and Back-pedal Brake.
Brand New Guaranteed Pneumatic-tyred Cycles for £3 19 6
Merlin Cycles are always good, no matter what price you pay.
MERLIN CYCLE Co., Martineau St, Birmingham

THE BEST FAMILY MEDICINE
KAYE'S WORSDELL'S PILLS
Are a certain Cure for Indigestion, Biliousness, Headache, Dyspepsia, Constipation, Liver and Kidney Complaints etc.
For Ladies of all ages they are invaluable.
Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and 4s. 6d. per box

GIVEN AWAY
with next week's
HOME NOTES
(No. 480)
PAPER PATTERN of a
BLOUSE.
Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.
Price Twopence.

FREE TO YOU
To advertise S.L.S Records, we are giving away our noted Phonographs for a limited time. Write, giving full address and nearest railway station; enclose stamp.
Symonds' London Stores,
128, City Road, London.

Digitized by Google

IN CONFIDENCE

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

A Trifling Toast.

FANNIE has known a man for some time, and been friendly with him. She likes him very much, but so far he has given no hint of having any deep feeling for her. The other day, before leaving their house, she offered him a glass of claret, and he drank it saying "My best love to you." Ever since that, FANNIE had been wondering whether it should be taken as a hint for her.

* * * * *

I fear such remarks as that over wine are only too frequent to be taken seriously. It was very likely just his nice little way of proposing your health. After all, "health" is a very overdone thing to wish people, and "respects" would have been formal. "Love" was the right thing to say, and he said it. Don't treat it too seriously. If he means it, he will want more of your claret, as it appears to be the only means by which he cares to express feelings at all.

❦❦❦

A Sudden Change.

X AND Y were engaged for five years. X, the man, suddenly drops Y, but Y still loves him. Is this explicable after five years of courtship?

* * * * *

It looks as though X has tired of Y. Give him a rest, and see if he comes back. Perhaps he thinks he is fonder of somebody else. He is probably wrong and will realise it. Five years is a long test, and few men could have continued so long unless there were a very real attachment between him and the girl. But I daresay he has got into a groove and wants a change. The engagement is altogether too long. Unless he repents very soon, try to get him out of your thoughts.

❦❦❦

An Unfair Advantage.

AILSA'S lover is going to Australia, and expects to be there ten years. AILSA is twenty. The young man wants to become engaged to her before he goes out. Would I recommend this course?

* * * * *

No, certainly not. It would be quite unfair to bind yourself to any such engagement. If you are really lovers, you should have a distinct understanding, but not a binding engagement. To expect you to wait until you are thirty before marrying is very unfair to you.

* * * * *

You may alter your mind about the young man in a year or so, and might quite easily meet someone at home who would attract you more. If the young man thinks there is a chance of your going out to him to become his wife within a certain time, you will consult your own inclinations in the matter of an engagement. I am assuming there is no likelihood of that.

Marrying Again.

"How soon after his wife's death should a man marry again?" F. G., who inquires this, has several children, and his home badly wants attention which he cannot give himself.

* * * * *

Under such circumstances, it is quite permissible to marry a year afterwards. Not so much because you have forgotten your first wife, as because on a mere common-sense basis a man must have somebody to manage his home. I advise somebody of your own age. A young and attractive woman who marries a man for the sake of becoming mistress of a home would probably be entering a fatal tangle.

❦❦❦

A Man's Column Proposed.

A MERE MAN is annoyed because there is no column dealing with men in Short Stories. He thinks men should be able to read of matters affecting them quite as much as women, including directions as to dress, manners, and general affairs.

* * * * *

I am always pleased to chat with men on any matters on which they may want a hint. A woman is often able to give hints, even in business matters, which, though inexperienced, may quite possibly hit the nail on the head. As to men's dress, I do not really believe there are many men who want to read about such things, excepting, of course, dandies.

* * * * *

The great test of a well-dressed man nowadays is neatness and the absence of display. Men who have the instinct to dress well cannot be improved by anything they may read, while those who have not that instinct are seldom able to learn. As to etiquette, there are certainly many points on which one has much to learn, and many of my male readers who are in doubt on such matters should drop me a line.

❦❦❦

The Language of Lilies.

WINNIE is a Sunday School teacher. Some time ago, one of the gentlemen teachers appeared with a bunch of lilies in his buttonhole, which WINNIE coveted. In a mischievous moment she asked him for them, and he at once handed the flowers over. Since that, every Sunday the young man has appeared with a bunch of lilies, and has each time presented them to WINNIE. Am I to read this as a sign that he is in love with her? His manners generally have not suggested anything of the kind.

* * * * *

I think you were a trifle forward, WINNIE. The young man could not, of course, refuse to comply with your request in the first instance, and being no doubt a bit of a courtier, thought it a happy idea to bring the flowers regularly. Perhaps he is a little bit of a flirt, and rather fancied the compliment you paid him by asking for his flowers. Don't place too much reliance on what you think is behind it. It is probably nothing more than a pretty compliment on his part.

❦❦❦

Introduction.

WILL many correspondents please remember what I have several times stated—that I cannot act as an agent for introducing couples to whom I have given advice. Neither can I announce anything in the nature of advertisements on this page. I hope those who continually ask me to do so will take this as final. If I agreed to do it once, I must consent to always, and the Editor of this paper does not want to become a matrimonial agent.

Cynthia.

Printed by HORACE COX, Breams Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SICK MADE WELL WEAK MADE STRONG.

Marvellous Elixir of Life Discovered by Famous Doctor-Scientist That Cures Every Known Ailment.

Wonderful Cures are Effected That Seem Like Miracles Performed—The Secret of Long Life of Olden Times Revived.

The Remedy is Free to All Who Send Name and Address.

After years of patient study, and delving into the dusty record of the past, as well as following modern experiments in the realms of medical science, Dr. James W. Kidd, 522, First National Bank Building, Fort Wayne, Ind., U.S.A., makes the startling announcement that he has surely discovered the elixir of life. That he is able with the aid of a mysterious compound, known only to himself produced as a result of the years he has spent in searching for this precious life-giving boon, to cure any and every disease that is known to the human body. There is no doubt of the doctor's earnestness in making his claim and the remarkable cures that he is daily effecting seem to bear him out very strongly. His theory which he advances is one of reason and based on sound experience in a medical practice of many years. It costs nothing to try his remarkable "Elixir of Life," as he calls it, for he sends it free, to anyone who is a sufferer, in sufficient quantities to convince of its ability to cure, so there is absolutely no risk to run. Some of the cures cited are very remarkable, and but for reliable witnesses would hardly be credited. The lame have thrown away crutches and walked about after two or three trials of the remedy. The sick, given up by home doctors, have been restored to their families and friends in perfect health. Rheumatism, neuralgia, stomach, heart, liver, kidney, blood and skin diseases and bladder troubles disappear as by magic. Headaches, backaches, nervousness, fevers, consumption, coughs, colds, asthma, catarrh, bronchitis, and all affections of the throat, lungs or any vital organs are easily overcome in a space of time that is simply marvellous.

DR. JAMES WILLIAM KIDD.

Partial paralysis, locomotor ataxia, dropsy, gout, scrofula, are quickly and permanently removed. It purifies the entire system, blood and tissues, restores normal nerve power, circulation and a state of perfect health is produced at once. To the doctor all systems are alike and equally affected by this great "Elixir of Life." Send for the remedy to-day. It is free to every sufferer. State what you want to be cured of and the sure remedy for it will be sent you free by return mail.

Remember a letter to America from the British Isles requires 2½d. postage. Write your name very plainly, and be sure to give your full address, so there can be no mistake in delivery.

10,000 RUGS GIVEN AWAY

GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

This Phenomenal Offer is made to the readers of Short Stories (21/3/1903) only. On receipt of Postal Order for 5/-, or 62 stamps, we will forward, DIRECT FROM OUR LOOMS to your address, one of our 10/6 genuine SEAMLESS WOVEN, REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, etc., handsomely bordered and woven in 30 different patterns, and large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room. These Carpets will be sold as an Advertisement for our goods, below the Actual Cost of production. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained direct from our Looms, thus saving the purchasers all middle profits.

With every Carpet we shall ABSOLUTELY GIVE AWAY a very Handsome Rug to match, or we will send Two Carpets and Two Rugs for 9/6.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED. THOUSANDS OF UNSOLICITED TESTIMONIALS RECEIVED.

CALAXY ILLUSTRATED BARGAIN CATALOGUES OF CARPETS, HEARTHRUGS, TABLE LINEN, CURTAINS, ETC., POST FREE,

if mentioning Short Stories (21/3/1903) while writing.
Cheques and P.O.'s payable to

F. HODGSON & SONS (Dept. S.T.S.) Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY

FOR HEADACHE AND Neuralgia.

Cures In TEN MINUTES.

For INFLUENZA.

KAPUTINE immediately relieves the distressing "Influenza" pains and cures the fever.

KAPUTINE has the confidence of and is recommended by many eminent medical men. KAPUTINE is not a single dangerous crude drug, such as has been condemned by the medical papers, but is composed of several ingredients, first discovered thirteen years ago by one of our leading medical men. There is no other remedy like KAPUTINE, the SAFE remedy for Headache and Neuralgia. Ask for KAPUTINE, and see that you get it and not some dangerous substitute offered for the sake of extra profit.

KAPUTINE is the ONLY preparation of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and Infirmaries.

The Editor of the "Family Doctor," the People's Medical Paper, IN ONE OF HIS COMMENTS, SAYS:

"After a careful examination of Kaputine, and learning its component parts, we should certainly recommend it as a Safe and Reliable Remedy for Headache."

Packets of 18 doses 1/-,
of all Chemists, Stores, etc., or post free from
KAPUTINE LTD., Huddersfield
for 12 stamps.

Digitized by Google

"G.P." ASK FOR "Government" Tea

Eighteenpence Everywhere.

RICH, RIPE, REFRESHING.

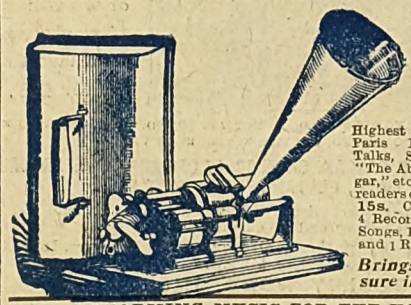
You May Know It by Its Red Tape and Seal.

WRITE FOR FREE SAMPLE TO G.P. GOVERNMENT TEA CO., 16 AMERICA SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

"THE MACHINE THAT TALKS."

CAMPBELL'S GRAPHOPHONE is the best Talking and Singing Machine in the Market at the Price.

A FASCINATING AND UNRIVALLED ENTERTAINER FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.

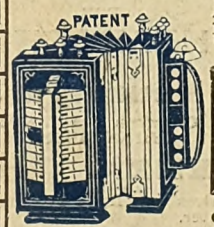


CAMPBELL'S HOME GRAND GRAPHOPHONE. This is no German manufacture, but the new American 20th Century Talking Machine, which gained the Highest Awards at the Paris Exhibition, 1900. Talks, Sings, and recites "The Absent-Minded Beggar," etc. Special price to readers of Short Stories, £2 15s. Carriage paid, with 4 Records free. 2 Vocal Songs, 1 Orchestral Piece, and 1 Recitation.

Brings Endless Pleasure into the Home.

CHARMING MUSIC FOR THE HOME.

CAMPBELL'S Gold Medal MELODEONS



With Organ and Celestial Tone, and Sweet Bell Accompaniments. No Home should be without one. No Knowledge of Music required. Used throughout the world.

200,000 TESTIMONIALS.

Special Offer to the Readers of Short Stories

Campbell's "Gem" Melodeons, price only 6/9
Campbell's "Miniature" Melodeon, „ 10/9
Campbell's "Paragon" Melodeon, „ 14/-
Campbell's "Favourite" Melodeon, „ 16/6

Cut out this and send P.O.O. for the amount

Either sent carriage paid to any address in Great Britain & Ireland.

All lovers of music should at once send for Campbell's New Illustrated Privilege Price List of all kinds of Musical Instruments for Season 1901-2, now ready. 200,000 sent out yearly. Send 1d. Stamp to—

CAMPBELL & CO., Musical Instrument Makers, 116 Trongate, GLASGOW.

Established 50 Years. BEWARE OF WORTHLESS IMITATIONS.

MACKINTOSH'S

IS DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!

PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.

A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

REGULATION JACK TAR SUIT

ROYAL NAVAL WORSTED SERGES

ALL ONE PRICE 66 ALL SIZES

Postage 3d. Send post-card for illustrated catalogue of young gentlemen's clothing.

THE BON MARCHÉ LIVERPOOL.

Price 75/- 1/9 per week.

5/- SECURES THIS MAILCART

It is a hand-carved satin Walnut Convertible Car, hand polished, upholstered in Tan, Green or Electric Blue, with springs and wheels painted to match. It has sliding foot well and drop front, adapting it for use for one or two children, just as required. Price, with Twisted brass Rail and fringed hood, 75/-. Size of Wheels, 25 by 10 inch.

TERMS.—Send 5/- deposit, we then forward at once, carriage paid; the price is only 75/-, and you pay 3/6 fortnightly or 7/- monthly until paid for. If, however, you wish to pay Cash the price is but 65/-. Write for Catalogue. Good Agents wanted.

MAXEY & CO., Meadow St., SHEFFIELD.

BRITANNIA CLEANS HER HELMET WITH "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH

AND EVERY BRITISH HOUSEWIFE SHOULD POLISH ALL METALS WITH IT, TOO.

Most foreign polishes set up acid, are sticky in use, and require much labour in cleaning. "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH spreads evenly over the metal, and produces easily and quickly a lasting brilliancy. "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH is entirely made in England, and by using it you support British Trade.

Manufacturers: THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH Co. Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

GREAT NEW COMPETITION STARTS INSIDE.

Short Stories.

No. 743.] Week ending March 28, 1903. [Price One Penny.

Flinging one arm as far as she dared along the body of the stone dog, she dragged her own body forward towards the gargoyle's mouth. So much depended on her getting the letter! Would she be able to reach it? ✍ ✍

Digitized by Google

(A Dramatic Incident from our Story, "FOR HIS SAKE." See page 391.)

A KODAK for 5/-

The No. 1 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 2½ by 2½ inches.

Despite its small size and low price the No. 1 Brownie is a thoroughly efficient little camera, and yields photographs as clear and distinct as possible. No dark room is needed for changing the films. In use the Brownie Kodak is simplicity itself.

THE NEW BROWNIE KODAK

The No. 2 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 3¼ by 2½ inches.

MARVELLOUS VALUE PRICE 10/- ONLY.

Finders for vertical and horizontal pictures. Everset time and instantaneous shutter. New and convenient spool-holding devices. Improved non-detachable winding key. Loaded and unloaded in daylight.

Ask for the Kodak Catalogue of all Photographic Dealers or of

KODAK Ltd., 43 Clerkenwell Road, London, E.C.

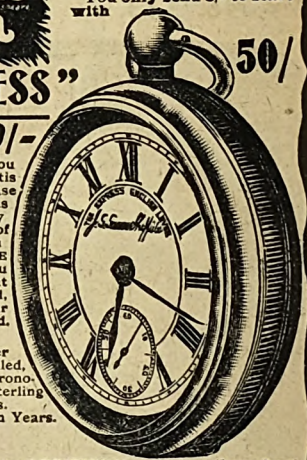
Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold Street, Liverpool; 72-74 Buchanan Street, Glasgow. Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, London, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, London, E.C.; 115 Oxford Street, London, W., 171-173 Regent Street, London, W.; 40 West Strand, W.C.

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES' System

On J. G. GRAVES' System you are absolutely certain of what you are buying before you pay for it.

You only send 5/- to start with

THE "EXPRESS"



50/

ENGLISH LEVER, (Regd.) 50/-

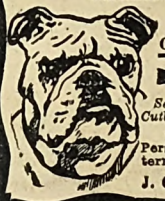
is then forwarded to you. You examine and test it, and, if satisfied, you complete the purchase in nine more monthly payments of 5/-; or, if you prefer to pay the balance in one payment of 45/- within seven days from receipt of goods, a HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT (which you choose yourself) will be sent you. If you are not satisfied, return the watch, and your deposit is instantly refunded.

SPECIFICATION.

First-grade English Lever Movement, Capped & Jewelled, Safety Winding Pinion, Chronometer Balance, Massive Sterling Silver (Hall Marked) Cases. Warranted Seven Years.



Guaranteed BRITISH Manufacture throughout.

THE LARGEST WATCH-SALES FIRM IN THE WORLD.

Send for No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, Cutlery and Plate, Fancy Goods, etc., Post Free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms. Good Commission. No Risk.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

Free Wheels. New Departure Hub, Bowden Brakes. All Improvements—Lamp, Bell, &c. Carriage paid.

Carr. Paid.

For Cash or 12 Monthly Payments of

£8 8s. 15/10 | £9 10s 17/6
£9 16/8 | £105s. 19/3

Juno Motor Cycle £32 or 60/- mo. Accessories at lower prices than any other house; Acetylene Lamp, 2/11; Cycle Stand, 1/8; Motor Horn, 5/6. Write for New Season List, over 100 pages and 500 illustrations, sent post free.—METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co. Ltd. (S.S. De t.), 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C. West End Showrooms: Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

PIANO VAMPING (BOOK 16 PACES.)

2/6 to £1 may be earned nightly by anyone having good knowledge of above. No knowledge of music required. A genuine work. Post free, 2/-; Colonies, 3/-.

Agent (Dept. A), 16 Eton Rd., Southsea, Hants.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

SPECIAL BARGAINS

ANY SENT ON APPROVAL WILLINGLY.

SAVE £ d S

GENT'S 18-ct. Gold-cased KEYLESS HUNTER, jewelled movement, lever balance, exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; sacrifice, 10/6; approval willingly.

POWERFUL FIELD GLASSES by celebrated optician (Le Gautier, Paris); 30 miles range; 8 achromatic lenses (guaranteed), nickel silver eyeshades, in leather sling case; sacrifice 10/6.

GLADSTONE BAG, 24in., superior quality, real brown cowhide, strong leather straps, nickel silver fittings, &c.; in perfect condition; unsolicited; cost 4 guineas; accept 25/-; approval.

LADY'S pretty 18-carat gold-cased KEYLESS WATCH, extra fine quality, jewelled movement, beautifully ornamented dial; perfect timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; sacrifice, 12/6; approval before payment.

FASHIONABLE LONG NECK-CHAIN, genuine 18-carat rolled gold (stamped), beautifully finished elegant West End design; sacrifice, 9/6.

MAGNIFICENT 5-ROW PEARL COLLARETTE; finest quality; mounted with four bars of lustrous Orient diamonds, in velvet-lined case, complete; sacrifice, 12/6; approval willingly.

LADY'S lustrous DIAMOND & RUBY RING, 5 large, matchless double rubies and 8 real diamonds, solid gold, hall-marked setting; sacrifice, 12/6.

CURB CHAIN BRACELET, with paddock and safety chain; 18-carat, rolled gold (stamped and guaranteed), in velvet case; sacrifice, 7/6; approval.

MANDOLINE, genuine Italian (Stridente, Naples); very fine tone, real rosewood, pearl inlaid, in saddler-made case; sacrifice, 19/6; approval willingly.

ORGAN-TONE MELODEON, magnificent 26/- instrument. 12-fold bellows (metal bound), 3 sets steel bronze reeds, 4 acting stops, powerful tone; perfect order, sacrifice, 10/6; approval willingly.

HANDSOME REAL MARBLE CLOCK, highly finished lever movement, 9in. high, in perfect order, guaranteed 10 years; sacrifice, 10/6; approval.

FEATHER BOAS; bankrupt stock, special bargains, real Ostrich Feather Boas, beautifully curly, perfectly new, in box colours, grey and white, black and white, and natural. Prices 10/6 and 12/6. Original price 30/- and 42/-; each approval willingly.

LADY'S 6-guinea solid gold (stamped) KEYLESS WATCH, jewelled in 10 rubies, richly engraved case, splendid timekeeper; 10 years' warranty; week's free trial; sacrifice, 21/-.

A full list of Special Bargains, New and Second-hand, can be had free on application.

R. H. DAVIS, Pawnbroker and Jeweller, 284 Brixton Road, London, S.W.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C

Short Stories.

No. 743.] Week Ending March 28th, 1903. [One Penny.

NEW SERIAL. START TO-DAY.

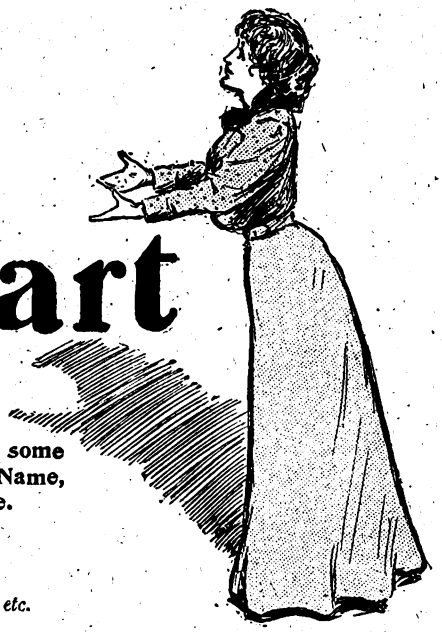
Held Apart



The Story of a Strange Double Fraud and its Influence upon some Young Hearts, a Great Name, and a Famous Fortune.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Author of "The Golden Dwarf," "A Daughter of Mystery," etc.

THE FIRST CHAPTERS.

Moira Davenal is sitting in the little cottage on Groudle Quay busy with her ribbon work. Sir Guy Vanbrugh is talking to her.

"Moira, I love you so much," he says. "Won't you——"

He pauses. There is a heavy step in the hallway of the cottage, and a burly figure enters the room.

"Good evening, Mr. Davenal. I'm off to London for the week-end and was just leaving a message for you with your daughter. How goes on the task of raising the Sylph?"

"I've found the last hole, Sir Guy," says John Davenal, who is a diver engaged in raising Sir Guy's yacht. "She'll soon be afloat."

After Sir Guy has gone a sailor appears at the door singing in drunken tones the scrap of a chorus:

"Give my love to Nancy, the girl that I adore,
Tell her that she'll never see her—her sailor any more."

The diver rises to his feet.

"Hullo, Hartigan!" he remarks loudly. "Glad to see you. Come in and make yourself comfortable."

While Moira goes out on an errand a conversation takes place between the two men, from which it appears that Moira is really Hartigan's daughter.

The sailor—who is a ship's steward—sits back in his chair and begins to sing again the drunken chorus.

He halts abruptly, for the door slowly opens, and a blind woman comes in.

Dennis Hartigan recognises her as his sister Kate. She tells her brother that she heard the song he was singing—sung in just the same way—once when she was sitting on a breakwater at Groudle. She also adds that the man who was singing said, evidently to someone with him: "This is out far enough. In with it;" after which there was a splash.

Hannah Davenal (Hartigan's wife and the diver's sister) is maid to Lady Tarleton. She is possessed of a secret with which she continually blackmails her mistress.

One afternoon Lady Tarleton and Hannah Davenal go down to Groudle Tower, and together they make a mysterious journey at midnight.

Two mornings later Hannah is found dead in bed, a towel smelling of chloroform is on her face, and over that a pillow on which are some dirty finger marks.

The police are informed of the tragedy, and Detective-Sergeant Ussher is sent from Scotland Yard to investigate.

Edward Stormont, the owner of Groudle Tower, and Lady Tarleton's brother-in-law, now arrives at Groudle with his friend Paul Jerome, a war-correspondent, and the following day Irene Tarleton comes in response to her mother's summons.

Dennis Hartigan is arrested on suspicion of causing his wife's death, but is soon released. He has a mysterious conversation with Lady Tarleton regarding the whereabouts of a child.

"If—if the child were no longer in my path," Lady Tarleton murmurs, "I would give ten thousand pounds—to the man who told me so."

She hands Hartigan a note for one hundred pounds.

"Think it well over," she says.

"I will, my lady," Hartigan answers.

On his way back to Groudle Tower Hartigan encounters his sister Kate. She mentions the song he had sung. Hartigan's eyes flash. The brother and sister reach a level crossing and are part way over when Dennis sees a train rounding the curve. Loosing his hold of his sister's arm, he springs over the wooden flooring of the crossing, saying:

"Stand there, you are quite safe!"

The blind girl stands between the metals, extending her hands gropingly; the ground is shaken by the vibrations of the oncoming express.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

NINTH CHAPTER.
Two Meetings and a Crossing.

Nearer and nearer came the thundering black mass of the locomotive, the afternoon sunlight glinting on its polished fittings and on the windows of the long train that swung behind it round the curve which opened to the level crossing. And the blind girl, frozen with terror, stood in its path, between the shining "metals" of the down line, aghast, shuddering, helpless.

The whistle of the locomotive shrieked—shrieked wildly, fiercely, in note after note of almost human warning, and the brakes ground on the flying wheels. She had been seen—too late!

A moment more and the train had shot by, its speed lessening, and the reversed wheels of the engine biting desperately at the rails. The driver and fireman stared each at the other, a wan smile of relief struggling through the terror on their rough visages.

For a wonderful thing had happened. Plunging almost under the buffers of the advancing train, a man and a horse had skimmed the gate of the crossing, bird-like and low, as the swallow flies before rain. There had been the hollow rattle of iron hoofs on the wooden planks of the crossing—audible above the clatter and rumble of the slowing express—and then horse and man were over the further gate and in safety.

The rider had leant in mid-career to snatch at the blind girl. As his gallant mount took the second leap, he lifted his own burden across the saddle in front of him.

In the lane beyond he eased his horse. The girl lay still and white, she had lost consciousness; the horse steadied itself into a hand-gallop. He spoke to it soothingly and pulled it up; it had broken into a lather of sweat. Nor could he marvel, he had roused it from a walk to hurl it, with whip and heel, at the double leap. It was a staunch, "flea-bitten white"; no Park hack used to hurdles, but a peerless old hunter. Paul Jerome, in all his wanderings, had never thrown leg over a better bit of horseflesh.

"By Jingo!" he exclaimed, pausing in his saddle to look at the woman he had just rescued, "what a pretty creature! And swooned; I thought as much!"

He dismounted carefully, flung a rein over his arm and lifted his burden to the soft turf of the wayside. A sigh burst from Kate Hartigan's lips and she sat up with an effort. The war-correspondent saw that she was sightless, and a great pity moved him.

"Don't be alarmed," he said; "you were lingering a trifle too long on the crossing, and as the gates were shut I had to jump my horse over them and whisk you out of danger rather unceremoniously."

The blind girl sprang to her feet.

"Oh!" she cried, "where is Dennis, then? He must be killed, killed by the train. Dennis! Dennis!" she moaned.

She buried her face in her palms. Paul Jerome studied her.

"If you mean the person who was with you," he replied, with a singular harshness in his voice, "you may make yourself easy. Mr. Dennis got over in perfect safety. He is doubtless behind us. I galloped some distance down the lane before pulling up. May I ask," added the war-correspondent, "Mr. Dennis' other name, and if he is a relative or only a friend?"

The blind girl dried the tears that were hanging on her lashes. "He is my brother," she answered; "his name is Dennis Hartigan. I am Kate Hartigan and I live with Mr. Davenal and his daughter at Hawthorn Cottage."

The war-correspondent suppressed an exclamation, and regarded her with a new interest. As he hesitated, looking at her, a hoarse cough sounded behind him, and he turned, but not so quickly as did Kate Hartigan. The blind girl had already flung herself into the arms of a short, squarely, built person, whose blue serge garments and tanned skin were redolent of the sea. Dennis Hartigan had overtaken them.

"Dennis! Dennis!" cried his sister; "I thought you were killed. Why—oh, why, did you leave me?"

The ex-steward glanced irresolutely at the war-correspondent. Paul Jerome patted, with an abstracted air, the flank of his horse.

"I—I don't know, Kit," the blind girl was told; "you see, I sort of lost my head and made a bolt for it. I'm—I'm not used to trains, you see, being, as you may say, a seaman."

He put her by and stepped towards the war-correspondent. "I can't find any words to thank you, sir," he faltered; "if—if it hadn't been for you, Kit would have been dead by now. It was a wonderful jump of yours, to be sure."

Paul Jerome met the speaker with a full and searching gaze. The ex-steward started. He had only just recognised the blind girl's rescuer.

"Not mine," he said coolly, "but this good brute's. Lucky for you, Mr.—Mr. Hartigan, that Mr. Stormont suggested my making the acquaintance of his old hunter. If I had been on a common hack, your unfortunate lack of presence of mind might have had very serious consequences."

The ex-steward's tan grew a shade less deep. "Losing your nerve's a queer thing, sir," he replied evasively; "but it's a mercy Kit's not a penny the worse. Poor lass, she's a bit flustered, though, and with many thanks to you, sir, I'll get her home."

He slipped his arm through his sister's. But the blind gir disengaged herself, an expression of disdain had flitted over her face.

"I'm quite well," she said petulantly; "besides, I told you not to come by the crossing, Dennis. And the train wasn't all that near us when you got frightened. It's very strange, I didn't think men ever got frightened."

Dennis Hartigan muttered an oath; but Kit had slipped away, and was stretching out a hand towards the white hunter.

"I want to pat the horse that did the jumping," she continued, "though my heart was in my mouth when I felt him come all on top of me."

The war-correspondent guided her tremulous fingers; they stroked the tall withers.

"And now I should like to know who you are," said the blind girl; "your voice is quiet and kind—you must be very brave. Did the engine hurt you?"

"Not in the least," rejoined the war-correspondent, "thanks to old Buckshot here; he was one too many for the iron-horse. My name, at your service, is Paul Jerome."

Kate Hartigan said it over to herself. "Thank you, Mr. Jerome," she added; "I shall remember you all my life, I am glad there are some brave men in the world."

Paul Jerome laughed, but the sun-burnt countenance of the ex-steward was distorted by a sudden vicious sneer. He moved off sulkily, and Kate Hartigan followed him. The war-correspondent bade her good-bye, and, springing to the saddle, cantered down the lane.

When he drew level with Dennis Hartigan, he motioned to him. The ex-steward came reluctantly to his stirrup. The war-correspondent's face set sternly, and he bent from his saddle.

"Hartigan," he said, "we have met before—last night in the hall at Groudle Tower. As I gather, you have just escaped from the clutches of the law. Now I chanced to see the whole of what happened at the crossing yonder, and you are either a most appalling coward or——"

He stopped, tapped the ex-steward on the shoulder with his riding switch, and then pointed with the same article to the blind girl, who had paused on the earthen side-walk to put up her disordered locks.

"The caution may be unnecessary," concluded Paul Jerome,

Digitized by Google

leaving his previous sentence ominously incomplete, "but if I were you, Mr. Hartigan, I would not let my sister come to any harm for the next little while. I shall not easily forget the way in which you abandoned her to her fate. Rather than panic it suggested, to my mind, deliberation."

The war-correspondent gathered up his reins. "A word to the wise," he added significantly, touched the white hunter with the whip, and trotted off without looking back.

At the head of the lane he met a couple of railway officials, hastening from the station hard by, to obtain some confirmation of the story that had been gasped out by the driver and fireman of the express. They stopped him politely and sought to question him. He put them off good-humouredly, minimised his exploit as much as might be, and rode back by the high-road to the Tower.

TENTH CHAPTER.

A Confession is Interrupted.

"I CAN'T lose her, I can't—Heaven knows I can't!"

John Davenal lifted his big, close-cropped head; it had been resting on his folded arms. The latter themselves were lying on the flap of an old-fashioned bureau, half chest of drawers, half writing-desk. The top drawer, pulled out and open, formed an escritoire, with pigeon-holes and smaller drawers at the back. All were filled with business and miscellaneous papers, laboriously folded and docketed; the diver was a methodical man.

The bureau stood by a polished bedstead of solid mahogany, turned and carved; its white sheets and chintz counterpane smelling of lavender. Fifty-year-old prints, in broad frames of light walnut, hung on the walls, in company with an elaborate sampler or two—scriptural subjects worked in coloured wools.

There were dimity hangings to the toilet-table, and muslin curtains with bright brass bars to the windows. One of the sashes was thrown up, the sea-air stole in, and the sound of the waves on the beach. The afternoon was far advanced and the tide was backing sleepily out, a sheet of shimmering, steely blue. John Davenal was alone with his thoughts.

The diver slid aside a flat, horizontal panel, and revealed a shallow well beneath. From it he took a small parcel and unfastened the pink ribbon that secured the packet. The contents were a tiny pair of soft red morocco shoes, a coral necklace, an ivory rattle with bells of thin silver, and a rippling golden curl like floss silk.

John Davenal gazed at them. "My little Moira," he murmured, his own broad dialect springing to his lips and making the words almost unrecognisable, save to a Cumbrian ear, "my pretty little lass! And thou wast a pretty little lass."

He fingered the eloquent trifles that lay before him. "The first pair of shoes I bought thee," he murmured; "the rattle thou'st forgotten long since, and the beads thou wast so proud of."

The diver brushed away a tear. "How I mind teaching her to call me daddy," he muttered huskily; "'twas a sweet lie on sweeter lips, and she took it for the truth."

He smote his great hand on the desk.

"But it's a lie!" he exclaimed; "a lie! I'm a childless man, trying to cheat Fate, and I can't do it. And she—she's a woman now, and her young heart's gone out like a bird to find its mate. I've lost her, lost her, that never was mine to keep."

John Davenal dashed his hand across his eyes, a girlish voice had floated up to him from below. It was Moira.

"Dad, dear," she called, "don't you want your tea?"

The diver went to the bedroom door and answered cheerfully in the affirmative. Then he returned to replace the pathetic mementoes in the well, closed and locked the panel, and descended.

Moira was putting a smart frilled silk cosy over the teapot that she had just filled from the steaming kettle on the hob, and there was a small pile of hot crumpets keeping hot before the fire. The slant afternoon sunbeams fell across the neat table from the window, the fresh green stalks and the blossoming flower-heads of the hyacinths on the board ledge basked in its rays.

The yellow glory shimmered on Moira's golden locks and made the delicate threads that would not be caught into her carefully-smoothed tresses like spun threads of the wandering precious metal. In a corner by the fire stood the tall frame with the panel of ribbon-work; the great spray of briar rose almost completed.

John Davenal moved heavily to his chair; the sight of the peaceful hearth and its dainty ministrant was unendurably bitter to him.

"Where's Kit?" he inquired. Moira shook her head as she set the crumpets on the table.

"I haven't an idea," he was told; "she went off somewhere a while ago. I said, 'Teatime soon, Kit'—you know, she hates to be asked where she's going, but she only said, 'Don't wait for me, there's a dear.' I expect she's going to pay some calls. Kit loves a gossip, and everyone is always glad to see her."

The diver wrinkled his brows. "Dear, dear," he exclaimed, "I'm not certain I wanted Kit to hear any gossip at the moment. You see, all Groudle will be talking about—about that business up at the Tower."

Moira poured him out a cup of tea and filled one for herself. "Oh, Kit isn't a child, dad," was her reassuring answer, "and I daresay people will be sensible and not talk about it too much."

John Davenal stirred his tea and gazed down into the mimic whirlpool produced by the spoon.

"Groudle folk," he retorted, "are magpies to talk and owls to think." There was a flash of irritation in the remark. "Perhaps I ought to have told you both," he added, "about what you are bound to know in the long run."

He hesitated, and twisted his spoon this way and that in his strong fingers. "Moira," he said, "my sister—your—your Aunt Hannah, that is, was married. She had been married for years and years, though few but I knew it. And who do you fancy her husband was?"

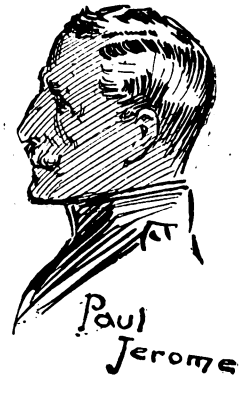
The girl's face was bent on him with a swift, feminine interest. "I couldn't guess, dad," she replied; "why I believe I never saw Aunt Hannah."

The diver took a hasty sip at his teacup. "Oh, yes, you did," he said; "when you were a little thing she came once or twice, but—but you wouldn't remember her, I doubt. However, that doesn't matter, you have seen her husband, and quite lately."

A singular embarrassment seemed to have fallen on John Davenal. He coughed and cleared his throat. "You'll be surprised," he continued, "and so will Kit—Kit especially, Moira. What do you say to Dennis Hartigan for—for an uncle?"

Moira started—then frowned—the diver saw the frown. "Mr. Hartigan," she exclaimed; "Mr. Hartigan Aunt Hannah's husband, and we never knew—Kit never knew!"

"No," assented John Davenal; "it was her wish and his. They as good as parted soon after they were married. He was a wild young chap, and she had a good situation—the marriage was a secret one and she hadn't left Lady Tarleton before she found out that Dennis wasn't what she thought him. So she sent him back to the sea and kept on as a lady's maid."



Moira pondered. "How very peculiar!" she commented, "but I should say Aunt Hannah was very wise—I couldn't fancy Mr. Hartigan being nice."

John Davenal stole a quick glance at her. "You wouldn't have liked him for a father, eh, my lass?" he queried. The girl shivered.

"Not for worlds," she replied. "It's quite bad enough to have him for an uncle—or a brother, as poor

Digitized by Google

Kit has. But there, I mustn't say that, for Kit is so fond of him, and so happy he has come home. She's been quite miserable because he hasn't been here yesterday or to-day."

The diver put down his spoon. "Moira," he said, "yon detective fellow, who came in here last night, and worried you about that chloroform-bottle, I saw him this morning and he knew all about Dennis and Hannah being married."

"Oh," responded Moira dubiously, "but I don't see what it has to do with us. But he was such a queer person; I couldn't make out what he wanted with the bottle, or how he came to know we had it."

John Davenal put a hand on hers. "Yes," he repeated, "and Mr.—Mr. What's-his-name—Mr. Ussher, said it was no use to him, now that no charge was being brought against Dennis."

Moira gasped. "No charge!" she murmured. The diver lowered his glance, his voice had been growing more and more husky and embarrassed.

"Aye," he assented, "they—they were saying in Groudle this morning that Hannah had been chloroformed to death."

"Chloroformed!" said Moira slowly, and there was a thrill of horror in her tone that struck the diver to the heart.

"But—but it isn't really thought now that—that Dennis did it," stammered the diver, "and, after all, lass, he—he is your—your—uncle, and you must try to think well of him. Many a man has been proved innocent that folks once believed guilty. Blood's thicker than water, Moira, and we must stand by our own."

Moira rested her soft chin in her palms, absorbed by a profound and tragic consideration.

"So that," she said, "was why the detective wanted the chloroform bottle. They believed that he had killed her. How horrible!"

John Davenal pushed back his chair. "Don't be over hasty, lass," he bade her, in a hard, constrained voice, "the stuff was bought in kindness to me, and signed for squarely in the book. No doubt that was how the police found out he'd had it."

"But I couldn't find the bottle," objected Moira, out of her reverie; "what if he took it away with him?"

The diver began to stir his tea again. "That can't be, lass," he told her drily, "for I put it by myself, and carried it up to Mr. Ussher this morning." Moira sighed, a sigh of relief.

"That settles it," she rejoined, "but what a strange coincidence, that Aunt Hannah should have been chloroformed, and Mr. Hartigan have bought some of the same stuff himself."

Moira started. "Oh, dad," she interrupted herself, "you're not eating a bite. Don't let us talk about the dreadful thing any more, you're making yourself ill again."

She slipped a crumpet on to his plate. Then an anxious expression sprang into her eyes.

"I do wish," she confessed, "that Kit would come back. It will upset her, won't it, to find out all this in a breath. And Mr. Hartigan not having been near us for two days will make her more anxious than ever. Poor Kit, she won't know what to think—how terrible if she were to—to believe him guilty, even for a moment. Oh, but she couldn't, she is too fond of him. I don't think, when you are very fond of anyone, that you can believe ill of them."

Moira coloured, and looked down at the shining steel bars of the ancient, homely fender.

"Dad," she pursued, "that reminds me, I—I want to tell you something. Something about myself." She paused, stole from her chair, and leant over him as he sat in his.

"Dad," she faltered, "you mustn't think I've been sly or—or afraid of your knowing. I didn't really know myself till—till quite lately. I suppose, if my mother had lived, I could have talked to her even before I was sure."

John Davenal drew a deep breath, but he said nothing. Moira put her cheek to his.

"Don't be angry, dad," she begged, "or—or sorry. I'm going to be your own little daughter just the same, and I believe I don't love him any better than you, only—only differently."

She stopped. The knob of the door outer had whined, and the tones of a man's and a woman's voices sounded in the tiny hall. They were those of Kate and Dennis Hartigan. An exclamation burst from the diver's lips, and he rose from his chair.

"It's them," he said in a hoarse murmur, "they may have met by chance—she may have heard nothing. Best be careful, lass."

Moira nodded, forgetting her interrupted confidence, and crossed to open the door. The ex-steward and his sister had lingered momentarily in the small ante-chamber without.

Kate Hartigan passed her brusquely into the kitchen, and went to the rear of the cottage to remove her hat and jacket. Dennis Hartigan followed loungingly. The diver met him.

"I—I know, Dennis," he said, in a low tone, "and so does Moira. We haven't told Kit—have you?"

The ex-steward shrugged his shoulders. "Not I," he responded, in the same fashion, and added aloud: "Give me something to wet my whistle, I'm as dry as a limekiln."

Moira moved towards the teapot, but he stayed her with an impatient gesture.

"No slops for me," he said. The diver muttered an apology, and himself had recourse to a cupboard whence he produced a bottle of whisky. The ex-steward picked up the steaming kettle, and mixed a glass of hot grog.

"The wind here's confoundedly cold," he observed, by way of explanation, as he tossed off a good third of the beverage, "and my nerves want screwing up—Kit and I had a narrow escape from being run down at the level-crossing."

"Kit!" cried Moira, "how frightened she would be! She hates trains."

"Do I?" Kate Hartigan asked calmly; "I suppose I do. But I couldn't help being frightened, you see. I'm not a man."

The blind girl had come back unperceived into the room. She sat down at the table, and Moira hastened to attend to her. Dennis Hartigan drank the rest of his grog and helped himself to a biscuit. The diver watched him, glancing occasionally from him to Moira, and from Moira to the ex-steward.

At last he forced himself to venture upon some commonplace remark, and the singular sense of strain that hung over the quartette lessened somewhat. John Davenal resumed his seat at the table and the meal proceeded.

When it was at an end, the diver rose, got his hat, and lit a pipe. "I'm in the mood for a stroll," he observed, "what do you say?"

"I've no objection," answered the other gruffly. He left the table, caught up his peaked cap, donned it, and put the end of a long cigar to John Davenal's briar. Then, side by side, they went out into the first of the gloaming.

Digitized by Google

Before they made their exit, John Davenal had turned his back to his companion, and, with a glance over his shoulder at the blind girl, caught Moira's eye, and laid his finger on his lip.

Moira understood. She was not to speak to the blind girl of the awful suspicion that had flung a transient shadow upon her brother. But the caution was not needed. Conversation was the last thing which Kit appeared to contemplate. Seating herself by the fire, she abandoned herself to silence and inaction. She scarcely seemed even to be thinking. Moira, too, was occupied with her own thoughts—she had realised suddenly that she had not told the diver who it was she loved—not better than himself, but yet "differently."

ELEVENTH CHAPTER.

A Spark and an Open Door.

"Excellent, excellent, you make me blush for my own wretched display. Shall we have another game, and make it a hundred-up this time?"

Irene Tarleton fished out of the dusty pocket of the antiquated billiard-table the ball she had just put down.

"You ought to blush for your duplicity, Mr. Jerome," she said. "I suppose you do play sometimes, instead of only pretending. But I don't mean to let you flatter me any more by doing it."

The war-correspondent put away the rest she had been using. "I'm out of form," he answered; "honestly I am. Besides, I think your style of playing is better suited to this table."

His fair antagonist laughed outright as she relinquished her own cue. "That is as much as to say," she retorted, "that I'm too much of an amateur to be bothered by this ghastly cloth. Well, to be frank, that last break was a series of sheer flukes."

She laughed again, her ripple of merriment sounding clearly in the great room, whose shaded gas-brackets struggled with the dying sunlight of the Spring day.

"Was it?" said Paul Jerome thoughtfully, and he rolled a ball to strike the opposite cushion. It rebounded, and after describing a complicated succession of angles, returned to the head of the table, and stopped by the red ball.

"Life is very like a billiard-table," he added, "only we don't know what is in the mind of Fate, when she gives us that little tap with the cue of destiny. If I had guessed, for instance, that my journey to the Balkans for the Gazette was to bring me round by Petersburg, Copenhagen, and Hull to the coast of Cumberland, and that here I should encounter you again, how much more contented I should have been."

"Would you?" murmured Irene. The war-correspondent drew a step closer to her.

"Would I?" he repeated. "Candidly, Miss Tarleton, I was horribly frightened sometimes out yonder. I ended by wanting to come back so badly that I was afraid of Fate playing me some nasty trick. When I went out first I rather hoped I might go under—I was only a Fleet Street hack who had bluffed his way into a post he might not be able to fill. And—and I had a certain heart-ache that warned me I was better out of England, if not out of existence."

He hesitated, contemplating her with a characteristic coolness. "But when I found I had made a hit," he went on, "and might come back somewhat more prosperous and rather less of a nobody than I had been, why, I got positively nervous. And when I was captured by the Turks——"

Irene Tarleton's gaze drooped. "I know," she said, "there were no dispatches of yours in the Gazette for a week. It was dreadful."

Paul Jerome leant on the table, in such a fashion that his hand was very close to Irene's. "Then you did think of me," he asked. Irene looked down.

"Of course," she answered, and added quickly, "you didn't imagine I could forget a friend, and especially a friend in danger?"

The war-correspondent winced. "N—no, I suppose not," he replied drily. The next instant he had caught up a cue and a rest, and was addressing himself to a difficult if impromptu stroke. Lady Tarleton had just entered.

"Ah, Irene, my dear," she said, "I have been wondering how you have been contriving to amuse yourself. The Tower is really too terribly dull for anything. We shall have Mr. Jerome beating a precipitate retreat to town."

"Not at all, Lady Tarleton," the war-correspondent assured her. "I find the old place extremely interesting, and Stormont has promised me some deep-sea fishing. Deep-sea fishing is my delight."

"As it used to be Stormont's," remarked Lady Tarleton, "before he took to running about in the heart of Asia and Africa. However, it seems to agree with him, and that's everything, is it not?"

She turned to her daughter.

"I'm afraid, Irene," she pursued, "that I must carry you off for the moment. I want you to write me some letters. Really, this unfortunate affair of poor Davenal has been engrossing me—that detective man simply haunts the Tower like an incarnate interrogation point. But I must try to attend to other matters, and you are such a sensible little secretary, my dear. So sorry to spoil your game, Mr. Jerome, but I think you will find Stormont in the neighbourhood of the stables."

Effusive, yet insistent, Lady Tarleton bore off her daughter, a significant glance had said more to Irene than was contained in her mother's spoken sentences. In her boudoir Lady Tarleton snapped at her daughter in a truly feminine fashion.

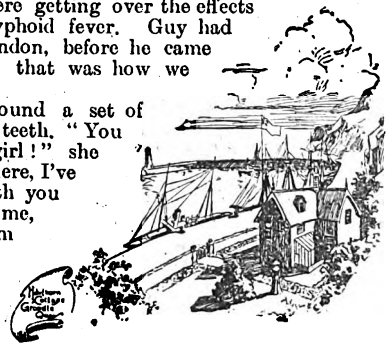
"Upon my word, Irene!" she exclaimed. "On a first acquaintance, you make yourself amazingly free with Mr. Jerome, who is nothing, after all, but a common newspaper person, without money or connections. It is just permissible for your uncle to be intimate with him, but you are not a wanderer on the face of the earth, an associate with gipsies and beggars."

Irene shrugged her shoulders. "Mr. Jerome, mamma," she responded crisply, "is very clever, very brave, and a thorough gentleman. What is more, he is a Society 'lion,' or will be, when he gets back to London. That is, if he lets himself be lionised, which he probably won't. But if it comes to that, he and I have met before—often."

Lady Tarleton stared. "Good Heavens, child!" she cried, "Where?"

Irene drew herself up, as if to brave the storm that spoke in her mother's voice.

"At Nice," she answered, "when we were there on Guy's yacht. He was there getting over the effects of an attack of typhoid fever. Guy had known him in London, before he came into the baronetcy, that was how we met!"



Her mother ground a set of still white and even teeth. "You reckless, deceitful girl!" she exclaimed, "but there, I've no time to deal with you now. But mark me, Irene, one symptom of sentimentality towards this Mr. Jerome, and I pack you off to your aunt's in Yorkshire. What would Guy think of you, if he knew?"

Digitized by Google

Irene made a wry mouth, but her eyes ran over with merriment. However she did not choose to take up more openly the gage of battle that her mother had thrown down, so she got pen, ink, and stationery, and settled down to write, from her mother's dictation, note after note, effusive but characterless.

Meanwhile, Paul Jerome, unconscious of the storm-cloud that had burst over Irene's head, was strolling, cigar in mouth, through the long avenue of Groudle Tower. He had failed to find his friend Stormont, and was pursuing the search with resignation, content to chew the cud of his thoughts, cultivate an appetite for dinner, and await the advent of the meal, when he should see Irene again.

Yet, as he strolled and pondered, his reflections were fairly equally divided between Irene Tarleton and the little blind girl whom he had rescued that afternoon from a horrible death. "I am Kate Hartigan," she had said, "and I live with Mr. Davenal and his daughter at Hawthorn Cottage," so she was Dennis Hartigan's sister, and it was Dennis Hartigan who had been arrested by Ussher on suspicion of Hannah Davenal's murder, it was Dennis Hartigan who had so deliberately deserted the blind girl on the level crossing, two hundred yards from an advancing express.

The war-correspondent frowned, he had been a "crime special" in the days of his reporterhood, and his trained scent suggested to him that he was on some kind of a trail. Should he follow it? It would be something to do for a day or two at hours when he could not see or speak to Irene. Besides, it would amuse him to best the blundering Ussher once more, as he had bested him in the old Fleet Street days.

As he smiled at the recollection he was aware of the swift, rhythmic beat of a well-broken team, and looked up. A high phaeton was nearing him through the quiet fall of the pleasant evening. There was still plenty of light, and he saw the face of the driver in the same moment as the latter perceived him. The phaeton stopped, and the war-correspondent sprang forward.

"My dear Vanbrugh!" he cried.

"My dear Jerome!" exclaimed the person addressed, and, giving the reins to his groom, Sir Guy Vanbrugh leapt out of the phaeton and seized Paul Jerome by the hands.

"This is an unexpected pleasure," he said. "What on earth brings you into these outlandish parts? Are you on a walking-tour?"

The war-correspondent returned the cordial salutation as cordially.

"I struck up a friendship with Mr. Stormont in Petersburg," he answered. "We travelled home together, both ultimately bound for London. He wanted to revisit Cumberland, and I was, for the moment, on a loose end. So here I am, renewing my acquaintance with your charming cousin and making that of her mamma."

Guy Vanbrugh laughed. "Yes," he said, "you're quite a notable now. My hearty congratulations! Not that I was surprised to hear of your successes—I always knew you had it in you. But I am keeping you."

"Not at all," rejoined the war-correspondent, "I was thinking of retracing my steps; I have only been looking for an appetite."

The other turned to his groom. "Drive on up the avenue," he instructed, "we will walk."

The man obeyed, the baronet slipped his arm into that of the war-correspondent, and they strolled on together.

"Excuse this expedient to get a moment alone with you," observed Guy Vanbrugh, "but you mentioned my cousin Irene. Now I wouldn't be impertinent for worlds, but I am going to risk taking something sufficiently for granted to drop you a hint. If Lady T. as she may do, thinks fit to tell you a 'secret' about Irene and myself, don't pay any attention to it, there's a good chap. Irene and I are merely chums; to—to be honest, my affections are engaged elsewhere, and she knows it, and, I believe, is confoundedly glad of it. But we're keeping Lady T. in the dark, for the sake of peace."

Paul Jerome smiled. "You're an awfully decent fellow, Vanbrugh," he replied, "and there isn't much wrong with your eyesight. I'm glad you told me. Thanks, very much!"

"Oh, that's all right," said his companion, embarrassed, "by the bye, to change the subject, I believe there has been some sort of a tragedy up at the Tower. One of the servants, they say!"

"Yes," answered the war-correspondent, "Lady Tarleton's maid, an elderly woman, was found dead in bed, chloroformed and smothered. An old police butt of mine has the case in hand, an amiable blunderer named Ussher, a London man. He is most amusingly bothered. I am half inclined to solve the mystery myself, and wipe Ussher's eye, not for the first time."

As they talked, Guy Vanbrugh had turned their steps down a narrower path that wound, cutting off a corner, to the Tower entrance. Penetrating a dense shrubbery, it had brought them within sight of a low stone building, domed and windowless, and set in a species of grassy basin. The basin was incircled by stone uprights and chains, and entered by a flight of stone stairs.

"What is that place?" asked the war-correspondent. Guy Vanbrugh answered him absently.

"That," he said, "oh, that is the family mausoleum—generations of Lennoxes lie there in their last sleep."

"Lennoxes?" repeated Paul Jerome, questioningly.

"Yes," rejoined Guy Vanbrugh, "Stormont's wife was a Lennox, Lady Tarleton is a Lennox. Stormont enjoys for life the Lennox estates and fortune. But as for the mausoleum it has not been opened for many a long year."

"Hasn't it?" queried the war-correspondent drily, "well, it's open now."

He pointed to a door that had been brought into sight by their onward progress. It was a low and massive portal, giving access to the lightless interior of the mausoleum. And against the blackness flickered a yellow spark, like a stricken match. While they looked, it went out.

(The explanation of the light will appear next Tuesday.)

Fred: "They tell me at your office that you are only one of the clerks. And you said you were a director." Charles: "So I am. I address envelopes."

Landlady (meeting Mr. Growler on the stairs): "Singing in the morning? Don't you know it's unlucky to sing before breakfast?" Mr. Growler: "It may be, but somehow I never feel like singing after breakfast."

Fashionable Mother (languidly): "Well, Sarah, how is baby to-day?" Nurse: "He cut two teeth this morning, ma'am." Fashionable Mother (still more languidly): "That was careless of you, Sarah! You oughtn't to let a young baby play with a knife."

"Bobby is attending to his pianoforte lessons very faithfully of late," said the youth's uncle. "Yes," replied his mother. "I don't have any trouble with him about that now." "How did you manage it?" "Some of the neighbours complained of the noise his exercises made, and I told him about it. Now he thinks it's fun to practise."

"I'm dreadfully afraid that Cousin Jasper's wife is an awful gadabout," said Mrs. Brown to her husband after a visit to her wealthy relative in the City. "Why, mother?" "Well, she has her name printed on cards, and in the corner it says 'Tuesdays.' And I asked her what it meant, and she said that was her day at home. Think of it! Only home one day in the week!"

Digitized by Google

FOR HIS SAKE!

The Story of How a Girl's Devotion Saved Her Lover.

Containing the Incident Depicted on the Cover.

META RAYNES was a typewriter girl, and lived at the top of an old-fashioned building in a central part of London.

Perhaps it was a lonely life for a girl, but Meta had grown accustomed to being by herself, and being of a sweet and sunny disposition, she contrived to find compensations even in her hard working existence.

She loved her big "garret," as she called it, and as indeed it was. She had made it cosy and homelike with a curtain across it to screen away the bedroom side, and with cheap rugs, a few pictures, some books, and a comfortable chair or two had really managed to make for herself a charming den.

If she loved the inside of her room, she loved even more the outlook from its window. Standing there she could see for miles across the roofs and towers of London; she could look down into the green trees of a square close by, and she could gaze upon a tall church tower that rose heavenward opposite her window, and she had learnt to have quite a friendly feeling for a gargoyle with a ferocious dog's head that jutted out in her direction.

But her Sundays were the last and greatest compensation of her otherwise lonely life, for on Sundays she could meet Jack Melville—Jack, her handsome young lover—who was working so hard to make a home for them both!

On a heavenly Sunday in May they were strolling slowly across a deserted corner of Richmond Park, enjoying the loveliness around them, when Jack exclaimed suddenly:

"Meta, I believe those two bounders whom I call by courtesy my chiefs have a regular down on me. Just lately they have done their very best to provoke and irritate me in every possible way."

Meta started violently, and Jack, who held her hand, felt the movement, and looked round at her.

"Why did you——" he began; but she interrupted him.

"I—I think I can guess why they don't like you, Jack," she said fast and nervously. "I told you, didn't I, that both your chiefs, Mr. Daubeny and his brother, Mr. George Daubeny, have given me a quantity of work lately?"

Jack nodded.

"Well," she went on in a lower voice, "they—oh! Jack—I didn't mean to tell you—I was afraid you might be angry, but I—they—I mean——"

"What do you mean?" Jack stopped dead and looked hard at the girl.

"I mean," Meta answered, averting her face to hide the burning blushes that swept over it, "I think perhaps they are nasty because they know—I am engaged to you!"

"They haven't been rude to you—they haven't insulted you?" Jack demanded fiercely, so fiercely that for a moment she repented of having told him anything.

"Not rude, Jack," she said, "and don't look at me so angrily. I have done nothing I am ashamed to tell you, dear." Meta turned back to him and laid her arms about his neck. "You are my whole world—you have my whole heart; I only did not tell you about those horrid men because I did not want to make you angry, as you are in their office."

Jack's fierce looks melted into a smile; he drew his betrothed closer to him.

"They are utter cads!" he said scornfully, "and I sometimes think George Daubeny is on the verge of lunacy; he is a cranky creature! Tell me, have they dared to admire you?"

"I have often had to go to their house about work," the girl continued; "they live together, you know. They have given me quantities and quantities of typewriting, as I told you, Jack; and then, lately, each of them in turn has asked me to marry him, and has worried me to do it. Of course I refused—refused with scorn. Perhaps I was too scornful, but I hate them both—I hate them! They remind me of reptiles, crawling, loathsome reptiles."

"But do they know you and I——" Jack began, and the girl again broke in.

"Oh! Jack, I couldn't help telling the elder Mr. Daubeny. He has always been the worst. He has almost persecuted me; and at last one day, when he insisted on walking home with me, and had worried me until I was nearly distracted, I turned on him and exclaimed: 'For pity's sake leave me alone! I am betrothed to a man whose little finger is more to me than your whole body, even if he is only a clerk in your office. What are you to me beside Jack Melville?'"

"That was not wise, dear."

"Jack, I know, I know! The moment I had said it, the moment I saw the awful look of baffled rage and malice on his face, I repented of my folly. But it was too late. I heard him mutter under his breath: 'Melville shall pay for this!' and ever since I have been dreading, dreading—I know not what."

Her voice was so strained, so anxious, that her lover tried to laugh away her fears.

"My dear child, it is all right," he said, "don't look so anxious. They can only make things a bit unpleasant for me; they can't do any real harm."

"But supposing—oh, Jack, supposing they hurt you?"

"Hurt me? My darling, don't be afraid. This is the twentieth century, not the twelfth; men don't go about hurting one another nowadays. Bless you, don't worry your pretty head about it. I should like to kill those two cads for persecuting you, that's all!" He spoke viciously, and his face grew so dark that Meta shivered. "Not that it is surprising that anyone should admire you, my darling," he added vehemently.

And indeed Meta was very fair to look upon. Slight and very graceful, she made you think of a tall white lily, and the likeness was emphasised by the exquisite whiteness of her skin, and her glorious crown of golden hair.

Her eyes, blue as forget-me-nots, looked wistfully into Jack's as they moved slowly onwards; and he drew her again into his arms, and kissed her tenderly, with the words:

Digitized by Google

"No wonder they think you are throwing yourself away on a poor beggar like me; my beautiful queen!"

"Throwing myself away!" she answered impetuously, her face suddenly transfigured with love, "did I not say you were my world? What is all the rest of the world to me in comparison with you? Less than the dust under my feet! There is nothing I would not give up for you, Jack, and nothing would be too hard for me to do—for your dear sake."

* * * * *

A week later Meta stood on the doorstep of the Daubenys' house, a parcel of typewriting in her hand. Most gladly would she have refused to do more work for the two brothers who had persecuted her, but such a refusal would have been suicidal for her. Work was infinitely precious, and to offend the two brothers, joint heads of an important firm, would have been madness.

Still it was with white face and fast-beating heart that Meta waited on the doorstep on that sunny May morning.

It seemed to her an interminable time before the door was opened, and when it swung back at last, Meta recoiled before the changed and ghastly expression on the butler's face.

It was the colour of ashes; and he was shaking in every limb.

"Is something wrong?" the girl asked abruptly.

"Lor', miss, ain't you heard?" the man answered in a whisper, glancing fearfully over his shoulder; "though how could you have heard; it's only just took place. Master—Thomas Daubeny—is, has been—oh, lor'! miss, it's something awful!"

By this time Meta's own limbs were shaking; she grasped at the lintel of the door to steady herself.

"What is it?" she said. "Has something happened?"

"Something happened?" The man looked at her with dazed eyes. "Why, yes, miss—ain't you heard? Mr. Thomas has been murdered—murdered in the office this morning by one of his own clerks."

"Murdered!" Meta's voice was high and thin, it no longer seemed to be her own. "Who did it? Why did they kill him? Tell me quickly," and hardly knowing what she did, she gripped the butler's arm and shook it.

"They do say it was all to do with a woman," the man answered, recovering some of his equanimity in the pleasure of telling his story, "though who the woman is nobody knows. But the murderer, he's been took up, and Mr. George, he——"

An arm suddenly thrust the butler aside, and the younger Daubeny appeared behind him,

"Come in, Miss Raynes," the young man said, and Meta, even in that moment of dismay, found herself wondering whether the note in his voice was one of triumph or of horror.

"Come in, I will tell you." He put out his hand and drew her through a door opening from the hall.

This was his brother's private study, the room in which Meta had been accustomed to receive his orders, and it looked so normal, so ordinary, that the girl speculated with a shudder whether the terrible news she had heard could possibly be true.

"Your brother!" she faltered, looking into George Daubeny's evil face; "it is not true that——"

"It is perfectly true that he has been murdered—foully murdered!" was the answer, given in an even voice which still held that something in it of triumph—or was it horror?

"And shall I tell you who killed him?" The man she loathed drew nearer to her and laid a heavy hand on her arm.

"My brother was killed," he said slowly and emphatically, "by your lover, Jack Melville."

Tearing herself from his hold, Meta drew back from him, and looked him full in the face, with gleaming eyes and proudly uplifted head.

"It is a lie!" she said; "the sort of lie that a cur like you would tell! Jack Melville is not the kind of man who is a murderer."

For a second the flashing of her eyes, the indignant scorn on her face seemed to cow the man before her. Then he recovered himself and laughed, harshly, wildly.

"A lie is it, my pretty dear?" he said recklessly. "A jury will decide that question. Your fine lover is safe in the hands of the police. My brother was stabbed—stabbed in the back with a knife bearing Jack Melville's name upon it. Your lover is doomed!"

Meta's face grew ashen white; she swayed a little where she stood; then controlled herself by a supreme effort, drew herself up to her superb height, and waved her hand with a haughty gesture to the man who barred her way to the door.

"Let me pass," she said; "do you think you can frighten me? Do you think the woman who loves him would ever believe that Jack Melville stabbed a man in the back? Tell your story to the jury; let fifty judges condemn the man I love—but I know—I shall always know—that his innocence is as clear as the day!"

The July sunshine poured into Meta Rayne's window. She stood there listlessly, looking out at the dusty green of the trees and the tall church tower with eyes that saw none of them.

Only one vision danced before them—morning, noon and night—the vision of a prisoner in the dock, whose eyes had met hers across the crowded court, whose voice had said firmly: "Not guilty, my lord." Whose face had seemed to her, as it had always seemed—the purest and noblest in the world.

To-morrow the jury would give their verdict; the verdict, the world said, was absolutely certain beforehand; Jack Melville would be condemned to death. Meta, standing alone in her room, clenched her hands in a very agony of impotent longing, impotent despair, and dropping her face against the window pane, she moaned aloud:

"Oh! God, if I could help him, if there is a way in which I can help him, let me find it! Give me something to do for his sake!"

The words had scarcely left her lips when the door opened softly, and George Daubeny stole into the room, an expression of such fiendish malice on his face as made Meta shrink terrified from him.

A sudden recollection swept over her of Jack's words, spoken in Richmond Park only so few weeks ago: "I sometimes think George Daubeny is on the verge of lunacy." The wild eyes, the strange gestures of her unwelcome visitor, made Meta wonder with a strange contraction of fear at her heart whether George Daubeny was mad now?

His conduct went far to justify her fears. Without speaking a word of greeting, he walked swiftly to the window, and, scarcely noticing her except to bestow upon her a demoniacal smile, he leant far out, his gaze fixed upon the church tower.

Then he turned to her and spoke rapidly.

"So your fine lover is guilty—no doubt of that, is there? No doubt, no doubt!"—he laughed wildly—"verdict to-morrow, you know," he nodded his head frantically; "and sentence—sentence—we all know what that will be—ha—ha—'hang by the neck—until——'"

"Hush—hush!" Meta cried passionately.

"Not so fast," he answered, gripping her hand in his own that burnt feverishly; "I say 'hang by the neck,' that's the sentence—unless—you—step in and save him!"

"I?"

"Yes—you—my lovely white lily. Give me a kiss and I'll tell you how you can do it."

Digitized by Google

Seizing her roughly, he pressed a kiss on her cheek, then almost flung her from him, as she shuddered and cried out:

"That's it, spurn your best friend, perhaps I won't tell you now how to save your precious lover."

"Ah! tell me, tell me!" she said, her hands going out in a pitiful gesture; "I will do anything for his sake."

"Anything? Will you? Look out there!"—he dragged her to the window—"see that gargoyle with the dog's head?"

Meta assented.

"There is a letter in that stone dog's mouth," he said impressively; "that letter will give you the name of my brother's murderer! Ha! ha! ha!"

"A letter there? Your brother's murderer. Then you know—you know who did it?"

"I know—I know!"—a demoniacal laugh broke from him and echoed wildly round the room—"it is my secret, mine, mine—and you must hunt for it in the dog's mouth, ha—ha!"

"You know, yet you have let Jack——" Her voice failed, as the madman laughed afresh, flung his arms into the air, shouted, "go and look for yourself—the secret is there"—and, first pointing dramatically towards the window, he next flung himself across the room and rushed precipitately through the door and downstairs.

Meta, too dazed and terrified to follow him, stood still for a moment, then she leant far out of the casement, craning her neck and straining her eyes, until all at once she exclaimed:

"He may be mad, but he has said one true thing; there is a letter in the dog's mouth. Ah! if his words should be true! If they should be true! Jack—my Jack, I will do it for your sake!"

* * * * *

Slowly and carefully Meta climbed the narrow winding staircase of the tower. By dint of coaxing and bribing the old verger had allowed her to go up the stairs, and she wound her way up and up, pausing now and again to look out of the wide openings in the wall to the dizzy depths below.

Presently the stairs came to an abrupt end, she was confronted by a blank wall, whilst on her right hand gaped one of those wide openings that gave upon the outside world.

Clutching at the wall, she leant out. Below her she dared not look. A few feet from her, round to the left, she could see the gargoyle, jutting out over space. She shrank back and shivered, shutting her eyes because of the awful giddiness that seized her.

"I cannot do it—I cannot!" she moaned.

That moment's glimpse had shown her that to reach the gargoyle, she must climb out of the opening on to a narrow parapet that ran round the spire, and reach from that to the corner of the buttress from which the gargoyle's long body sprang.

"It is impossible," she said again, and then suddenly she stood upright and opened her eyes.

"I must try," she said; "it is Jack's life! I can but make the attempt, if I fail—I fail; but I must try for his sake."

Sick with horror, her head dizzy and swimming, she crawled out of the opening on to the narrow parapet without. So tightly did her hands cling to the few stones that jutted out of the wall that the blood dripped from them, but she did not heed it. Keeping her head erect, lest for a moment she should see the ghastly gulf below her, she kept on—and on to the angle from which the gargoyle jutted.

It was a narrow enough angle in all conscience, but compared with that awful parapet it seemed wide—almost safe; and Meta leant for a moment against the wall to take breath. Once, only once her eyes glanced downwards, and a shiver ran through her.

The roofs, the trees, the towers that lay far below for one wild moment rocked and swung before her eyes; she shut them closely and gripped more firmly at the slab of stone till her equilibrium returned. Then she began the most perilous part of her terrible adventure.

Flinging one arm as far as she dared along the body of the stone dog, she dragged her own body forward—forward—forward towards the gargoyle's mouth, half hanging over the abyss, half pressed against the stone beast.

Would she reach its mouth? Could she ever reach it, or would she, in the act of doing so, overreach herself—slip and fall—and fall into those dizzy, seething depths below.

"God help me—for his sake!" she cried aloud in her agony, and, pulling herself one step further, she put out her right hand once more.

Her hand had touched the letter!

Hardly daring to breathe she drew it from the dog's mouth, and slowly, slowly, with infinite caution, dragged herself back to the angle, every nerve at highest tension, every muscle taut and strained.

She dared not pause in her backward path; she did not rest even for a second in that friendly angle, but crept back, back along the parapet, fearful lest a moment's delay should bring on a paralysis of fear.

And at last, when, trembling in every limb, she crept in again at the wide opening of the tower, it was only to sink down upon the steps, white and unconscious, the letter clasped closely in her hand.

Jack Melville's life was saved. The letter was the confession of the true murderer, another clerk in the office, who on his own death-bed had written the confession and confided it to George Daubeny.

Whether that wretched man had intended to give it to Meta, or whether he divulged the secret unintentionally, will never be known. His reason never returned to him. It was believed that he had himself put the letter into the gargoyle's mouth, but even this fact was never known.

Months went by before Meta recovered from the shock of her awful climb, and though she is now a happy wife, the many grey threads in her golden hair are signs of what she endured during the terrible moments when, as she says, "I hung between Heaven and earth, to save my Jack. I could only have done it for his sake."

L. G. Moberly.

Result of the "Cats" Competition.

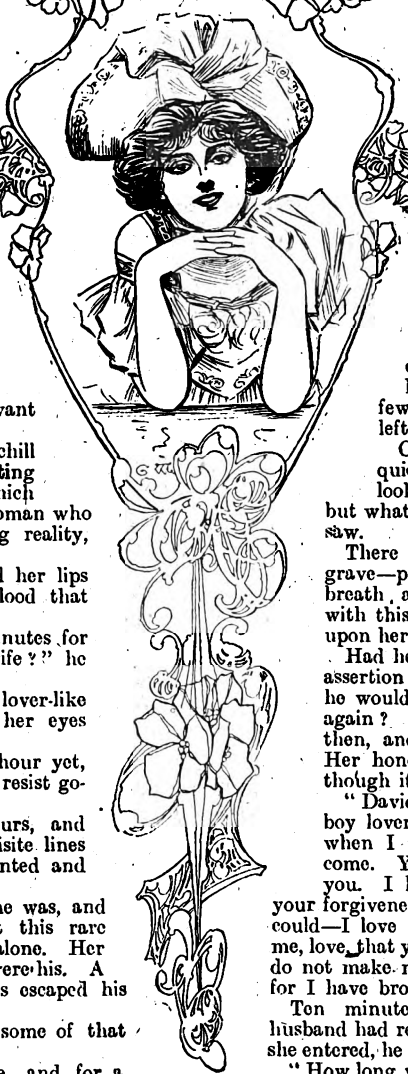
The Gramophone prizes have been awarded as follows:

E. Gillespie, 10 Wellington Street, Salford, Manchester; Mrs. R. Fuller, 1 Camden Park, Tunbridge Wells, Kent; S. J. Kyberd, 140 Belgrave Road, Hoe Street, Walthamstow; C. Renshaw, Birtle Vicarage, Bury, Lancashire; J. Bradley, 1 St. John Street, Felling-on-Tyne; H. King, 1 Thomas Street, St. Paul, Bristol; Mrs. Howard Watson, The Vicarage, Water Orton, near Birmingham; J. Winfield, 11 Whitehaugh Terrace, Paisley, N. B.; G. H. Barnes, 244 Waterloo Road, Hightown, Manchester; Mrs. Judd, St. Monica, Whitton Road, Twickenham; W. F. Dray, 289 High Street, Lewisham; J. Higton, Hollywell Farm, South Wingfield, Alfreton, Derbyshire; T. M. Loughnan, 24 Mount Pleasant Square, Dublin; H. James, 17 Beach Street, Swansea; Mrs. H. Wyatt, 9 Grange Street, Leigh, Lancashire; H. J. Lewis, 3 The Buildings, Bathampton, near Bath; W. Eggleton, 106 Westbourne Street, Hove, Sussex; W. Webster, 131 Thomson Street, Dennistoun, Glasgow; G. Q. Waters, 75 Court Road, Barry Dock; F. Evans, 11 Briscoe Road, Colliers Wood, Merton, S.W; J. Curtis, 10 Park Street, Griffithstown; H. C. Millen, 77 Rye Hill Park, Peckham Rye; A. Herbert, 16 Whitworth Street, Stanley Grove, Longsight, near Manchester; F. Hepton, 28 Upper Market Street, Woolwich; A. G. Snook, 90 Milkwood Road, Herne Hill.

TURN NOW TO PAGE 399. ☛

Digitized by Google

Out of the Past.



When Absence Did Not Make the Heart Grow Fonder.

THE great creaking iron gate swung upon its hinges, there was a light yet decided footstep along the pathway to the house, and then the merry tinkle of a bell sounded.

To the man inside, the tuneful melody acted as magic. He rose hastily and opened the door before a servant could do so.

As he opened the door he felt the chill rush of winter air, and caught a fleeting glimpse of the deep, smouldering sky which formed a crimson background for the woman who was his divinity, a beautiful, breathing reality, radiant with love and life.

As he drew her into the house he kissed her lips and cheeks, her hair, and the scarlet blood that coloured her cheeks turned a ruddier hue.

"I have been waiting thirty long minutes for you. Where have you been, my sweet wife?" he added tenderly.

The tone was one of reproof, but the lover-like reproach was dear to her. She lifted her eyes with a half laughing plea in them.

"I didn't expect you home for an hour yet, and the air was so tempting I could not resist going out."

He watched her throw aside her furs, and admired for the hundredth time the exquisite lines of her figure. The bright, gold hair glinted and sparkled against the deep purple toque.

He thought how surpassingly lovely she was, and realised with a thrill of emotion that this rare woman was his. She belonged to him alone. Her mind and heart, her beauty and her soul were his. A sigh of great contentment and happiness escaped his lips.

"Come and sit by the fire, and take some of that Arctic atmosphere off," he said, laughing.

She sat beside him on the oaken settle, and for a while neither spoke, resting in the quiet of perfect harmony, and watching the idle play of the flames as they darted hither and thither. The evening paper lay at his feet, and with a laugh she picked it up.

"Now," she said, "I will read you all the news—war, society, politics—which will you have?" And he, content with the mere sound of her voice, murmured, "Anything."

"Then it will be war," she declared. "for that will be the only way we will ever have any experience about the subject."

She read aloud a few items, and then her eyes wandered slowly down the list of wounded and killed.

"David Hathaway." She got no further. "David Hathaway!" her heart echoed, and then suddenly the whole brutality and fierceness and horror of war seemed to close down upon her and stifle her heart beats. The paper slipped from her hand like an animate thing.

"I must go upstairs," she said, "and re-arrange my hair for dinner."

Something, he knew not what, that rang in her voice, prompted him to turn and look at his wife, but she was shielding her face from the firelight with one white hand.

The slender fingers hid her eyes, and cast her face into shadow; thus protected he could tell nothing of the emotions which were surging through her. She rose abruptly, and, with a few words, promising to return soon, she left the room.

Once in her room she shut the door quietly, and then walked to the window and looked out upon the dull purple twilight; but what lay before her eyes was not what she saw.

There rose before her mental vision a lonely grave—perhaps a mere trench—sharing the last breath and sigh of David Hathaway. And with this picture the knowledge was born in upon her that it was of her own doing.

Had he not left her five years ago with the assertion upon his lips that come what might he would win fortune or die before he saw her again? And she had promised to wait until then, and she had broken her faith, her vow. Her honour had been killed just as surely as though it had been struck by bullets.

"David!" she whispered huskily, "my brave boy lover, I thought it was the end a year ago, when I married, but now the end has really come. You are dead, and I cannot mourn for you. I have wronged you, and I can only ask your forgiveness, for I would not change things if I could—I love my husband. I was lonely—lonely—tell me, love, that you understood how it all happened, and do not make me feel as if I should be the one to die, for I have broken faith, and you have not!"

Ten minutes later she went downstairs. Her husband had reinstated himself by the fire, and, when she entered, he said:

"How long you have kept me waiting. I was just thinking of coming upstairs, to see whether anything had happened to you. It seemed for ever, although I have been trying to occupy the time in reading. By the way, I see the death notice of David Hathaway. He got killed by a stray bullet during a skirmish with the followers of the Mad Mullah. It was a very sad case. Curiously enough, I met his brother in the street yesterday, and he buttonholed me for a loan. Wanted to bring back David's wife and child. They went out a few months ago to join him; he had just begun to get together what promised to be a prosperous trading business when this disturbance occurred, and as he knew the country very well, he joined the forces as a scout. The wife and child are left almost destitute."

She clutched the arm of the chair. "How long had he been married?" she asked.

"Oh, two years, I believe, poor fellow!"

And then a great cloud lifted from her shoulders and vanished for ever; and the exoneration she longed for came.

Charles Orford.

Digitized by Google

A GOOD MATCH.

The Love Story of a Writer and an Actress.

THE season was drawing to a close, and already the earlier birds had departed; the tourist was beginning to crop up in strange localities, and the British lodging-house keeper sniffing the battle afar off, to prepare for war with her natural enemies, the visitors, groups of whom I found scattered about Euston Station as I comfortably ensconced myself in the corner of a carriage bound for Staverton Towers.

A very few months back, Clement Sandering, with whom I was going to stay, had been living in town on a comparatively small income, which he had augmented in a somewhat desultory way, by literary work.

He had written a novel, a successful comedy, an endless variety of articles on an endless variety of subjects, and was looked on as rather a rising man. Probably he had never heard of Staverton Towers, when one morning, amongst the letters and papers which burdened his table, was a note from a firm of lawyers in the City to tell him that the Towers, and a rather extensive property in Meadshire, belonged to him.

Sandering had met with such things in the realms of fiction, and the intimation seemed rather like the foundation of a plot for a novel than a real and veritable possibility. It was true, however; a distant relative of the late owner had died childless in Paris, and within a very short time Sandering had resigned his chambers and left town.

In the former days I had vaguely hovered during the season round a certain Gertrude Leigh, Sandering manifesting a slight disposition to admire her sister Bell.

All this was entirely hopeless, for there was not the very remotest chance of old Sir Thomas consenting, even if the girls had wished it; and Lady Leigh would probably have had fits if the subject had been mentioned to her.

The affair was not very serious on my part, nor, as I think, on Sandering's, though some of his heroines bore a suspicious resemblance to the fair Bell; but, then, one must get his heroines from somewhere, for pictures painted without models are seldom satisfactory.

Circumstances alter cases, however, and his circumstances had very materially altered the case. Since his accession he had been in Paris, where I knew the Loighs were also staying, and though his letters had not said anything particularly pointed, it was evident that they were much together, and only natural to suspect that something would come of it—the usual something.

Immediately on his return he had written to ask me down; there was no one with him, he said, and if I had work to do it would be much quieter than the chambers; so taking a heap of paper to try to ease a conscience which demanded industry, and secretly resolving to do nothing but lie under the trees and smoke, I started, anxious to see Sandering, in case his bachelor days were soon to be ended; for marriage sometimes alters a man very considerably, and a young wife has not always an enthusiastic affection for her husband's bachelor friend.

He met me at the station, and we drove through some of the prettiest scenery in Meadshire to the Towers, which was a very fine old house.

After dinner we retired to a small room to smoke, and discuss all that had happened since we last met.

"And how are things theatrical?" he asked, when he had given me details of his journeying.

"Much as they were when you left, I think; and, in one way, as they will be always. The good pieces pay; the bad ones don't. All the same, I suppose we are to understand that the drama is declining?"

"That's a very silly cry," Sandering answered. "There are plenty of good actors, and plenty of good plays. I don't mean to say that the whole thing is in a perfectly satisfactory state.

"A number of gentlemen, and some ladies, adopt the profession now, and study it; but many fellows go on the stage with the idea that the art of acting can be learnt any morning before breakfast, and, under the impression that "ease" is the great requisite, behave in drawing-rooms with the sort of ease that City clerks exhibit in their favourite liquor-shops."

"But there is a bigger blot on the stage than what old actors call the "cuff-shooters." Look in the photograph shop windows," I replied.

"Yes, at the—those—the—well, the 'popular actresses.' Popular actresses—my stars! As you know, I am very far from being a straight-laced moralist, but to see long rows of ogling creatures, whose modesty is as scant as their attire, labelled 'Popular Actresses,' is a little too much; and men who have the interest of the stage at heart ought to protest vigorously."

I could only assent.

"Why do these sort of persons go on at all?" continued Sandering, who evidently felt the subject deeply. "From vanity, generally, or some reason other than the making of small salary, or a desire to learn the profession.

"Either they want the money, or they don't want it; in one case they have no business on the stage, and in the other the less business they have there the better. I speak, of course, of the "shop-window actresses,' and it is for the sake of the gentlewomen who are really actresses that I am so indignant."

"It's a rough sea and a difficult voyage, but how bravely some little girls weather the storm. For instance the young lady—for she was a young lady, although she had been doomed to wear something like the costume of an acrobat—who played Mary in your comedy," I said.

Sandering rose slowly from his chair, and leant against the mantelpiece, smoking thoughtfully.

"Miss—what was her name?" I continued. "You seemed much struck by her once, and that is why she was taken from the ranks to play the part, I presume. Miss Burton—that's it. I suppose you have forgotten all about her, now?"

"No," he slowly replied, with a somewhat troubled face; "I have thought a good deal of her—and a good deal less of myself in consequence."

I looked at him inquiringly.

"I was struck with her, as you say, and told her so, and used to take her about to afternoon performances and that sort of thing; and gave her the part in the comedy, as you know."

Digitized by Google

"Which was quite as much to your advantage as to hers, for she played it charmingly," I interrupted.

"She did, certainly. Well, I used to take her about, and got to like her, awfully. After a time she seemed to grow shy about it—wouldn't come always when I wanted her to, and I was vexed and couldn't understand it.

"One evening, when she was out of an engagement, I wanted to take her to the opera, and she made an excuse, and so I asked her about it. She said, 'Of course I'd like to go with you every day, dear, only you know how particular I have to be, and if we are always together, people will talk and wonder where——' I think she was going to say, 'Wonder where it will end,' so it occurred to me to wonder where it would, and knowing where it ought—for she was evidently very fond of me—I told her that I wanted to marry her."

He stopped and gazed thoughtfully into the fire.

"And what did she reply?" I asked.

"I took her to the opera that evening. Things went on for a couple of months—she was a dear, good little girl," he said, breaking off his sentence and pausing, as some reminiscences appeared to flit through his mind, "and a lady, too. I don't mean to say she would get through a wood of social etiquette, as Gertrude Leigh might do, without knocking against some of the trees, but in heart she was as perfect a lady as the best of them.

"However," he continued, "things went on for a couple of months, and she was away from town when I heard, to my intense amazement, as you know, that this place had come to me. I wrote to her at once, but I had to go to Paris on business connected with the estate before returning to town. Well, the Leighs were there, and so was Ethilton, and—and he knew about the affair—with the little girl, and——"

"And I suppose he indulged in that mysterious style of conversation which is vaguely termed 'saying things'?" I asked.

"Yes. He talked about my position in the country, and my small knowledge of a girl whose associations had been somewhat equivocal; and said what a good thing it would be if I went in for Bell Leigh—you know I used to like her, rather—and he persuaded me to stay on—he was always talking about it—and——"

"Lord Ethilton is such a very great swell that I can't be expected to see things from his elevated point of view; but I must say I fail utterly to understand why your position in the county should oblige you to act dishon——"

"Go on," Sandering said, as I stopped short; "oblige me to act dishonourably——!"

"To act unkindly," I continued, "to Miss Burton."

"And you think I ought to go and see her? Perhaps she has forgotten all about me," he said.

"I'm sure that you ought to go; and she's not the sort of girl to have forgotten you—or to have ever forgotten herself, in spite of Ethilton's charitable opinion," I answered.

"I will go," he said, flinging his cigar into the fire. "I will go; and, by Jove! I feel so happy now that I've made up my mind. Of course I ought to go; and I'll start to-morrow morning—at least, it seems so rude to you, old fellow, when you've just come down——"

"Not at all," I said, and meant it; though, for the matter of that it is the only reply to such a speech possible under any circumstances. "I'll go up with you, if you like."

"Don't you mind, really? I can't tell you how much obliged I shall be. Do you know where she is?"

"Yes; I was in at rehearsal at the Prince's a day or two ago. She was going to play in the new opera bouffe."

"A part?" he asked.

"Two lines, I think, and about five bars of recitative. There were thirteen people in the boxes and nearly two rows of stalls the other night, and such good business nearly turned Manley's head, and he put a new piece into rehearsal at once."

"There's a train at half-past ten, if that's not too early for you," he said, very eager to be off, now that he had decided to go.

"Not at all; and, as it's nearly twelve, I think I'll retire. Good night!—whatever are you thanking me for? Good night! and good luck in this and everything."

A servant brought up a very early message next morning that Sandering was up, and waiting for me to breakfast with him; and the dog-cart to take us to the station was at the door some twenty minutes earlier than was necessary.

We arrived in town about two o'clock, and hastened to the theatre, where rehearsal was busily proceeding. Sandering's heart slightly failed here, and I left him in the neighbouring square while I went to find Nelly Burton, and tell her that he was waiting to see her.

I made my way up the little dark staircase, and paused at the back of the half-lighted stage to take in the scene.

The ladies of the establishment, gorgeously arrayed and highly bejewelled, were seated in a semi-circle, receiving, with some shrugging of shoulders, the verdict of the leader of the band that there was very little improvement yet in the repetition of a chorus, and that it must go a good deal better before it would do. He was a vulgar person, and of bad manners, for he ventured to say that some of the soprani were very flat and quite out of tune.

Two of the men were bitterly quarrelling with each other in the most polite tones, as to what business should or should not be introduced into the scenes they had together.

One of the principal ladies was going through a speech to which the author listened with a badly-concealed expression of contemptuous dismay; but he did not interfere, for he had written pieces before and knew the actress and her ability, and so sorrowfully resigned another of his best points and a good joke, fervently hoping that the next good part he wrote would be cast for a lady who had at any rate a little idea of reading, speaking, and understanding simple sentences in her native tongue.

Barkington, the stage-manager, who worked sixteen hours a day, and did as much as sixteen people, was bustling busily to and fro.

The manager, surrounded by some of his company, was examining a brilliant poster containing all the hues of the rainbow, in addition to several which no well-conducted rainbow ever dreamt of assuming, destined soon to blaze out and illuminate a thousand walls. But posters won't make pieces, charm the printers and lithographers never so wisely.

I soon caught sight of Nelly Burton, whose fresh, honest little face formed a striking contrast to some of those around her—harsh, blasé, and coarse in expression as many of them were. Her trim little jacket had been worn before, and the newness had left the hat which was perched on the top of her fair curls; but she was very pleasant to look at.

"Are you busy?" I asked, when she had arched her interrogative eyebrows more than ever, and given me a very nice little hand to shake, on ascertaining that it was I.

"I have to sing all this, directly," she answered, smiling as she held out a sheet of music-paper with a very few bars scribbled on the top. "They are going over that scene again?"

"Not without cause, I think. Miss Shaftesbury does not seem to know much of her part, nor to play what she does know particularly well; and she certainly can't sing the music," I said.

Kind little Nelly wanted to find an excuse for her directly.

"Well, you see, it's rather an awkward part to play," she urged.

Digitized by Google

"Then the author's intention will be thoroughly realised, for she's certain to play it awkwardly. I came here on purpose to find you, Miss Burton. A friend of mine, and of yours, wants very much indeed to see you," I said, taking her a little apart. "Can you guess who it is?"

Her lips said "No," but her face very plainly said "Yes."

"It is Clement Sandering," I continued.

"I can't imagine what Mr. Sandering can wish to see me for," she replied, with an effort at haughtiness which did not much accord with the eager way she glanced round to see if he were near, as she asked, "Where is he?"

"In the square; waiting very anxiously to see you," I said.

"I am quite at a loss to understand what Mr. Sandering can have to say to me. Will you please ask him to write if there really is anything?" she answered.

"To a certain extent, Miss Burton, I am in Clement's confidence; and if I were not, your tone would lead me to think—several things."

"I am sure my tone is just the same as always," she said, looking up with a faint twinkling as of coming tears in her ordinarily bright eyes. "Mr. Sandering is nothing to me, and I had rather not see him."

"Of course, if you had rather not, there is no more to be said; but he will be greatly pained and hurt at your refusal—your unkind refusal, for he came all the way from Staverton this morning on purpose to see you. I did not think that you would ever have condemned anyone without hearing the defence. Circumstantial evidence is so terribly deceptive," I rejoined.

She did not in the least know what to do, and so tried to be angry, and rolled up her sheet of music without the slightest regard for the legibility of the writing.

"Well, good-bye, Miss Burton; I will say that you are too angry to forgive him, shall I?"

"There's nothing to forgive, and I'm not angry a bit," she said, quite as savagely as it was possible for her to speak.

"What is the word?" I answered, repressing a slight inclination to smile. "Annoyed—hurt—vexed—grieved—disappointed? There is evidently something wrong between you, for you and he were excellent friends when his play was produced.

"If you see him, in three seconds he will probably explain away—whatever requires explanation, and then you will be very sorry that you hesitated in hearing him."

She unrolled her music, and studied the signature at the beginning of the stave with great diligence.

"My cue will be coming directly," she said at length.

"And then you'll see poor Clement?" I asked.

"Indeed I don't know why you call him 'poor Clement,'" but she lingered over his name, and seemed to like the sound of it; "he's not—— Yes, I'll go, if you don't mind waiting a minute more," and she went down the stage, did her scrap of duty, and then we left the theatre together.

Sandering was coming towards us as we turned into the square. He threw away his cigar, and raised his hat as I left Miss Burton and retired; he seeming uncertain whether or not to offer his hand, for her obstinate little paws were tightly holding her parasol.

I looked after them, however, when they had gone a little way, and saw one hand slowly relax its grip and resign itself for a moment to Sandering's custody, anticipatory of its retention for a very much longer period; and when presently they overtook me, a glance convinced me that all was right. Nelly Burton appeared well on her way to making a good match.

* * * * *

The future Mrs. Sandering lived in rooms up a good many stairs in one of the streets which surround Russell Square; and thither I used sometimes to accompany my friend; when our pretty hostess regaled us with cups of tea, and sang songs to us at a tinkling little piano which tried strenuously to be gay and festive, and make good music, but whose age and decrepitude would sometimes assert themselves by the sudden cessation of a note or so, which grew tired and refused to speak any more.

Here, too, we examined her drawings—she was a very clever little person, and sketched admirably—and looked over the precious volume in which were pasted the newspaper cuttings criticising her performances; mostly from country chronicles, though there were nearly two lines from a London morning paper which had afforded her so vast an amount of pleasure, that if the writer had but known the gratification his pen was destined to give, I believe he would have defied his editor and put in half a column.

"The only suggestion I have to offer," he said, pointing to the sketch, "is that a body should put explanatory notes to her drawings."

On one of these afternoons, about a week after our arrival in town, we were looking over a portfolio of sketches, and Sandering was amusing himself by chaffing the drawings to tease Nelly.

"The only suggestion I have to offer," he said, putting a sketch on the mantelpiece and looking at it with the burlesqued air of a connoisseur, "is that a body should put titles and explanatory notes to her drawings; because a body is apt to be misunderstood."

"I wish you wouldn't keep on teasing me about saying 'a body,' just because I used the expression once," she said, spoiling a laugh with a pretended pout.

Digitized by Google

"You should be very careful what expression you make use of, for you want all you can muster to put into these works of art, dear. Now, here's a strange picture; very charming, very interesting, but just a trifle vague," he said, selecting another from the case.

"A gentleman, seated in a—a box carried by two elliptic wheels, and drawn by a—by an anomalous quadruped, which my slender knowledge of natural history will not permit me safely to—— A horse, is it? Really a horse? Well, we'll call it a horse, at any rate, if only for the sake of, or rather the avoidance of, argument—drawn by a horse.

The gentleman is engaged in emulating the example of Simple Simon in the ballad, and fishing as he goes along the turnpike road—driving!—do you seriously mean it? Very well, dear, you drew it, and so you ought to know; but why a man should go out driving with a fishing-rod in his hand, I—a whip? Oh, no; come now, Nelly, dear, that is going a little too far; really it is only as a personal favour to you that I can consent for a moment to accept that as a whip. Men don't hold their whips jutting over their horses' backs like bowsprits, and it quite bears out my premises that explanatory notes should be appended to these works of art."

Nelly showed a disposition to attempt the recovery of her much-abused work; but Sandering was on the alert, and resumed—

"He is driving (if you really do insist upon it) up a hill towards a church of ingeniously-assorted architecture, about which I will only say that if the incumbent is not more upright as a man than the steeple is as a building, the heads and morals of the congregation are in some danger. You are quite sure that is a horse?"

"What a shame!" Nelly said laughingly. "I'm sure it's all quite plain enough."

"Quite plain enough, in all conscience—you might almost go so far as to call it ugly," Sandering replied.

"You may think so, if you like, sir. I'm sure the church is upright, and my uncle was incumbent—at least, curate there," Nelly said, looking at the drawing.

"Why, I never knew that you had an uncle, dear. What's his name, and where does he live?" he asked.

"He lives abroad, and I don't write to him much—he wouldn't like my being in the profession. He's very kind, though, and used to want me to go and live with him, only I didn't. Hedley, his name is."

"What Hedley—not Robert, I suppose?" Sandering asked.

"Yes, it is Robert. How did you guess?" inquired Nelly.

"You don't mean to say that this is Chesterton Church?" Sandering said in a tone of extreme surprise.

"Yes, it is," Nelly answered, evidently bewildered at his knowledge.

"But surely, Nelly, Robert Hedley, who was curate of Chesterton in the seventies, was not your uncle?"

"Not only was, but is. Why are you so excited about it, dear?" she asked.

"Don't you know that—have you not heard of his death Nelly?" he inquired.

"No, indeed I haven't," Nelly replied.

"Poor little girl! I ought not to have mentioned it so suddenly. He died last year."

Nelly laughed. "Then all I can say is, that he has since been represented by a wonderfully healthy-looking ghost. I have not seen him lately, but two or three times since then; and I shall most likely have a letter from him—or the ghost—to-morrow morning. I wrote the other day, the first letter for a long time, to tell him about—about us," she said.

"My dear child, if you are not joking, there must be a very great mistake somewhere. Do you know that if Robert Hedley were alive he would inherit Staverton Towers? But he must be dead. I have every proof of it. You know," he said, turning to me, "it was chiefly to ascertain this that I went to Paris. He must be dead."

Nelly persisted, however. He had lived in Paris, years ago, she said, but was now minister to a little Protestant community in the South of France, and such, on investigation, turned out to be the case. A Robert Hedley, a clergyman, corresponding apparently in other particulars, had died in Paris; but we had the best reasons for assuring ourselves that it was not he.

An extract from one of his letters to his niece will best finish my story.

"—— let Mr. Sandering, then, resume his occupation of the Towers without scruple; convinced that I should but be unhappy in leaving my work here, and adopting a new life, at my advanced age. You are my only relative, and if I have power to dispose of the property at my death, it will be yours; if not, it appears that your husband would inherit it."

Sandering talked nonsense at first about having asked Nelly to marry him under false pretences, and it being his duty to free her from the engagement; but she appears much to prefer her bondage, and impudently asserts that if he did go away, he would only want to come back again as he had done before.

Of course, Sandering scoffed at this remark—what else could he do?—but, all the same, he knew that what she said was quite true.

There is some question of entail which the lawyers have not yet decided, and, indeed, I believe they have not been requested to do so; but, under any circumstances, there seems every probability that it will turn out to be a good match.

Alfred E. T. Watson.

"What are you doing, Tommy?" "Standing before the looking-glass," said Tommy. "I wanted to see how I would look if I was twins."

Teacher: "Now, here is an example in mental arithmetic: How old would a person be to-day who was born in 1868?" Pupil: "Please, mum, was it a man or a woman?"

Jones: "Look here, Smith, when you asked me to lend you that half-sovereign, two months ago, you said you only wanted it for a short time." Smith: "Quite true; I only had it half-an-hour."

"You shouldn't be so restless in church, Charlie," said the minister to his little son. "I could see you moving and jumping about in the pew all through my sermon." "I was stiller'n you were, papa," answered Charlie. "You was wavin' your arms and talkin' all through church."

Tom: "How cold that pretty Miss Jones does look, Bob. She ought to have something round her!" Bob (absent-mindedly): "She will have as soon as it gets dark."

Cobwigger: "Didn't you think it rather foolish for her to ask you if her hat were on straight?" Merritt: "No. It was in a railway train, and we had just come out of a long tunnel."

Guest: "How is this? My bill this time is 12s. a day, and last December I had the same room and it was only 10s. a day?" Clerk: "Yes, I know; but the days are much longer now."

Young Man (to messenger boy): "What did the young lady say when you gave her the flowers?" Messenger Boy: "She asked the young fellow who was sitting in the porch with her it if he didn't want some for a buttonhole."

Digitized by Google

BRAND NEW COMPETITION. Starts To-day.

Cash Down. Cash Down. Cash Down.

1st Prize, £50. 2nd Prize, £25. 3rd Prize, £10.

and 25 Gramophones.

THIS IS AN ENTIRELY NEW COMPETITION AND IS NOW PLACED BEFORE THE PUBLIC FOR THE FIRST TIME. IT IS EXCEEDINGLY SIMPLE, AND IS OPEN TO EVERY PERSON WHO READS "SHORT STORIES."

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below will be found six paragraphs containing the buried names of Railway Stations in the United Kingdom (or words that sound the same as the names). You must write in the spaces given the names of the Railway Stations so indicated.

No word or part of a word may be used more than once in making up the name of a Railway Station. In the event of the name of a Railway Station occurring more than once in a sentence, it should be underlined and written down each time.

When you have discovered the names of Railway Stations in the sentences, underline (in ink) the words which go to make up the names (or words that sound the same as the names) and then on the line underneath each sentence write (in ink) the correct names of the Railway Stations to be found in each.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Staticns in the January edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to Bradshaw's Guide, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or Room Eight, SHORT STORIES, 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The names of the Railway Stations consist of one word or two or more consecutive words, or consecutive parts of one word, or two or more consecutive words.

The first prize of £50 will be given to the Competitor who fills in the greatest number of railway stations under the conditions stated.

The second prize of £25 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in the order of merit.

When you have filled up all the names you can find, cut out the list below and keep it by you. Don't on any account send it to us until the closing date is announced in SHORT STORIES. A second list of sentences will appear next week.

In the event of a tie a further list (or, if necessary, several further lists) of sentences will be submitted to the tieing competitors until one wins the first prize outright.

CUT THROUGH HERE

EXAMPLE.

The oaks were swaying in the breeze, the cows were grazing peacefully, when out of the park tore a huge black bull.

The Oaks, Sways, Cowes, Grays, Park, Black Bull.

FIRST LIST.

1. Over the hill gay with heather came the seven sisters munching sandwiches.

.....

2. I do wish you would come with me to the East-end on Monday, Brooke and Hockley have promised to come.

.....

3. They pressed on, panting for breath, until they reached the place where the five ways met.

.....

4. To obtain admittance we had to knock long and loud, and when the door was opened the sight that met our gaze made us rush away and hide ourselves.

.....

5. The halfway house was an inn named the Horse and Jockey. They knew full well that it was nowhere near the fishponds, but it was useless to ask them why they went there.

.....

6. Let it lie. It will get washed over the waterfall and on to the sandy banks of the river where we can pick it up.

.....

NAME..... ADDRESS.....

Digitized by Google

GREAT NEW SERIES. YOU CAN BEGIN HERE.

Confessions of a Self-made Girl

The writer of these Confessions relates in this series of articles the true story of her life, from the time when she left Cornwall, an unsophisticated but ambitious girl, until she made her name and fortune. Her name is well known to you.

[For the purposes of these Confessions I am calling myself Maud Cardew, as my real name is too well known for me to wish to make the story of my life public in this manner.]

MY HEART'S DESIRE.

I AM a native of a seaside village in Cornwall. As I grew up I began to tire of the monotony of the life and determined to go out into the world and make a name for myself.

One day when I was in the ruins of the Old Keep, which is on the cliffs, meditating upon what I should do were I free to carve out my own destiny, two strangers appeared—evidently tourists, I thought. They told me they had decided to stay in the neighbourhood for a few days, and asked if I knew of any lodgings. I said that my father would be glad to put them up at the farm, and accordingly they came home with me.

Their names were the Honourable Robert Lestrange (commonly called Bobbie) and Di Northcote.

I told these two Londoners of my desire to see the world. Bobbie encouraged me in my ambitions, but Di advised me to stay at home. This, however, was not at all in my line, as I told him, and when he saw that nothing would shake me from my resolve, he promised to try to find something for me to do when I arrived in the great city.

Bobbie met me on my arrival in London. Owing to a fog we got separated, and as I stood on the steps of a house I heard a man's voice asking me to come inside and wait until the fog cleared. Feeling that it would be hopeless to find Bobbie, I accepted the invitation. I remained there some time when Di happened to call, and he took me to my lodgings in Bloomsbury, where Bobbie was waiting; he told me that the man in whose rooms I had been was Lord Cecil Trevor, one of the worst "men about town."

Di came in next morning to tell me he had found me a place as trier-on in the firm of Philips and Philips, mantle and jacket makers. He also gave me some advice which I rather resented. I didn't like my work at all, and as I felt I ought not to live alone I got Lizzie Brown, a new girl, to share rooms with me.

I met Lord Cecil Trevor again at a dance of the employees of Philips and Philips—he was a friend of young Fred Philips. He was just about to see me into a cab after the dance when Di Northcote came up, with an angry gleam in his eyes such as I had never seen there before.

I FALL OUT WITH DI.

I AM bound to confess Cecil Trevor showed great presence of mind. There was an odd expression on his face, but he did not get angry at all.

"Miss Cardew has just given me permission to see her home," he said, quite affably, ignoring Di's studied rudeness.

"Thank you," said the latter curtly, "but as I am going in her direction we need not trouble you."

Lord Cecil hesitated a moment, glancing from one to the other of us; then I suppose he realised that Di was determined to accompany me at any cost, and that it would be wisest to seem to withdraw with a good grace.

He turned to me.

"I am sorry," he said purposely throwing a good deal of feeling into his voice, "but I hope I shall soon have the pleasure of seeing you again. I have had a delightful evening."

Ever since Di addressed me I had been standing very upright, with my head thrown back a little, and a studied expression of careless disdain. Now I held out my hand instantly to Cecil Trevor, and smiled up into his face.

"Oh, yes, I hope so," I said warmly; "I have enjoyed myself very much."

He pressed my hand, looked hard into my eyes, then bowed and walked away.

Di at once held out his hand to help me into the hansom.

"Will you kindly direct the driver?" I said frigidly, and ignoring his extended arm, stepped into the hansom, and seated myself in the middle of the seat.

Di coolly mounted the step.

"Which side shall I sit?" he asked.

"Outside," I replied, staring straight in front of me.

"It is too cold," he answered, suppressing a smile. "If you don't make room for me I'm afraid I shall crush you."

I moved to one side and we drove away in silence. He spoke to me a few times, but as I only answered shortly, he soon left off. At the door he asked for my latch-key, but I took it from my pocket and fitted it into the latch myself; afterwards entering and closing the door behind me with merely a "good-night."

The next evening I was rather surprised to find him waiting for me outside Philips and Philips. He asked me to go to dinner with him at once, and I declined, starting to walk homewards.

Without the least hesitation he accompanied me, and in spite of my soreness, I could not help admiring his cool persistence. He talked to me all the way on topics of the day, not in the least nonplussed by my unappreciative replies; and when we reached my door, he asked if he might come in.

Digitized by Google

I shrugged my shoulders and he followed me, closing the sitting-room door behind us, and placing his hat and stick on a chair. Lizzie was spending the evening with friends, so we were quite alone.

"Now," he began, "let us have it out and done with."

I stood by the chimney-piece carelessly unbuttoning my gloves, and made no reply.

"Of course you can't keep this up indefinitely," he continued. "Anyhow, I don't intend to let you."

I turned on him then.

"Mr. Northcote," I exclaimed warmly, "once for all, let me tell you I will not allow you to assume this right of command over me. I am absolutely free and independent, and I wish you to understand I intend to remain so."

He was too much of a gentleman to throw his previous help into my face, and only replied quietly:

"Most certainly. I have not the slightest wish to interfere with your independence, but at the same time, since I was partly instrumental in your coming to London at all, I intend to act as guardian to you whether you wish it or not, especially when such a man as Cecil Trevor is in the question. Once more I tell you, he is not a fit companion for any self-respecting girl."

I was silent, but inwardly determined to choose my friends for myself.

He gazed into the fire for a few minutes, still perfectly calm and serene. I watched him, and there grew up in my heart that determination to make him feel, which afterwards ruled so much of my intercourse with him.

I saw in him then, by a kind of divination, just the man he was. The brilliant scholar, the fascinating companion if he chose, the far-seeing, unerring judge, with each trait carefully hidden away beneath a crust of cynical indifference with which he purposely misled the greater part of the world.

I do not mean that I saw everything clearly then, but I realised he was not the man he chose to appear, and unconsciously I pitted all my own share of character and insight against that other, hidden part of him to force it to the surface.

When at last he looked up from the fire, he regarded me a moment critically.

"I see it is not much use expostulating," he said. "You will have to cut your wisdom teeth your own way, and I shall have to look after you in mine. However, I will leave you an address, and if ever you are in a difficulty and send for me I will come at once."

He took a card from his pocket-book and laid it on the chimney-piece.

Then he turned to the door.

"Good-bye," he said simply, and without offering to shake hands or giving me a chance to thank him, walked out.

I picked up the card and read:

Mr. Reginald Northcote,
Thatched House Club.

I fingered it a few moments thinking it was rather good of him not to leave me to go my own way to destruction without caring, then rang the bell for supper.

It was some time in coming, for though the landlady looked after us all right, she never hurried herself on my account, and always behaved with an easy familiarity that made me think she had not a very high opinion of me.

This was very unpleasant to me, but I did not know how to help myself, and dreaded hunting for fresh rooms.

She was particularly familiar that evening, and when at last I sat down to my solitary meal, I felt homesick and depressed.

It was all very well to come to London to be a brilliant success; but it was another thing to live in a dingy lodging, waited on by a familiar landlady, with no prospects much beyond trying on jackets for highty-tighty young ladies.

I had been low-spirited several times through disappointment, but I remember I was particularly so that evening, and my inward greyness coloured everything about me with dull monotony.

Just when I was on the verge of a little weep, there was a ring at the front door, and the next moment my landlady entered with some beautiful flowers.

"For you," she said. "My, ain't they beautiful!" And she stood and gazed at them open-mouthed.

"Who brought them?" I asked, with a pleasant glow of surprise.

"A messinger b'y. 'Ere's a card in a henvelope as come with 'em."

I tore open the envelope, expecting to find it was a peace offering from Di.

When I read: "With Cecil Trevor's compliments," I felt my cheeks flush a little.

On the back of the card was scribbled: "Please look out for me when you leave to-morrow. I want to see you particularly."

"Will you bring me some water for them?" I said, and replaced the card in the envelope.

All the next day I wrestled with myself as to whether I should meet him, or purposely avoid him. I had not the least doubt as to what I ought to do, but my inclinations led in the opposite direction.

The fact was, I was still dull and lonely. I did not care for the other girls, with the exception of Lizzie Brown, and she was rather a bore at times; I was weary to death of my occupation, and I dreaded going home to sit alone, for Lizzie was very often late at the shop, not reaching home much before ten. In which confession lies the nucleus of cause for half the downfalls in a big city.

While I was still hesitating one of the girls was very rude to me, and all the others laughed. I don't think they meant to be unkind, but I believe they were jealous, for though I neither wished it nor encouraged it in the least, the shop-walker of the mantle department never missed an opportunity of a few words with me.

I lost my temper and answered back hotly, which resulted in a little scene. Finally, feeling tired and miserable, I put on my hat, and went out to meet Cecil Trevor.

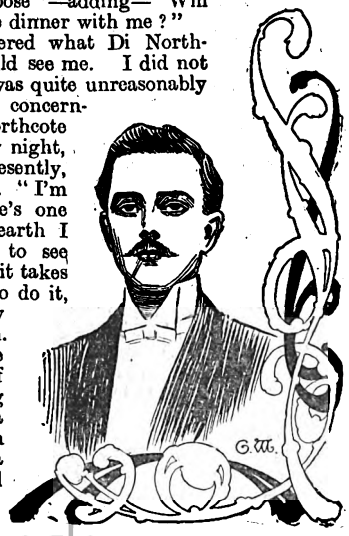
He was waiting for me, and greeted me with unmistakable pleasure. I did not exactly reciprocate it, but I liked being appreciated again, and began immediately to feel on better terms with myself.

My depression had fortunately not cowed me in the least, however, and I was quickly on the defensive.

"How good of you to come!" he said, and I replied carelessly; "I had nothing better to do, that's why."

He frowned slightly, and remarked: "Then I must thank my good fortune I suppose"—adding—"Will you come and have some dinner with me?"

I assented, and wondered what Di Northcote would say if he could see me. I did not mind much because I was quite unreasonably prejudiced against him concerning Cecil Trevor. "Northcote was fairly riled the other night, wasn't he?" he said presently, with a look of amusement. "I'm awfully glad. If there's one thing in Heaven and earth I thoroughly enjoy, it's to see Northcote put out; but it takes such a dickens of a lot to do it, it's a pleasure one only gets once in a blue moon. I've seen that fellow smile in that sickening way of his at the most insulting remarks, and never turn a hair; and however much you may hate him, it is a hundred to one you will never have the satisfaction of annoying him."



Digitized by Google

"Why do you hate him?" I asked.

"Domineering, insolent brute," he muttered; "fancies himself formed of some special clay, superior to all the rest of humanity. I should like to know by what right he treats you as a child?"

"He doesn't!" I exclaimed warmly. "He only tries to, but he will never succeed."

I was too engrossed in making this plain to observe an expression of triumph steal over my companion's face; though I had reason afterwards to know that he was purposely attempting to incense me against Di. I had not even the sense to see then that I was playing straight into his hand.

"That's right," he said; "don't go under to him whatever you do. You'd never get free of him again. I'm not going to give the chap away, because it's a beastly, low-down game, I think; but I tell you plainly, he will get you under his thumb if he can.

"He hates above everything to be thwarted, and if anyone disputes his sway, especially a woman, he never rests until he has conquered them."

"Or they him," I remarked meaningly.

"You won't do that," he answered; "it's an impossibility. He's like an adamantine rock. Every woman who has tried to move him, has either given it up or gone to pieces in the attempt. If you take my advice you'll just drop him altogether."

I realised dimly the utter futility of such advice if Di did not choose to be dropped, but I only said:

"Was he ever in love at all, do you know?"

"Oh, yes, there is a story, but it was when he was a very young chap. He was heir to a dukedom, you know, through a second cousin, and he got engaged to a beautiful girl at Oxford.

"Then a nearer relative turned up from Australia, and he remained plain Mr. Northcote, and the girl dropped him. He believed in her, silly young fool, and it was such a shock to him he's never been the same again."

"Did she manage to get the real duke?" I asked.

"No," he told me, "there was a mystery about the chap. He turned up from Australia, proved his identity, claimed his dukedom, and vanished again. I believe he has never been to England since."

"Then he might just as well have stopped away," I said; "and let Mr. Northcote have his bride."

"Yes, but chaps don't throw dukedoms about, even if they don't care for them at the time. I daresay he thinks it may come in useful some day."

We went into a quiet restaurant for dinner, but even there I was conscious that we attracted a good deal of attention; but whether it was I or my companion that caused it I did not know.

It was a very pleasant meal, for he entertained me with descriptions of high life which interested me vastly. After dinner, however, he proposed going to his rooms.

I refused at once, and said I would go home. He remarked questioningly that he supposed he mustn't come with me, and I said "No, certainly not."

"Why?" he asked, and I did not know what to answer.

"Does Northcote come?" he went on, and I was obliged to confess that he did.

"And Lestrange as well?"

Again I had to say "Yes," and he asked at once: "Then why can't I come?"

"They are old friends," I asserted, stretching a few weeks into a few years to suit my convenience; "perhaps some day you may come."

"It might just as well be now," he urged. "We could have such a nice chat, and it is so difficult anywhere else. Come—let me call a hansom?"

"No, no," I exclaimed vehemently, remembering Di's warnings.

"If you will promise not to worry," I added; "I will walk all the way with you now."

He had to be content with that, and we started off leisurely.

"What on earth possessed you to go to Philips and Philips?" he asked presently.

"Mr. Northcote arranged it," I said; "but I don't like it at all."

"I should think not"—with emphasis—"you are absolutely thrown away there. You ought to go on the stage; you'd soon go to the top and make a fortune."

I caught my breath eagerly and looked up at him.

"Oh, do you think I should?" I exclaimed.

"I'm sure of it," he answered; "I can't imagine why you didn't start long ago."

"I should love it," I ran on with the same eagerness; "but I'm afraid I shouldn't be any good."

"Nonsense. My dear girl, beauty is half the battle, and you are fully equipped."

"But if I gave up my post at Philips and Philips and did not earn anything on the stage, I should be penniless," I said anxiously.

"That need not worry you," he answered at once, and I fancied he seemed pleased at the idea. "I'll see that you don't starve. I could offer you a nice easy post as bachelor's companion, or secretary by day, you know," and he tried to get hold of my hand, looking closely into my face.

I drew aside instantly.

"You are trespassing," I said. "Remember our compact."

He frowned, and then gave a little confused laugh.

"You're as hard as a stone," he remarked; "and not a bit kind to a fellow. However, I'll have to go on liking you because I can't help it. If you wish I'll get you an introduction to a theatre-manager. He'll let you do something for a start, if it's only to walk on, if I ask him."

"Oh, thank you," I cried delightedly. "I'd love to try. It's just deadly, messing about with those mantles all day. Will you see about it to-morrow?"

He promised, and it was with feelings of suppressed excitement, I said "Good-bye," and went into my home.

It was with great trepidation, however, I presented myself for my first interview with the manager of The Queen's Theatre.

Lord Cecil had arranged it all, and taken good care, I was bound to see, that our negotiations over it should be verbal. He absolutely refused to write anything, insisting instead upon my meeting him.

I did not altogether like it, but felt I had no choice if I wished to go on the stage; and undoubtedly I did. The consequence was that I saw a good deal of him, and it took me all my time to keep him at arm's length.

When I entered the manager's office, one of his first remarks was: "I suppose you are very friendly with Lord Cecil Trevor?"

Something about his way of saying it, made me grow very hot, and I replied indignantly—"No, I am not. I only know him slightly."

"So—so——" he said significantly, and, narrowing his eyes, looked me up and down in a way that made me want to run away and hide.

I should not like to imply that this particular manager was in the least an example of his class; and I am obliged to confess, what I have learnt more fully since, that the mere fact of my being introduced by Lord Cecil was sufficient to make him adopt towards me his tone of that first interview.

"How tall are you?" he asked next; "would you mind standing up?"

I stood up, and again he took stock of me generally.

Digitized by Google

"Umph——" he remarked approvingly; "you're a fine woman."

I felt furious, and doubtless showed it, for he added in a conciliatory tone. "Now, don't get angry. If you want to go into the theatrical profession you must put up with its ways. It's no use being too thin-skinned; and if you're going to be very straight-laced it's no good your coming to this theatre, because you'll never get on."

I bit my lips hard and said nothing; for I was then under the impression that Lord Cecil's introduction was of great account to me, whereas it really made no difference at all, and the part I was afterwards given, my appearance would easily have secured for me.

"Now," he continued coolly; "let me see what sort of a neck and arms you have."

"I will not!" I exclaimed instantly; "I never heard of such a thing. Have I come here simply to be insulted?"

"My dear young lady," he said; "now don't go into a tantrum. Most of the girls I am in the habit of receiving for such an interview as this usually raise no objections. That is why I asked you."

I daresay I looked rather well as I stood before him, burning with indignation, for I have always found when I get angry I provoke admiration, whether my companion would or no.

Anyhow, after a few minutes he added: "I think you'll do all right. You can walk on for a few weeks as a trial, and then, if I can manage it, I will give you a part. You will receive twenty-one shillings a week, and your dress will be found for you. You can begin to-night if you like."

I thanked him and explained that I must give a week's notice at Philips and Philips, so it was decided I should begin that day week.

I went home feeling very pleased in spite of the unpleasant interview, and not a little of my rejoicing was at the thought of what Di's feelings might be when he found out my changed plans.

The poor salary did not trouble me in the least, as I was confident it would soon be raised, and meanwhile I could afford to spend some of my savings.

That evening Lord Cecil called at my lodgings without waiting for my permission when he was shown into the room, I looked up with both surprise and annoyance.

He held out his hand, but I drew back and looked at him in silence.

"Don't be angry," he said, "I want to know all about your interview with the manager, and I couldn't arrange to meet you earlier. It is an old saying that one good turn deserves another, so you might let me stay now I am here."

The contrast of his at once claiming an obligation compared with Di's careful ignoring of it, struck me unpleasantly; but since I had allowed him to help me I felt compelled to make the best of it.

"You may stay fifteen minutes," I said, and placed the clock in a better light. Needless to say when the fifteen minutes were up he easily found some plausible excuse to remain, but at last, in desperation, I told him he really must go without further delay.

In reply he only remarked, "I wish Northcote would drop in now. His face would be a picture. I should enjoy it for weeks."

"I wish he would also," I retaliated, "then you would be obliged to go."

He looked considerably amused.

"I like your cheek," he said, "it beats everything I ever knew. You are almost the only girl of my acquaintance who would not ask me to stay."

I drew myself up somewhat haughtily, and turning away, occupied myself with some flowers in a way that implied dismissal.

He stood astride on the rug and watched me a few moments.

"All the same I believe I like you for it," he said at last.

"I'm no saint, as doubtless Northcote has impressed upon you, and I admit I haven't much respect for your sex; but I like pluck, and you've got more than your share."

Still I stood with averted head trifling with my flowers.

"Look here, Maud," he began, advancing a step.

I turned at once and regarded him stonily.

"Miss Cardew, then, if you will. I'm going now. You'll part good friends, won't you?"

"Good-bye," I answered evasively.

"No, that won't do," he said. "You've got to shake hands with me, or I'll sit in that chair till morning."

I believed him capable of it, so coldly extended my hand.

"Good-bye," I said again. "Another time I hope you will wait until you are invited."

"I won't promise," he answered daringly; "I'm going to break you in, you know," and with an easy laugh he turned away.

Exactly as he opened my door the landlady opened the front door in answer to a ring we had not heard.

I do not know if Fate went out of her way in those days to guide Di Northcote to me at the most awkward moments, and purposely involve me in difficulties, but certainly she achieved it in a most remarkable fashion.

"Will you give this to Miss Cardew," said a voice I could not possibly mistake; and then Di looked up and saw Lord Cecil advancing from my room. Not a muscle of his face moved. He gave one quick glance, and then looked straight past him to where I stood under the light of the gas.

"Will you come in?" said the landlady, and he raised his voice slightly as he replied—

"No, thank you; I merely called to leave this book."

Then he turned and walked away.

Lord Cecil turned too, as if to come back, but I waved him aside.

"No," I said bitterly, "this is your fault. The least you can do is to go after him and explain."

He hesitated a moment, then asked—

"Do you wish me to?"

It was on the tip of my tongue to say "Yes," but a little demon of pride and wilfulness had time to take possession of me, and instead I tossed my head and remarked, "Oh, it is of no consequence."

When he had gone I stood for a long time staring into the fire.

"What will Di do now?" I kept saying to myself. "What will Di do now?"

(Next Tuesday I will tell you what Di did.)

"Why will Brown have nothing but French dishes on his table?" "It's an idea of the governess, to make the children speak French in the household."

Father (who has been helping a son in his school work): "What did the teacher remark when you showed him the translation?" John: "He said I was getting more stupid every day."

Mother (indignantly): "What's that, you thoughtless child? You say you haven't taken all your nice presents round and shown them to the neighbours yet? What do you suppose I bought them for?"

Digitized by Google

A Tottering Pedestal.

A TALE OF LOVE AND A MISUNDERSTANDING.

"Well, that is cheerful!" exclaimed the assistant editor, as he hung up the telphone receiver with a jerk. "Mr. Allen is ill, and probably cannot come down for several days," he added, turning to where Natalie stood, pulling off her gloves.

"Ill?" she echoed blankly. "Ill? Is it anything serious? Who telephoned?"

"Dr. Porter; he didn't say what the trouble was, but it would take more than a headache to keep the boss at home. He has been working like all possessed lately, you know."

Indeed she knew—who better? Had she not seen him there in the harness day after day, anxiously watching him grow haggard and worn under the extra strain which a sudden break in his staff had put upon him? Had she not longed, mutely, rebelliously, to be able to lift even a little of the load from his overburdened shoulders?

Mechanically she sat down at her desk, trying to begin her work. There was a mist before her eyes, an inexplicable lump in her throat, and instead of her papers, she saw before her the editor's strong, self-contained face. Was he being well cared for, she wondered; was everything possible being done for him? Even while she realised the absurdity of such questions, they persistently recurred to her.

Of Mr. Allen's private life she knew no detail; in the office she attended strictly to her business, and outside of it had no intercourse with any of her associates there. From chance remarks which Mr. Allen had made she knew that he had been through the mill, attaining his present position, while still a young man, by the most persistent sort of hard work.

"Oh, I've slaved and starved, and all the rest of it!" he told her once, half-jestingly, but there was a ring of truth through the lighter strain that made her wince.

Daily she had marvelled at the power of the man; his alert, decisive mastery of emergencies; his ever-ready courteous appreciation; his patient, tactful handling of the innumerable nameless worries, the never-ceasing, varying demands that go to make up the sum of an editor's existence, were all revelations to her.

His up-hill fight had not embittered him or made him unmindful of the struggles of others. When Natalie, utterly inexperienced, came to him, he held out a helping hand, showing her kindness where she had expected rebuffs, considerations wherever consideration was possible. She thought that all editors were like him, and could not understand why anyone should try to dissuade a girl from "breaking in" to newspaper work. Nothing that she could ever do for him could adequately express her gratitude.

So this morning she pulled herself together and went to work with a will; now, if ever, was the time to put forth every effort, that their editor's part of the great news machine might be kept in smooth working order for him. There was little rest for anyone in the office that day.

Late in the afternoon the doctor telephoned again. Mr. Allen, he said, was worrying greatly about his business, and someone from the office must come to him, and be sure to say that everything was all right, as the patient was in no condition to be disturbed about anything.

The assistant looked round perplexedly.

"I'm afraid I shall have to ask you to go, Miss Spencer," he said. "I simply can't spare one of the men."

Natalie succeeded in veiling the eagerness of her assent. How glad she was to go; to see for herself just how he fared, and have her tormenting doubts dispelled.

When she reached Allen's residence Dr. Porter admitted her, saying that the family were all away.

"As luck would have it, it is even his man's day out, and he would not hear of the fellow staying at home with him. He'll kill himself yet trying to be kind to people," fumed the little doctor, who was Allen's friend as well as physician.

"You think he is very ill?" Natalie faltered.

"He will need considerable care," was the doctor's non-committal reply, as he led Natalie into an inner room where Allen lay tossing restlessly, his eyes unnaturally bright, his face flushed, his fingers pulling nervously at the coverlet. Although he managed to speak with some of his wonted alertness, Natalie's watchful eyes detected his suffering.

"It was a shame for them to trouble you to come to me," was his first remark. Then he listened with satisfaction to what she had to say, and told her clearly and concisely what he wanted done; but the strain told. As she left him he sank back very limply among his pillows.

"He will rest for a time now," Dr. Porter said, when Natalie rejoined him. "Still, I hate awfully to leave him alone."

"You are going, too?" Natalie asked quickly.

"Why, I don't see how I can help it. There is one patient whom I really must see—the others could wait. I have sent for a nurse—goodness knows why she does not come!" impatiently pulling out his watch.

"I'll stay here till she does come," said Natalie promptly.

"You're a little brick!" exclaimed the doctor delightedly. "I was just wondering if I might not ask you. I will be back in half an hour any way, and probably the nurse will be here before that," and, after giving her a few directions, he hurried away.

Returning to the sick room, Natalie slipped into a chair near the bedside, sitting quietly till Allen began to toss and moan. Then she bathed his hot head with some cool stuff the doctor had prepared. He opened his eyes for a moment, looking wonderingly at her, then lay still again.

When he woke once more he saw her still near him in the dim light.

"Natalie!" he said breathlessly.

She did not move or answer him, believing him to be only half awake.

"Natalie," he repeated; "am I dreaming, or is it really you?" There was no mistaking the eagerness in his manner. The blood surged to Natalie's cheeks at the sound of her name on his lips. Could he know what he was saying, to be thus calling her by name?

Digitized by Google

"Dr. Porter had to leave, so I am staying with you till he returns," she said unsteadily.

"I only wish that you would stay for ever!" he murmured. "Natalie! My Natalie!" catching her hand, and pulling her down till she sat on the edge of the bed, "do you know how much I love you? I never thought before that you cared anything for me, but you seem different to-night. Do you love me, Natalie?" capturing her other hand.

Natalie's heart beat tumultuously; how should she answer him? Did he really mean this—and for her?

"Answer me, Natalie," compelled the insistent voice from beside her. Well if he was delirious he would not remember; and if he knew—if he meant it——

"Oh, I do! I do!" she cried.

He crushed her hands to his burning lips.

"My love! my dearest!" he whispered, while his eyes made eloquent appeal to her. She leant down till her lips touched his brow. Smiling and still clasping her hands he dozed again, like a tired child.

Natalie felt that she had been suddenly snatched to some wonderful, beautiful world, wherein all was brightness and great glory. She slipped to her knees, laying her cheek softly against his hand.

"He loves me! he loves me!" trilled a voice in her soul, while she tried dizzily to form the words with her lips.

"I can love him as much as I want now!" she thought. 'And, oh, it's so good—it's so good!"

It seemed doubly so to her because there was no one else in all the world for whom she cared deeply. There were those for whom she felt affection, but not one whom she really loved. Now that the flood-gates were down, the long repressed emotions of her impulsive nature swept riotously through.

A sound in the outer hall brought her back to earth and she rose hurriedly from her knees, trying to free her hands without disturbing Allen. He only tightened his hold.

"You are not going?" he said plaintively.

"I must—I think the doctor has come back! Please let go my hands—dear!"

He kissed them again, then reluctantly did as she asked.

"Try not to worry about the office," she begged; "we will make things go right for you, if you will only do just as the doctor tells you."

"Oh, I'll be good!" he promised, "just so as to get rid of this fever and be able to kiss you, my Natalie."

With this promise to comfort her Natalie went home, tired and overwrought, with some work still to do; but happy, happy, happy.

During the days of anxiety and uncertainty which followed Natalie vainly wished that they would send her to him again from the office. It was so hard to glean tidings of him only through the reports of others, to have to show only a moderate solicitude in his progress.

When they said that he was to sit up, she decided after some hesitation to send him a note by the next person who went to him. No one who saw it would ever guess what a precious little missive it was—they would fancy it some dry old business communication.

"How was Mr. Allen?" Natalie asked, when the bearer returned.

"I did not see him, because the nurse said that his wife had just come home and was with him, and——"

But the sentence remained unfinished, for, at that point, Natalie suddenly dropped, a dead weight, into the astonished reporter's arms.

When she recovered consciousness they urged her to go home and rest, for she had done much extra work during Mr. Allen's absence. She refused steadily, with a white, miserable face, that they could not understand.

Dully she reasoned to herself that sometime she must take up the awful burden of life again, so she might as well begin at once. Through the recurring waves of despair that swept over her one fact alone seemed clear—

"His wife was with him."

His wife!

Slowly another thought disentangled itself from the chaos of her mind—she had made some mistake that night. Her king, which, being interpreted, meant her editor, could do no wrong. Delirious, after all, he must have been, thinking her perhaps this very wife.

"My Natalie," seemed to echo back mockingly to her. Well, that must be his wife's name too. They had quarrelled perhaps—the marriage was not a happy one. All he had said seemed to indicate this, if there were any reason at all in his utterances. Those words that she had treasured so, that she had repeated to herself so often, so ecstatically. The note she had sent him. A horrible surge of shame brought the blood back to her pallid cheeks as this thought smote her. What, what would he think? There would be no room for doubt—he would know.

Thus her thoughts ran riotously, tumultuously, without sequence, one thing only repeating itself—he had meant no wrong. Hard as it was to reconcile all of his utterances with the theory of delirium, the mistake was, must have been, hers alone.

Slowly the day dragged on, till Natalie began to think with dread of the time when her work should be ended, and she alone with her tortured, miserable thoughts. She was ill-fitted to bear another stinging blow that came to her.

"Mrs. Allen wants to see Miss Spencer," an office boy announced abruptly, coming to her desk.

The room began to whirl again. "The note," she thought. That dreadful, tell-tale note. Bracing herself as best she could for the ordeal she went to the waiting-room, where a very beautiful woman met her cordially.

"Ah, he has not told her," thought Natalie. "That is like him. But why is she here?"

"Miss Spencer, Mr. Allen wants to see you particularly. He told me to stop and ask you to drive home with me," Mrs. Allen said.

Poor Natalie was at bay. This was practically a command from the editor, which she could hardly disregard.

"I cannot come just at present, Mrs. Allen," she managed to answer, "but will you say that I will be there soon?"

The idea of driving in his carriage beside his lovely wife was quite unbearable.

"Then I will call for you again, say, in half an hour. There are one or two errands that I shall be glad to do."

Even this crowning pain was to be heaped upon her it seemed, so, with breaking heart, Natalie endeavoured to consent graciously.

As they drove away together Mrs. Allen chatted brightly, frequently speaking of her husband, while Natalie inwardly writhed, wondering if she could go through with all of this ordeal. Now that the meeting with Allen was drawing so near she began to fear that she had over-estimated her strength. She should have refused to come at any cost.

"Stanley has told me how you stayed with him the first night he was ill," said Mrs. Allen suddenly, "it was so good of you."

Digitized by Google

Then he remembered! Oh, this was too much. Natalie wanted to scream and smash the carriage windows as the pleasant voice continued:

"He said that you were the best nurse he had at all, and often when his fever was bad they say he called for Natalie!"

Natalie gasped. What manner of woman was this who could talk so lightly about her husband's calling for another woman? "Another woman!" That was she, Natalie Spencer—Natalie was not his wife's name—what he had said he meant for "Natalie," he remembered. He——

No, no, it could not be! Her dear love, her idol, this man of highest honour.

Before she could collect her thoughts they had reached the house.

"Why, child, you are white as a sheet," cried Mrs. Allen, as the light fell on Natalie's face, "you must have a glass of sherry before you see Stanley. He would think that I had not taken good care of you if he were to see you looking like that."

Natalie had become passive, so many shocks and conflicting emotions having benumbed her faculties. As she mechanically thanked Mrs. Allen, and drank the sherry, she rather believed that she was having a very bad nightmare. To be sure it was very real, but nightmares so often are.

"That's better; now go to Stanley," Mrs. Allen commanded, as she saw the blood slowly creeping back to the girl's cheeks. "He's in there," she continued, "nodding towards a carefully closed curtain, but making no attempt to lead the way. Vaguely wondering Natalie crossed the room, resolutely pushed aside the curtain, and entered the cosy den where Allen was sitting propped in an arm-chair.

He looked up eagerly, a glad light in his eyes. "My Natalie," he said softly, attempting to rise.

"Don't get up," she cried, running to him, even the anger that his words inspired swallowed up by her anxiety for him. As she reached his side he tried to take her hand, but she drew quickly away.

"How can you, how dare you?" she questioned miserably.

"Why, Natalie, what do you mean? 'Can, dare'—this to me?" he questioned, in blank amazement. "Was it all a dream after all—wasn't that night real, Natalie? And your note to-day?" With trembling fingers he pulled the little, crumpled missive from the pocket of his dressing-gown, and held it accusingly towards her.

"Oh, don't, don't," she moaned, not trusting herself to look at him. "I thought that you wanted me on business, or I should not have come. If you only sent for me to insult me——"

"Why should you accuse me of such a thing?" he began hotly. "Why are you torturing me like this, Natalie? I don't in the least understand," he ended helplessly.

Natalie pressed her hand to her head. Was she crazy or was he? Agonising doubt of him began to creep into her heart, benumbing her senses, even though his bewilderment seemed too real to be feigned.

"Do you suppose I knew about your wife?" she said, in a harsh whisper.

Allen grasped the arms of his chair and leant towards her.

"My what?" he exclaimed.

"Your wife!" she insisted hysterically. "The nurse said—" A light of relieved understanding brightened Allen's face; he was almost smiling as he quickly interrupted her.

"So that is the trouble, is it?" he asked rather stiffly. "I remember now that the nurse did call Mrs. Allen my 'wife' at first, but surely you"—his voice softened, but the reproach in his face stung her cruelly—"Natalie, Natalie, she is my young step-mother. My poor, little sweetheart, how could you believe——"

Natalie flung herself on her knees beside him, and, between her sobs, managed to explain how the mistake had occurred.

"Can you ever forgive me?" she ended in such a woe-begone way, that Allen hastened to prove to her, in a distinct, convincing manner, the extent of his magnanimity.

M. C. Hueston.

Your Editor Chats.

You will find the first list of sentences in our great new Competition on page 399. I am sure that the discovering of the hidden names of railway stations will prove both an attractive and instructive amusement for all readers. The Competition is extremely simple, though at the same time a large amount of skill is required in finding the names. The prizes consist of three cash gifts, being £50, £25, and £10 respectively for the first, second, and third prizes. In addition to this twenty-five Gramophones are offered.

I have been led to offer these Gramophones, which are similar to those which have already been given away in other Competitions, owing to the repeated requests of many readers who have so far been unsuccessful in winning instruments, but yet are desirous of obtaining them, they having heard from other prize-winners of the magnificent quality and tone of the instruments. Each Gramophone is accompanied by two records, and is fitted with a Concert Sound-Box, which greatly increases the volume of sound.

If any readers have friends who experience a difficulty in obtaining a copy of this issue of Short Stories in order to be able to enter for the Competition, they will find the first list of sentences in Pearson's Weekly and Home Notes, dated April 2nd, both of which cost one penny, and are on sale on Friday next.

The majority of readers experienced considerable difficulty in deciphering correctly the facsimile of Mr. R. Norman Silver's handwriting which was published in Short Stories, dated March 7th. The following is a list of the pencil-case winners, and also a copy of what Mr. Silver wrote:

L. H. Bowden, St. Bulades, Aylestone, Leicester.
A. Bruce, 4 Clarence Road, Handsworth, Birmingham.
E. Canham, 27 Courtney Road, Highbury, N.
F. Hulme, 5 Earl Street, Audenshaw, near Manchester.
W. Rose, 46 Shamrock Street W. Glasgow.
Mr. Ramsay, Maplebank, Leadhills, Abington.
M. Richardson, Lynwood, Egremont, Cumberland.
N. H. Simmons, 43 Milson Road, West Kensington.
J. H. Gainford, 33 Everton Terrace, Liverpool.
J. H. Robertson, 9 Glenogle Road, Edinburgh.

Hans Christian Andersen, that teller of so many simple yet haunting tales, said once that his stories looked over his shoulder. What he meant no doubt was that in every true romance there is something that "comes of itself," some situation, some character that springs up as with a life of its own. Such situations, such characters, come to the author with a little thrill that gives him a new interest and a new pleasure in his work.

In "Held Apart" the writer has been fortunate enough to meet with many of these odd sensations. One thrill came to him when he seemed to see the scoundrelly ship's steward, Hartigan, checked in his drunken song by the creaking of a hinge, lolling in his chair and staring with stupid, startled eyes at the blind white girlish face in the doorway. Another came when he heard—as novelists do hear—the cold, hard voice of Hannah Davenal bidding her aristocratic dupe and accomplice, "Go down to Groudle Tower and look!" The others—but his readers must discover those for themselves.

He trusts, however, that they may find as much pleasure in reading "Held Apart" as the writing of it has given to

R. Norman Silver.

The result of the "Cats" Competition will be found on page 393.

Digitized by Google

A FLAW IN THE STRUCTURE.

The Story of a Weakness that Became Strength.

"I always feel a dreadful bore when I call in at this time of the evening, my dear Maud!" declared Miss Rose Dawson with an easy air, which did not betoken any special amount of compunction. She had already been there for more than half-an-hour. "I know that you are usually in the study with your father, when he is at home in the evening, going over his plans for new ships and all that sort of thing. I hope he is out now, or I may be keeping you from him!"

"You are not a bore at all, Rose!" said Maud Newbold quietly. Her friend's lively chatter amused her, and Rose did not intrude too often. "My father is not out, though; he is in the study with Mr. Arnold Morrison, and they are going into some plans together."

"Mr. Morrison!" cried Rose in mild surprise. "Oh, is he working for your father's firm now? Very clever, people say, and I know he is very good-looking and manly. So you do not have so much of your father's society now, of course—superseded!"

She laughed, not giving Maud time to reply.

"Of course, you've heard about that romance of his? He was looking at some plans or something of that sort"—this was a favourite expression of hers—"when he let the paper fall and the wind caught it.

"Just as the paper was rolling into the water, a girl ran up and caught it with her umbrella, pinning it to the ground. Mr. Morrison came up, recovered his paper, thanked her—and report says that he fell in love with her on the spot!

"I have seen the girl; very nice, almost charming, but she is only a poor milliner or something of that sort, and not quite good enough for him! Lucky for her! Of course I don't mean to say that a milliner is not as good as—— But there, I mustn't turn gossip!"

Maud had not heard it all; she was sitting in her chair with tightly clasped hands and in the attitude of one who is about to spring to her feet. Her face wore a tense expression, but this could not be seen by Rose as they were sitting in the twilight.

"I wonder, now, how it would be if he met somebody else, more in his own circle?" continued Rose, just a little more thoughtfully. "Would he give her up? The girl, I mean. Her name is Alice Boyce. That is the question!"

Maud did not reply, but the intensity of her expression deepened, till she had the appearance of one who is in pain. Rose fidgeted and went on, somewhat awkwardly:

"I suppose it is rather too bad to discuss the gentleman while he is so close to us! What about the Paynes' ball? You will go, I suppose? And when shall we have the pleasure of seeing you a captive to Cupid?"

"If it were not for the fact that you are so good, if you did not demonstrate the possession of a heart in so many ways, I should be disposed to assert that you do not own one! The efforts of several men to make an impression are sufficient to cause most persons to declare that you have hedged that organ round with the determination to die an old maid!"

Maud's face lost its pallor and became bright with colours. With an effort she forced herself to reply in a steady voice:

"Let us leave my heart to take care of itself, and let us consider the following problem, Rose: Suppose a woman sees a man with whom she falls in love, or with whom she feels that she could fall in love, whichever way you like to put it. The man, however, is engaged, in word if not in fact, to another—girl. Yes, we will call her a girl in order to distinguish her from the woman first mentioned.

"Now, the man has never made love to the woman; there is no deceit on his part, and the woman does not know till after the first fateful meeting, that he is even acquainted with the girl. Yet, although the man has said nothing to the woman, yet she is perfectly sure that if she exerted any power, call it fascination, if you like, the man would leave the girl and come to her."

Maud ceased speaking, although she had not finished her statement of the problem. Rose looked interested.

"Where's the problem?" she asked. "I don't see it yet, but perhaps I am dull to-night."

"What ought the woman to do?" continued Maud. "Ought she to go about her ordinary mode of living and resolutely turn from the man, who is unconsciously tempting her with the greatest happiness that can come to a woman, or ought she to take that happiness? Ought she to sacrifice herself or be happy—leaving the girl to——"

"My dear Maud, I am almost out of patience with you!" cried Rose, in a tone of mild surprise. "I thought you were prossie; I am sure that a girl who mixes in shipbuilding plans with her father ought to be practical! What right has the woman to sacrifice herself?

"If happiness is offered to us mortals, we are bound to accept it! The fact that someone else has to suffer because we do it, is not our concern. That is her, or his, concern!"

"But suppose," began Maud anxiously, while her hands clasped one another still more tightly.

"I don't suppose anything!" declared Rose positively. "It is only in novels that the characters sacrifice themselves; it doesn't cost anything, you see! The author uses up so much ink and paper and brain tissue either way, so it makes no difference! But in real, practical life, it does cost something! So you don't sacrifice yourself, you leave that to the one who can't help herself!"

"Listen to me!" requested Maud. Her voice was calm and steady, but she was trembling with suppressed emotion. "The man loves the girl, and will be happy with her unless the woman allows him to—fall into temptation himself.

"The woman has all she requires, all she desires, except the love of that man; but the girl has nothing save that. She is poor, has to work hard for a living; she knows the miseries of genteel poverty, and can only look forward to a life of work. But she has that man's love, and if he could offer her only a workman's lot in life, yet would she feel recompensed for the hardships of life by having that man's love.

"Ought the woman to take that from her? The woman who has all else—ought she to take from the girl the only thing she has to make her happy?"

"I am afraid that problem is being put to me in too poetical a manner!" laughed Rose. "I tell you, Maud, that the whole matter, stripped of the gilt of poetry, comes to this:

"The woman is throwing away a chance of happiness, and she has no right to do so! It is quite conceivable that the man would be more happy with her than with the girl; why, then, should she bring about a double sacrifice? That settles it, my dear Maud!"

She rose to go, and Maud, rising also, switched on the electric light. Rose was busily engaged in setting her hat straight, and rattled on for a moment without noticing her friend.

Digitized by Google

"It is quite a treat, notwithstanding your absurd problem, to find you interesting yourself in love matters, Maud. This is very promising, and augurs well for the peace of mind of certain male friends—or of one of them, at least! We shall see developments before long, and—— Good gracious, what's the matter? How white you look!"

"Oh, it's nothing!" exclaimed Maud, with a faint smile. "I have not felt quite well to-day, and my headache is becoming worse, I fear."

"Then it's time I went," decided Rose. "Lie down quietly, my dear, and don't worry your head about problems! No, don't come to the door! Well, if you will, you will!"

Maud accompanied her friend to the door, and Rose soon disappeared. Maud Newbold turned and walked slowly back along the hall, but at the end she stopped abruptly, for Arnold Morrison came out of the study and came towards her.

"I hope I have not kept you from your father, Miss Newbold," he observed courteously. "We should doubtless have benefited by your apt suggestions on a difficult matter."

His manner was quiet and unemotional, but the look in his eyes was very keen and penetrating.

For a moment the deep brown eyes of Maud Newbold seemed unable to meet his steadfast gaze, but after the first short faltering they looked firmly into the blue orbs, through which one could almost read the man's very soul.

"It is very good of you to say that, Mr. Morrison," she replied, with her usual gracious manner. Her winning smile, the faintest trace of which was upon her lips now, had a fascination for him, and he wondered why it was so near the vanishing point. "What is the subject now?"

"It would appear to most people to be a trivial matter, Miss Newbold," he responded, "but you, who know as much about these matters as many trained men, will understand that it is more than a trifle. We have discovered a flaw. A small flaw, scarcely noticeable; but you understand that ever so small a flaw spoils the whole construction. We must alter all our plans; it means a loss of money and time, but it cannot be helped. Do you not agree with me?"

"Oh, dear! It seems so unfair to hold that a little defect spoils the whole of a beautiful structure!" she said in a tone of concern. "Can nothing be done, but to pull apart and begin again?"

"Nothing, I fear, Miss Newbold! If a construction, a machine, an organism, a character even, has a weak spot, it spoils the whole. Is that not true, or do you think——"

There was almost a pleading accent in his voice; he appeared to be stating a positive fact, and yet pleading to be told that he was incorrect in his theory. What did he mean by including the character of a human being in his category?

He had turned his eyes from hers while speaking, and her heart beat violently. Was the theory true? She felt that it was, and yet she tried to think otherwise, as he was endeavouring to do! Her heart cried out against this harsh dictum.

"Oh, that is too severe a judgment, Mr. Morrison! Does it follow of necessity that a flaw, a weak spot, mars the whole? No, no; I cannot think it!"

She clasped her hands tightly. He turned his eyes slowly to hers, and in them she read the application of his stern remark to himself. She read what he could not say, for he was bound to another.

His allegiance was due to Alice Boyce, but there was a weak spot in it—only just a speck of disaffection, but that little flaw spoilt the purity of the allegiance and marred the structure of the engagement. He knew it, but he was pleading to be told that he was wrong!

And Maud saw this in his eyes and shut her own, for what was he reading in them? What injustice were they both doing to Alice Boyce? Was there not a flaw in the structure of her own womanly character and integrity in permitting this feeling to linger in her heart? She was aroused from her soul-piercing meditation by the sound of his voice.

"Yes; all that I have said is true, although I would that it were not! I see that you agree with me. Good-night, Miss Newbold!"

She felt his hand touch hers, and he was gone.

She looked about as if in search of him, then groped her way to the drawing-room, for her eyes were filling with tears and she could see nothing. Throwing herself on a couch, she covered her face with her hands and moaned in the agony of her stricken heart:

"No, no! It is not so; it is all theory! Arnold, Arnold, my love! I cannot give you up!"

"Why, whatever is the matter, my dear child?" inquired her anxious father, entering the drawing-room half an hour later. "You look ill, and I believe you've been crying! Headache? Don't have it so bad as that very often, do you?

"I think you haven't been looking so well just lately, and I have a good mind to send you to Italy or Egypt for the winter! Your aunt thinks of going to one place or the other and you could go with her, you see. Don't wish to go? Well, well! Never mind about that just now. Go to your room and bathe your head. Your poor mother used to have dreadful headaches at times."

Maud was glad to escape from her father's eyes. He looked after her and sighed.

"She has been studying too hard!" he mused. "She must have put in a lot of study to get the grip of the thing as she has done. She seemed to go in for it more than ever after that first visit of Morrison's! My word, wasn't he surprised to find a girl knowing so much! I shan't forget that in a hurry!

"He was inclined to treat her like a know-nothing at first, just bowing to her and taking no further notice. But I could see the look of utter surprise when she put in one of her shrewd suggestions! It was as good as a play to watch them! After that, she studied harder than ever, and he always seemed to be waiting to hear what she had to say." He chuckled with amusement.

"I've wondered, occasionally, if I should be told that Morrison wanted to be my son-in-law. Hum. No, I shouldn't mind, although I want Maud to do better. Oh, yes, I forgot! I've heard something about his being engaged! So that's all right. She will be better in the morning!"

* * * * *

On the following day Maud Newbold did more walking about the town than usual; she explained this to her father by saying that her head felt heavy and that out-door exercise might benefit her. Yet there was some other motive—an additional reason for so much walking, if, indeed, it were not the principal one; she appeared to be constantly on the watch.

On the second day she continued the practice; morning, afternoon and evening she went out. It was Saturday, and there were more people about. It was early in the evening; she had made her way towards a piece of land that had been set apart as an open space.

Almost on the edge of the common, as it was called, she passed at the back of a seat on which two girls were sitting, and a remark from one of them brought her to a stand with considerable suddenness.

"You're a lucky girl, Alice Boyce!"

"Yes, I am!" was the reply, uttered in sweetly simple tones. "I am very happy!"

Maud felt rooted to the ground; it was mean to listen, yet she was unable to move.

Digitized by Google

"You are going to be taken away from the drudgery of earning your own living and placed——"

"It isn't that!" protested Alice Boyce earnestly. "I should be happy without that, and I sometimes wish that he were more in my own position, because then he might not be tempted to think that he could have done better!

"But I mustn't say that of him!" she added hurriedly, and Maud could see the colour suffusing her cheek as she caught a side glimpse of it. "He is so good, so noble, that he would not be tempted! I can trust him, and I am ashamed of myself for even allowing the thought to come!"

The words were spoken quietly, but to the keen, perceptive faculties of the listener there was a depth of passion in the tone. Maud pressed her hand to her side, as if a sudden pain had estruck her, and moved away, passing in front of her rival.

"I am glad that I have found her at last!" murmured Maud as she walked quickly homewards. "It has made me stronger to see her, and I cannot take from her the one thing she possesses!"

Mr. Newbold was out till nine o'clock, and punctually at that hour Mr. Arnold Morrison arrived and was shown into the study. Maud saw him as he left.

"How has it been arranged?" she asked. "Has the weak spot necessitated the complete undoing of the work or can it be strengthened?"

"In this instance it can be strengthened, Miss Newbold," he answered gravely. He was gazing at her, trying to read her soul. "It is an exception!"

"In human character," she proceeded slowly; "a weakness, if properly dealt with, may be turned into strength and the whole structure is really stronger for it afterwards. It requires the moral fibre to cut out the defective point, or to probe it, and do what is necessary to fortify it; and if that be done, the result in after years is self-esteem. That means more happiness; for, if the weakness has been accepted, and one's conduct shaped accordingly, the result would be shame, the inability to hold one's head erect! It were better to suffer the pain of—sacrifice!—than that of shame!"

"I understand you, Miss Newbold!" he said softly, drawing a deep breath. "You are so good, so good!"

He took her hands in his, clasping them so tightly that he hurt her, carried them to his lips, and let them fall. She heard his steps as he passed out. The sacrifice was made!

The wedding took place within six weeks, and the smiling bride little guessed how near to shipwreck her happiness had been.

Maud Newbold was in Cairo on that day, and her aunt wondered at her niece's absentmindedness. Maud's thoughts were far away; there was a dull pain at her heart which struggled for mastery with a fierce joy—the joy that comes from doing what is right at any cost.

"I did not rob her of it!" she murmured many times. And the thought seemed to cause a gleam of light to illumine the vista of long years of single existence that stretched before her!

George Day.

Liver Complaint, Constipation, and Piles.

A LEADER OF 50,000 MEN WHO WAS GIVEN UP AS INCURABLE.

BILE BEANS COMPLETELY CURE HIM AFTER DOCTORS AND OPERATION FAIL.

THIRTY YEARS OF AGONY ENDED.

Mr. Jabez Leedham, of 69 Sauvey Gate, Leicester, ex-president of the National Union of Boot and Shoe Operatives, has had a remarkable record. By his great natural gifts he rose from a humble position in a boot factory to be president of the great boot trade union of 50,000. He reached this position in spite of the fact that for thirty years he battled against liver complaint and piles. He stuck to his work in spite of these ailments until he could do so no longer. When his life was almost despaired of and he was given up by the doctors as incurable, he started using bile beans, and after a course he was restored to complete health and strength.

But hear his story: "It's quite true, he said to the interviewer who waited upon him. "For the greater part of my career as a leader of Labour I have been handicapped by very serious illness. The cause of my trouble was really liver complaint, and which caused an aching head, a feeling of weight, a dull, aching pain in every limb and an overpowering presentiment that some great calamity was going to happen me.

"These are a few of the feelings I had, and every sufferer from liver trouble will recognise them. Constipation was another source of trouble, and, greatest of all, piles. Oh! the torture of the latter ailment I shall never forget. Doctors? Bless you, I went to one after another, and it was all in vain. I went to the infirmary—no use. I stayed at home and rested—no use. I tried various recipes which friends advised—no use. Years ago a very clever medical man told me that there was no hope for me except by a surgical operation, and at last I underwent the operation. To my horror THIS, TOO, PROVED WITHOUT AVAIL. I was soon suffering again as bad as over.

"Sometimes I was so weak that my arms would actually fall helpless at my sides, my speech seemed to be leaving me, and beads of perspiration stood on my forehead. I dearly loved the work of bettering my fellow men through trade union lines, but at last my illness compelled me to give it up and retire from office. Everything failed to do me good, and I was just waiting for the end.

"One day, as I sat in my chair at the door, Mr. Rudkin, the butcher, coming by, stopped and looked at me. 'Leedham,' he said, 'you'll not live much longer, lad, unless you try the right cure, and that is——bile beans. I've been as bad as a man can be, and they cured me.'

"Then I gave them a trial, and at the end of a few weeks I was feeling some better. The drowsy, heavy, dull feelings were getting less troublesome. I began to have more energy, and the piles began to leave me. This improvement increased, and, to cut a long tale short, in a few weeks I WAS RESTORED TO PERFECT HEALTH."

Bile beans are an absolute cure for liver complaint, constipation, piles, indigestion, biliousness, headache, weakness, kidney disorder, pains in the side, loins and back, dizziness, sleeplessness, nervousness, anæmia, and all female ailments. Also for colds, chill, neuralgia, lumbago, rheumatism, and influenza. Bile beans may be had of all chemists, or post free from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., Red Cross Street, London, E.C., on receipt of prices 1s. 1½d. or 2s. 9d. (2s. 9d. box contains three times 1s. 1½d. size). Insist on seeing the name "Chas. Forde" on each box.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM (CLOTTED)

absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil; invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1s. 4d.; 1lb. 2s. 4d.; 2lbs. 4s. 4d., free, supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon.

Digitized by Google

A Shadow Barrier.

The Story of a Broken Engagement and its Sequel.

EDITH had always known that David had been engaged before, but his love had been too satisfying, and she had been too happy to think very much about the matter.

When he asked Edith to marry him, David told her of his previous engagement, and there the subject rested. Edith had been proud to be too honourable to question him; indeed, she was not conscious of any desire to do so. She felt no resentment against the other woman, for David's love was too complete to leave any room for jealousy.

But one evening as they sat in the cosy window-seat in the library, watching the sunset colours change and glow, there came to Edith the woman's instinct to probe the heart of the man she loved, and lay bare all its secrets.

"Do you love me, dear?" she began, moving closer, to run her fingers through David's hair.

"Indeed I do, my darling."

"Better than you ever loved before?"

"Yes, dear."

"That other woman—the one you were engaged to first—did you love her?"

"Of course, or I shouldn't have asked her to marry me!"

Edith's hand dropped to her side, and the man took it and held it in a strong clasp.

"It seems odd," mused Edith. "I suppose you sat by her side and held her hand just as you are holding mine now. Did you make the same pretty speeches you do to me, I wonder?"

"Certainly not," replied David gently. "No man ever makes love to two women in quite the same way."

"No, men are too adaptable for that," said Edith, but there was no malice in her voice, and David, glancing at her quickly, saw that she did not realise how deep the truth of her remarks lay.

"Isn't that red sky gorgeous?" he asked after a moment. "In a little while it will be the faintest pink."

"It's wonderful," said Edith. "Do you know, dear, that you never told me which one of you broke that engagement?"

"Didn't I, dear?"

"No," Edith answered, "but don't tell me if you would rather not," she added softly. "Somehow I feel sure that you did."

"Yes," David said, "you are quite right. I broke it."

"I am glad it was you," said Edith quickly, "because it makes me feel sure you have no regrets. I never had any patience with the false notion of honour that prevents a man from breaking an engagement. I don't see how it can be honourable to marry a woman when you do not love her."

As she spoke Edith looked at her lover to see whether he shared her opinion. His face, with the glory of the sunset full upon it, was very sober.

He did not speak for some time, and Edith waited, knowing he would soon tell her what was in his mind.

"I did not break my engagement because I had ceased to care," he said finally, "but the woman I was to marry did me a great wrong, and I lost faith in her. I could not marry a woman I did not trust, so I released her. I think it right to tell you this, dear."

"And then," said Edith softly, "you ceased to care?"

"Yes, dear, I ceased to care. Not all at once, but gradually. There, now the sky is pink, a pink that would just become you. Don't you wish I were equipped with wings so I could fly up and get you a piece of that cloud for a ball dress?"

"Was it before you met me or afterwards that you ceased to care?" Edith asked.

"I hardly know. It was before, I think, that I stopped caring, but it took you to restore my lost faith in womanhood."

"And I made you forget?" Edith's voice grew tender.

"Yes, dear, you made me forget," said David in the same tone. "See, how fast the pink is fading!" he continued. "It is just as well I could not get you that ball dress, I think. I am afraid the colour wouldn't wash."

Once Edith would have retorted gaily that people didn't wash ball-dresses, but now she gave his hand a tiny pressure and said:

"It must have hurt you dreadfully to be treated so. Are you sure the hurt is all gone?"

David returned the pressure, but he did not speak at once. Edith looked up at him, but the light was growing dim, and she could scarcely see his face.

"It still hurts a little, dear," he said slowly, "not because I have any regrets, but I feel a resentment because of the way I was treated. I shall get over even that in time, but now it makes me angry to think of it. I love you dearly—better than I ever thought I could love anyone, but a blighted trust must always leave a scar, I suppose."

"Poor darling!" Edith's free hand went to David's head and ran lingeringly through his curls and across his forehead. With a caressing motion her fingers touched first his cheeks and then his eyes.

Suddenly she felt something wet against her hand. Her body grew tense, and her arm dropped to her side as though she had been stung.

David had said that the other woman was nothing to him now, but—that tear in his eye! Slowly Edith drew her hand from his clasp, but he did not seem to notice. Presently she shivered, and he felt the motion.

"What is the matter, dear?" he said. "Are you cold? Shall I close the window? See, the pink is only a dull grey now."

"No, I am not cold," said Edith wearily. All the brightness seemed to have gone out of her life; it had changed from gorgeous crimson to a dull grey while the sunset faded. Her

(Concluded on page 412.)

Digitized by Google

ASTHMA

WHY ?? is it generally thought that there is no cure for ASTHMA,

CHRONIC BRONCHITIS,
SHORTNESS OF BREATH, EMPHYSEMA, BLOOD-SPITTING, HAY FEVER, and other Lung Complaints.

BECAUSE !! the usual treatments only confine themselves to combating single symptoms instead of attacking the root of the disease.

BE SURE THERE IS ONE ABSOLUTE LASTING CURE.

Sufferers will receive, post free, Free of Charge, particulars of the famous WEIDHAAS HOME TREATMENT when applying to THE PAUL WEIDHAAS HYGIENIC INSTITUTE, 16 T.A. BUCKINGHAM ROAD, BRIGHTON.

Mr. Weidhaas has tried the Treatment on himself, after having been given up as incurable, and cured himself, and had then practised it for over 19 years in many thousands of special cases. Many having suffered for over 40 years have been cured by this Treatment (in some instances even at the age of 70 or 80 years), after having been GIVEN UP AS INCURABLE.
No interference with daily occupation. Send description of complaint, and mention if you suffer from COLD FEET. Read the following Testimonial, one out of thousands received:

MRS. GREEN.
(From a photo.)

BRONCHIAL ASTHMA (4 years' standing) CURED.

Before undergoing the treatment, Mrs. Green wrote: "I have to sit up, propped up in a chair, by the fire all night. I cannot lie down for the dreadful cough and labouring for breath. It is as if I am being suffocated. I have suffered from Asthma for 4 years. I cannot sleep with my mouth shut. I have pains as if someone were pressing on my chest—piercing pains sometimes. I have palpitations and pains under the heart sometimes. I have always had a short breath from a girl."

After the treatment, Mrs. Green wrote: "I wish I had applied to you before; it would have saved me a great deal of suffering and expense. The doctor that I was under told me that I might go to one hundred doctors, but none could cure me. Now I know there is a cure, simple but wonderful, and would be only too pleased to see anyone that wishes to hear from my own lips what your cure has done for me."
London. MRS. GREEN.

(Full address on application.)

The DIRECTOR is prepared to pay to any Charitable Institution if the above is not a genuine extract from the patient's own letter. The original may be seen at the Paul Weidhaas Hygienic Institute by any bona-fide inquirer.

£1,000

CURABLE

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY

FOR HEADACHE AND Neuralgia.

Cures in TEN MINUTES.

For INFLUENZA.

KAPUTINE immediately relieves the distressing "Influenza" pains and cures the fever.

KAPUTINE has the confidence of and is recommended by many eminent medical men. KAPUTINE is not a single dangerous crude drug, such as has been condemned by the medical papers, but is composed of several ingredients, first discovered thirteen years ago by one of our leading medical men. There is no other remedy like KAPUTINE, the SAFE remedy for Headache and Neuralgia. Ask for KAPUTINE, and see that you get it and not some dangerous substitute offered for the sake of extra profit.

KAPUTINE is the ONLY preparation of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and Infirmaries.

C. E. POPPLESTON, Esq., B.A., Mus. Doc., writing from Exeter College, Oxford, says:

"I have suffered continually from severe Headache. A medical friend advised me to try Kaputine. I did so, and in a few minutes my Headache had left me. It is a splendid remedy."

Packets of 18 doses 1/-,
of all Chemists, Stores, etc., or post free from
KAPUTINE LTD., Huddersfield
for 12 stamps.

MACKINTOSH'S

IS DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!
PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.
A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

DO YOU WANT A GOOD CYCLE?

Write for my Lists. I deal only in the Best Coventry made Cycles, and by contracting for thousands annually, I BUY CHEAPLY and SELL CHEAPLY.

from 8/- MONTHLY

Premiers, Rovers Coventry Challenge, Triumphs, Swifts, Humbers, Centaurs, Raglans, Singers, etc.

The QUALITY is there. Get my prices, save money and ensure satisfaction.

A High-Grade COVENTRY CYCLE for £6-0-0.

Two Years' Guarantee. Easy Payments without publicity. Cycle sent on receipt of first payment. EDWARD O'BRIEN, The World's Largest Cycle Dealer, COVENTRY.

INCREASE YOUR INCOME.

SEND us your name and address, and you will receive Free on approval 24 of our Silver Aluminium 1903 Novelty Thimbles. Each one is prettily embossed with the inscription "Remember Me," "Forget-me-not." They are lighter and tougher than silver, never tarnish, and will last a lifetime. One million sold already.

WE TRUST YOU—
NO MONEY REQUIRED.

Sell the thimbles at 2d. each, making 4/- altogether, which forward to us, and we will send you at once the Guaranteed Timekeeper or other Presents of High-class Jewellery you have earned, and which you can select from our list sent with the "Sell-at-Sight" Thimbles, and we will also tell you how you can make a regular income of £2 10s. per week. Write to-day and we send to-morrow.

GOLD & Co., No. 37 THE WATCH HOUSE Delamere Crescent, London, W.

Mothers

Icilma is the only absolutely safe Natural remedy for children's skin and scalp irritations. A perfect boon in the nursery. Send postcard, with address, for method of treating children's skin troubles by natural remedies and offer to those who have not yet tried it, to ICILMA (Dept. 12), 142 Gray's Inn Road, London, W.C.

MERLIN CYCLES

MARVELLOUS VALUE A HIGH GRADE £10 10 0 Cycle for £5 19 6. Free Wheel and Back-pedal Brake.

Brand New Guaranteed Pneumatic-tyred Cycles for £3 19 6

Merlin Cycles are always good, no matter what price you pay.

MERLIN CYCLE CO., Martineau St, Birmingham

Digitized by Google

heart ached, and her head throbbed. She wanted to be alone —to think it over.

"I have a headache, dear," she said aloud. "I think, if you will excuse me, I will go to bed. Perhaps it will be better by morning."

"I hope so, darling," answered her lover, adding in a whisper, "I am sorry. I'll go now," he continued, "and to-morrow I'll come and take you for a drive."

"Thank you, dear," said Edith, but the face she lifted to his was unresponsive to his kiss.

"Why, your hands are cold!" cried David. "How thoughtless I was to let you sit so long beside that open window! These evenings are cool. But I was watching the sunset, and did not think."

Edith sighed. It was not the sunset that made him forget, she thought.

All night Edith lay awake, staring into darkness. When daylight came she got up and wrote the following letter to her lover—

"Dear David,—I am sorry, I did not mean to hurt you last night. I did not suppose it could hurt you to talk of her. But it did, dear, and so, although you do not know it, you must care for her still. If you did not love her, the thought of her could not bring tears to your eyes.

"I am going to break our engagement, dear, for I love you too well to have even a memory between us. Ah, you don't know how it hurt me when I saw that you did not want to talk of her. Had I shown tact I would have changed the subject, but I could not do that.

"And I should always be wanting to talk of her to see if it hurt you.

"It will be easier to endure the agony of separation than to go through life with this awful ache in my heart, and feeling that I have not the power to heal a hurt that anyone else cou'd cause you.

"Do not try to see me, dear, you cannot alter my decision and you will only make things harder for me. To think of you is almost more than I can bear, and yet I must go on thinking of you always. Good-bye, dear, and God bless you. Edith."

After this letter was sent, Edith took up her life as if it were something that must be got through somehow. A week passed without bringing any sign from David, but on the eighth day a letter came. Edith clutched it to her heart with a fierce eagerness. She had not known how hard it would be to let him go out of her life. Trembling she broke the seal and read the letter.

"My Dear Child,—I shall not try to tell you how your letter hurt me, but it was a hurt far worse than the hurt of the other night, the one that caused you to write it.

"I am not going to plead with you, dear. I am a proud man, and I could not do that, but I am going to ask you to alter your decision.

"I hardly know how to write what I wish to, dear; how to tell you what I want you to know. There can be nothing between us, not even a memory.

"Once I loved that other woman, I believed her everything that was good and womanly, and when my confidence in her was shaken, I thought that I never could trust anyone again. I believed at the time that it was the depth of my love that made me suffer so, but now I know it was because my trust had been betrayed. I mourned, not the woman herself, but the ideal she had shattered. That is why it still hurts me to talk of her, although she is nothing to me now.

"It was you, dear, who brought back my faith in human nature, my trust in woman; and your power to do this is the best proof that I love you as I have never loved before.

"Some people say that a man's first love is his best; if his love lasts and becomes the fuller, rounded love of his later life, it is the best, but each time a man loves he loves against greater odds. His trust has more bitter experiences, more cynicism to battle with. There can be no love that is worthy the name without confidence, and the love that can bring to life a dead faith must be the greatest love.

"I do not think you can realise this, dear; you are too young. But try to believe me, and do not send me away from you. I have said that I would not plead with you, but I do plead, dear. You can do what no one has ever been able to do; you can make me forget my pride.

"I know how you love me. Your letter told me that, as well as of your pain. I am sorry for the hurt, dear. I understand. But if you send me away now, some day, when you are older, and have learnt the difference between the troubles that are shadows, and the cares that must be faced and fought, you will be very, very lonely.

"Better the joy of love, dear, than the pain of loneliness.

"The messenger is to wait for an answer. Will you say, 'Come?'

"David."

"Cry away, dear, it will do you good," said David, an hour later. Edith had said "Come," but on seeing him she had burst into a passion of tears. The sudden release from the tension of the past week was too much for her self-control.

"I don't know why I am crying, I am sure," she said, "for I am glad—oh, so glad! I found out that I could not live without you."

Ina Brevoort.

Binks: "I don't like to complain about trifles, Mrs. Jingle, but my hash appears to consist largely of fragments of deal board." Mrs. Jingle (the landlady): "Well, what kind of board do you expect for twenty-five shillings a week. Mahogany?"

First Sweet Thing: "Is it true that you love Dick Dashleigh? Tell me, dear, in confidence." Second Sweet Thing: "Well then, in confidence, dear, I do love him devotedly." First Sweet Thing (aside): "That settles it! I'll accept the proposal he made me last night."

Consult the Oracle;

Or, How to Read the Future.

A Guide to the Interpretation of Dreams, and to Matters Magical and Mysterious, being the Wisdom of Past and present Times as to what will come to pass.

Crown 8vo, Cloth, Price 1s., post free 1s. 2d.

Some of the subjects dwelt upon in this excellent book are:

Omens, charms, and spells for lovers—Mystery about plants—The Fortunes of little people—Certain cure for adder's bite—Something important about dogs—Character judged by the hands and fingers—How to cure anæmia—Lucky and unlucky numbers—Omens connected with apple trees—Fortunes told by cards—Baptism as it should be—Cupid at work all the year round—Beckoning to ships, unlucky—Getting out of bed backwards, unlucky—What we may learn from bees—Lucky days of birth—Married life begun as it should be—Bleeding at the nose—Unlucky breakages—How to have money plentiful in everyone's pocket—Hints to bridegrooms and bridesmaids—The sneeze of a black cat—Feathered prophets of good and evil—Proper days for putting on new clothes—Lucky coins—Rocking the cradle—How to cure cramp—Fortunes read in the palm of the hand—Notes on dogs—Singing in the ears—The influence of the evil eye, etc., etc.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

To the Peak Publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of "Consult the Oracle," for which I inclose the sum of one shilling and twopence.

Name.....

Address.....

Digitized by Google

Will Deafness afflict half the next Generation?

A startling report on deafness has reached the public press through a prominent London Medical Journal, which publishes an official record of tests of the hearing of school children. These tests show that more than one-half of the children examined were deaf to some degree, and also that, unfortunately, there was a very large proportion where deafness had not previously been recognised. This tendency to overlook a slight defect in the hearing is, without doubt, the reason why the offices of Aurists and our special ear hospitals are crowded with people seeking, later in life, a cure for obstinate deafness. On this question the Editor of the "Journal for the Deaf" gives some interesting advice in a series of articles on "Prevention of Deafness," "Tests of Hearing," and "Cure of Deafness." In the latter paper are discussed the various kinds of treatment. Among these is mentioned the Method adopted by the Drouet Institute, consisting chiefly of an external application, which has succeeded in curing many apparently incurable forms of deafness. The "Journal" referred to can be obtained free by post by addressing the Secretary, Drouet Institute, 10 Marble Arch, London, W. With the Journal will be sent a Report Form, by means of which anyone can obtain free advice as to the treatment of deafness, and Ear, Nose and Throat Diseases. The Editor, however, advises patients, whenever possible, to attend the Institute for a personal examination.

Sulpholine Lotion.

For Clearing the Skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

GIVEN AWAY with the Spring Double No. of

HOME NOTES

(No. 480).

A Paper Pattern of a

BLOUSE.

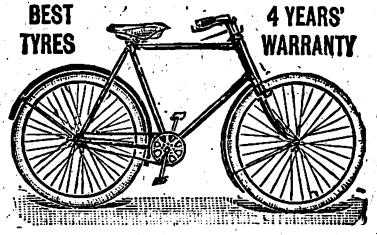
Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE 2d.

HALF PRICE

Greatest Cycle Bargain ever Offered

BEST TYRES — 4 YEARS' WARRANTY



ASTONISHING OFFER!

To introduce Royal Duke Cycles, we will supply 2,000 now, for only half list price—£7 7s. each—with 4 years' warranty. Free wheel, choice of noted tyres, Crabbe brake, triple enamelling and many other important features.

PAY ONE SHILLING WEEKLY

On easy payments, you can send 1 shilling weekly, or any larger amount that suits your convenience. No guarantor, no unreasonable enquiries. Pay while enjoying the use of your machine. Ladies', gents', boys' and girls' models. Every penny of your money returned if not as represented. We point with pride to thousands of voluntary testimonials. Write for full particulars of Royal Duke Cycles, mentioning name of this publication. Enclose stamp. Address:

SYMONDS' LONDON STORES, 124-128, City Road, London, E.C.

Also at 14, Peter Street, Manchester.

SONGS COPIED.

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly 6d. page. Mrs. Conyers, Morchard Bishop, Devon. Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

Do you not envy the woman with a "pearl-like" skin? Then use "Peralia" regularly. It soothes, refreshes, clears and beautifies, making the skin smooth and healthy. Preserves a fine complexion and restores a faded one. Makes the hands and arms like velvet. Endorsed by society and professional women all over the world. Gentlemen find it extremely pleasant after shaving; relieves irritation—cools the skin. Use it for Spots, Blackheads, Freckles, Tan, Redness, and especially for Red Nose.

In Bottles, 1/- 1/6 2/6

Postage, 3d. extra

Doctor's certificate guaranteeing its purity, and testimonials, sent with each bottle.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

TOWLE'S PILLS

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

of all Chemists, or Post Free on receipt of 15, 34, or 56 penny stamps or P.O.O. from the Sole Proprietors

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Nottingham, Eng.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

Or Flat Footed? If so, try our Elevators, which will increase your height from 1 to 4 inches without detection. Comfortable to wear. Price from 5/6, Lady's; 6/6 Gent's, per pair. Send stamps for further particulars. Peralia Co. (Dept. 14), 73, Camden Street, North Shields.

NOSE

If your nose is large or badly-shaped in any way, use our Nose Machine, price 10/-. Cheek Plumpers for thin or sunken cheeks, 10/- pair. Ear Instruments for standing-out ears, 10/- each. Send stamp for further particulars. Peralia Co. (Dept. 14), 73 Camden St., North Shields.

FREE TO YOU

To advertise S.L.S Records, we are giving away our noted Phonographs for a limited time. Write, giving full address and nearest railway station; enclose stamp.

Symonds' London Stores, 128, City Road, London

CRIMPOLINE HAIR CURLING FLUID.

Curls the hair naturally in a few days, and, what is more, the hair will keep in curl. Does not change the colour or destroy the hair but makes it soft and silky, and will curl or friz into natural curls. No tongs needed. Not sticky or greasy like other curling fluids, which only keep the hair in curl. After the hair has become curly it is not necessary to continue using Crimpoline. Give Crimpoline a trial—the result will astonish you. Use it for Ladies', Gents', and Children's Hair. 1/9 and 2/6 per Bottle, Postage 3d. Ask your Chemist or Hair Dresser to get above preparations for you; if they are out of stock, we will send it direct to you secretly packed.

Have no other or you will be disappointed.

Under Royal Patronage. Used by Madame Patti, Vesta Tilley, Minnie Palmer, etc.

PERALIA PERFUMERY CO.

(Dept. 14), 72 and 73 Camden Street, North Shields.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

From Factory to Rider.

How Does This Suit You?

Handsomest & Best of Cycles right away after payment Month's Instalment—or Deposit—as you wish. £14 14s Grade for £6 10s Write, H Dept, Williams' Direct Supply Mfg. Co., 12 Approach, London Bridge, London.

CHICKEN HATCHING EXTRAORDINARY FOR 2/6

The Texas Egg-Hatcher and Rearer combined supersedes all incubators. Hatches above and rears little ones below simultaneously all the year round. A money-making home industry requiring neither capital nor labour. Turns 1d. eggs into valuable Chickens or Ducklings. Millions selling in America. 15-egg size 2/6; 30-egg, 5/-; complete for use. Address, AMERICAN POULTRY SYNDICATE (Room 101), 7 Albion Grove, Stoke Newington, London, N.

Ten Days Free Trial

is allowed on every cycle we sell. The full price and all carriage charges returned if unsatisfactory in any way. 1903 Models, fully warranted,

£3.10 to £6.10

New Departure Coaster Brake Front Rim Brake and highest grade genuine British made fittings and accessories.

200 Good Second-Hand Cycles £1.10 to £2.10

Don't Fail to get our big illustrated catalogue before deciding on your 1903 machine. We save you money.

Rider Agents Wanted in every district to buy sample cycle at special price and take orders for us. Large profits easily made in spare time. Address Dept. 44,

MEAD CYCLE CO. Liverpool.

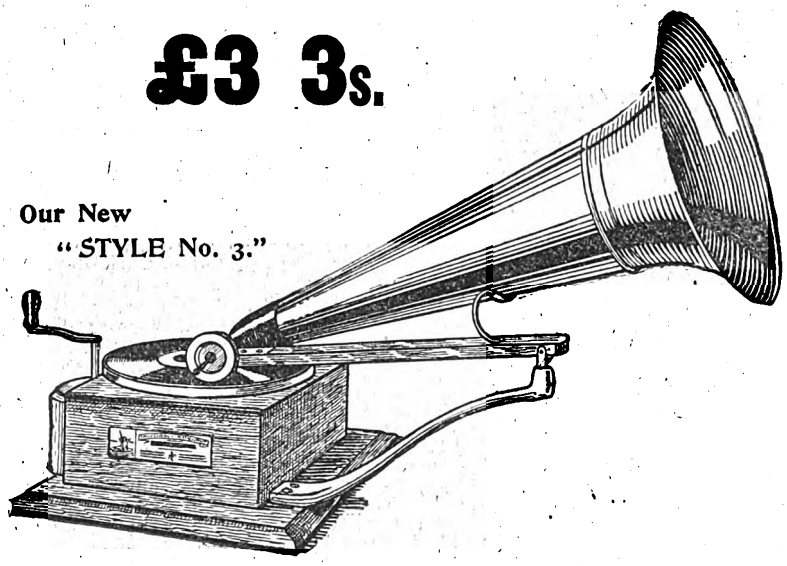
You can now buy a Clockwork . . .

GRAMOPHONE

FOR

£3 3s.

Our New
"STYLE No. 3."



SPECIFICATION:

CABINET—Polished oak.
MOTOR—Strong single spring, clockwork mechanism.
TURNTABLE—Seven inch, will play both 7-in. or 10-in. records.
HORN—Bright nickel 14-in. horn, bell mouth.
SOUND BOX—Our Patent Concert Sound Box (hitherto only supplied with our most expensive machines).
NEEDLES—200 special Sheffield made Gramophone needles in metal box.

This instrument will play 10-in. Grand Concert Records as well as 7-in. Records.

According to the Pall Mall Gazette: "It is without question one of the most extraordinary scientific triumphs of modern science."

The Daily Mail of Jan. 6 says: "It is the most wonderful machine of its kind yet constructed, and almost marks the climax in the art of phonographic construction. Among the 'records' are songs rendered by the greatest opera singers, including all the Covent Garden 'stars' of the past few years. A correspondent who has heard the machine working states that the metallic ring to which one has become so accustomed is quite inaudible, the volume of sound being almost as full as the original voices."

On receipt of a postcard we will send you full Catalogues of our Records, our Price-lists of Gramophones, and the name and address of the nearest dealer in our Gramophones.

THE GRAMOPHONE AND TYPEWRITER LTD.,

21 CITY ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

He Wouldn't Ask Again.

"I'll never ask another woman to marry me so long as I live." "Refused?" "No; accepted."

Putting it Kindly.

This is a delicate way of putting it, isn't it? "My dear," he said to his wife at table, "I begin to think there are a few misprints in your cookery book."

Little Things Tell.

The Curate: "You should always be particular about details, Miss Tucker. It is little things that tell." Nellie: "I know that. I have three small sisters."

He Was Forgiven.

Culprit (in confusion): "I beg pardon! but really I couldn't help it—you looked so roguish and tempting." She: "Are you sorry?" Culprit: "No, I'm not. She: "Then I'll forgive you."

A Smart Husband.

Daughter: "Did you find out what it was that papa cut out of the paper?" Mother: "Yes, I bought another copy. I've read it all through, but I can't see anything wrong with it. It's an article on the healthfulness of housework."

Reason for Extravagance.

Friend: "I can't help wondering why a man on your small salary should give his affianced a cluster diamond engagement ring." Mr. Smartchapp: "That's so she won't slip it off and leave it upstairs when the other fellows call."

Saved the Dentist's Fee.

Mother: "Why, Johnnie, what on earth have you been doing?" Johnnie: "Fight'n! And you owe me half-a-crown on it. You know that tooth you was going to pay a dentist to draw?" "Yes." "Well, Billy Biffer knocked it out."

Why He Ate It.

Young Wife: "Dear, why are you eating so much more of my cake than usual to-night? Is it nicer than it was the last time?" Young Husband: "I—my darling—I—well, to tell the truth, I bet Tobble five shillings that I weighed more than he did, and we are going to settle it to-night."

Her Father's Hobby.

Adorer (anxious to please the old gentleman): "Has your father any hobby?" Sweet Girl: "Yes, he has, and it's such a funny one. It's dogs." Adorer (delighted): "I am somewhat of a dog fancier myself. Which is his favourite breed?" Sweet Girl: "It changes constantly. Every time I'm a year older he gets a bigger dog."

A Lover's Embarrassment.

"And when was it?" she asked tenderly, "that you made up your mind to propose?" He blushed and faltered, and tried to say that it was on a summer night, when she looked radiantly beautiful in the pale moonlight. As a matter of fact, it was one morning when the boarding-house coffee was exceptionally weak; but how could he tell her that?

One of Her Ways.

He "What is Miss Woolson getting that twenty-guinea costume for?" She: "To wear at a charity bazaar; admission sixpence."

Her Ideal.

Ada: "No, Priscilla will never marry unless she find her ideal." Ida: "What sort of a man is her ideal?" Ada: "A man who will propose."

She Liked Mystery.

He: "How fearfully and wonderfully we are made! Think even of my arms, what a mystery they are!" She: "Yes, but it's nice to be enveloped in mystery."

Excessive Politeness.

Sweet Seventeen (to her partner): "So I trod on your toe, Mr. Briggs?" Briggs (excessively polite): "Not at all, not at all, I assure you! Pardon me for having a toe."

A Severe Test.

"Promise me that you will be true to me while I am away," said a youth to the object of his affections. She: "I promise, but don't make me break my word by staying away three or four days."

Gave His Consent.

She: (anxiously): "Have you asked papa, Reginald?" He: "Yes." She (nervously): "What did he say?" He: "He didn't say anything; but I know he gave his consent, for he looked at me in a pitying sort of way, don't you know."

Insult to Injury.

Bertha: "What! That horrid little Alec Sandiman had the impudence to make you an offer? What next?" Alice: "But that wasn't the worst of it, my dear. The nasty little wretch didn't put a stamp on the letter, and I had to pay twopence for it!"

He Meant Business.

Mother: "Mary, that young Spinner has been paying a great deal of attention to you of late. Do you think he means business?" Mary (with a far-away look): "I am afraid he does, mother. He is an agent for a bicycle firm, and he has done nothing but try to sell me a machine ever since he has been coming here."

A Fable.

A young lady was once noticed by her mother to be fondling and kissing a pet kitten. "Why, Mary," said the mother, "you have kissed that kitten more in five minutes than you have me in five years." "Don't you know why I'd rather kiss the kitten than you, mother?" "No, my child." "You haven't got whiskers."

His Place in the Picture.

Mr. Mashemall: "By Jove, Miss Prettypert, I wish you'd put me into your picture." Miss Prettypert: "I will, if you sit where I ask you to." Mr. Mashemall: "Oh, delighted, by Jove! Where shall I sit?" Miss Prettypert: "On that rock in the background. Make haste!" (N.B.—"That rock" is five miles away.)

Buying Him Off.

Mr. Billion: "You shall never marry my daughter, sir." Impassioned Suitor: "Your threats do not frighten me. I'll marry her or die! When I once love, sir, no power on earth can——" Mr. Billion: "Oh, I'm not proposing to use force. How much cash will it take to buy you off?" Impassioned Suitor: "Um—er—how much'll you give?"

Mere Force of Habit.

Distinguished Foreigner: "I think the voices of English girls very sweet, but they would be still more musical if conversation were carried on in a lower tone." London Belle: "We make a good deal of noise; but you must remember our favourite amusement is concert-going, and one gets in the habit of loud talking, trying to make one's voice heard above the music, you know."

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Love Versus Art.

"PETERSBURG" is in love with a young lady who has a great talent for Art, and apparently has a promising career before her. He thinks that the young lady returns his affection, but has not asked her yet. As "PETERSBURG" himself has no talent for Art, he is afraid to ask his lady-love to share his lot, being afraid that, having no sympathy with her work, he might spoil her career. He is on good terms with her parents, but knows that they would be very much against such a union with their daughter.

* * * * *

I don't see that the fact of your not being in sympathy with your lady friend on the question of Art, "PETERSBURG," should prohibit a declaration of love. It is often the case that persons with opposite tastes are most happily married. You surely will be able to find out through a mutual friend, if not in some other way, whether she cares for you or not.

* * * * *

If she really does care for you, and you are able to show her that you can make her happy, I am sure she will not let the Art question be a stumbling-block. Regarding the parents, they are not likely to make a fuss when they see that their daughter is really in love with you; they would not permit you to be on visiting terms had they not some degree of friendship for you.

A Soldier's Trouble.

"XAVIA," who is a soldier, has been engaged to a girl for a few months, and he promised to marry her in November. He now finds that if he marries before the expiration of three years he will forfeit a lot of benefits, which will mean a great deal to him. The girl is slightly his junior, and "XAVIA" wants to know whether he should fulfil the promise made for November or ask the girl to wait.

* * * * *

I should most certainly advise you to wait, "XAVIA." You say you have only known the girl six months in all. That is hardly long enough to get to know whether you are really suited to each other. The lot of a soldier's wife is hard at any time, and think how much harder it will be if the benefits you mention cannot be obtained.

* * * * *

A thing that is worth having is worth waiting for, and, after all, three years will soon pass, and if during that time you find that you have made a mistake in becoming lovers—I imagine from your letter that you are both very young—you will be glad to think that the knot was not already tied.

Girl and Boy Friendships.

"HETTIE B.," who is sixteen, is in great trouble because her mother does not like her to speak in the streets to a number of boys to whom she has been introduced by her girl chums. It does not look very well to see a girl talking in the streets with several boys (or young men, I expect they would prefer to be called), and I think your mother is quite right to raise an objection to it. If you meet them at the houses of friends that is quite a different matter. Mothers generally know best what is good for us, "HETTIE B."

Married Women at Business.

"ONE OF YOUR READERS" has been engaged to a girl for four years, and though he cannot afford to keep her as he would wish, she wants the marriage to take place, and suggests that she should go back to business; and, in fact, tell no one of the marriage except her grandfather, her only relation.

* * * * *

I wonder, "ONE OF YOUR READERS," who your fiancée thinks will look after the home while you are both away at business. If it is necessary for a husband and wife to work all day in order to keep the home together they are not likely to be able to afford to keep a servant, and in consequence the home must suffer.

* * * * *

Ask your fiancée how she thinks she will like to come home to prepare a meal after a hard day's work. She will find that she simply cannot do it; she will break down utterly. If she wants to get married, and you see no prospect of improving your position for some time, you should consent to marry and then set up an establishment well within your means. Don't conceal the fact that you are married from anyone; it is always an unwise thing to do, and may lead to endless trouble.

Etiquette.

"AT a party should the husband or the wife enter the room first?" asked "D. F.," "also, when should the hostess leave the room after a meal?"

* * * * *

It is usual for the lady to be taken to the hostess' room to disrobe, while her husband waits for her downstairs. When the lady returns, she should enter the room first, followed by her husband. As to the hostess, after a dinner or supper she always leaves the room first—to show the way, as it were—and her guests follow her.

Mixed Marriages.

"MOSSIE," who is British, lives in Cape Colony. He was formerly engaged to a Dutch girl, but owing to his parents' opposition, she gave him up, not wishing to cause ill-feeling in the family, though at the same time persisting that she still loved him. "MOSSIE" will be independent of his parents in a year or so, and he wants to know whether he should give her up absolutely; they are both very unhappy without the other.

* * * * *

The subject of mixed marriages is a difficult one, "MOSSIE." I have known of very happy marriages between Dutch and British, and also the reverse. It is quite possible that your parents' prejudice against the Dutch was caused by the late war, and they will soon forget about it.

* * * * *

I would advise you to wait a year before doing anything definite, and if you are both in the same mind then, try to win over your parents to your way of thinking. If they will not be won I should advise you to marry in the face of their opposition, as, after all, though it is much more agreeable when parents are fond of their daughters-in-law, such a state of things is not absolutely essential, and Time heals many wounds.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"It deserves all the praise it has received from the Leaders of the Profession."—Medical Magazine.

Ask for the "Five Boys" Milk Chocolate.

"Unrivalled as a Chocolate Confection."—Medical Magazine.

Digitized by Google

Cadbury's cocoa

THE STANDARD OF HIGHEST PURITY.—The Lancet.

Cadbury's is Cocoa and the Best Cocoa only.

ABSOLUTELY PURE.

"Cocoa alone is an excellent food as well as a stimulant, having a salutary action upon the nerve centres."
The Lancet.

"Cadbury's is a perfectly pure Cocoa of the highest quality."—Medical Annual.

A Perfect Beverage for all Seasons of the Year.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

are

THE REMEDY FOR THE PEOPLE.

RECOMMENDED BY FRIENDS TO FRIENDS.

NOT PUSHED BY DOUBTFUL METHODS.

DESERVING OF THEIR POPULARITY.

NOW ENJOYING A GREATER SUCCESS THAN EVER.

STILL WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

BIRD'S CUSTARD POWDER

BIRD'S CUSTARD is Pure, Nutritious, and easily digested. It is a delicious article of food for daily use. Exquisite for Luncheon, Dinner, or Supper. Eggs often disagree; BIRD'S CUSTARD never.

In Springtime,

BIRD'S CUSTARD AND RHUBARB. Wholesome and healthful, rich and creamy. BIRD'S CUSTARD is the one thing needed with all Stewed, Tinned, or Bottled Fruits. It enhances their flavor and imparts to them a grateful mellowness.

NO EGGS! NO RISK! NO TROUBLE!

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

START THE NEW COMPETITION NOW.

SHORT STORIES.

No. 744.] Week ending April 4. 1903. [Price One Penny

He struck a match and went forward. By the dim light he could see the form of a woman lying chained to the bed. "Daisy," he cried, as the light fell on her face, "my love! Why are you here?"

Digitized by Google

A Dramatic Incident from the Story, "A CHANGE OF IDENTITY." See inside.

Headache

Kaputine cures the most obstinate Headache or Neuralgic Pains in ten minutes. Is the only preparation of its kind having the confidence and recommendation of Medical Men.

Kaputine
THE SAFE REMEDY

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., says: There can be no hesitation on the part of anyone suffering from Neuralgic troubles to employ Kaputine—the safe remedy.

The only remedy of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and Infirmaries.

Packets of 18 doses 1s.

KAPUTINE LTD., HUDDERSFIELD.

Neuralgia

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES' Cutlery

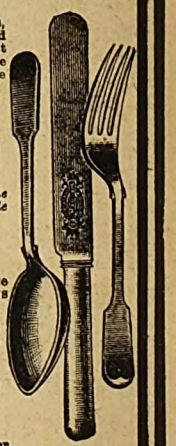
THE "ENTERPRISE" . PARCEL . 25/-

Household Cutlery & Plate.

Containing: 6 Table Knives and 6 Dessert Knives, made of reliable Sheffield Steel and fitted with polished white "Ivorette" Handles. "Ivorette" is the best substitute for genuine African Ivory. The Plate consists of 6 Table Forks, 6 Dessert Forks, 2 Table Spoons, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Tea Spoons, 6 Egg Spoons, 2 Mustard Spoons, 2 Salt Spoons, 1 Pair of Sugar Tongs, 1 Moist Sugar Spoon and 1 Pickle Fork.

The Spoons and Forks are made of 'Columbian' Silver, a hard white metal. It is the finest substitute for Sterling Silver known, will wear white throughout, and is unaffected by acids or exposure.

J. G. Graves is the only Manufacturer who supplies the Public direct, and the whole of the above Goods are made in the Firm's own factory in Sheffield.



HOW TO PAY.

Send 5s. with order and complete purchase in five more monthly payments of 4s.; or HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT for full cash payment.

All orders are executed under Positive Agreement to refund the full amount of the deposit if the Goods are not perfectly satisfactory in every respect.

Send for No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery Cutlery and Plate, Fancy Goods, etc., Post free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms and particulars. No Risk. Good Pay.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

Free Wheels. New Departure Hub, Bowden Brakes. All Improvements—Lamp, Bell, &c. Carriage paid.

Carr. Paid. For Cash or 12 Monthly Payments of

£8 8s.	15/10	£9 10s 17/6
£9	16/8	£10 5s. 19/3

Juno Motor Cycle is the King of Motor Cycles, £32 or 60/- mo. Accessories at lowest prices; Acetylene Lamp, 2/11; Cycle Stand, 1/8; Motor Horn, 5/6.

Write for New Season List, 136 pages and 600 illustrations, sent post free.—METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co. Ltd. (S.S. Dept.), 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C. West End Showrooms: Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

PIANO VAMPING (BOOK 16 PACES.)

2/6 to £1 may be earned nightly by anyone having good knowledge of above. No knowledge of music required. A genuine work. Post free, 2/-; Colonies, 3/-.

Agent (Dept. A), 16 Eton Rd., Southsea, Hants.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

"As a specific for Toothache it has no equal. I have used it successfully for years."—Prof. W. WILSON, M.D.

THE BEST FAMILY MEDICINE

KAYE'S WORSDELL'S PILLS

Are a certain Cure for Indigestion, Biliousness, Headache, Dyspepsia, Constipation, Liver and Kidney Complaints etc. For Ladies of all ages they are invaluable.

Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and 4s. 6d. per box.

SPECIAL BARGAINS

ANY SENT ON APPROVAL WILLINGLY.

SAVE £ d S

GENT'S 18-ct. Gold-cased KEYLESS HUNTER, jewelled movement, lever balance, exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; sacrifice, 10/6; approval willingly.

POWERFUL FIELD GLASSES by celebrated optician (Le Gautier, Paris); 30 miles range; 8 achromatic lenses (guaranteed), nickel silver eyeshades, in leather sling case; sacrifice 10/6.

GLADSTONE BAG, 24in., superior quality, real brown cowhide, strong leather straps, nickel silver fittings, &c.; in perfect condition; unsoiled; cost 4 guineas; accept 25/-; approval.

LADY'S pretty 18-carat gold-cased KEYLESS WATCH, extra fine quality, jewelled movement, beautifully ornamented dial; perfect timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; sacrifice, 12/6; approval before payment.

FASHIONABLE LONG NECK - CHAIN, genuine 18-carat rolled gold (stamped), beautifully finished elegant West End design; sacrifice, 9/6.

MAGNIFICENT 5-ROW PEARL COLLARETTE; finest quality; mounted with four bars of lustrous Orient diamonds, in velvet-lined case, complete; sacrifice, 12/6; approval willingly.

LADY'S lustrous DIAMOND & RUBY RING, 5 large, matchless double rubies and 8 real diamonds, solid gold, hall-marked setting; sacrifice, 12/6.

CURB CHAIN BRACELET, with paddock and safety chain; 18-carat, rolled gold (stamped and guaranteed), in velvet case; sacrifice, 7/6; approval.

MANDOLINE, genuine Italian (Stridente, Naples); very fine tone, real rosewood, pearl inlaid, in saddler-made case; sacrifice, 19/6; approval willingly.

ORGAN-TONE MELODEON, magnificent 26/- instrument. 12-fold bellows (metal bound), 3 sets steel bronze reeds, 4 acting stops, powerful tone; perfect order, sacrifice, 10/6; approval willingly.

HANDSOME REAL MARBLE CLOCK, highly finished lever movement, 9in. high, in perfect order, guaranteed 10 years; sacrifice, 10/6; approval.

FEATHER BOAS; bankrupt stock, special bargains, real Ostrich Feather Boas, beautifully curly, perfectly new, in box colours, grey and white, black and white, and natural. Prices 10/6 and 12/6. Original price 30/- and 12/-; each approval willingly.

LADY'S 6-guinea solid gold (stamped) KEYLESS WATCH, jewelled in 10 rubies, richly engraved case, splendid timekeeper; 10 years' warranty; week's free trial; sacrifice, 21/-.

A full list of Special Bargains, New and Second-hand, can be had free on application.

R. H. DAVIS, Pawnbroker and Jeweller, 284 Brixton Road, London, S.W.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Short Stories

No. 744.] [One Penny.

For the Week Ending April 4th, 1903.

A Change of Identity.

The Story of a Double Wrong.

Containing the Incident Depicted on the Cover.

"Prompt action was necessary," said Mr. Josiah Wilkins, solicitor, to his son Henry, "so I wired for Netta to come at once, and she will, I hope, be here as soon as Daisy Penfold."

"And then?" queried Henry.

Josiah Wilkins meditated for a while, and his son's mind went over the facts of the matter which was necessitating prompt action.

David Millar was a wealthy gentleman with only two relatives, two nieces, Netta Morris and Daisy Penfold. The latter was his favourite, for the former he entertained the greatest aversion. He had made a will, by which he left about half his fortune in charitable bequests and the remainder to Daisy Penfold.

It was Josiah Wilkins' object to obtain a goodly share of the wealth for Netta Morris, who was his brother's step-daughter, although Millar did not know this last fact, having refused to take any interest in that side of his family connections.

Millar had agreed to make a will, but his purpose was to leave all his money to Daisy; so Wilkins had conceived the plan of getting Millar into his office to sign the will, but, just as he was about to append his signature to have the electric light fuse tampered with so that the office would be in darkness for a few minutes.

This would enable him to substitute another document, giving all to Netta; the testator and witnesses (these last not knowing the contents of the will) would sign, and there could be no dispute after the old man's death. But Millar had been taken dangerously ill quite suddenly, and had himself sent a telegraphic summons to Daisy Penfold.

The will not having been signed, he intended to cross out the charitable bequests in the old will, and to hand his safe keys to Daisy in the presence of the witnesses, Wilkins and his son, which formalities would constitute a valid bequest.

"There is only one thing to be done," said Josiah Wilkins. We must have that money or we shall have to flee the country very soon, for there are several trust moneys I can't account for! So we must substitute persons instead of names. Daisy and Netta are somewhat alike, and neither is known here. As soon as Millar has done the trick, we must get rid of Daisy, and Netta must become Daisy!"

Henry nodded.

"You don't mean murder, I suppose?" he asked quietly.

"Gracious, no!" cried Josiah Wilkins, turning pale. "We must keep her confined."

"Boyle will do that!" declared the son. "He will jump at the chance, as an experiment; and, after a time, she will come out, not only harmless to us, but a witness in our favour, having lost her identity!"

They elaborated their diabolical plan, and then went to Millar's house to await the coming of Daisy.

When she arrived she was met by Josiah, who introduced himself, and escorted her to the darkened room where her uncle lay. The only person there, other than Millar, was Henry Wilkins.

The old man and woman, who acted as servants, had been kept out by Wilkins, who declared that when they, he and his son, acting as legal advisers, had finished their business, they would retire and the servants could enter.

Was there any doubt that Millar would die quickly? That was the only immediate danger. They felt convinced that he would last only a little longer; they had even been apprehensive that he might die before the arrival of Daisy.

"Uncle!" called the girl softly, striving her hardest to keep back the tears. He had been kind to her, so kind! She had never been to his house to stay, but he had visited her at school, and had seen that she was well cared for. "Uncle!" she called again.

The old man came to himself with a start, and looked about him eagerly. The girl uttered his name, and took his hand; the touch quickened him into life. He called her by name and seemed to regain his strength.

"I have made a will, Daisy!" he said, speaking hurriedly, as if afraid that he would not have time to say all he wished. "I have crossed some out—it is all for you now—Wilkins has arranged—take these keys! There! You witness it, Wilkins? Where is he?"

The old man's strength was maintained till he had performed the formality which Wilkins had been successful in making him understand, but he afterwards fell back exhausted.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

Daisy, forgetful of her inheritance, scarcely comprehending these formalities, bent over the pallid face and kissed it. The tears welled to her eyes, as she turned anxiously, desperately to Wilkins and asked what could be done. She did not notice that Henry Wilkins had left, and she had heard nothing of the hurried consultation between father and son. The time had arrived for setting the plot afoot!

"Nothing can be done, my dear young lady," responded Wilkins sorrowfully. "The end is at hand. Let me take you away!"

But Daisy refused to move, and Wilkins waited impatiently till a deep sigh came from Millar. Daisy had never seen death and she thought this was the end. Wilkins seized the opportunity, telling her that all was over, although he knew better. Daisy uttered a subdued cry of bitter grief, and suffered herself to be led from the presence of the one who had done so much for her.

Wilkins summoned the servants to the room by a bell; they saw the girl, her face buried in her hands, walking feebly by the side of the solicitor, and the old woman's heart went out to her. She was about to offer to conduct the young lady to her room, but Wilkins waved her back.

Unknown to Daisy Penfold, Wilkins locked her in her room, and remained on guard at the head of the stairs. He was not easily moved, but the position of affairs agitated him. He was waiting for Henry Wilkins to return with Netta.

The doctor might come in at any moment, and so complicate matters; Daisy might wish to go to the room of the supposed dead man, and might raise her voice in alarm, and downstairs lay a man whose life was fast ebbing away, and whose property was being stolen by the villains who were wishing for his speedy end, and pretending to be his friends.

"He must be dead by now!" muttered Wilkins angrily. "What a time Harry is! I hope nothing has prevented Netta from coming! What's that?"

In the stillness he heard a faint cry, a weird sound that struck terror into his soul for the moment. It came from downstairs.

"Pshaw!" The cold drops stood on his brow. "Is that the end of Millar?"

Then a ring at the bell. Wilkins hurried below, and admitted two persons.

"All is ready!" whispered Harry. "Here is Netta. Can we get Daisy down? Is Millar dead?"

"I think—I hope so!" was the trembling reply. "Quick! Have you the chloroform?"

"Yes!"

They crept upstairs, Netta following. Unlocking the door, the three entered. Daisy, who knelt by the bed with her face buried in the clothes, looked up with tear-stained face as she felt a touch on the shoulder. Instantly something was clapped to her face and she found herself powerless and perceiving strange visions.

The two men lifted the senseless form and carried her downstairs, and within three minutes she was being conveyed by road to Dr. Boyle's private nursing home in a remote part of Kent.

The three conspirators returned to Millar's room. He still breathed, much to their disappointment. The servants were once more dismissed, and the three plotters waited.

"He won't come round again!" said Henry. "We are safe enough!"

As if to belie his words, Millar opened his eyes, and, by an effort, sat bolt upright in bed. His eyes were wide open, and he glared at them.

"Where is Daisy?" he asked, in a shrill voice. Then, as Netta stepped forward, he cried aloud, in anguish and terror, "No, no! You are robbing me! I feel it, I know it! I felt it as I reached the borderland, and I have come back to prevent it!

"You are robbing me, robbing me! I know it! I feel it! Restore what you have taken! Right the wrong!" he shrieked.

He raised his hand and pointed a terrible finger at them all, while they stood paralysed with fear at this awful re-awakening, this return of strength, shrinking from the warning finger, and trying to shut the spectacle from their eyes. "Heaven will send its wrath down on you! Help, help! I am robbed—robbed!"

That was his last effort. He fell back, the terrible warning finger still pointing at them. The stiffening arm and finger slowly descended to the coverlet, but it was still pointing at them. Millar was dead.

* * * * *

Dr. Boyle's nursing home was situated in a very lonely part of Kent, as plenty of fresh air was essential to cure. It was a spacious house, but it was practically empty, for very few patients came to it. Boyle lived there with one servant, an elderly woman, partly deaf.

When he had good-paying patients, Dr. Boyle engaged a nurse, but that was not often. He was usually regarded, by the few who knew him, as a crank; he had certain theories which he tried to work out, and in which he had a firm belief.

He was the sort of man to lend himself to such a plot as that hatched by the Wilkinses, and he would be quite an innocent accomplice. To him it would be a scientific experiment, and it would not occur to him that he was doing wrong.

"The experiment is going on capitally!" he murmured, rubbing his hands gleefully. "This young woman will completely lose her identity in time! Let me see! Yes, she has been here one month. At first she was a trouble, a great trouble! She didn't give the least hope of success, but that made her a good subject for experiment, and will prove the accuracy of my theory! I'll go and see her again!"

He ascended the stairs to a room on the first floor. Listening at the keyhole and hearing nothing, he cautiously unlocked the door and entered.

The room was in darkness; he lighted a candle which stood on the mantelpiece, and the light revealed a bedstead, with the form of a woman lying on it. He approached the bed and held the candle so that he could obtain a good view of the figure, and surveyed it with a calm and critical eye.

It was Daisy Penfold! She was asleep or insensible on the bed, her wrists were encircled with a chain which, at the other end, was attached to the head of the bed.

"H'm! Asleep!" murmured Dr. Boyle thoughtfully. "That will do her good. She is tired out with her tantrums! I was sorry to chain her, but it was necessary to prevent her from throwing herself against the door, and it will also help in the experiment, as the electricity will be attracted to the metal, and then to her brain through the wrists!"

He straightened himself and paced noiselessly about the apartment. He cut a queer figure, dressed as he was in a silk hat, and ready for a walk, but still holding the lighted candle.

"It's a grand idea, and it shows how backward are our men of science that they ridicule it as impossible!" he went on. "The object of this particular test is to make that girl believe she is not herself, but some other girl—some mythical creature whom we call Netta Morris.

"She is to lose, entirely, her former identity, and to believe that she has been brought up under another name, and in absolutely different circumstances. This is done by means of electricity.

"This chamber is pervaded by the subtle force; it oozes

Digitized by Google

into the room from a dozen points. It gets into her brain, changes the convolutions, affects the grey matter, and brings about a phenomenon similar to that occasionally caused by an accident, where people quite forget who they are, forget that they were expert typists and what not.

"Only, I go further and cause the patient to assume another identity! And when once that is accomplished, nothing will ever undo it!

"This girl is losing her identity; in a week or ten days, she will be Netta Morris. I can then let her go; she will not be mad, not in the least! She will be perfectly sane, but she will be somebody else—and ready to swear to it!"

He bent over the unfortunate girl once more. She moved uneasily, opened her eyes, and hastily rose from the bed and stood before him with eyes flashing angrily.

"Go away!" she cried. "Why do you put me in irons, in chains, like a criminal?" She raised her arms and the chain clanked. "Release me and leave me! Oh, dear! what is it?"

She lifted her manacled hands and passed them over her forehead. She seemed dazed now. Dr. Boyle smiled complacently.

"You will be well soon, Netta Morris," he said, in a soft, purring tone. "Have patience, be quiet, and you will be leaving here soon."

"Why do you call me by that name?" demanded the girl. "Yet—yet it seems that it is my name. I thought I was—was Daisy something. Netta, Netta?" She sank on the bed in perplexity and gazed vacantly at the floor.

Dr. Boyle smiled again. "Some food will be brought to you when I return from my walk," he said, "and you will feel better!" He turned on his heel and left poor Daisy Penfold to wrestle vainly with the mystic force that was changing her identity.

While Daisy was being thus tortured in the name of science, at the investigation of villains and the hands of a fanatic, the three conspirators were taking things easily in the house of the eldest, Mr. Josiah Wilkins.

The pseudo Daisy, otherwise Netta, was living there for the time, it having been considered advisable to leave Millar's house. Some money had been advanced to the heiress by the executor, a former colleague of Millar, who was not moving so quickly in the matter of proving the will as Wilkins liked.

In the new will, had it been signed, he would have been executor, and he was getting anxious about his position. He had already secured Netta's signature to a deed transferring half the property to himself and his son, as soon as she should enter into possession.

They found Netta quite willing to act in accordance with their wishes, for she worshipped gold, as old Wilkins had said, and would do anything for it—that is, she was agreeable on all points save one, and that was to receive the matrimonial proposals of Henry Wilkins. Had this been necessary in order to secure money, she would not have hesitated; but it was not necessary.

"I think things are going well," remarked Josiah Wilkins easily. There was a great contrast between his appearance now and when the dead finger was pointing at him. "We may, I am sure, consider that we are safe. Candidly, I quite fail to see any chance of identification. How about her?"

"Going on satisfactorily, according to Boyle," answered Henry.

"When she comes out, we can give her a few hundreds to help her," said Netta with callous indifference.

"Well, I'll be off now and leave you young people to yourselves," observed Josiah Wilkins. "I daresay you have something to say to one another which old fogeys like myself do not want to hear."

"Exactly!" approved Henry.

"No, we haven't!" snapped Netta, rising to go.

She followed the elder man from the room and passed into one of the reception rooms. With a face dark with anger, Henry put on his hat and coat and stalked out of the house.

Netta sat in solitude, alternately reading and meditating. She did not intend to marry Henry, so much was certain, but her heart longed for the love of a man of her choice. Where would she meet him?

She was interrupted in her none-too-pleasant reflections by a servant. A gentleman to see Miss Daisy Penfold; the name on the card was Cyril Mortimer. Netta ordered the servant to usher the visitor into her presence.

"I don't know the name, but I may as well see him! It makes a change!" she mused.

A young man entered. As soon as the door closed behind him, he made a hurried step forward.

"Daisy, at last!" The voice was eager. "Why did you not write to tell me that——" He broke off abruptly as Netta advanced. "I beg your pardon!" he stammered in confusion; "I have—the servant has—made a mistake!"

"My name is Daisy Penfold," declared Netta calmly, not foreseeing the danger. This young man charmed her; she tried to be pleasing. "You came to see me? I have not the pleasure of knowing you."

It was not exactly conventional, but that did not matter to Netta.

Mr. Cyril Mortimer became grave; this girl was so unlike the Daisy he knew, in manner, that if her form and voice had been the same he would have known that she was not his Daisy.

"There is some great error," he said earnestly. "You are not the Miss Penfold whom I know. I must apologise for the intrusion."

Netta was sad; she did not want this young man, so tall and so handsome, to pass out of her life. Yet she could do nothing to prevent it, and in her absorption she forgot to make even a plausible attempt at explaining the difficulty. When Mortimer was gone, she realised the position.

"What a donkey I am!" she cried, clasping her hands. "I ought to have told him that she had run away, disappeared. He will try to find her! We have overlooked this chance of identification. We forgot that she might have a lover!"

It is strange to notice how the cleverest rogues often leave a weak spot in an elaborate plan; this is what the Wilkinses had done.

Josiah and Henry were disturbed when they heard the news, but after reflection they regained their composure.

"It will be impossible for him to find her," said Henry. "It destroys our chance of bringing her forward, should we want to, as Netta Morris, but I fancy that we shall not want to do so. When she is thoroughly 'treated,' we can send her away. It's all right! At the same time, it teaches us that it may be well to realise old Millar's estate and invest the cash abroad!"

Mr. Cyril Mortimer was not satisfied. He had heard that Daisy had gone to her uncle; that uncle was dead, and Daisy was said to be living in the solicitor's house; but that Daisy was not his love.

He went back to the old servants, but they told him that there was no possibility of two Daisy Penfolds.

Cyril set his teeth hard and vowed to find his lost love. He hung about the residence of the Wilkins and acted the part of amateur detective, as well as employing one to trace Daisy from the time she was seen off in the train en route for her uncle's house.

On the third day he was rewarded. He saw the father and son go out together and shadowed them. They stopped at the post-office, talking, while

Digitized by Google

Henry held a letter, ready to drop into the box when he had finished. Cyril strolled casually past them, and his keen eye caught a part of the writing on the envelope. "Boyle" and "Kent."

He set to work at once to find out the name of Boyle, applying to a firm of envelope addressers. Love is said to be blind, but at times it has keen sight.

Cyril saw hazily through the deep mist, a mist that would have baffled all save the keen mental vision of a lover. He immediately grasped the fact that Daisy might be detained in this nursing home.

He was soon watching the place, after having gleaned some information about it. He saw Boyle go out and he made a bold move; he knocked at the door, and said he had been sent to inspect the small electric plant, as something had gone wrong, and the old lady let him in. Within fifteen minutes he had eluded the old dame's vigilance and was at Daisy's door.

His heart beat more quickly as he tried the door and found it unlocked. Was it Daisy within? He hoped and believed so. He peered in. All was dark; it was a room without a window. He struck a match and went forward.

"Daisy!" he cried, his hopes and fears realised as the light fell on the figure of the girl he loved. "Daisy, my love! Why are you here?"

She looked at him with unknowing eyes; she did not recognise him. He stepped back in horror as he noticed this, even in the poor light; then he heard the chilling clank of chain and his heart contracted with fear as he perceived that she was chained to the bed.

"Daisy, my darling. what have they done to you?" he cried in agonised tones. "Don't you know me, dear? It is Cyril!"

"I am Netta Morris," she replied coldly. "Why do you call me Daisy? When are you going to take these chains from my wrists?"

Cyril Mortimer was beside himself with grief, rage, and terror.

"I'll soon have the chain from your wrists!" he cried.

He dashed from the apartment and down the stairs, where he found a heavy poker. He met the old woman on his return, but he pushed her aside and left her screaming "Murder!" and "Help!"

He cared for nothing now. In a moment he was with Daisy. With one powerful blow he smashed the link attached to the bedstead, and Daisy was so far free.

"Daisy, Daisy!" he cried in anguish. "Oh, Heaven! What have they done to my love?"

In his agony he caught her in his arms, pressed her to his breast, and rained kisses upon her sweet face, calling her by endearing terms all the while. He felt her quiver under his caresses, and, a moment later, a wild cry burst from her lips.

Love had undone the work of science and villainy; she knew him, her memory returned with a rush, and she cried:

"Cyril, my love!"

A sound at the door caused them to turn; they saw Dr. Boyle glaring at them. He pulled the door quickly, and they heard the key in the lock.

"We will soon settle that!" cried Cyril, seizing the poker. "Follow me, Daisy, and we will regain freedom!"

With a mighty smash he shivered the lock and panel, and they went out. Boyle retreated before the threatening poker, and there was no obstacle to liberty. Within half-an-hour Daisy was rid of her manacles, and, after a rest, the lovers returned to London, where Cyril placed Daisy in safety.

Cyril had hoped to catch the Wilkinses by prompt action, but a telegram from Boyle warned them and they fled, taking what money they could realise, which was very little. They left Netta in the lurch, to face the consequences alone.

Dr. Boyle was sentenced to imprisonment as a criminal lunatic; he was scarcely that, but he was not a fit person to be left at liberty to do mischief in the name of science.

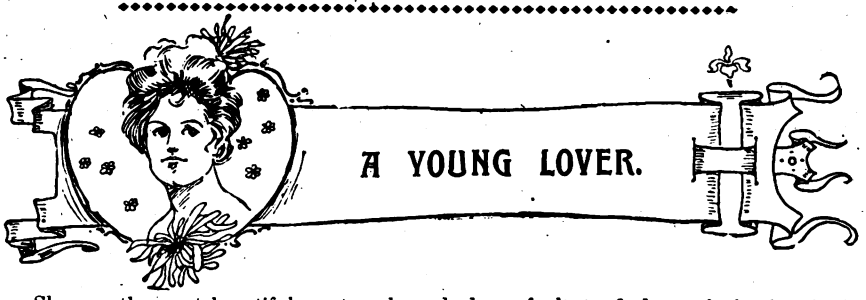
His great regret was that he had not been able to properly complete his experiment, owing to Cyril's appearance; two or three days longer, he said, and the experiment would have been finished.

At Daisy's request, Netta was allowed to go without punishment.

"I am sorry for you, Netta," she said gently, "and I will give you an annuity, so that you may never want. Go away and be penitent!"

Netta's eyes filled with tears at this unexpected treatment, and she left her cousin's presence with broken words of thanks.

George Day.



He loved her — very much. He thought that he had never loved half so much before. And she? Well, she may have loved him; that he didn't know—he hadn't asked her.

She was twenty. She was the most beautiful creature he had seen. Her hair was black—as ink; her skin was white—as a lily; and her eyes—how brilliant they were! They seemed to look into his soul. And he wondered if she knew it.

He had never seen anybody so ravishing to look at—not even in fancy. He had never before left his food half-tasted on his plate—not even at the seaside hotel. He had never before found it a task to close his eyes at night—not even when he had been ill with fever.

As for her, she looked upon him with favour; she would take his hand as they walked along the beach, and when the waves rolled further than she expected on the sand, she would cry, "Look out, Harry, dear," or the like.

He presumed he ought to be happy—there was no reason why he should not be; others in his position would have been.

Ah, yes; it was well enough—until the five o'clock express from London came in. Then she would be dressed in something wonderful in blue and gold, or in grey and black, or in pink and white, and she would walk in the gardens of the hotel and chat and gossip with the men who had been in town all day. Of course, when he came up, she treated him civilly, and he had no fault to find—no fault, that is, in order. Yet he asked himself sometimes if she was treating him as one individual, or as a species.

Ah, well! One day, fourteen trunks were loaded on the van at the side door. A good many of the trunks belonged to her. She was going away.

She came to him. She was dressed for travelling, in a tailor-cut gown with plaitings of Indian cloth on the front of the bodice, and with a black veil that could not hide the sparkle of her eyes. She held out her hand to him in good-bye, and then impulsively she took his head in her hands and kissed him.

What a thrill went through him!

He looked up—she was gone! Quickly he heard the rumbling of the van. Then he heard nothing—except that he imagined that he heard his heart beat.

He was all alone, and he let his head drop on his breast, and he cried as though his heart would break.

For, after all, he was only six years old.

O. P. W.

Digitized by Google

BRAND NEW COMPETITION. ‖ Start To-day.

Cash Down. Cash Down. Cash Down.

1st Prize, £50. 2nd Prize, £25. 3rd Prize, £10.

and 25 Gramophones.

THIS IS AN ENTIRELY NEW COMPETITION AND IS NOW PLACED BEFORE THE PUBLIC FOR THE FIRST TIME. IT IS EXCEEDINGLY SIMPLE, AND IS OPEN TO EVERY PERSON WHO READS "SHORT STORIES."

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below will be found six paragraphs containing the buried names of Railway Stations in the United Kingdom (or words that sound the same as the names). You must write in the spaces given the names of the Railway Stations so indicated.

No word or part of a word may be used more than once in making up the name of a Railway Station. In the event of the name of a Railway Station occurring more than once in a sentence, it should be underlined and written down each time. In case of more than one person finding the same number of words for each or any sentence, those words containing the largest number of letters will have preference.

When you have discovered the names of Railway Stations in the sentences, underline (in ink) the words which go to make up the names (or words that sound the same as the names) and then on the line underneath each sentence write (in ink) the correct names of the Railway Stations to be found in each.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to Bradshaw's Guide, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or Room Eight, SHORT STORIES, 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The names of the Railway Stations consist of one word or two or more consecutive words, or consecutive parts of one word, or two or more consecutive words.

The first prize of £50 will be given to the Competitor who fills in the greatest number of railway stations under the conditions stated.

The second prize of £25 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in the order of merit.

When you have filled in all the names you can find, cut out the list below and keep it by you. Don't on any account send it to us until the closing date is announced in SHORT STORIES. A third list of sentences will appear next week.

In the event of a tie a further list (or, if necessary, several further lists) of sentences will be submitted to the tieing competitors until one wins the first prize outright.

CUT THROUGH HERE

EXAMPLE.

The oaks were swaying in the breeze, the cows were grazing peacefully, when out of the park tore a huge black bull.

The Oaks, Sway, Cowes, Grays, Park, Black Bull.

SECOND LIST.

7. You might send Brown down for the cape Lucy Timmins left at the Manor, she will brook no delay.

8. The mallow, rose, mountain ash, berried plants, and Indian corn would make any garden pretty.

9. They wrestled for a star, crossing over after every genuine round. O'Connor O'Cluny was victorious.

10. Several shots were fired on a Monday morning, so scenting danger, on the succeeding mornings I departed earlier than usual for business.

11. He carved four crosses, one on each of the four stones; he also said he was willing to number Lizzie Claxby's flock of sheep.

12. We conned over the manual of Ho-Lang-Ho, the Chinaman. It contained pictures of the Botanic Gardens and its famous pear tree.

NAME..... ADDRESS.....

Digitized by Google

With His Own Words.

Telling of How Love Was Revealed.

Stephen Annerly and Ethelwyn Macey had grown up side by side in the old provincial town that was a mere village when they were born.

He was older than she by three years, but they had been schoolfellows and playmates during their earlier years, when a difference of thirty-six months does not count.

He had been the first to leave the old school, and, as he worked in the field he had watched her tripping across the meadow on her way to the little house in which instruction was imparted.

Somehow, neither of them had been exactly like other village children. Each was endowed with feelings far above the ordinary level, and was regarded with suspicion and defiance by those who should have been their playmates also.

As time went on the difference of three years became more apparent, and the two former playmates stood aloof from one another, hesitating and shy.

Stephen had left the fields and entered the warehouse in the rapidly-growing town. She had left school and was acting as companion to the daughter of a well-to-do business man who had made his home in Belsham, just outside the lower portion of the borough, for the sake of his child's health.

The familiar meadow had vanished, and in its place stood rows of houses; a great change had come over Belsham, but the feeling that had existed within the recesses of Stephen's heart had not changed except insomuch as it had become stronger.

Ethelwyn Macey! All he did or thought was for her or because of her! He took up his pen and felt himself transformed into a poet when he permitted himself to reflect on the vision of the girl tripping across the meadow.

He wrote poetry—heartfelt, moving verses, full of subtle sentiment and not the maudlin doggerel that so often passes for it. There was talent within him, and this talent found expression only when he thought of her.

He wrote of the dawn, and told her that she resembled it; he wrote of storm and darkness, and tried to make her understand that, without her, his life would be as the tempest and the night. He sent the verses to her, and waited for some sign from this budding woman, but none came.

Then the business man removed elsewhere, and Ethelwyn went with the family. Never a word of acknowledgment reached him, only a timid glance in his direction when their paths crossed. So she went, and with his teeth set hard Stephen Annerly turned his attention to the warehouse and laid aside his poetic pen.

He sought distraction in hard work, and he found himself at the end of seven years at the head of a growing business nearly two hundred miles from the place of his birth.

Business had at first afforded him all the scope he needed for his superabundant energy, but nothing succeeded like success, and he saw his business increasing almost without effort on his part. He had time to spare.

He furnished a large flat and lived in it with a manservant, wondering why he had no desire to demand in marriage the hand of one of the many ladies with whom he came in contact. Other people wondered also, but they were unlike Stephen in one respect—they had no answer to their questions, but the reply came readily enough to him. It was Ethelwyn Macey, and that reply was all-sufficing!

In the meantime Ethelwyn had left the family with which she had lived for so long and had gone abroad. In the land of music, Italy, she revealed herself. Her whole being was music; it throbbed in every nerve. It had been crushed, oppressed, by her surroundings, although she had had opportunities of satisfying her longing to the extent of learning to play and sing, and acquiring a knowledge of the laws of harmony.

Thus it came about that the sojourn in Italy was like setting a blazing torch to a pile of timber; there was a sudden flame, and Ethelwyn Macey was an altered woman.

She worked to support herself and studied at the same time; then she began to compose, and little by little her compositions gained celebrity and her assumed name became a household word in her own country. Her songs were sung in halls all over the kingdom and hummed by thousands; they were full of passion and soul-stirring music.

The words were not hers; sometimes they were taken from a poem by an old or a new writer, and not especially written for her, at others they were anonymous, and sometimes they were penned expressly.

Everyone wanted to know who she was, but her identity remained a mystery; the critics made conjectures as to the personality of this gifted composer, but none guessed that she was spending her days in solitude, hundreds of miles away, in an Italian village.

"I say, Annerly, you can do me a service and give yourself a little pleasure at the same time!" said Dick Brandon. "I've promised my sister that I would take her to the Harmonic Hall this evening, to hear Madame Sefton sing a new song by that clever composer who is taking the musical world by storm, and I can't go. Mary wants someone to take her, and you're the only man I care to ask to act as my substitute. What do you say?"

Stephen Annerly laughed good-naturedly.

"It's against my principles, you know, to act as cavalier, Dick!" he responded. "I'm a sworn bachelor, and you're placing me in danger!"

"I don't think so," observed Dick drily. "I think that you and sis are about the most unlikely persons to fall in love with one another, although I believe you would make a good match, 'pon my word! But sis is anxious not to lose this treat, so I hope you won't disappoint me!"

"I shall be delighted to accompany Miss Brandon to the Harmonic," said Annerly, with a profound bow. "Joking apart, though, I rather like the idea. That woman who composes the music for those songs and other pieces is wonderful. A woman composer is an exception, anyhow, but this one is doubly so. You may count on me, my friend, so hand over the tickets and don't go away with them in your pocket, leaving us in the lurch!"

"Just what I should have done if you hadn't reminded me!" cried Dick. "Here you are, and I'll tell sis that you'll call for her in a cab——"

"In a brougham, please! I never do things by halves!"

Punctually at the appointed time Stephen Annerly was waiting for Miss Brandon. She also was punctual, and they were at the Harmonic Hall in good time. They had excellent seats, and Stephen Annerly made up his mind that he was about to enjoy himself.

The first items on the programme were executed, and then came Madame Sefton, a magnificent singer.

She warbled the notes in entrancing style, and held her audience spellbound.

She sang two songs by the new lady composer; the first was one that had been heard before, while the other was entirely new to the lovers of songs and the frequenters of the concert halls. Stephen waited in eager expectation for this new song.

Digitized by Google

The first verse set him thinking, but the second made him sit bolt upright and stare vacantly in the direction of the singer, although not at her. The words were familiar to him; they recalled the old village and Ethelwyn Macey tripping over the meadow.

He forgot the charming girl by his side, he forgot the personality of the singer, he knew nothing of the audience. He was far away, yet listening with intense emotion to every word that was sung.

He knew those lines! His blood tingled. That was a poem of love which he had written and sent to his former playmate!

It seemed to him that the girl who had never given the least sign that she returned the affection which he had lavished upon her, was now answering him, telling him by means of beautiful music, and through the medium of his own poetic declaration, that she loved him.

There was a forcible beating of his heart, and a throbbing in his ears; he wanted to rush out when the singer had finished, and hasten back to the old place in the hope of still seeing her trip across the meadow, of catching her in his arms and asking her why she had not told him all this long ago!

He stifled a groan as memory came back and told him that the meadow was gone, and that Ethelwyn was there no longer. He sat out the rest of the programme, but he knew nothing of what passed, and Miss Brandon confidentially informed her brother on the following day that she had rarely seen an educated man so dull as Stephen Annerly had been at the concert.

"Perhaps he wasn't well?" suggested Dick. "I'll go and see! I have to formally thank him for taking you, of course, so I must go to his office."

Mr. Annerly had gone out of town, the manager told him. Yes, it was rather a sudden departure, but Mr. Annerly said he had received an urgent summons to the town where he was born, and must be off without delay. No, he hadn't explained the nature of the summons, so the manager could not say whether Mr. Annerly had lost a near relation quite suddenly.

Stephen Annerly was the only person who knew exactly why Stephen Annerly had left town so unexpectedly. He wanted to find one of Ethelwyn's relations, in order to make inquiries concerning her present whereabouts. He found the old lady in his and Ethelwyn's native place, and he plied her with questions.

"Bless me!" ejaculated the old lady. "You want my grandniece's address? Ah, to be sure, I mind you now! It's young Stephen! My eyes are not so sharp as they used to be, and you've grown out of knowledge! Yes, yes! You were always good friends!

"And so you want to find her? Well, I heard from her only last week; she sent me a pretty card from Italy, but she said she was coming back to England, and her address would be at Bournemouth."

She fetched the card, but it was useless. He must go to Bournemouth and seek her there.

He returned to the Metropolis without delay, and then caught the next train to Bournemouth. It was late at night when he arrived, but he was happy to be in the same place as Ethelwyn. He went to bed in a comfortable room in the best hotel, but he slept very little, and was up betimes and out, seeking for the shy maiden who had inspired him with such poetic feeling.

He was unlucky. For three days he walked about without catching the slightest glimpse of anyone who even remotely resembled Ethelwyn; she would be changed in figure, that was certain, and he was alive to that fact.

It was a lovely evening on the fourth day. Stephen Annerly, tired of his quest, approached a lonely portion of the beach on his return to the hotel. Seated on a piece of rock he saw a woman, at the mere sight of whom he stopped and pressed his hand to his heart to quiet its tumultuous throbbing.

He could not well distinguish the features, but he knew that it was Ethelwyn, and that his search was rewarded at last.

Recovering his self-possession by an effort, he drew near to her and cried: "Ethelwyn!"

She had not heard his approach, so deep were her meditations. At the sound of that name she awoke from her day-dreaming with a start, and glanced quickly up at the newcomer.

"It's Ste—Mr. Annerly!" she cried, rising and holding out her hand with a glad smile, which testified to the pleasure afforded to her by this unexpected meeting.

As she took the proffered hand, however, she seemed to recollect, and the old, shy, shrinking manner returned.

"Why not let it be 'Stephen,' as in the old schooldays?" he asked gently. He was mystified by the rapid change in her look. "Let us sit here and talk of those days and of the later ones."

"I thought you had forgotten me," she said, keeping her eyes averted. She did not call him by his Christian name, but he was glad to see that she did not use the formal "Mr. Annerley."

"Forgotten you?" he cried. "How could I? I have kept the vision of Ethelwyn Macey in my memory ever since, but I was sad because I believed that you had forgotten me!"

"You have remembered me all these years!" she said softly. "Yet you—I have never heard of you. What has made you come now?"

"A song! A new song by a celebrated lady composer! I went to hear it and the words aroused all the slumbering passion in my heart, for they were the words I had written to a girl long before!

"I thought that she had never cared for the poems, never cared for the writer, for she had given him none of the signs for which he was waiting so eagerly! When I heard those words sung with lovely music I said to myself that the girl did care after all.

"I told myself that I must find her, and ask her if my conjecture were correct or false! I sought tidings of her in the dear village where love sprang into existence for me, and I sought my love here. I have tramped here and there for four days in search of the composer who set my words to music, but I have only just found her!"

"I am residing inland," she explained, "and under my own name, not under that adopted for compositions; that is why you did not find me."

She was gazing at the sea. What a beautiful woman she had become! She did not reply to his revelation of love for her, but she did not shrink from him.

"Ethelwyn, why did you not tell me that the verses pleased you?"

"People said that you were mad on writing poetry, so I believed that you wrote just as the mood seized you, and that you would write the same to anyone else. I could not guess that they were written for me especially."

"They were written for you, because you were the only creature who inspired me with poetry! No other woman has ever awakened within me the poetic passion which—I realise better now than ever—which runs through those verses addressed to you. Ethelwyn, why did you set those words to music, after so long? Was it merely because the words were suitable for the purpose?"

She did not answer, and he continued, with subdued passion.

"Was it because you had treasured those lines through all the years of separation, and were at last compelled by your own love to set them to the responsive music that was vibrating in your own soul? Was it because you have loved me, as I have loved you, in secret all this long time?"

He had taken her hands and drawn her nearer, so that he could gaze into those expressive eyes, which had drooped under the searching glance.

"It is not fair to me to make me speak!" she protested, meekly, with burning cheeks. "Can you not guess, and so spare me? It is the woman's part to listen, not to answer questions!"

"Except one!" he cried, with a ring of joy in his voice. He folded her in his arms, careless of being noticed by anyone who chanced to be near. He lifted the drooping face till she was forced to look straight into his eyes. Then he asked her the old, old question, and she answered, "Yes, Stephen!"

E. Powles.

Digitized by Google

GREAT NEW SERIES. YOU CAN BEGIN HERE.

Confessions of a Self-made Girl

The writer of these Confessions relates in this series of articles the true story of her life, from the time when she left Cornwall, an unsophisticated but ambitious girl, until she made her name and fortune. Her name is well known to you.

[For the purposes of these Confessions I am calling myself Maud Cardew, as my real name is too well known for me to wish to make the story of my life public in this manner.]

MY HEART'S DESIRE.

I AM a native of a seaside village in Cornwall. As I grew up I began to tire of the monotony of the life and determined to go out into the world and make a name for myself.

One day when I was in the ruins of the Old Keep, which is on the cliffs, meditating upon what I should do were I free to carve out my own destiny, two strangers appeared—evidently tourists, I thought. They told me they had decided to stay in the neighbourhood for a few days, and asked if I knew of any lodgings. I said that my father would be glad to put them up at the farm, and accordingly they came home with me.

Their names were the Honourable Robert Lestrange (commonly called Bobbie) and Di Northcote.

I told these two Londoners of my desire to see the world. Bobbie encouraged me in my ambitions, but Di advised me to stay at home. This, however, was not at all in my line, as I told him, and when he saw that nothing would shake me from my resolve, he promised to try to find something for me to do when I arrived in the great city.

Bobbie met me on my arrival in London. Owing to a fog we got separated, and as I stood on the steps of a house I heard a man's voice asking me to come inside and wait until the fog cleared. Feeling that it would be hopeless to find Bobbie, I accepted the invitation. I remained there some time when Di happened to call, and he took me to my lodgings in Bloomsbury, where Bobbie was waiting; he told me that the man in whose rooms I had been was Lord Cecil Trevor, one of the worst "men about town."

Di came in next morning to tell me he had found me a place as trier-on in the firm of Philips and Philips, mantle and jacket makers. He also gave me some advice which I rather resented. I didn't like my work at all, and as I felt I ought not to live alone I got Lizzie Brown, a new girl, to share rooms with me.

I met Lord Cecil Trevor on several occasions, and Di and I fell out because of my friendship with him. I accepted an engagement for a small part on the stage at the suggestion of Lord Cecil. He was just leaving my rooms one evening when Di appeared at the door. They saw each other though they did not meet, and I wondered what Di would do about it.

An Encounter in a Restaurant.

FOR just two months Di did nothing.

Apparently he completely ignored my existence, and left me to go my own sweet way, though afterwards I found this was far from being the case.

Not that that way was sweet by any means, quite the contrary. What I endured during my first few weeks on the stage I shall never forget.

Fortunately for me the manager was always fairly polite on Lord Cecil's account, but he was most insulting to many of the girls, and I do not know how they ever put up with it.

My dear reader, if you are dying to go on the stage, and look upon it as a life of bliss; before you take the initial step picture to yourself the possibilities of vulgar, even dirty, companions, with whom you will probably share a dressing-room; the wearing of half-soiled dresses, whose previous wearers may have left a good deal to be desired; much familiarity from young men who ought to know better; possible insults from the manager which you dare not resent if you want to keep your post, and very likely existence in cheap and nasty lodgings indefinitely.

The picture you no doubt see of beautiful clothes, heaps of money and admirers, costly gifts, and a speedy ascent to fame, remember, is only for the few.

For one that succeeds, how many are there who fail—nay, worse—who sink out of the reach of all self-respect for ever? I am afraid to say.

I am not saying that the stage is all evil; I know there are admirable men and women in the profession, but I do say unless a girl has "the strength of ten" to keep her heart pure and her aims high, let her take any lowly walk in life and any salary offered, sooner than risk all for the precarious chance of doing well on the stage.

I certainly did not have to go through the worst, but my experiences were quite bad enough, and again and again I meditated throwing it up.

Had I not resigned my post at Philips and Philips, and estranged my best friend, I no doubt should have done. As it was I dare not.

I was too proud to go to Di and ask him to help me. Bobbie was travelling abroad, and I had no one to go to but Cecil Trevor.

If I had chosen to lift my little finger he would have given me half his income, but that was one of the temptations my natural strength of mind saved me from.

I realised that to accept anything further from him would be a step downward I might never be able to retrieve, and one which might lead to irreparable results.

Digitized by Google

I did not then know any definite harm of him, beyond what Di Northcote had implied, but the latter had not spoken altogether in vain, and I kept continually on the defensive whenever I saw him, which was fairly often.

Certainly in a way he was good to me, for he took me out to dinner many a time when I was actually in need of food; and after discovering by accident that I could not afford a good fire, he ordered in coal regularly, without saying anything about it.

At the same time he did all in his power to make himself necessary to me, and to get me so involved with him that I could not free myself.

When I think of all the subtle, unsuspected designs with which a clever man tries to entrap a girl who is friendless and alone, I shudder at the thought of my own risk.

It ended in his proposing marriage, though I am bound to confess I do not think he had the least intention of carrying out his suggestion at the time. It was merely the last stone left unturned, and it is quite likely he would have deceived me somehow.

As it was, I began by refusing to listen, and growing angry, but he merely waited a little, and watched his opportunity to return to the attack. In choosing his time he showed diabolical insight. Never once, I think, did I know him to speak out of season.

One of the worst attacks of all came when I was laid up with influenza. A girl, who was in the same company, and who was good to me in a way of her own, came round to see if she could do anything.

She found me sobbing helplessly from weakness, and loneliness, and misery. No one had come near me since Lizzie went out except the landlady, who had brought up some beef-tea scarcely fit to drink, and got me some quinine, then left me to my own devices.

I felt too ill to read, so lay picturing the waves and the cliffs at home, until I did not know how to bear it.

Then Jessie Ward came.

Poor Jessie! I must always feel grateful to her, although she was such a rough diamond, and ended in being one of those who go under.

She set to work at once to make my bed and wash my face and hands, then she went out to buy some beef jelly with her own money.

"Where's that fine young spark of yours all this time?" she asked, when I had eaten and recovered a little. "Why isn't he looking after you now? It's what he ought to be doing."

"Oh, no!" I said. "I shouldn't like it at all. I wouldn't have him near."

She grinned at that and shook her head knowingly, then remarked laconically, "Rats!"

"He is nothing to me," I reiterated wearily. "Please go away now, I want to try to get to sleep; but I hope you'll come again if you've nothing better to do. I shall get up to-morrow morning."

She promised readily and went off. When she next returned she did not come alone.

"I'm glad to find you up," she said. "I've brought someone to see you," and she looked very pleased with herself. "I thought it would do you good," and she beckoned Lord Cecil into the room, shortly after retiring herself.

I felt very angry, but felt too weak to expostulate, and I must admit he was very kind. He had brought me beautiful fruit and flowers, and jelly, all bought on the way, after Jessie had succeeded in finding him and telling him of my illness.

"I was just going to join a party at Prince's," he said, "when Miss Ward came to tell me about you. I don't know how she ever discovered my address, but I just jumped into a hansom and came.

"You mustn't be angry, Maud, I only want to take care of you while you're down; and it must be awful to sit here alone," and he too glanced expressively round my dingy little sitting-room.

"Do let me take you away," he urged, "just until you are better. I'll find a nice room and a nice nurse, and then you'll be taken care of properly."

I smiled faintly, for it was undoubtedly very pleasant to be taken care of, but I refused to be moved.

"I shall be all right to-morrow or the next day," I said, "it is only this wretched cold I have caught somehow."

After he had gone again I sat thinking about him for a long time, and about the future.

What was I to do?

I hated my present existence, and began to feel it was a vain hope to think of success. I wondered whether I would write to Bobbie, and half decided to do so, but my stupid pride again stepped in and prevented me.

I had chosen my own way, and would not weakly cry out because it was a failure. If I hung on a little longer things would probably improve, and then I should be so glad I had not spoken.

As for Di, I imagined he had given me up altogether, and would never speak to me again. I felt vexed with him, although I knew I had given him good cause, and indulged in a pleasing picture of myself at the top of the profession, scornfully ignoring his attempts at a reconciliation.

But when the night came and I lay in a sleepless fever, trying in vain to rest, all my bravado forsook me, and I broke down again into helpless weeping. Finally I decided to ask Cecil Trevor to send me back to my home the next day.

But when he came he would not hear of it. Again he had brought me exquisite flowers and fruit, and while he arranged them on a little table near the couch he spoke encouragingly of all I was to achieve by-and-bye.

"Only you can't go on alone, Maud," he said, changing his voice to lover's tones. "You must come to me and let me take care of you always."

"No, no," I breathed. "It would be madness. By-and-bye you would weary of me, and then I believe you are the kind of man to desert one."

"Never," he urged. "You are cruel to say a thing like that. I have never changed to you for one second since I first met you."

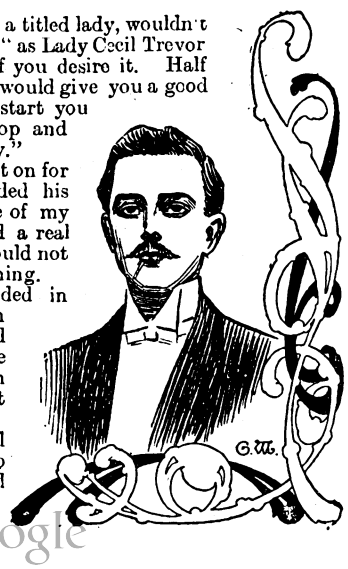
"Not to me, perhaps, but what of other women?"

He walked down the room and came back and stood beside me.

"Look here, Maud," he said, "you're so clear-sighted I don't suppose I could blind you if I tried, and I don't know that I want to. I suppose I have been a rake in my time, but if you'll marry me I'll turn over a new leaf and begin again. I never cared for anyone in my life as I do for you; you can do what you like with me."

He pressed nearer.

"You would like to be a titled lady, wouldn't you, Maud?" he urged; "as Lady Cecil Trevor success is at your feet if you desire it. Half the managers in London would give you a good part, and with such a start you would soon run to the top and have it all you own way."



In this manner he went on for some time, and he pleaded his cause well. But in spite of my antagonism to Di, I had a real respect for him, and I would not let myself forget his warning.

All Lord Cecil succeeded in wringing from me then was a half hearted promise to think the matter over, and with that he had to be content for the present.

I got well quickly, and prepared to go back to the theatre, but at Lord Cecil's request the manager gave me a week's holiday to completely recover.

Digitized by Google

During that week he insisted upon taking me out every day, and one afternoon he arrived in a beautiful little motor to take me into the country. I was delighted, and we started off at once, heading for the north, with the idea of going round by Bushey and Stanmore.

It was a part of the country I had not seen, and it pleased me exceedingly. Lord Cecil was in a gay, entertaining mood, and, for a wonder, refrained from worrying me with his usual plea.

I have never been able to discover if the ending of that day were a planned affair or not, but certainly it savoured of being so.

The evenings were not very long yet, and it began to grow dusk some time before we were near London. Lord Cecil lit the lamps, and remarking carelessly that we should be rather late home, resumed his driving.

At about 9.30, when it was pitch dark and commencing to rain, something went wrong with the motor. At first my companion assured me it was all right, but presently he began to appear anxious. Several times we stopped for him to try to remedy matters, but at last he gave it up, and confessed he could do nothing.

"Then we must catch a train," I said at once, rather relieved than otherwise to have escaped the long, cold drive home.

"There is no train anywhere near here," he answered.

"But there must be," I exclaimed, with something like a gasp.

"Unfortunately the railroad builders did not think so," he said lightly. "The nearest station is about four miles distant, and there would scarcely be likely to be a train."

"Then we must hire a trap and drive home," I said firmly.

"Drive twenty miles to-night?" he asked. "Why, it will be raining cats and dogs directly."

"But what else can we do?" I urged.

"We must go to a hotel for the night," he said, calmly.

"It is quite impossible," I asserted indignantly, "I should not dream of such a thing."

"But you have no choice," and he could not quite conceal the latent triumph in his voice. "It is absolutely the only thing possible."

"I can go to a cottage," I said, "and you can go to the hotel."

"What difference would that make beyond being far less comfortable for you? You would probably get your clothes stolen or something, to say nothing of possible smallpox."

That last settled me, for I had an intense horror of any infection, and would have risked a good deal before possible contact with it. Accordingly we went together to the village inn, and ordered rooms and a hot supper.

While they were preparing Lord Trevor returned with someone to the motor, and they succeeded in getting it as far as the inn yard. Then he joined me in the little old-fashioned sitting-room where our supper was laid for us.

I was in an icy mood, and scarcely spoke to him the whole meal, and directly we had finished I announced my intention of going to bed and turned to the door, without offering to say "Good night."

"Wait a minute," he said. "It is very early yet. You are not angry with me about this, are you?"

I bit my lip a moment.

"I think you have managed very badly," I said frigidly.

"But I couldn't help it," he urged, "on my oath I couldn't, Maud. It is just Fate that is throwing us together."

He had got hold of my hand, and I tried to draw it away.

"No, don't," he said; "it is no use fighting against Fate. If ever two people were meant for each other it is you and I."

I broke away, but he stood against the door and would not let me pass. He grew wild, and reviled his fate, and me, and everything else. He said much that I cannot remember, but I have great cause to be thankful to the good Providence that gave me a strong and fearless heart for any time of stress.

He tried to frighten me with the consequences of our being thus waylaid together, and I knew that it was a very serious business, but I held my ground firmly in spite of him.

Finally, knowing I was not to be conquered, he opened the door for me, but as I passed out he snatched my hand and kissed it passionately.

I drew it away hastily and fled; but when I had carefully locked my door I threw myself on the bed and burst into tears, completely overcome.

Two days later he came to me with the news that the story was out. As a matter of fact, I knew it, for I had returned to the theatre the evening before, and the jokes fired at me and at my expense left me no room for doubt.

All the evening my face had burnt with shame and indignation, and when at last I got home I had cried myself to sleep.

At first when he came I was so angry with him I hardly knew what I said; but when my anger had spent itself he returned to the charge with fourfold energy.

He pointed out how I was now involved; how nothing I could do or say could alter anything; and what an untenable position I held.

I was very tired and very miserable, and I let him talk. I had got into that fatal mood when nothing seems to matter, and the more he talked the stronger hold it gained upon me.

I believed my reputation was ruined, that I was a dead failure, and that the sooner I was out of it all the better. Meanwhile it seemed that I might as well marry him as not, since nothing mattered; and anyhow it would be better than going on as we were.

He saw the signs of relenting, and drove in his keen-edged barbs with faultless dexterity, dwelling upon just those points he knew most likely to affect me.

In the end I gave way.

"It doesn't matter," I said wearily. "I know I am a dead failure, and if I went back home I could never feel the same again. I will marry you as soon as you like."

After that he was exceedingly good to me, and I grew more hopeful again. He would not let me go back to the theatre, but promised I should take a part as soon as we were married if I still wished it, and meanwhile he insisted on taking good rooms for Lizzie and myself.

I used to wonder sometimes what Bobbie and Di would say, but on the whole I thought very little, just enjoying the sudden release from the miseries of the last two months.

As a matter of fact, Di was out of town just then, as well as Bobbie, having been called away to a young cousin who was taken dangerously ill in France and had no other relative. He has told me since how he hated going while I was on such friendly terms with Lord Cecil, but was unable to help himself.

Meanwhile the day for our marriage drew near. It was to take place very early, and immediately afterwards we were going away for two months.

Again and again during the last week I had anxious qualms, and once I even went so far as to consider writing to Di at the address he had given me. But my pride still ruled me, and what I had undertaken I said I would go through with.

It was about two evenings before the date fixed that I went with Cecil Trevor to one of the quiet restaurants we usually chose for dinner.

I remember there were more people present than usual that evening, and I could not help feeling a sense of discomfort at the evident interest bestowed upon us.

I did not feel somehow that it was my appearance, or the fact that we were a striking-looking pair, but I had an uncomfortable sensation of something quite out of the ordinary. So it proved a little later on.

Digitized by Google

We had just got to the sweets when a tall, handsome, gipsy-faced woman walked leisurely into the room, and sat down a little behind Lord Cecil, where she could have a full view of me without being seen by him.

For quite ten minutes I do not think she took her eyes off me, and at last, in desperation, I drew Lord Cecil's attention to her. He turned round, and instantly, before he could collect himself, gave a muttered exclamation, and grew ashy white.

The girl did not stir, but she looked at him with a bold, supercilious stare and an ugly expression on her mouth. It was impossible not to see that there was something between them, and they were not strangers. However, Lord Cecil turned back to the table and took up his fork again, with an attempt to appear perfectly at ease.

"She seems to know you," I said, not willing to let the incident pass.

"Yes," he answered at once, "but she is a perfect stranger to me. She either mistakes me for someone else or is mad. If she continues to annoy you I will ask the manager to have her removed."

I was silent a few moments, then looked in her direction again. She was still gazing at me, but now her eyes were less hard, and much of the scorn in them had given place to a certain degree of interest. At last she got up and came to our table.

"So you're here, my fine fellow, are you!" she said in a low, clear voice. "I've run you to earth at last."

Immediately many eyes were upon us, and I felt myself turning scarlet with mortification. Lord Cecil, however, kept his face well. He looked up at her coolly and remarked:

"You must be mad, woman; or you have mistaken me for someone else."

"A pretty tale!" she retorted. "Certainly if you are not Lord Cecil Trevor I have mistaken you for someone else."

He blanched then, but held his ground.

"Yes," he said, "I am Lord Cecil Trevor, so I can only conclude you are mad."

"Waiter," he added; "I think you had better call in a policeman, for this woman is either drunk or insane."

The waiter took her by the arm and attempted to lead her away; but she was a majestic being, and waved him off as if he had been a child.

"No," she said; "I am neither drunk nor mad. I came here to find Cecil Trevor, and having found him I have got something to say to him." And she seated herself at our table.

Cecil Trevor got up then, and turned to the head waiter angrily.

"Will you remove this woman," he said peremptorily; "or am I to leave your restaurant because you do not know how to protect a lady from insult? Are you all cowards here?"

The head waiter fussed and fumed as foreigners do when in a quandary, but still something about the strange woman seemed to quell them all and compel attention.

"Listen to me, Cecil Trevor," she said; "I will not keep you long. When I last saw you, I told you I would frustrate every fresh scheme of villainy on your part I had any power to, as long as I lived.

"Last week I heard you were going to be married, and the one who told me spoke well of the girl. That is why I am here. Had she been one of the bad ones I would have left you in peace, but I have sworn an oath to myself that you shall never harm an innocent girl if I can help it."

While she spoke this in clear, rich tones, Lord Cecil grew yet more deathly white, and fidgeted uneasily, in spite of his frantic efforts to appear unconcerned.

"The poor thing is quite mad," he said; "if you like we will retire while they call a policeman." And he got up.

"No, don't go," she said to me, and something in her voice made me sit still.

"I have been watching you purposely, because I wanted to see what kind of girl you were. I like you, so I will save you. You can't marry Lord Cecil. He is a married man."

(I will tell this woman's strange story and its result next Tuesday.)

BETRAYED BY THE RONTGEN RAYS.

Telling of the Shattering of a Love Affair.

Ponpon Mortgage, the renowned financier, sat in his sumptuously-furnished library in his Park Lane mansion thinking bitter, hard thoughts. Deep lines furrowed his brow, and his fingers twitched nervously as he turned a letter over and over in his hands, and read again the lines therein.

"Never have I tried to thwart my daughter's slightest wish," he said at last; "but this thing is too serious. Upon it depends her whole future happiness. This letter from Reggy Ordinaire tells me that he loves her, and that she returns his affection. Hah! is it so? Then I must, and shall, cure her of this absurd passion. Thompson!"

A footman entered the room and bowed to the great financier.

"Go to this address and tell the Professor to call at my house to-night at eight o'clock and bring a Rumkorff coil and a Crooke's tube with him."

The footman bowed again and left the room.

"Once more will I save my fortunes by the use of the cathode rays," muttered the banker. "Hah! Reggy Ordinaire, I doubt me if you can stand that test!"

* * * * *

Reggy Ordinaire and Mildred Mortgage sat in the yellow drawing-room of the financier's palatial mansion. Reggy was in faultless evening dress and Mildred wore a wonderful gown of some filmy material of a lovely soft colour.

Suddenly the lights went out and the subtle cathode rays from a Crooke's tube were directed full on Reggy. Neither he nor Mildred noticed it, because they were too deeply engaged in the sweet dreams of perfect love.

* * * * *

"Mildred, darling, hear me. I swear to you that——"

"Stop!" The beautiful girl raised her arm with an imperious gesture.

"Stop, Reginald Tabbledote Ordinaire! It is useless for you to attempt to deny the evidence of a Röntgen process cathode photograph. See for yourself!" and the proud girl held out a large photograph.

Reggy looked at it and then turned as white as he conveniently could.

There in the horrible cathode picture was his face and form in evening dress, but standing out with startling clearness were the pictures of three of his other girls which he had in an inside pocket—five love letters written by Mildred's rival, sixpence-halfpenny in coin in his vest pocket, nine pawn tickets, and a dunning letter for his room rent.

He also noticed with horror that the outlines of his dickey, or false shirt-front, were standing out with cruel distinctness in the photograph.

"I could have, perhaps, forgiven the rest," cried Mildred with a proud toss of her shapely head, "but the dickey—never!"

And Reginald Tabbledote Ordinaire darted into the cheerless night—a broken man.

A. H. W.

ON PAGES 421 AND 431 YOU WILL FIND SOMETHING TO INTEREST YOU VERY MUCH. TURN TO THEM NOW.

Digitized by Google

CAUGHT IN THE ACT;

or, Sinning through Love.

"And this is the old study, eh? I remember carrying your little daughter across the lawn the last time I was here. She was about six then, so that fact tells us how many years it is since we met, Dick!"

Mr. John Penton, just home after a residence of several years in the East, in which part of the world he had served his country in the Consular Service, laughed softly at the recollection. It would have sounded strange to others to have heard the stern old solicitor called "Dick," but Mr. Penton had not forgotten the college days and he had not grown so hard as Richard Mortimer.

"Quite a woman now, eh?" pursued Penton suavely. "Yes, you had her baby portrait up there—it's gone! How is she, Dick? You haven't mentioned her for two years or so, if my memory serves me well. I believe I asked you about her some months ago, but you didn't reply."

"I have no daughter; she is gone!" answered Mortimer harshly.

The tone in which the words were uttered told Penton more than five minutes' explanation would have done. Instinctively he grasped the situation; Joyce Mortimer had disobeyed her father and had been thrust out from his life. He was just the kind of man who would steel his heart against all affection and ruthlessly drive away the son or the daughter who dared to cross his desires in any important matter.

"These are some first-rate 'first editions,' John," said Mortimer in a matter-of-fact tone, devoid of emotion. "You know that I was always a keen collector of old books."

He motioned to one partition of his book-case, but Penton, although he pretended to show great interest in the books, was thinking of Joyce Mortimer. She would be about twenty-four, so it was likely enough that the separation had been caused by a love affair.

"I am open to bet that Joyce fell in love with a man who didn't suit her father," thought Penton. "She has just enough of her father's character to make her refuse to give him up, and—well, that settles it! I wonder how it has turned out? I must make it my business to find out!"

John Penton's visit—it was rather a call than a visit—was not so pleasant as he had anticipated, and it was with something very much like a sentiment of relief that he took leave of Richard Mortimer at nine o'clock in the evening. Some intangible restraint was upon both men; the conversation did not flow easily; the thoughts of both wandered towards the daughter, and Richard Mortimer found it impossible to shut her out as completely as he contrived to do on other occasions.

Perhaps it was the mysterious force of magnetism that was working upon him, for Joyce was thinking of him—thinking deeply of him as she sat in the small room, scantily furnished, and waited for her husband to return. How greatly things had changed in less than three years! She had fallen in love with Clifford Hatton; her father had disapproved of her choice, because he wished her to marry the son of a great judge. Joyce had argued and pleaded with her father, but the old man was obdurate, and demanded implicit obedience. He was incapable of comprehending so great a love as that of Joyce for the man of her selection; he could regard her refusal to do as he desired simply in the light of gross disobedience, and he told her that she must yield or leave his roof. He was almost overwhelmed when she chose the latter course, but he did not relent and he had not heard from her since that day.

Joyce had married Clifford and the first few months of married life had been very happy. Clifford had a small income from investments left to him by his father, and he was a rising star in the operatic world—he would be a second Sims Reeves, said the critics. The young tenor—he was nearly thirty—and his lovable wife bade fair to become the pets of Society when Cliff was taken ill with the influenza, and when he recovered his voice was gone.

From that time their troubles seemed to come thick and fast. The investments upon which they were relying till Cliff could find another profession or till his voice should come back, failed utterly, and they found themselves in very straitened circumstances.

Their great love for each other buoyed them up, and they faced the sudden change of fortune with calmness; the baby, too, drew them closer together, although its advent increased their monetary troubles.

"I shall get some occupation, some appointment, soon, and all will go well again, dearest Joyce!" declared Cliff cheerfully.

And Joyce smiled and whispered words of encouragement.

Fate, however, was not kind to them, and the strength of their love was tested to the utmost. Occupation did not come as Cliff expected; try as he might, he could get no appointment, for he had received no training that fitted him for any other sphere in life. He was glad to accept work in almost any capacity, but he obtained no regular employment, and the home was gradually sold, till they were reduced to three small rooms in a middle-class locality.

Joyce never complained, although her love for her husband must have been severely tested when she recalled the luxury she had given up for him. At times, Cliff referred to the fact in remorseful tones, but she always stopped him.

"It is every bit as hard for you, Cliff," she would say energetically. "Your lot in life has changed, and you would be better off if you only had yourself to think about. I have nothing to regret!"

"I should not have been better off, Joyce dear," he would return, "for I should not be the possessor of your love!"

The crisis came one day when Joyce suggested that she might be able to get a situation in an office as a lady clerk.

"I have done some work for my father, you know, Cliff, and I understand a good deal of the work of a solicitor's office. Lady clerks seem to have a better chance than men, and I shall probably get a post. At any rate, it is worth trying. I know you have tried the same thing, dear, but have not had a chance. You see, you know nothing of the work, whereas I have acquired quite the correct style of hand-writing and really know a great deal. Our joint attempts to get music pupils are not successful. Yes, yes!" she added gently, as he pronounced against the idea. "You must let me try!"

"Wait a little longer, Joyce, and I shall get something, I feel sure of it!" he protested.

There was such a pained expression on his face that she gave way. She recognised how bitter it would be for him to see her go out to work, while he—who ought to be the bread-winner—was forced to be idle. She yielded in order to give him time to become accustomed to the painful thought, but she was determined to carry out the idea if their prospects did not improve.

Cliff's face was white when he left her, and there was a strained look on it; the pallor seemed to grow in intensity as the next day or two passed and the strained appearance of his usually handsome face was more noticeable than at first.

Digitized by Google

Joyce's heart seemed to be pierced with anguish as she observed this change in him; she knew that it was on her account; his love for her caused him agony whenever he thought of the position to which they were reduced, and she began to fear that the mental suffering would bring about some illness. She always presented a cheerful exterior when he was in, and tried to make him happy by playing with the baby and in many little ways.

He began to sit up at night, "to practise writing and learn something of book-keeping," he told her with a sad smile. He would creep into bed after midnight and sleep uneasily, starting violently now and then. One morning, a fortnight after he had begun this practice, he arose in a very agitated condition.

"What is it, Cliff?" asked Joyce anxiously. "You are upset and I am afraid you will be ill."

Cliff laughed mirthlessly.

"The office work is affecting my nerves," he said evasively. "I mean the study of hand-writing and book-keeping. I have good hopes that I shall get something to-day, Joyce! I cannot tell you more now, but we shall see. I hope that this misery will soon be over!"

He returned in the afternoon, looking happier, yet with an uneasiness evident in his face and eyes.

"I have some money, Joyce!" he cried, drawing out ten sovereigns. "And that is only the beginning of the better times, I hope."

"Oh, Cliff!" she gasped. She was so thankful, and now that the long strain appeared to be over, she sank down into a chair and sobbed. "It is so—I mean, I am so thankful, Cliff, for your sake and the baby's."

"I am glad, for your sweet sake, Joyce! It has cut me to the heart, to watch you drooping. I could scarcely bear it, dear! It was driving me mad!"

He spoke earnestly, so very gravely, that she sobbed the more. It was not like the light-hearted Cliff of old.

"How was it, Cliff? How did you get the money? Have you got a situation, and this is an advance of salary?"

There was a pause; Cliff did not answer at once; something seemed to be choking him.

"I have done a desperate thing!" he said at length. "But desperate diseases require desperate remedies! I speculated on the Stock Exchange. I bought under 'cover.' You do not know what that means, dear. I can buy a few shares by paying only a couple of pounds, and I got that advance from someone. I was lucky; almost as soon as I bought, a rumour sent the shares up in value and I sold! I can go on doing that now; some call it gambling," he added hastily, as he saw the look in her uplifted eyes, "but business is just as much a gamble. It is fair, and I shall have my losses as well as my gains, but in the end I shall win, if I watch the markets."

"I don't like it, Cliff!" she began, but he stopped her.

"I will still try to get other employment, and in the rush of business on 'Change I may succeed there and get into an office, but we must live in the meantime!"

Cliff went out regularly every morning after that, and he brought home a small salary at the close of each week. It was just enough to keep them going in the modest style to which they had been reduced, but that was sufficient. Joyce was relieved of the necessity of finding a situation, at which Cliff expressed himself as delighted; while Joyce herself began to assume a happier look.

"If my husband goes, I go with him," cried Joyce, going to the side of the shrinking man.

At the end of the first fortnight, however, Joyce spoke to her husband seriously.

"You are not looking well, Cliff, dear! I have been hoping that the pallor and the anxious appearance would leave your face now that you have work and we can keep afloat. Oh, Cliff! Don't worry about me! I do not mind, so long as I have you and the baby. It grieves me to think that you are worrying about me. I would willingly give up all for your sake!"

"You are a good, brave woman, Joyce, and I will try to be more cheerful; but it does——"

She placed a delicate hand over his mouth, then withdrew it and kissed his lips. The subject was dropped, for Cliff could not endure the look of tender reproach in her eyes. He became more cheerful in manner, but Joyce was not deceived. Something was worrying him and she was not happy.

Nearly another month went by, and Cliff resumed his practice of sitting up late. Joyce said nothing on the first occasion, but on the second night she told him not to be long and retired to the bedroom where she sat down without attempting to undress. Cliff did not suspect that she had not gone straight to bed.

Joyce waited for nearly an hour, but Clifford had not moved, so far as she could judge. She was uneasy; an indefinable feeling of impending trouble took possession of her. It was not late, for Cliff had pressed her to retire early, as she was tired, and she had left him at the early hour of nine. The house was still; the occupants of the lower apartments were out for the night

Digitized by Google

At length Joyce rose from her seat and moved quietly towards the door, an inner one, permitting the occupants to pass from one room to the other without going across the landing. The door was shut, but the handle turned quietly, and the door opened noiselessly.

She scarcely comprehended why she moved so silently; she wished to see what her husband was doing, yet she did not desire to disturb him. He must not work day and night to the injury of his health on her account!

He was bending over the table, writing; he was doing it very slowly and carefully. On the table, rather to the side, she could see a sheet of paper with scraps of writing on it. Poor Cliff! He was still practising the "office hand"! Yet she thought he had acquired a good style lately. She approached him on tip-toe, intending to bend over him from behind, see what he was writing, kiss him and remonstrate.

She reached the back of the chair and bent over the bowed form. Before him lay a cheque and Cliff was just finishing the signature, "Richard Mortimer." Her head seemed to swim; it was a cheque for five hundred pounds, payable to "self or bearer," and Cliff had written it, and was forging her father's name!

"Oh, Cliff, how could you?" she moaned in a low voice, grasping the back of the chair to save herself from falling.

She was pointing to the tell-tale slip of paper on the table, and the anguish indicated by her look was terrible to behold.

"Cliff," she asked huskily, "Cliff, did the other money come in that way?"

He bent his head, he could not answer; but the gesture was sufficient.

"Why, oh, why did you do it? Oh, my husband, my husband, I could have borne poverty!"

"I did it to save you and the child, Joyce! I could not endure to see you suffer! If I have sinned, it is my great love for you that made me sin! But have I committed any crime? The law may say so, but justice should say that I have not! Your father brought you up to luxury and gave you your own way; then, when you wanted your own way on the most important occasion in life, he would not let you have it, and he cast you off, leaving you to misfortune. He knows how you have suffered, so he has not the excuse of ignorance, for I humbled myself to him and told him—for your sake! He brought you up in luxury, I say, and it is his moral duty to support you in that state if you need it, and he can give it! You do need it and he can give it! If I have taken his money, to save you from want, it is but justice!"

"No! no! no!" cried Joyce vehemently. "It is not right; you are guilty of the crime of forgery, and the wrath of God and man will fall upon you and yours—upon us, whom you love and would save! Oh, what can I do to save you?"

A sharp knock on the outer door made them start. A voice called out sternly to open.

"The police!" cried Joyce in a whisper. "Quick, Cliff, you must fly! I will keep them out till you get away!"

The wife's love conquered all other sentiments now. She knew that a felon's doom awaited him, and her only thought was to save him from it.

"Quick!" she cried again, as the knock was repeated and the voice muttered a threat to break the door in. "Through there, to the back, and along the coping! You can drop to the roof of the low house at the end, and from there you ought to get clear!"

She snatched up the cheque and the sheet of paper on which were imitations of her father's signature, and thrust them into her pocket. She caught him by the arm in order to hurry him away, when the door gave way under a sudden push, and in walked Richard Mortimer, followed by John Penton.

The latter closed the door behind him, after whispering something to two men who remained outside.

"Father!" cried Joyce. "Father, spare him!"

Mortimer waved her aside imperiously.

"The police officers outside have a warrant for the arrest of that man on a charge of forging my name on a cheque for fifty pounds!" he cried. "They will take the good-for-nothing scoundrel and you will come back with me to the home which you should never have left! Penton, let them in. What on earth are you keeping them out for?"

"If my husband goes, I go with him!" cried Joyce, taking her place by the side of the shrinking man. "If he has done wrong, he has done it on my account, and as I have shared the gain, so will I share the penalty! I will never return to your house under such conditions!"

Penton stepped forward and placed a restraining arm on Mortimer.

"There is something wrong here, Dick!" he cried sternly. "You have given me to understand that your daughter's husband was a blackguard, but I see by the very look of the man that that was wrong. Your imperious temperament has led you to a gross injustice. Nay," he continued, as Mortimer interrupted, and his tone was judicial in its authority, "listen and let me get to the bottom of this!"

The commanding figure of John Penton seemed to overawe all, even the autocratic Mortimer. He bade them be seated while he himself stood and put clever leading questions. In three minutes he had the whole story.

"Dick," he said impressively, "a crime is a crime and cannot be overlooked, the law says, but there are crimes and crimes. There are some acts which the law cannot touch, although they be sins as great as any in the penal code. You owed a duty to your daughter and you have not fulfilled it! Her husband is right in what he says, so far. You deserve more punishment for your heard-hearted conduct than he does for his crime! And if I were a judge," he added hotly, "I'd give it to you—by George, I would!"

Mortimer cowered under the scathing words of his old college chum. Penton reflected for a few seconds, and then he spoke again.

"The guilty should always be punished, but the punishment should be in accordance with the circumstances under which the sin was committed. I can imagine that Hatton has suffered already—suffered in a manner that cannot be equalled by any sentence that might be passed upon him. Further, I consider that Richard Mortimer has something to suffer, for his sorry conduct towards his daughter. Don't plead for your father, my dear; it's no use! We must try to get Hatton off as lightly as we can, and if Mortimer looks foolish or suffers in other ways, in endeavouring to get out of the consequences of having a warrant issued, that's part of his punishment! I'll pay the fifty pounds, and we must say that some blunder has been committed, or that there has been a mistake! I expect you'll have to go with the police now, but I'll come and bail you out!"

Hatton clasped his weeping wife in his arms; then he imprinted a kiss on the brow of his still sleeping daughter, and left the room with Penton and the officers.

When they were gone, Mortimer raised his eyes to Joyce and held out his hands in mute appeal for forgiveness. Joyce sank on her knees in front of him, burying her face in her hands and weeping hysterically, yet with a strange feeling of joy. Was it all coming right?

The police superintendent would not take bail; but on the following morning, when Hatton was brought before the magistrate, Penton appeared and stated that a serious mistake had been made and that the prosecutor was too ill to attend. Ultimately the case was allowed to escape from public notice.

Joyce and Clifford retired to a large farm in the east of England, where they lived down the memory of those dark days. John Penton is an occasional visitor and is always made welcome. Mortimer was ashamed to meet them for a long time, but he finally overcame the feeling and paid them a visit. He goes there once a year for a holiday. Joyce is not likely to feel the need of money again, for Richard Mortimer has settled most of his estate on her.

They are happy, Joyce and her husband, but at times the shadow of the sin makes itself felt, for no sin can be completely obliterated. When Cliff is depressed, Joyce knows what is causing this sentiment, and she kisses him fondly as if to assure him that all is forgiven.

F. Brewster.

Digitized by Google

THE FRESH AIR FUND.

What is the F.A.F.?

The Fresh Air Fund is an organisation which exists to, so far as may be, brighten the dull, joyless lives of the children in the slums of our great cities.

It has been described as "The Cheapest Charity," and this it is in two senses.

I.—The F.A.F. devotes the whole of the moneys subscribed to the purpose for which their donors intend them. There are no deductions for rent or salaries or postage, or the thousand and one expenses which make so big a hole in many other excellent charities. The whole of the expenses are paid by Messrs. C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., and by the Ragged School Union, which places its great organisation at the disposal of the Fund.

2.—There is no such charity in the case of which so little buys so much. Ninepence pays for a day's delight for a child. Eight pounds two shillings provides all that is necessary for the enjoyment of a complete party of 200 children, with the needful complement of attendants.

As a broad rule, threepence pays for a child's fare, and sixpence more buys it food enough for two good meals.

Every penny subscribed is spent on those two wonder-workers, food and fares. God's green country and the kindly help of willing friends do what else is needed to make a day's real happiness for a little prisoner of the great, gloomy city.

There are no distinctions of creed. Need and the improbability of any other holiday are the only qualifications.

Why was the F.A.F. Started?

Just because there seemed to be nothing more pitiful than to see little children in a steamy, smelly slum trying to make-believe that they were in the green fields, which are the natural and only proper summer playground for children.

Most of you haven't even seen this. If you had, there would be no need to ask you to subscribe to the F.A.F. You would be asking where you could send your subscriptions.

Childhood should be the happy time of life. There isn't too much happiness for most of us when we are grown up. The well-to-do of us try all we know to make our children happy.

These little people of the slums have no one trying to make them happy.

So the F.A.F. was started to try to bring just one day's happiness into as many dull little lives as possible. It isn't really only one day, though. There are the days before and the days after, and if you had heard the grimy mites discuss the joys of anticipation and of retrospection you would know that the great day itself is only part of the joy.

The excursion parties are made up generally of from 600 to 800 children, and three adults are allowed to every hundred children. This brings the total cost of a party of 600 up to £24 6s., but if anyone forwards a cheque for £8 2s., sufficient to pay for 200, the day is known by whatever name the donor cares to mention.

Each year is worked independently of any other, all the money subscribed during any one summer being used up before the end of September. Then the accounts are made up and a report published.

What has the F.A.F. done?

Quite a lot. It was started in Pearson's Weekly in the summer of 1892, and, with the aid of the practical advice of Mr. John Kirk, Secretary of the Ragged School Union, and the assistance of his Council, succeeded the first year in giving a day's outing to 24,000 London children. The movement is now assisted by other publications issued from the same office, and by the Daily Express, Midland Express, and North Mail.

This wasn't half a bad start, and after one year more of work in London it was found possible to extend the scheme of operations to other large towns. First, 5,000 children were given a day in Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow and Birmingham, and then the scheme was extended, until it now includes the thirty-two biggest towns in the Kingdom, and the districts known as the Potteries and the Rhondda. The towns are:—

Aberdeen, Belfast, Blackburn, Birmingham, Bristol, Bradford, Bolton, Cardiff, Dublin, Derby, Dundee, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Gateshead, Hull, Halifax, London, Leeds, Liverpool, Leicester, Manchester, Nottingham, Newcastle, Norwich, Oldham, Portsmouth, Preston, Plymouth, Sheffield, Sunderland, Southampton, Wolverhampton.

In each of these places the excursions are arranged and looked after by a local committee of well-known ladies and gentlemen formed for that purpose, and at the end of the year each secretary forwards a certificate stating the amount of money received by the committee, and showing that it was spent according to the conditions laid down for the working of the Fund.

Nine hundred thousand children have enjoyed an F.A.F. day in the past ten summers. And you may take it those 900,000 units of happiness would roll up into a mountain of joy that would dwarf all the fun in all the slums as completely as Mount Everest dwarfs a mole-hill.

That's what it has done.

And it's going to do lots more—to take millions more children from the slums to the country. You are asked to help.

Subscriptions should be sent to the Hon. Sec., F.A.F., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. They will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly.

Remember that—

There are no expenses of management for the Fresh Air Fund.

Every penny subscribed goes to the children in food and fares.

All expenses are borne by the promoters—Pearson's and the Ragged School Union.

There are no distinctions of class or creed.

Ninepence pays for a day's happiness for a child; £8 2s. pays for a complete party of 200 with the necessary attendants.

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIAL. START TO-DAY.

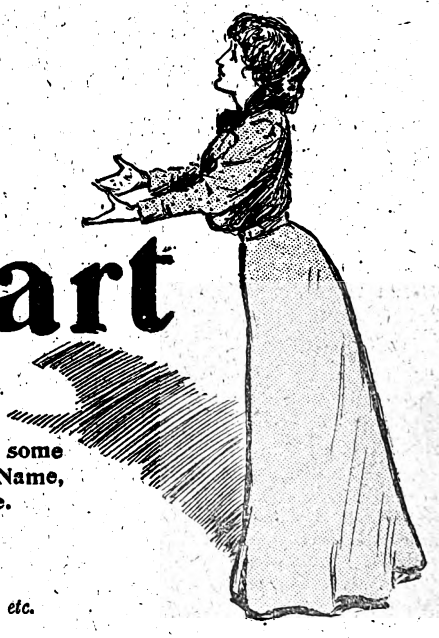
Held Apart



The Story of a Strange Double Fraud and its Influence upon some Young Hearts, a Great Name, and a Famous Fortune.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Author of "The Golden Dwarf," "A Daughter of Mystery," etc.

THE FIRST CHAPTERS.

Moira Davenal is sitting in the little cottage on Groudle Quay busy with her ribbon work. Sir Guy Vanbrugh is talking to her.

"Moira, I love you so much," he says. "Won't you——"

He pauses. There is a heavy step in the hallway of the cottage, and a burly figure enters the room.

"Good evening, Mr. Davenal. I'm off to London for the week-end and was just leaving a message for you with your daughter. How goes on the task of raising the Sylph?"

"I've found the last hole, Sir Guy," says John Davenal, who is a diver engaged in raising Sir Guy's yacht. "She'll soon be afloat."

After Sir Guy has gone a sailor appears at the door singing in drunken tones the scrap of a chorus:

"Give my love to Nancy, the girl that I adore,
Tell her that she'll never see her—her sailor any more."

The diver rises to his feet.

"Hullo, Hartigan!" he remarks loudly. "Glad to see you. Come in and make yourself comfortable."

While Moira goes out on an errand a conversation takes place between the two men, from which it appears that Moira is really Hartigan's daughter.

The sailor—who is a ship's steward—sits back in his chair and begins to sing again the drunken chorus.

He halts abruptly, for the door slowly opens, and a blind woman comes in.

Dennis Hartigan recognises her as his sister Kate. She tells her brother that she heard the song he was singing—sung in just the same way—once when she was sitting on a breakwater at Groudle. She also adds that the man who was singing said, evidently to someone with him: "This is out far enough. In with it;" after which there was a splash.

Hannah Davenal (Hartigan's wife and the diver's sister) is maid to Lady Tarleton. She is possessed of a secret with which she continually blackmails her mistress.

One afternoon Lady Tarleton and Hannah Davenal go down to Groudle Tower, and together they make a mysterious journey at midnight.

Two mornings later Hannah is found dead in bed, a towel smelling of chloroform is on her face, and over that a pillow on which are some dirty finger marks.

The police are informed of the tragedy, and Detective-Sergeant Ussher is sent from Scotland Yard to investigate.

Edward Stormont, the owner of Groudle Tower, and Lady Tarleton's brother-in-law, now arrives at Groudle with his friend Paul Jerome, a war-correspondent, and the following day Irene Tarleton comes in response to her mother's summons.

Dennis Hartigan is arrested on suspicion of causing his wife's death, but is soon released. He has a mysterious conversation with Lady Tarleton regarding a child.

"If—if the child were no longer in my path," Lady Tarleton murmurs, "I would give ten thousand pounds—to the man who told me so. Think it well over."

"I will, my lady," Hartigan answers.

On his way back to Groudle Tower Hartigan encounters his sister Kate. They return by way of the level-crossing. A train is in sight, rounding the curve. Dennis leaves his blind sister standing in between the metals along which the train is coming. She is rescued just in time by Paul Jerome, who is out riding. He leaps one gate, picks Kate up, and then leaps the other gate.

After leaving Kate in safety Jerome comes up with Hartigan, and tells him that he saw all that happened, and leaves him with a warning.

Lady Tarleton discovers that her daughter is very friendly with Jerome, and takes her to task about it. She does not know that Irene and Guy Vanbrugh have each agreed to go their own way. Jerome and Sir Guy meet in Groudle—they are old friends—and walk towards the Tower. On their way they pass a curious building which Sir Guy tells Jerome is the family mausoleum of the Lennoxes.

"Lennoxes?" repeats Paul Jerome, questioningly.

"Yes," rejoins Guy Vanbrugh, "Stormont's wife was a Lennox. Lady Tarleton is a Lennox. Stormont enjoys for life the Lennox estates and fortune. But as for the mausoleum it has not been opened for many a long year."

"Hasn't it?" queries the war-correspondent drily, "well, it's open now."

He points to a door that had been brought into sight by their onward progress. It was a low and massive portal, giving access to the lightless interior of the mausoleum. And against the blackness flickered a yellow spark, like a stricken match. While they looked, it went out.

Digitized by Google

ELEVENTH CHAPTER.

What Paul Jerome Found.

Guy Vanbrugh strained his eyes towards the small, dark portal in the gloomy little pile of masonry; another flickering spark had showed abruptly against the solid obscurity that hid the interior of the mausoleum. Then he shrugged his shoulders.

"I suppose some repairs are going on," he said; "two or three hundred years of weather, in an open country like this, must tell even on granite."

The war-correspondent moved in the direction of the low structure. "Forgive my curiosity," he remarked, "but I am a journalist, and a journalist is inquisitive both by birth and training. As it happens, I have never seen the inside of a mausoleum."

He reached the moss-grown steps that went down into the grassy basin, at whose centre stood the silent resting-place of so many departed generations, and descended leisurely. Guy Vanbrugh followed him.

As they gained the lower level at a point opposite the entrance of the mausoleum, a man emerged from it, pulling the door to behind him. Paul Jerome started. It was Edward Stormont, and he was gazing at them with an air of surprise.

"Hullo, Jerome!" he said, "so you are exploring the grounds of Groudle Tower, eh?"

He stood with one hand on the stout ring of the solid metal door behind him, his glance lingering on the war-correspondent's companion. Jerome perceived that Guy Vanbrugh apparently did not recognise the speaker.

"You know Mr. Stormont, Vanbrugh?" he observed questioningly.

Edward Stormont's face changed. "Vanbrugh!" he exclaimed. "Guy, is it you, you rascal? How you young beggars do grow! Last time I saw you, you were a red-cheeked rogue on a Shetland pony."

Guy Vanbrugh clasped warmly the hand held out to him. "And you had not cultivated a beard, Mr. Stormont," he answered; "but I know you now by your eyes. I am very glad to meet you again."

Edward Stormont studied him gravely. "You are like your father, Guy," he added; "I was sorry, very sorry, to hear of his death. I read of it up in the Himalayas, in a chance copy of the Times that had been sent me. And I asked myself why Fate, that refused me death, had taken away a better man."

He turned to the war-correspondent. "I expect," he said, "you are wondering what I'm doing out here." He motioned to the sombre building at his back. "My ultimate refuge," he remarked; "as it has been that of many a grey head and grey heart before mine."

Paul Jerome did not reply. There was a reflection of profound bitterness in Edward Stormont's tones which repulsed sympathy no less than it did a conventional response. Edward Stormont roused himself.

"I—I did not know, Jerome," he said, "that you and Vanbrugh were acquainted." The war-correspondent reflected.

"No," he owned, "I don't fancy I have mentioned it. We met in London and on the Continent. I had, indeed, forgotten that the Vanbrughs are a Cumberland family, and that his place, the 'Close,' of which I had heard him speak, is near Groudle. Judge of my surprise when I met him just now, en route to call on Lady Tarleton."

"In pursuance of which object, Mr. Stormont," said Guy Vanbrugh, "I showed Jerome the short cut across the plantation, and, in passing the mausoleum, pointed it out to him. He has eyes like a hawk's, and noticed that the door was open. A spark within attracted our attention and curiosity drew us hither."

"Quite so," commented Stormont brusquely. "I—I did strike a match or two." He pushed wide the door of the mausoleum. "There is nothing to see," he said, "and yet, I believe, the scoundrelly people my sister-in-law leaves in charge of the Tower have been making a show-place of it, for I discovered, on paying a visit to the neighbourhood, that the door was unlocked and slightly ajar. Naturally, I investigated, and though the place proved empty, there are half-burnt matches on the floor inside. It is desecration to bring a parcel of gaping rustics to chuckle and stare under such a roof."

Running on irritably he led the way into the building, striking a vesta as he did so. Guy Vanbrugh and the war-correspondent found themselves in a roughly-circular space, floored and walled with polished granite, the latter honeycombed by regular recesses, almost all tenanted by the great leaden caskets for which they were devised.

"Ten generations of Lennoxes lie here," said the master of Groudle Tower. He paused, and they stood silently, the glow of the vesta shining on their faces. Edward Stormont threw it down.

"Shall we go?" he queried harshly.

The query was more a command than a request. Guy Vanbrugh and the war-correspondent obeyed. The fresh, cool air of the evening came pleasantly to their nostrils as they passed out.

Edward Stormont drew the door to and tried to close it firmly into its deep metal jambs. It resisted, he pushed it open again and examined the hinges. The door was of gun-metal, and they had not rusted in the least.

"I think I can see what is wrong," said Paul Jerome. He stooped down and swept the threshold clear of a twig or two and some gravel. The door thus eased fell solidly into its frame and Edward Stormont twisted the huge ring that shot its safe-like latch.

"I must send down and have it properly locked," he observed grimly; "nor shall it be invaded again, as I presume it has been, by local sightseers."

The set of his bearded jaw and the subdued gleam in his blue eyes said more than the words. Then he changed the subject, and the three walked away together, talking of indifferent matters. It was dusk when they reached the Tower.

Guy Vanbrugh's phaeton was standing outside the embattled entrance; he looked at his watch.

"I—I only drove over to see if I could be of any use," he said; "I had heard that some untoward event had occurred. But really it is far too late for a call, and your presence, Mr. Stormont, makes my offer unnecessary. Perhaps you will give my respects to my aunt and to Irene."

"Nonsense!" retorted Edward Stormont; "you must come in and have some dinner."

"I'm sorry!" he was told, "but I have some people dining at the 'Close' to-night. I had no idea it was so late."

Edward Stormont shook hands with him, and watched him drive down the avenue, after bidding the war-correspondent a hasty adieu.

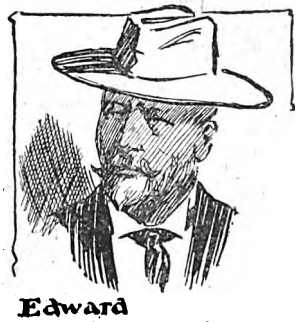
"A nice lad!" he said; "Vanbrugh was a lucky beggar to have such a son!"

He sighed and entered the hall. The first of the dinner-bells was ringing; the war-correspondent went on to his room. Arrived there, he opened his left hand; he had kept it lightly closed since he had swept free the threshold of the mausoleum. In it lay a small, tortoiseshell hairpin—broken.

TWELFTH CHAPTER.

"I'm a Hard Man to Frighten."

Upon the windy wharves and quays of Groudle, in the darkness of the March evening, two men were walking up and down, aimlessly, as though they had no more definite object than that of keeping in motion. They were John Davenal and Dennis Hartigan. The ex-steward's cigar had burnt



Edward Stormont

Digitized by Google

to a stump, its combustion hastened by the strong breeze. The red tip waxed and waned like a star. John Davenal's pipe had gone out. He bit restlessly at its mouthpiece as he walked.

"I'm afraid you got into yon trouble with the police on my account, Dennis," he said, suddenly breaking the silence; "if you hadn't bought that chloroform to doctor my pains with, there'd have been nought to bother you about."

Dennis Hartigan took his cigar out of his mouth. He paused a moment before speaking.

"What's the odds?" he growled; "all's well that ends well!"

The diver put his arm in the speaker's.

"It's good of you to look at it in that way, Dennis," he said; "very good."

The ex-steward glanced at his brother-in-law. John Davenal's tones had a curious ring in them—a ring that somehow suggested ingratiation. The diver drew his companion past the head of the little harbour and they went along the breakwater.

"You—you remember," pursued John Davenal, in the same tremulous, almost fawning fashion, "our arrangement about Moira? The allowance I was to make you while she stayed with me and remained in ignorance that you—that you were her father?"

"Yes," said Dennis Hartigan; "well, what of it?"

"N—nothing," answered the diver; "but I thought perhaps that now—now Hannah is dead, you would be going away—from Groudle, if not to sea—and that you might like some more money."

"Oh!" retorted the ex-steward. "Well, you can bet your bottom dollar money never comes amiss to me. But I'm not so sure that I want yours, John Davenal, not on those terms."

"I—I scarcely understand, Dennis," faltered the other. "What terms do you mean?" Dennis Hartigan released himself from the other's clasp upon his arm.

"About leaving Moira with you," he said; "it strikes me I shall need to take her away."

John Davenal paused in the windy dark of the breakwater.

He was leaning on his stick and swaying as if he were a very much older man.

"Take her away?" he gasped. "Why—why should you do that, what reason can you have?" Dennis Hartigan flung his cigar stump into the bay.

"My reasons are my business," he responded; "but if you've got to have one, let us say that I'm going to settle down somewhere further south, and that I want my daughter to manage the house for me."

The diver shook his head.

"You're not a home-keeping man, Dennis," he said; "besides, if that be so, you can have Kit; Kit is a rare little housekeeper. And then we might as well all move. I can retire now, and Plymouth or Southampton, or even Liverpool or Cardiff or Bristol, are nice places enough. You could live with us, Dennis, and it would cost you nothing."

"Pshaw!" exclaimed the ex-steward; "co-operative housekeeping don't suit me, and I can't stand Kit groping about and pawing me—I never could. If the reason I've given you isn't sufficient, choose another, or invent one of your own. Anyhow, I'm Moira's father, and I mean to have her."

John Davenal stood up abruptly and lifted his stick, instead of leaning on it. His powerful fingers were contracting and his nostrils dilated.

"Don't bully me, Dennis," he said sternly. "Perhaps I know more than you think for. I know that your reason—as you call it—is no better than a lie. Hannah threatened me, the—the very day she died, to take Moira away. But she told the truth, she owned that a mystery hung over the lass, that it had been allowed to hang for other folks' purposes. That was why she was going to take Moira from me, as, no doubt, it was why she had been given to me."

He raised his stick, quivering it passionately in his hand.

"Listen to me, Dennis," he continued. "I love Moira, and she loves me, and you are a wastrel and a drunkard. You shall not have Moira from me—no one can prove anything about her now that Hannah is dead; I will not even admit that she is your daughter."

The ex-steward sneered.

"I can easily prove she isn't yours," he snarled. "How will Moira like that, John Davenal? Your wife never had any babies. You've managed cleverly enough so far, pretending Moira had been left with a wet-nurse when you brought the missus home to Groudle to die. But I can soon prick that bubble."

John Davenal set his strong, white teeth.

"Prove away," he said, "you can't prove Moira into your evil charge. I'm not a poor man—I'll go to law. There's the Lord Chancellor of England, Dennis, to be a father to her till the law's made up its mind, and where's the man that dares touch her till it has? I'll have the law on you for two or three years, Dennis, if it brings me to the poor-house. But before I'm broke she'll be twenty-one and—married!"

A savage ejaculation burst from Dennis Hartigan's lips.

"You obstinate old fool!" he cried. "Don't think you can play the sea-lawyer with me. When I say I'll have the girl, I will have her, sweetheart or no sweetheart, or I'll make you and her rue the hour you said me nay."

The diver faced him unflinchingly.

"Threaten and swear as much as you like, Dennis," he said. "I'm a hard man to frighten, and Moira's more to me than life or money, or peace of mind. I told Hannah she shouldn't have her, and now she's dead, I tell you the same. I'll pay you fair and honest, what I said I would, and, if you speak a word to Moira or to the lawyers, you'll not get that. Make up your mind which it's to be, Dennis, and good night to you."

He turned on his heel and went back along the breakwater. The ex-steward stood silent, his lips distorted in a sneer, his eyes glittering. Then, with a short, forced expiration like the snarl of a cat, he darted down one of the triple flights of landing steps towards the black water.

To a ring in one of the landing platforms, a string of boats was moored, they floated peacefully some distance from the breakwater in the harbour basin. Dennis Hartigan drew the leading boat into the shadow of the stairs, loosed it from the line, slid in, and sculled himself noiselessly up the harbour, keeping in the shadow.

On the further side of the quiet pool he landed, secured the boat, crawled up on to a deserted wharf, and, speeding along it, reached the cobble-stoned level of Groudle Quay.

Approaching stealthily the side fence of the diver's cottage, he climbed over and crawled along inside the large garden, screening himself dexterously, till he gained the vicinity of the entrance-wicket. Here he crouched down, hidden by a row of privet bushes. He had drawn a sailor's knife from his pocket, and fastened it open by a spring. So he waited.

Digitized by Google

At length the latch of the wicket clicked. It swung wide, and John Davenal came in. As he passed, Dennis Hartigan leant out and buried the knife-blade in his back. The diver fell with a groan. There was the crackle of a twig or two under foot, a rustle of bushes on the other side of the garden, and Dennis Hartigan was gone.

THIRTEENTH CHAPTER.
"How Very Romantic!"

"Morning, Ussher!"

"Good morning, sir!"

The detective paused before the high-backed oaken settle that flanked the huge, carved fire-place in the hall of Groudle Tower. On it, his feet stretched out to the blaze, his arms folded, sat Paul Jerome; he had looked up as Mr. Ussher passed across the hall, and called out a cheerful if brusque greeting.

He smiled thoughtfully as he noticed the signs of importance in the detective's bearing—the tightly-buttoned overcoat, the pursed lips, the drooped eyelids, and, above all, the red-bound note-book carried with a finger between the leaves, and the others clasping it jealously.

"I believe your inquest comes off to-day, Ussher?" he said. The detective put his right hand to his hip, and stood with the left standing stiffly at his side, holding the note-book.

"It does, sir," he answered, drily. The war-correspondent surveyed him with provoking amusement.

"Going to arrest anyone on the coroner's warrant?" he demanded.

Mr. Ussher drew himself up.

"No, sir," he said, "only formal evidence will be given, and then the inquest will be adjourned."

"So you own yourself beaten, so far?" observed Jerome.

The detective glanced at him between his half-closed lids.

"Scarcely that, sir," he said. "The case has assumed even more importance than before. Last night John Davenal, the brother of the deceased woman, was found lying in his own garden, stabbed in the back."

"Good Heavens!" exclaimed the war-correspondent, starting up; "what an extraordinary thing!"

Mr. Ussher showed the whites of his eyes in a flash of gratification at the effect of his news. The sternly official expression returned to his large, plump features.

"The fact serves to confirm my view," he added loftily, "that the murderer of Hannah Davenal was not a member of the Tower household. It is probable that some person, with or without good reason, had a grudge against both the Davenals. As, in neither case, had robbery taken place, or been attempted, and as each attack was most deliberate, the motive cannot be other than revenge."

"Admirably deduced!" exclaimed Paul Jerome, with an impenetrable assumption of enthusiasm, "but about this stabbing business, do I understand that Davenal is dead, or dying?"

Mr. Ussher put his head on one side.

"Hard to say, sir," he responded, "the poor fellow has lost a lot of blood—the knife glanced off the shoulder-blade, and made a great gash in the chest-wall, cutting into the substance of the lung, the doctor reports. There has been internal hæmorrhage, he is in a dangerous condition."

The war-correspondent knitted his brows.

"And there is no clue to his assailant?" he asked.

The detective answered in the negative.

"He went out with his brother-in-law," Paul Jerome was told, "for a walk and a smoke. They parted at the head of the breakwater, after strolling in its neighbourhood for some while. An hour after, Davenal's daughter fancied she heard the click of the gate-latch. Not hearing anyone knock, she looked out at the front door, and saw her father lying on the path."

"His brother-in-law," said the war-correspondent, reflectively, "that is the man you arrested, Ussher—Hartigan, wasn't it?"

Mr. Ussher frowned.

"It was, sir," he replied, "but the man seems to bear no malice. I found him quite willing to give me every assistance in his power. He even asked me if I wanted to arrest him again, for the attack on his brother-in-law." And the detective smiled grimly.

"And didn't you?" queried the war-correspondent.

The detective bit his lip.

"You will have your little joke, Mr. Jerome," he said. "No, I didn't—Hartigan had gone straight to a public-house on the quay by the breakwater, and ordered some supper. On his way back to the Half Brick Inn, where he has been lodging, he called at Hawthorn Cottage, his brother-in-law's place, to speak to his sister, a blind girl, who lives with the Davenals. Finding what had happened, and that Davenal was practically at the point of death, he insisted on the police being informed, and himself came to the station."

"Very proper," commented the war-correspondent, "and very discreet."

Mr. Ussher adjusted the elastic band about his note-book.

"Oh," he answered, "the fellow is hard-headed enough, and yet he is communicative too, when he is handled tactfully. He tells me that his wife was eccentric and avaricious to a degree, and that her brother, John Davenal, is not unlike her in eccentricity, though he is by no means ungenerous. Hartigan thinks that they may jointly have excited the hatred of some third party, both being extremely obstinate, not to say cantankerous."

"A feasible theory," said Paul Jerome. "By the way, I suppose this last remark was after you had broached to him your view that his wife's death and the attempted murder of his brother-in-law might be due to the same agent?"

"Y—yes," answered Mr. Ussher, reflectively; "I believe I did mention it."

The war-correspondent nodded.

"I only wondered," he said, "if the idea were exclusively yours."

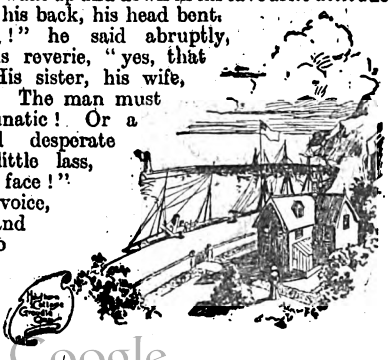
The detective put his note-book in his pocket.

"Oh, yes," he said, "my own exclusively," and, with an added "Good morning!" and a semi-military salute, moved off across the hall and vanished into the offices at its rear.

Paul Jerome gazed after him with a quizzical expression on his sunburnt countenance. The humorous tremor about the corners of his mouth disappeared suddenly, he sat down on the settle again, and fell to contemplating the red hollows in the glowing coals.

The ancient clock in the hall ticked away the moments, and still the war-correspondent seemed to chew the cud of his thoughts, and his face grew graver and graver. At length he rose and began to walk up and down in his favourite attitude—his hands behind his back, his head bent.

"Kate Hartigan!" he said abruptly, speaking out of his reverie, "yes, that was her name. His sister, his wife, his brother-in-law. The man must be a homicidal lunatic! Or a very daring and desperate scoundrel. Poor little lass, she had a sweet face!"



A clear, girlish voice, somewhat raised and sharpened, cut into his soliloquy.

"How very romantic!" it said, and Paul Jerome

Digitized by Google

wakened out of his brooding, to find himself confronted by Irene Tarleton. Irene's mouth was mirthful, and her cheeks flushed, but her eyes lacked their usual softness and vivacity. She wore a riding-habit, and played with a slender bamboo whip.

"So this is where you come to dream your day-dreams?" she went on. "Excuse my eavesdropping, I couldn't help it, really, and I didn't hear the lady's name. But perhaps you didn't mention it. Never mind, I'm not curious."

The war-correspondent flushed, but under his moustaches his lips were twitching.

"I'm afraid you wouldn't know—ahem—the lady's name if I were to mention it," he said, "and yet, to use the language of the melodramatist, her humble cottage lies within sight of your castle windows. She is, to be exact, the sister-in-law of your mother's luckless maid, Davenal. Her name is Kate Hartigan, and she is blind.

"Yesterday, as it happened, I was able to do her a chance service, she was within an ace of being run down at the level-crossing. I was out riding, and managed to get her off it in the nick of time."

Irene paled. "And risked your life, I've no doubt," he was told, half-admiringly, half-irritably. "Is she—is she really very pretty?"

"Very," said Paul Jerome, "in a sad, childish, querulous fashion. She is a bit of an oddity, I think, poor little soul."

He took her gloved hand into his. "I believe," he observed, "that I ought to be allowed to say 'how do you do?' Do you know I have not seen you since last night, and at dinner, as well as afterwards, you scarcely spoke to me."

"Did I," murmured Irene, plucking at the loop of her habit, "well, you see, Mr. Jerome, my aunt in Yorkshire is really a most unendurable person."

The war-correspondent stared; then a light broke into his face, and he smiled.

"I'm very much flattered," he replied; "if I could I would reassure Lady Tarleton. But I—I can't."

Irene blushed to her eyebrows.

"Really, Mr. Jerome!" she said.

Paul Jerome was imperturbable.

"You are going out riding?" he asked.

Irene nodded.

"With a groom to chaperon me," she said, a suspicion of school-girlish malice in her tone.

The war-correspondent looked at his watch.

"Stormont is engaged with his steward," he remarked; "ride round by the place they call the 'Half Brick Inn.' I will commandeer old Buckshot, Stormont's hunter, and ride him across country. I will be there as soon as you. Do you mind?"

Irene laughed.

"If I go to Yorkshire," she said, "I shall blame you for it."

And she caught up her habit and left him alone. But she looked back over her shoulder as she passed out through the side door that led to the stable, and the war-correspondent sprang up the stairs, three steps at the time, to dress.

FOURTEENTH CHAPTER.

Guy Vanbrugh is Detected.

"Mr. Davenal anywhere about?"

Guy Vanbrugh called the question to a burly, authoritative-looking personage in muddy blue overalls, who was standing on the wet and sandy deck of a very dank and bedraggled yet well-shaped little steam-vessel. It was the ill-fated Sylph, safely ensconced in dry dock, and awaiting the attentions of the repairers.

The foreman came down the gang-plank to the dockside.

"No, sir," Guy Vanbrugh was told, "he calculated to leave the job to us once she was high and dry again. Besides, sir, haven't you heard about him?"

The Baronet started.

"No," he said, "what's wrong? I—I was going up to the cottage, but thought I might find him here, I—I wanted a word with him personally."

"You'll scarcely have that for a while, sir," replied the foreman; "John Davenal's fighting for his life, sir. He was struck down at his own gates last night, sir—stabbed in the back by some hound, him that's as well liked as any man in Groudle."

"Good Heavens!" exclaimed Guy Vanbrugh aghast.

"Yes, sir," added the other; "and not even in a fight, or after a word or two of argument, but by some cowardly brute who daren't meet him face to face, and must steal up behind to run a knife into him. It's touch and go, the doctor's say, whether the poor fellow'll win through it."

Guy Vanbrugh collected his scattered senses.

"I—I will go round at once," he said, and continued hastily, "I may be able to help in some way."

The foreman sighed.

"I'm afraid not, sir," he rejoined, "though it's kind of you to think of it. But John Davenal is one that's thriven, and they do tell me he's had the best doctor in Groudle and a couple of hospital nurses with him turn about. The end of it's out of our hands, sir, it must be for his own strength to pull him through now. They say the hæmorrhage is very bad, sir, that's the trouble."

Guy Vanbrugh murmured something in reply, and hastened off, out of the small shipyard and through the waterside shed and wharves of Groudle to the less active quarter where the diver's cottage fronted the bay, across a rough cobble-stoned level, and the calm surface of the sheltered harbour.

He shivered slightly as he passed in at the wicket—it was there, if he had been correctly informed, that the diver had been stricken down by his unseen enemy—and closed it heedfully that it might not click or shriek. Then he went on through the neat garden and tapped cautiously upon the door. The blind girl opened it. She was very pale, and her eyelids were flushed as if by weeping.

"Yes?" she said questioningly.

"It is I, Sir Guy Vanbrugh," answered the visitor gently; he knew her well by sight—"I have only just heard of Mr. Davenal's sad condition. May I see Miss Davenal for a moment—perhaps I may be of some use."

Kate Hartigan drew the door wide.

"Will you come in, sir?" she said, and retreated.

Guy Vanbrugh acted on the invitation, took off his hat and entered the pleasant kitchen beyond the diminutive ante-room; Kit had pushed open the door of that also.

"Moira," she said, "here is Sir Guy Vanbrugh, to ask about your father."

The Baronet stepped forward. The room was empty save for Moira, himself, and the blind girl, and the lovers had no need to restrain the language of the eye and hand.

Moira had risen from the couch by the window, she came and put her hands in his, and the tears overran her long lashes. Sir Guy Vanbrugh lifted her small, strong fingers to his lips, and kissed them silently.

"I—I went round to the yard," he observed, trying to speak conventionally, "to see how they were getting on with the Sylph—and also to have a word with your father about another matter. And, of course, they told me. It is very strange and terrible."

Digitized by Google

"Yes," answered Moira, unsteadily "we—we can't understand it at all."

She was trembling, as though the sight of him had unnerved her. The eyes of each were fastened upon those of the other, in a gaze more eloquent than words. Kit stood silently by, listening to their forced and halting exchanges of conversation.

"I—I fancied perhaps I might be of some assistance," said Guy Vanbrugh awkwardly.

Moira shook her head.

"No—no, thank you, Sir Guy," she replied, lingering upon his name with a caressing intonation, "the doctor is an old friend of father's, he sent in two hospital nurses, and a specialist was here this morning from Liverpool. But—but they say it all depends upon father's strength."

Her voice broke, and she smothered a sob.

Her lover could not bear to see her fighting so desperately for self-control.

"I will not say more then," he murmured, "than that I am very much grieved. I will drive down to-night and see how your father gets on. We—we must hope for the best."

"I am trying," faltered Moira, "but you see, it is so hard. He was not going down any more, he was so happy to think that he could pass nearly all his time with—with us."

Guy Vanbrugh had stepped towards the door, he cast a significant glance at it, and Moira moved to show him out. As they passed into the little ante-room, he drew her to him. For the moment they were practically alone together.

"My darling," he whispered, "what a horrible thing!"

Moira buried her face in his breast.

"I—I nearly told him last night about—about us," she sobbed; "but we were interrupted."

"Is there any reason to suspect someone in particular?" queried her lover.

Moira choked back her sobs.

"No," she said, "we can think of no one, and the doctors will not let the police go near him so long as there is a chance of his getting better. They say it might kill him."

Guy Vanbrugh patted the hand that she had laid on his shoulder.

"Your father has a fine constitution, dear," he told her; "and he has lived a very regular and temperate life. That is all in his favour."

Moira brushed the tears out of her eyes.

"If—if only the diving were not so bad for people's hearts," she said, "that is what makes them all so anxious."

Her lover kissed a wet, white cheek that was very near his own, and whispered soothing words of love and tenderness. He did not notice that the outer door had swung ajar, and that someone was approaching it up the path, someone who had just stepped out of a smart victoria at the gate.

Suddenly the wicket-latch clicked, and Moira looked up. It was too late. Lady Tarleton, pausing on the threshold of Hawthorn Cottage, had glanced into the small entrance-hall, and perceived none other than Sir Guy Vanbrugh with a fair and ruffled head pillowed on his breast.

(Another long instalment next week.)

Mrs. Younglove: "See this beautiful ring John bought me." Mrs. Oldbird: "What has he been up to now?"

"What do you think you will make out of my daughter's talent?" Professor (absent-mindedly): "About half-a-guinea a lesson, if the piano lasts."

He (at parting): "Oh, Ethel! You have broken my——" She (interrupting): "Not your heart surely!" He (sadly): "No; my whole pocketful of cigars."

Nell: "Did you enjoy the performance last night?" Belle: "No. It was stupid. Nearly every woman in the house took her hat off, and there was nothing to look at but the play."

Your Editor Chats.

The second list in our great new competition appears on page 421. I take this opportunity of advising readers who have not yet entered it to do so without further delay; they are sure to regret it if they let the opportunity slip by. In addition to being a profitable occupation from the monetary point of view, the solving of puzzles is both interesting and instructive. It is really astonishing how much one learns from them.

Fifty pounds in cash, which is being given away as the first prize, is a sum which would be acceptable to anyone, and it is not often possible to obtain so much money in such an easy manner. There are two other cash prizes of £25 and £10 each, in addition to which twenty-five of our much-appreciated Gramophones will be awarded.

As an entertainer a Gramophone is unrivalled, and it is so simple to manipulate. All you have to do to get the sounds out of the instrument is to put the record in position, then set the machine in motion. It will continue to reproduce the sounds engraved on the record just as long as you wish it to do so. Each of the Gramophones offered in the competition is accompanied by two records, and is fitted with a Concert Sound-Box, which brings out the tone of the instrument much more loudly and clearly.

Those readers who did not decide to enter the competition until it was too late to obtain a copy of last week's Short Stories may enter now by purchasing a copy of last Friday's Pearson's Weekly or Home Notes, both of which contain the first list of sentences. The price of each of these papers is one penny.

The day after this paper is in your hands the Boat-Race between the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge will be decided. The tale of a love affair which came out of one of these events is recorded on pages 438 and 439. The title of it is "True Blue."

Next week's cover will consist of a picture illustrating a very dramatic incident from our splendid new serial "Held Apart," concerning which so many favourable opinions are expressed. The picture is the work of Mr. Albert Morrow, the well-known artist. It will be beautifully printed in green and gold.

On page 431 you will find something about the Fresh Air Fund, that great institution for giving children a day in the country, with plenty to eat and drink, for the small sum of ninepence for each child. I hope all my readers will contribute generously to it this year. All contributions will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly. If every person who reads the notices about the Fund were to send only ninepence there would be no disappointed faces among the thousands of children in the large towns of the British Isles. They would all be able to have their day in the country—the one bright spot in the whole year to many who never see anything but bricks and mortar. If you can't spare ninepence smaller sums will be accepted gratefully; they all go to swell the big total which it is hoped to reach this year.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

True - - Blue.

A Boat Race Love Story.

Millie Grahame was in a high state of excitement. She had never seen the boat race before, but now at last she had got her wish, and her brother had promised to take her.

Besides this, Ethel Fortescue, her greatest friend, had persuaded her brother to take her, and was going too.

Millie and Ethel had been friends since childhood; but although Ethel knew Millie's brother Gus very well, yet Millie had never met Wilfred Fortescue, and she felt very glad that he was coming to make a fourth, for she knew from experience that Gus always monopolised Ethel.

She thought to herself, "If only those two boys chum in well together I shall have a chance of a good old confab. with Ethel. I have such lots to tell her, and I want to hear what she thinks of my idea of having my new frock for the dance to-night pale blue in honour of the victors, for of course Cambridge will win; that goes without saying."

At this point Millie snipped the ends of a pale blue rosette she had just completed, and surveyed it with admiring eyes.

Just then her brother Gus entered the room, and seeing her work, cried out—

"'Hullo, you are not going to wear that washed out old cabbage stalk, are you? That the right colour for you," and he pointed to a little swallow of Oxford blue in his buttonhole, and held out a similar one to his sister.

Millie refused it with a great show of indignation.

"You wretched boy," she said, with withering scorn.

"Oh, you do rise so beautifully," teased her brother, diving into her work basket. "Where's my rosette? I suppose you've made me one like yours."

"I have," replied his sister, somewhat mollified, for she was a staunch light blue. "One just like mine, and I've made one for Ethel, too."

"You can give me that," said Gus, hastily, "I'll give it her myself; and now do go and get ready, and look sharp, there's a good girl, or we shall never get our train, and the Fortescues are going to wait for us on the railway bridge."

The Fortescues were already waiting for them on the bridge when they arrived. Gus sprang up, schoolboy fashion, four steps at a time, and Millie followed him as quickly as might be.

Ethel Fortescue was only a year older than Millie, and they had both only just left school; but somehow during these last few weeks of separation she seemed to Millie to have grown out of all recognition, and to have become quite the woman.

Millie was not conscious that Ethel was observing the same alteration in herself, and she turned from scrutinising her friend to glance at her brother Wilfred, and met his eyes very gravely regarding her in his turn.

The impression she received was that she had never seen anyone quite so determined-looking in her life; but she liked his face, and thought him quite as good-looking as his sister.

She did not trouble to bestow further thought upon him, and little imagined that she had made a very deep impression on him.

By the time Millie had reached the top of the bridge and joined the others, Gus had already taken complete possession of Ethel, who now, after affectionately greeting Millie, casually introduced her brother, and proceeded to march off with Gus, leaving Milly and Wilfred to bring up the rear.

Wilfred was most certainly bent on doing his best to please and interest his companion, but Millie was not in a very amiable temper.

Firstly, she was disappointed at not being able to walk with Ethel, and secondly she noticed, with severest disapproval, that Wilfred had in his buttonhole a bird of Oxford blue identical with the ones she and Gus had so disdained.

She responded coldly to Wilfred's overtures, and in despair he reverted to the weather for the third time, and added—

"I hope it will be a good race. By the way, you're Cambridge, I see, like Ethel. I'm Oxford myself."

"I'm not," said Millie. "Gus and Ethel and I are all Cambridge. At school we used to have tugs of war, the Oxford girls against the Cambridge girls, and Ethel and I always pulled for Cambridge, and we always won."

"I think most girls are Cambridge," said Wilfred thoughtlessly, "unless they have a special reason for being Oxford. It's the pale blue takes their fancy, and they think the colour suits them; at least, it suits you," he said, looking admiringly at Milly.

She had on a black coat and skirt and a pale blue scarf, and trimmings of the same in her hat, and knew that they became her amazingly, but she chose to put on an offended air, and was quite childishly indignant with him for assigning such a ridiculous reason to her sex for its choice of favours.

At the last they all had to hurry up for their train, and were packed into a compartment together with a dozen other people of very "assorted sizes," as Wilfred whispered to Millie, making her laugh in spite of herself.

After that she relaxed her dignity a little, to Fortescue's immense relief and delight, and even condescended to beg him to throw away the Oxford swallow, but he laughed at that and shook his head.

"I've got a cousin rowing stroke in the Oxford boat," he said, "and I'm going to Trinity College, Oxford, myself later on; but I'll tell you what, I'll wear your colour if you'll wear mine."

But to this Millie would by no means consent.

The four of them secured good places along the bank, where they had a capital view of the finish. Cambridge won, to Millie's unbounded delight and triumph.

Gus and Ethel seemed by this time to have become too absorbed in each other to be properly interested in the proceedings, and even Wilfred was not nearly so cast down as Millie had fondly hoped.

"I should have been bitterly disappointed if Cambridge had lost," she declared, "and I know no one rowing, and you have a cousin in the Oxford boat. Aren't you ashamed of him?"

Wilfred laughed.

"Better luck next time," he said. "Wait till I row stroke," he added confidently. "You'll see."

Millie looked at him contemptuously, and a cloud came over his face.

During the years that followed Millie often thought of this day. In the meantime she and Ethel had gone to be "finished" abroad, and had since spent most of their time travelling on the Continent.

Very little had they seen of their respective brothers. Millie had seen Gus hardly at all, and Wilfred only at intervals, for he was usually away in outlandish parts or busy with his tutor.

But now once again they were all in England, and Wilfred was completing his last year at Oxford. He had done well.

too, in his work, and was to row stroke—as he had told Millie he would—in the next boat race.

The boat race day had come round again, and found Millie and Gus staying with the Fortescues.

Ethel was engaged to be married in the summer, though she was still the best of friends with Gus, who was fond of referring to his "blighted affections," but still continued to fall in love on an average once a fortnight.

Gus was now on the Thames Conservancy, and his was the proud privilege of following the race in the Umpire's boat.

Millie and Ethel were to watch from a friend's house overlooking the course.

Millie's interest in the race was far greater than it had ever been before. She knew someone in the boats, the wrong boat certainly, and although she had religiously decorated herself with light blue, she was not so sure after all whether, in her heart of hearts, she wished it to be the winning colour.

Ethel, since her engagement to an Oxford man, had gone over to the enemy completely, and was openly sporting dark blue as if she had worn it all her life.

She told Millie she was very silly to stick to Cambridge now there were so many reasons she should be Oxford. "And I am sure Fred will be very hurt about it," she added.

Millie did not take much notice of what her friend said; she was giving all her attention to the crews, and she actually drew a breath of delight as Oxford shot past, and reached the winning post, and the crowd started cheering—"Hurrah for Oxford. Oxford wins! Oxford, Oxford!"

"Well, I am glad," exclaimed Ethel; "indeed, it is quite a relief to me that it's all over. I declare I don't want excitement like this every day. I do hope Fred won't be quite done up with his exertions. You know we are having a sort of reception to-morrow, and we don't want to be disappointed of our 'lion.'

"By the way, Millie, you won't wear Cambridge blue to-morrow after this triumph, will you? It would be like a slap in the face to Fred."

"It won't make any difference to him," declared Millie, "and of course I shall; that new blouse is the only decent thing I've got. And Fred's sure to be all right, Ethel," she added, "so you need not be afraid of his disappointing us."

Millie was feeling very gay and light-hearted, unaccountably so, in view of Cambridge's defeat; but the next day as she completed her toilette, she did almost wish her dress had been any other colour.

As she clasped her bracelets she took a final peep at herself in the glass, and really pale blue suited her so admirably that already she felt reconciled.

Wilfred's words of so long ago, "It's the colour that fetches the girls," recurred to her, and she laughed to herself, and determined to be very nice to him for once.

She came downstairs, and found Wilfred standing somewhat gloomily by the fireplace.

"Cambridge for ever!" she laughed, as she greeted him.

"By Jove! You'll win me over to that colour before you've done," he said, his face brightening at her friendly manner.

"Nonsense, why I'm going to congratulate you on your splendid success," she said, holding out her little hand to him which he took eagerly, and held fast in both his own, as if he would never let it go.

"Do you remember," he said, with his eyes fastened on her, "I asked you once to give me your Cambridge rosette for my Oxford bird? Will you give me one of your ribbons now?" He touched the dainty pale blue bow at her wrist. "I won't ask you to wear my colour in return this time," he said.

"Suppose," she said, colouring under his ardent gaze, "that I won't give it under any other condition?"

"Oh, Millie, do you mean what you say? Do you care for me a little bit at last?"

Millie's head drooped lower, and Fred drew her unresisting into his arms.

"I'll be true blue to you, my darling," he said, with his lips pressed to her hair, "true blue as long as I live!"

Ellice Beere.

Stop a Cough in One Night.

Take Veno's Lightning Cough Cure. This Marvellously Successful Remedy Surpasses anything in the Healing Art and has the Largest Sale in the World.

The remarkable rapidity with which Veno's Lightning Cough Cure absolutely cures the worst cases of Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, Asthma, Influenza, Catarrh, and Children's Coughs has gained for it scientific recognition throughout the world.

Granville H. Sharpe, F.C.S., Analyst, 11 and 12 Great Tower Street, London, says in his certificate of analysis:—"I am of opinion that Veno's Lightning Cough Cure will prove a valuable remedy in the cure of coughs, colds, asthma, and all bronchial complaints."

Geo. Knox, M.D., 256 Second Avenue, Pittsburg, writes:—"Veno's Lightning Cough Cure excels in chronic coughs and bronchitis, and is especially good for children."

Ask for Veno's Lightning Cough Cure at Chemists, price 1/1½ and 2/9, or post free from the Veno Drug Co., Hulme, Manchester.

Seaweed as a Medicine.

Its Marvellous Effect upon the Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, and Bowels.

Seaweed possesses a natural strengthening, healing and purifying power far greater than other known remedies. This is now conceded by recognised authorities. It was first introduced by Mr. Veno, as one of the ingredients of Veno's Seaweed Tonic, since which time Veno's Seaweed Tonic has been used in hospitals and by doctors themselves because of its superior curative properties. Its most brilliant effect is produced in stomach, liver and kidney diseases, and the extraordinary cures it performs, even in the worst cases, is positive proof of its great therapeutic value. It is a god-send to sufferers from indigestion, wind, headache, weakness, kidney trouble, weak and painful back, torpid liver, female troubles, poorness of blood and Habitual Constipation. Ask for Veno's Seaweed Tonic, price 1/1½ & 2/9 at chemists and medicine vendors.

Free Trial Bottles—A free trial bottle of either Veno's Seaweed Tonic or Veno's Lightning Cough Cure, and a free copy of "The People's Medical Instructor," an indispensable treatise on diseases for the household, a complete family doctor in itself, will be sent to any address on receipt of 3d. for postage from the Veno Drug Co., Hulme, Manchester, England.

CHICKEN HATCHING EXTRAORDINARY FOR 2/6

The Texas Egg-Hatcher and Rearer combined supersedes all incubators. Hatches above and rears little ones below simultaneously all the year round. A money-making home industry requiring neither capital nor labour. Turns 1d. eggs into valuable Chickens or Ducklings. Millions selling in America. 15-egg size 2/6; 30-egg, 5/-; complete for use. Address, AMERICAN POULTRY SYNDICATE (Room 101), 7 Albion Grove, Stoke Newington, London, N.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%

repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

Digitized by Google

A Third Party.

Proving that 'Tis the Unexpected that Happens.

"This is what I call a most outrageous interference with the liberty of the subject!" mused Miss Kate Wheatley, who did not look so indignant as her remark would have led anyone to suppose.

She frowned, however, as she raised the letter in order to peruse it again.

"This is how it stands," she continued, after a second perusal, shaking the paper at an imaginary individual in the corner. "Aunt Eliza, called 'Liza, for short, has some money—a fair amount of it, as I understand.

"Like most people who have money, she thinks that everybody else wants to handle it when she has gone to—to where they don't use that sort of thing, I must say, for lack of knowledge concerning the exact destination of Aunt 'Liza.

"So, like many more people once again, she thinks she can use that money, and the desire of others to have it, by forcing them to do something which pleases her; it may not please the others, but they do not count in Aunt 'Liza's calculations.

"Very well! Now, Aunt 'Liza thinks that it will be much better to keep that money in one sum than to divide it between the only two relatives she has. It happens that one of these relatives is a woman, myself, to wit!—and the other is a man!

"I didn't know of his existence till I received this disagreeable communication, and he is possibly in a like position. So, Aunt 'Liza, good lady, decrees that we must marry one another, and so keep the money in the family. If not, she will carry out her desire to keep it one sum and in the family by giving it to an orphanage.

"I don't see the logic of that decision, but then, I'm not Aunt 'Liza. Both she and I ought to be thankful for that! I am!"

She twisted the sheet of notepaper in her fingers, her brows knitted in reflection.

"Easy circumstances and life with a man not of your own choosing, and who is certain to be somewhat like dear auntie, or she wouldn't take to him; or hard work, with independence and a chance of marrying a man with whom you have fallen in love; that's the affair in a nutshell, and I choose the latter.

"I haven't fallen in love with a man yet, but I may. So here goes to tell Aunt 'Liza. If my reply gets there first, she can't blame the man. I'm sorry for him, but I can't bear the idea that he should be the first to say that he doesn't want me!"

Miss Kate Wheatley wrote the note that settled her future career and then turned her attention to the necessity of gaining a livelihood for herself. She revolved in her mind the prospects of a governess' life as against those of an amanuensis to a literary man and a position as a lady clerk.

Without coming to any proper decision, she bought the current issue of the largest circulation in the world, and deliberately wrote letters in application for all three positions.

"If I were a man, I should toss for it, probably," she remarked. "Being a woman, I adopt a much more sensible course and try all three. I could fill all three positions, and my choice will most likely be made for me!"

She received a reply to the letter answering the advertisement for an amanuensis, but she found that her prospective employer was a doctor; he was a man of means, retired from practice (in which he could not have made much of a mark), and devoting himself to municipal affairs.

"You are very young," he observed, looking at her over his glasses.

"I shall get out of that, sir!" replied Miss Wheatley demurely, and the retired medico hardly knew how to take it.

"You say you can do all I want," he resumed blandly. "I should like to test you at shorthand and also your skill on this new-fangled machine which people say is equal to lengthening your life because it saves time." He waved his hand towards the typewriter.

He was sarcastic, and this aroused Kate to answer in the same strain.

"It is better than medicine, then! I prefer the typewriter to drugs! Suppose you dictate something to me and see what I can do?"

Dr. William Banks cast a quick glance at the girl; it was new to him to be spoken to in that manner, and he could not feel certain whether it was innocence or impudence. However, he tried her skill both in shorthand and typewriting, and was delighted.

She spoke French and German, too, which was very convenient. He engaged her at a salary of £2 a month, with board and lodging, to begin with; Kate accepted, and the retired medico chuckled at having made so good a bargain.

"She is well educated," he said gleefully, rubbing his hands. "It will make me appear big in the eyes of those who know me, and that is worth a good deal; besides which, she will prove a useful companion in time!"

From this it may be gleaned that Miss Kate Wheatley had made a slight impression on the elderly gentleman's heart as well as upon his purse; both impressions were equally slight, but both had the chance of improving.

Digitized by Google

The work was light, and she was made comfortable in the house by an old cook, so she settled down to life as secretary to Dr. William Banks, and lost even the vestige of regret which had remained with her in connection with Aunt 'Liza's money.

Dr. Banks' appreciation of his secretary's qualifications increased as the days passed.

At the end of the first week he asked her to sit with him in the evening, dividing her time between reading to him and to herself, or doing other little things for either, as occasion offered. This was just as agreeable to Kate as to him, and she was pleased.

After a month he doubled her salary, and at the end of the third month he had decided that Kate bore so striking a resemblance to the lamented Mrs. Banks that he must seriously make up his mind to instal her as that inestimable lady's successor.

Mrs. Banks, it may be stated, had been somewhat rotund in figure, very full-faced—some rude persons called it fat—and had scanty red hair; Kate was slim, with golden-brown hair, and well-formed features.

A charming complexion and vivacious expression, instead of Mrs. Banks' florid tint and stolid look, completed the contrast; the fact that the doctor saw a great likeness is another proof of the power of the tender passion over an old man. He would pass his hand over his head, at the particular spot where the hair was thin, and sigh. Kate noticed this one evening, and smiled behind her book.

"Probably he is sighing as he remembers that the late Mrs. B. used to pull his hair just there!" she said to herself. "It is very touching when a woman leaves behind her so much—or is it so little?—to be remembered by!" The true state of affairs never entered her head, although she was more than ordinarily observant.

The condition of the susceptible portion of Dr. Banks' anatomy had arrived at that condition when someone else appeared on the scene; this was Dr. William Banks, Jr., who had been practising in a small country town and had sold his business in order to return to the Metropolis and secure a more lucrative one.

He was introduced to the secretary, and it did not take him long to grasp the situation, especially when his father tried to point out that Kate's hair was like that of the late lamented.

"It's a good thing I turned up!" declared Dr. William when he retired for the night. "The old gentleman is making a perfect fool of himself with that girl, who, I must say, doesn't encourage him, so far as I can see. I must put a stop to it! Dear me! Once a man, twice a child; that's what the proverb says, and I fear that my respected father is getting into his second childhood!"

Three days later, William the younger reasoned thus with himself:

"She's the best girl it has been my luck to come across, and it would be a sin for her to waste her young life tied to an old man like father. I don't care to do it, but I'll cut him out with her, for the girl's own sake. I think we should make a good, well-matched couple!"

He surveyed himself in the glass and saw a man who—well, he "took after" his mother, as people say. His expression was more deserving of that name, as there was some expression in it. He smiled complacently, and proceeded to sketch out a plan of campaign.

He joined the party in the evening and made himself agreeable to the secretary, conversing with her on educational and social topics, on which she was well informed.

Dr. William the elder was not displeased; he was so confident of his own conquest that he saw no danger, but rather accepted it as a good omen. William the younger would welcome his stepmother very heartily and be glad to retain so charming a lady in the family.

The wooing of William the younger did not proceed as he had hoped; it was not conducive to progress to have Miss

(Continued overleaf.)

SEIGEL'S SYRUP

"My husband suffered from acute indigestion for over five years. His chest was so raw he could eat next to nothing. Seigel's Syrup wrought a complete cure. (Mrs.) H. Mansell, The Scrubbs, Bisley, Stroud."

"For months I suffered from indigestion, anæmia, lassitude and disfiguring spots on my face. Seigel's Syrup absolutely cured me when everything else had failed. (Miss) Rose Newton, 1 Brighton Grove, New Cross, S.E."

The condition of the blood governs the health. Pure, rich blood is the product of well-digested food, conveys nourishment to brain and body tissues, carries away their poisonous waste substances, sustains life. Rheumatism and Gout are caused by the deposit of Uric Acid in the blood, Anæmia by the reduction of red blood corpuscles through absorption of fæcal poisons in constipation. Biliousness by absorption of bile into the blood. To avoid these complaints and secure good health, maintain perfect digestion, pure blood, an active liver, and efficient kidneys by the regular use of Seigel's Syrup. Backed by 34 years' unbroken success in 16 countries.

PURIFIES THE BLOOD.

Kate attending to William the elder during the day, and then to have him interjecting his remarks in the conversation during the evening just where that remark was not desirable. William stood it for a time, but finally resolved that he must bring up some reinforcements in order to enable him to defeat his father.

He reflected, and an idea occurred to him. He had a friend, a young man studying at the Bar; this friend would have his evenings free, no doubt, and could come to the house and play chess or two-handed whist with William the elder, while his son played at whispers with the secretary. Good idea! He wrote off at once and the friend made his appearance that very evening.

"I say, old man," said William the younger, confidentially, when he welcomed the friend, "I want your assistance. The old gentleman is doing his level best to make an ass of himself. I want your help."

"To accelerate the progress?" asked the friend, without the ghost of a smile. "I should have thought that he could get all the help he would ever be likely to want at home!"

"So he can! So don't try to be funny!" retorted William the younger. "But the assistance is unconscious! That's too much for you, isn't it? Well, listen, and don't be too sharp!"

"Go on!" encouraged the friend.

"The old gentleman has engaged a secretary, and if I don't look smart she'll be engaged in another capacity! He is in love with her. So am I! She's got to marry me, and I want you to play chess or something with him to keep him quiet while I lay siege to the maiden's heart! See?"

"It looks rather complicated."

"Are you willing?" asked William anxiously.

"Yes, Will, I am!" was the double-meaning answer; but William was too full of his subject to see the joke.

"That's right!" cried William, shaking his hand effusively. "We shall circumvent the old fellow between us. It would be such a pity, you know!"

The friend came regularly every evening and William the younger contrived that he should play cards or chess with the elder, thus leaving the way open for his own campaign with the lady secretary.

Miss Kate Wheatley talked very cleverly with the son of her employer, and occasionally the friend of William the younger missed a point through listening to the whispered, but animated, conversation of the other occupants of the room.

Before a week had slipped away, Dr. William, Jr. was convinced that victory was certain; she seemed to enjoy these evenings so much!

Dr. William, Sr. was equally confident that Miss Kate Wheatley was ready to accept him as soon as he should make her a definite proposal; he was waiting for his son to remove himself and his effects to another place, which the said son seemed in no hurry to do, before proposing. The friend also appeared to thoroughly enjoy the evenings at Dr. Banks' residence, so everybody was pleased.

One morning William the younger caught Miss Kate Wheatley gazing with unfeigned delight at a magnificent bouquet, and an uncomfortable feeling took possession of him.

That bouquet was not purchased under ten shillings, at that time of the year, he thought, but upon consideration he concluded that it might have been obtained for half that sum. The matter was more serious than he had imagined; the old gentleman was buying her flowers and she was accepting them!

This occurred for several days and finally William the younger determined to ask her who sent the floral offering. This was an artful move; he expected to see her blush and confess that she thought it was he, William the younger, who had sent them; that is, she would do so if she were in love with him.

If she had fallen in love with his father, and knew that the old gentleman was sending the flowers, she would betray the fact in some way.

Now suppose she really thought that he, the son, was the donor? He would make ambiguous remarks that would confirm the opinion, thus taking advantage of the situation and hoaxing the old fellow.

The father paying for the flowers to advance the wooing of the son! That would be getting the best of his respected parent indeed, and it would teach the old gentleman not to be so foolish as to fall in love with a young girl.

"Good morning, Miss Wheatley!" he said blandly, popping in upon her just as she was inhaling the scent of the latest bouquet. "What splendid flowers! Who sends them?"

"I have not the remotest idea!" she asseverated with such emphasis that William was bound to believe her. "Aren't they nice? It is very good of whoever sent them!"

"But surely you have asked the messenger who was the giver?" he asked, trying to assume a conscious air.

"The boy from the florist's brought them, and I couldn't ask him!" explained Miss Kate. "They come every day, so I suppose I shall learn before long who it is that sends them!"

William murmured: "Oh, of course!" and retired. He hoped that he had created the desired impression, but at the same time he was not happy about that daily offering. If the old gentleman were paying five shillings a day for flowers, that was thirty shillings a week, for six days, and that made nearly £80 a year.

"I'm positive they cost more than that!" was his muttered opinion. "It's nearer £200 a year that the old idiot is spending! If he goes on like that, where do I come in? He has made his will in my favour, but there won't be any more to inherit, at this rate, than if he married her himself! I'll talk to him!

"I don't like to say anything against your actions, sir," he began; "but if you're going to keep up that nonsense of spending all that money on flowers for a girl, I must protest! It isn't fair to me!"

"William," replied the elder, severely; "if I choose to do a thing I shall do it, but I haven't done it! I was waiting for you to come in so that I might remonstrate with you for doing the same thing to a young lady whom I intend to make my wife!"

"I intend to do the same, sir!" retorted William the younger, staring at William the elder. "I didn't send the flowers; do you mean to say, on your word, that you didn't send them?"

"Of course not!" exclaimed his father.

"Then there's another!" gasped the son.

The two men glared at each other in blank surprise. This was a development which neither had anticipated; it was too much to bear!

"We must find out who he is, William!" said the elder decisively. "We'll go to the florist and demand his name!"

A common enemy compelled them to unite their forces; they forgot their own differences in the face of this danger, and sallied forth together to demand information of the florist.

Miss Kate Wheatley was in the drawing-room when she heard a soft knock at the door and called out: "Come in!" The friend entered in response to her invitation.

"I saw them both go out, and I blessed my lucky stars!"

(Concluded on page 444.)

Digitized by Google

Alfosco Regd

Call or Write.

Allen Foster & Co

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

47 GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Call or Write

Alfosco Regd

BUY DIRECT BY PARCEL POST FROM THE LEADING FIRM OF LONDON MANUFACTURERS.

Design No. 793. 10/6

Design No. 793. 10/6.

The Fashionable Coat and Skirt for Spring and Summer Wear. It has a short full Sacque Coat, single breasted, bell sleeves. The Skirt is a good shape and carefully made. Produced in ALLEN FOSTER & Co.'s new Zibeline Cloth, also in their celebrated Specialite Serge or Venetian Cloth. Colours: Black, Green, Light and Dark Grey, Royal, Fawn, Brown, Red, and Navy. Patterns post free. This excellent Costume complete, only 10/6; carriage 6d., or Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage 5d. If lined throughout the price will be 16/6; carriage 6d. A Bargain.

7/11 7/11

Design No. 746. 7/11.

Exceptional Value in Costume Skirts. Made in good Vicuna Cloth, and trimmed 18 rows corded tucks; also trimmed with strappings tastefully arranged. Cut full and well-finished. A marvellous production for 7/11; carriage paid; 6d. extra. Satisfaction guaranteed.

Design No 443. 10/6.

New Design for Spring. One of ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'s latest productions, and by far the cheapest and smartest Half-Guinea Costume on the market. Made in A. F. & Co.'s new Zibeline Cloth (a material with a silky surface and carrying a splash effect) or in either their Specialite Serge or Venetian Cloth—all colours. The bodice is lined and made in the Russian style. New collar and small cape tastefully trimmed braid. Well finished Skirt trimmed round hips with braid; very stylish. Price only 10/6; carriage, 6d. ex. Skirt alone 6/6; carriage 5d. When ordering, please give bust measure under arms, size of waist, and length of skirt in front. Satisfaction guaranteed.

Design No. 443. 10/6

Send Post-card for PATTERNS AND NEW SKETCH BOOK of Latest Fashions in Ladies' Costumes and Jackets. Free on Application. Call or write.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,

47 GOLDEN LANE, BARBICAN, LONDON, E.C.

DO YOU WANT A GOOD CYCLE?

Write for my Lists. I deal only in the Best Coventry made Cycles, and by contracting for thousands annually, I BUY CHEAPLY and SELL CHEAPLY.

Premiers, Rovers, Coventry Challenge, Triumphs, Swifts, Humbers, Centaurs, Raglans, Singers, etc.

The QUALITY is there. Get my prices, save money and ensure satisfaction.

A High-Grade COVENTRY CYCLE for £6 0 0.

Two Years' Guarantee. Easy Payments without publicity. Cycle sent on receipt of first payment. EDWARD O'BRIEN, The World's Largest Cycle Dealer, COVENTRY.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

From Factory to Rider.

How Does This Suit You?

Handsomest & Best of Cycles right away after payment Month's Instalment—or Deposit—as you wish. £14 14s Grade for £6 10s Write, H Dept, Williams' Direct Supply Mfg., Co., 12 Approach, London Bridge, London.

Ten Days Free Trial

is allowed on every cycle we sell. The full price and all carriage charges returned if unsatisfactory in any way. 1903 Models, fully warranted,

£3.10 to £6.10

New Departure Coaster Brake Front Rim Brake and highest grade genuine British made fittings and accessories.

200 Good Second-Hand Cycles £1.10 to £2.10

Don't Fail to get our big illustrated catalogue before deciding on your 1903 machine. We save you money.

Rider Agents Wanted in every district to buy sample cycle at special price and take orders for us. Large profits easily made in spare time. Address Dept. 44A,

MEAD CYCLE CO. Liverpool.

ZOX for Neuralgia at Any Time.

GIVES INSTANT RELIEF TO HEADACHE, TOOTHACHE, NERVE PAINS

Any Sufferer Sending Stamped Addressed Envelope May Try Zox FREE.

Neuralgia is a Disease of the Nerves, and most commonly attacks the nerves of the face. Its presence is announced by the most piercing darting pains, recurring in paroxysms, followed with brief intervals of relief; but hardly a moment elapses after a lacerating pain darts along the course of the affected nerve ere another shoots forth, inflicting pain equally distressing to the patient. The annexed cut presents in the prominent lines the nerves of the fifth branch, which are most liable to attacks of Neuralgia. All who suffer from this terrible pain, or from Headache, Toothache, or nerve pains generally, will be glad to know of ZOX, a Simple, Safe and easy Remedy certified free from injurious substance by no less an authority than Dr. A. B. Griffiths, F.R.S. The Proprietors offer to send Two Free Sample Powders to any reader of "Short Stories," who will send them a stamped addressed envelope.

ZOX is sold by Chemists, &c., at 1s. and 2s 6d. per box, or can be had post free from

THE ZOX COMPANY, 11 Hatton Garden, London, E.C.

"In pain? Try ZOX."

Digitized by Google

he informed her joyfully. "I wanted to bring the flowers myself this morning, and I was scheming a way to do it without letting them know. There!" (handing her the floral tribute), "Do you like them?"

"Oh, so much!" declared Miss Kate Wheatley, blushing charmingly under his look of ardent admiration. "I didn't know that it was you who gave them!"

"You didn't?" he inquired in surprise. "Who did you think it was, then? I've been in love with you ever since that first evening, but I couldn't get a fair chance of telling you so. Well, I've told you now!"

He took her hands in his as if assured of her answer, and she allowed him to press her close to him and kiss her.

"I think it must have been like that with me!" she admitted, her cheeks becoming more red. "But I'm afraid I am not well enough off to——"

"Nonsense! I haven't much to boast of, but I shall make more when I am a full-fledged barrister. It might have been different if that old lady relative of mine hadn't made such a ridiculous will!"

"Oh, have you got a relative like that? So have I! She wanted me to marry a man whose very name was unknown to me, or she would disinherit me altogether! But I don't mind a bit!" And Kate hid her blushes on her lover's breast.

"What's that?" demanded her friend. "I say, what's the name of your relative?"

"My aunt's name is Miss Eliza Platt. I call her aunt 'Liza."

"Well, I'm delighted!" exclaimed the friend. "That's my relation, too! So we've actually done of our own free will what we wouldn't do at her command. We shall have to go to Aunt 'Liza and do the penitent dodge!"

"Hallo! You're here!" cried William the younger as he entered with his father at his heels. "Perhaps you can help us to solve the mystery. Someone has been sending to Miss Wheatley here"—Kate had released herself from the friend's grasp just in time—"and she does not know who it is.

"We have been to the florist's to ascertain the name of the author of this—this outrage, but all he can say is that the flowers are ordered and paid for every day by a youngish sort of a man, a sort of——"

"An odd-looking man, neither old nor young, dressed like most people, that's what he tells us!" chimed in William the elder. "Do you know anyone answering that description?"

"Don't recognise the description," replied the friend, meditatively. "Appears to be in love with her, doesn't he?"

"That's just it!" cried the Williams in a breath, forgetting the presence of Kate in their anxiety. "I am sure," added William the elder impressively, "that Miss Wheatley wouldn't fall in love with somebody she didn't know!"

This was so extremely probable that the friend assented.

"I am glad that the florist acknowledged that I paid for the flowers," he added, with assumed simplicity of countenance.

"You!" gasped the father and son in unison.

"Yes! I have discovered by accident that Miss Wheatley and I are relations. Before we made that discovery, we made another—that we are very much in love with each other! This proves to be a fortunate circumstance, for it enables us to carry out the wishes of a venerated aunt!"

William the elder and William the younger gazed mournfully at the pattern of the carpet. It was quite two minutes before either of the medical gentlemen spoke.

"I hope you will be very happy!" the elder said earnestly. "That wish comes straight from my heart!"

"Miss Kate must stay with us till the marriage," said the younger William softly. "We should not like to lose her all at once!"

It was lucky that the managers of a certain charitable institution never knew the contents of the last will but one made by Miss Eliza Platt, for they would have been saddened by the fact that they had lost a legacy of twenty thousand pounds. Miss Platt's solicitor earned a few more guineas by making a fresh will, in which she bequeathed the said sum to two persons whom the clergyman had just made one.

Edward Gardiner.

"I do not believe that I have a true friend in the world." "So you have been trying to borrow money, too, have you?"

"Can you show me the way to the dentist's?" "Yes. Go down that little street, then turn the corner, and listen till you hear a shriek."

"Ah, Charley, I hear you have written a book." "Yes." "What is your publisher's name?" "Can't tell yet; I've only tried three-quarters of the list so far."

Mabel: "What an interesting talker Mr. Gusher is. He always holds one when he speaks." Mrs. Gusher: "Does he? That accounts for the hair I found on his shoulder last night."

Husband: "Woo! Hoo! Good gracious! Why do you set that alarm clock so it will go off like that just at bedtime?" Wife: "That is to remind me that it's time to wind it up, my dear."

Old Skrooge: "Do you think, young man, you could support my daughter in the style to which she has been accustomed?" Her Suitor: "I could, but I'm not mean enough to do it."

"Isn't Mrs. Jarvis an agreeable neighbour?" "No; she's horrid. I gave a dinner and didn't invite her, and the mean creature lent me a lot of spoons and forks, and then sent her little boy over for them when we were just starting the second course."

"You should never point, Johnnie," said Mrs. Brown as they left the shop; "it is very rude." "But what are you going to do, ma, when you don't know the name of the thing you want to see?" "Why, let the man show you everything in the shop till he comes to the right one."

THE ETIQUETTE OF ENGAGEMENT AND MARRIAGE.

By G. R. M. DEVEREUX.

Price 1s., Post Free 1s. 2d.

A Volume of Sensible Advice to All.

Some of the subjects dealt with are:

The Beginnings of Courtship—Social Intercourse—Introductions—Recognition of Affinity, or Love at First Sight—How to Follow up an Acquaintance—Intercourse between Unconfessed Lovers—The Question of Presents—Friends who Become Lovers—Flirts—Male and Female—How she may Give Encouragement or Ward off an Unwelcome Offer—The Question of Age—Young Lovers—Proposals—Some Things to Avoid—Vaguely Worded Offers—Engagements—The Attitude of Parents and Guardians—Making it Known—Congratulations—The Choice and Giving of the Ring—His Visits to her Home—The Engaged Couple in Public—In Society—Going About Together—The Question of Expenses—Love Letters—Long or Short Engagements—Marriage—Fixing the Day—Preparations—Trousseau—Invitations—Wedding Presents, etc., etc.

S. S. ORDER FORM.

To The Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of "Etiquette of Engagement and Marriage," for which I inclose 1s. 2d.

Name _____

Address _____

Digitized by Google

"Worth a Guinea a Box."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS AND NERVOUS DISORDERS,

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Wind and Pains in Stomach,

Impaired Digestion.

Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

CONTAINING 56 AND 168 PILLS RESPECTIVELY.

10,000 RUGS GIVEN AWAY

GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

This Phenomenal Offer is made to the readers of Short Stories (4/4/1903) only. On receipt of Postal Order for 5/-, or 62 stamps, we will forward, DIRECT FROM OUR LOOMS to your address, one of our 10/6 genuine SEAMLESS WOVEN, REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, etc., handsomely bordered and woven in 30 different patterns, and large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room. These Carpets will be sold as an Advertisement for our goods, below the Actual Cost of production. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained direct from our Looms, thus saving the purchasers all middle profits.

With every Carpet we shall ABSOLUTELY GIVE AWAY a very Handsome Rug to match, or we will send Two Carpets and Two Rugs for 9/6.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED. THOUSANDS OF UNSOLICITED TESTIMONIALS RECEIVED.

CALAXY ILLUSTRATED BARGAIN CATALOGUES OF CARPETS, HEARTHRUGS TABLE LINEN, CURTAINS, ETC., POST FREE,

if mentioning Short Stories (4/4/1903) while writing.
Cheques and P.O.'s payable to

F. HODGSON & SONS (Dept. S.T.S.) Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants,
WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Do you not envy the woman with a "pearl-like" skin? Then use "Peralia" regularly. It soothes, refreshes, clears and beautifies, making the skin smooth and healthy. Preserves a fine complexion and restores a faded one. Makes the hands and arms like velvet. Endorsed by society and professional women all over the world. Gentlemen find it extremely pleasant after shaving; relieves irritation—cools the skin. Use it for Spots, Blackheads, Freckles, Tan, Redness, and especially for Red Nose.

Doctor's certificate guaranteeing its purity, and testimonials, sent with each bottle.

In Bottles, 1/- 1/6 2/6
Postage, 3d. extra

IF you buy another Cycle and afterwards see a MERLIN, you will be very sorry that you have purchased. Catalogue Free:

MERLIN CYCLE CO.,
Martineau Street, BIRMINGHAM.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

Or Flat Footed? If so, try our Elevators, which will increase your height from 1 to 4 inches without detection. Comfortable to wear. Price from 5/6, Lady's; 6/6 Gent's, per pair. Send stamps for further particulars. Peralia Co. (Dept. 14), 73, Camden Street, North Shields.

NOSE If your nose is large or badly-shaped in any way, use our Nose Machine, price 10/-. Cheek Plumpers for thin or sunken cheeks, 10/- pair. Ear Instruments for standing-out ears, 10/- each. Send stamp for further particulars. Peralia Co. (Dept. 14), 73 Camden St., North Shields.

CRIMPOLINE
HAIR CURLING FLUID.

Curls the hair naturally in a few days, and, what is more, the hair will keep in curl. Does not change the colour or destroy the hair but makes it soft and silky, and will curl or fris into natural curls. No tongs needed. Not sticky or greasy like other curling fluids, which only keep the hair in curl. After the hair has become curly it is not necessary to continue using Crimpoline. Give Crimpoline a trial—the result will astonish you. Use it for Ladies', Gents', and Children's Hair. 1/9 and 2/6 per Bottle, Postage 3d. Ask your Chemist or Hair Dresser to get above preparations for you; if they are out of stock, we will send it direct to you secretly packed.

Have no other or you will be disappointed.

Under Royal Patronage. Used by Madame Patti, Vesta Tilley, Minnie Palmer, etc.

PERALIA PERFUMERY CO.
(Dept. 14), 72 and 73 Camden Street, North Shields.

FOR LADIES SYMONDS' CYCLES

They are GOOD machines. Thousands of voluntary testimonials. Cheapest genuinely guaranteed cycles in the world. Prices £4 to £8. Cash or easy payments. Sent anywhere. Full particulars free. Mention this paper.
Symonds' London Stores, 125-128, City Rd., London, E.C.

Order
E. & T.
PINK'S JAM
Undoubtedly the Best.
PURE.
No Artificial Colouring or Chemical Preservative.

Patronised by Royalty.

TRIUMPH Cycles

10 Guineas AND 15 Guineas Or from a Guinea per month.

The Best Bicycle that British Workmanship can produce.
TRIUMPH CYCLE Co., Ltd., COVENTRY.
& 5, Holborn Viaduct, E.C. 30, Deansgate Arcade, Manchester

Digitized by Google

Indigestion

"EVER since I was a young girl I have been subject to severe attacks of biliousness and indigestion," said Mrs. Rose Broad, of 10 Alfred's Place, Icknield Street, Birmingham, to a Birmingham Telegram reporter. "About seven years ago these attacks increased in severity, and I began to suffer ceaseless excruciating pains in the head accompanied with nervous tremor of such a character that I dared not go about alone. I so frequently swooned and fell that I have cuts and marks about my body that will never die out. One day I was trying to do a little washing, and, swooning beside my work, remained insensible until a neighbour found me, carried me to bed, and eventually I recovered through the efforts of my medical attendant, but had to remain in bed for a few weeks. This nervous tremor eventually became such a terror that I feared losing my reason. I wasted to a shadow, became weaker every day, and the efforts of physicians, attendance at hospitals, prescriptions, medical advice and medicines, all proved useless; it was at this time (when everything pointed to my being a life-long sufferer) my daughter suggested trying Bile Beans. I did so, and felt much easier and brighter after the first dose. Carefully following the directions and persevering in a proper course of the medicine I continued to improve, the nervous fits ceased, I rapidly grew strong, recovered a good appetite, was free from pain, and my complete cure (through the efficacy of Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness) is a matter of common knowledge."

Bile Beans for Biliousness are the product of modern scientific research and therefore thoroughly up-to-date. They do not merely purge, giving temporary relief, and leaving the patient weakened like the out-of-date, so-called remedies of forty or fifty years ago which contain probably aloes, mercury, and other harmful drugs. Bile Beans without the slightest discomfort prompt the liver and digestive organs to act in Nature's normal way, leaving those organs strengthened and stimulated to continue the performance of their duties without further assistance. They produce a gentle action on the bowels, curing or preventing constipation, cleansing the stomach and ridding the system of all impurities. Do not be misled by claims of half a hundred pills in the box where probably four to six constitutes a dose, and the doses cannot be discontinued. ONE BILE BEAN IS ONE DOSE. They can be discontinued after the cure is effected; they are purely vegetable; they do not contain any harmful drugs; and are the safest family medicine. Bile Beans for Biliousness cure Headache, Constipation, Piles, Liver Troubles, Bad Breath, Liver Chill, Indigestion, Flatulence, Dizziness, Buzzing in the Head, Pimples, Blood Impurities, Spring Ailments, Debility, Anæmia, and all Female Ailments. Of all Medicine Vendors, price 1/1½d. and 2/9 per box.

Bile Beans FOR Biliousness

Digitized by Google

Sister's Hint.

"If you don't give me a shilling," said little Willie, "I'm going to tell about you kissing sister." "But I hadn't even thought of kissing your sister," protested the young man. "You ain't?" said Willie, puzzled. "Then I wonder what she told me to say that to you for?"

The Modern Way.

She (as he finishes mending her tyre): "Oh, thank you so much. What should I have done without you?" He: "Don't mention it. I wish I could always carry the repair kit for you." Tenderly: "May I, Eleanor?" And the two bicycles continued to lean against the grassy bank.

A Broken Melody.

"Dearest," he said, as he swung to and fro upon the gate, "I wish I might linger here for ever." She was about to say something encouraging when he got his finger caught in the hinge, and began yelling so hard that the entire neighbourhood turned out to help him loose. Then all was over between them.

Knows What It Is.

"Oh, Henry," exclaimed his wife, as she threw her arms rapturously about his neck, "I do love you so! Don't forget to leave me five pounds when you go to town this morning, will you, dear?" "And this," muttered Henry, softly disengaging himself from her fond embrace, "this is what you might call being hard pressed for money."

Love at First Sight.

Friend: "So yours was a case of love at first sight?" Mrs. Lovejoy: "Yes, indeed. I fell desperately in love with my dear husband the moment I set eyes upon him. I remember it all distinctly as if it were yesterday. I was walking with papa on the promenade at Brighton, when suddenly papa stopped and, pointing him out, said: 'There, my dear, is a man worth £120,000.'"

No Encouragement Intended.

He (in the conservatory): "Why did you lead me on to a proposal if you intended to refuse me?" She: "You do me great injustice. What have I done to make you think I loved you?" He: "In every waltz with other men you kept them almost at arm's length, but when waltzing with me you leant your head on my shoulder, and let me almost carry you." She: "That was to keep my feet off the floor, so that you wouldn't step on my toes."

At His Own Expense.

Mr. Bluff: "Look here, young man, you're always going about with my daughter, and I want to know what your intentions are regarding her?" Young Man: "I really have no intentions, sir." Mr. Bluff (angrily): "Then what do you mean by amusing yourself at my daughter's expense?" Young Man (airily): "I'm not amusing myself at your daughter's expense, sir, but at my own expense. I always pay for the theatre tickets and refreshments."

Lack of Confidence.

"May I kiss you, Miss Jane?" "I am sorry to see, Mr. Briggs, that you, too, are affected by the prevailing cause of business depression." "And that is?" "Lack of confidence." Then he kissed her.

Too Dreadful to Contemplate.

Angelina: "When one of us dies I shall go and live somewhere in the country, all among the woods and wild flowers." Edwin: "But, dearest, supposing that you were to die first?" Angelina: "Oh, don't let us think of anything so dreadful."

That Made a Difference.

Husband: "I really think you might have had that ball dress made a little bit higher in the neck—to say nothing of the back." Wife: "I'll have it changed if you wish; but the stuff cost two guineas a yard." Husband: "U'm—well, never mind."

Brutal Behaviour.

Ancient Brute: "Er, excuse me, but doesn't my open window trouble you?" Lady Passenger: "Oh, thank you! I was feeling it a little." Ancient Brute: "Well, I wouldn't run any risk of catching cold. There are some empty carriages forward."

Man's Heavy Burden.

Mrs. De Science: "If I am able to carry the baby about, I should think you ought to be." Professor De Science: "You forget, my dear, that an average man has to carry an atmospheric pressure of fifteen tons, while woman, being smaller, does not have to carry over ten or twelve tons."

Why She Didn't Bow.

"Have I done anything to offend you, darling?" he asked brokenly. "To-day you passed me without bowing, and now you sit there with such an air of hauteur and pride that——" "Arthur," interrupted the girl with an unbending air, but in her voice a cadence sweeter than music in the night, "I have a stiff neck."

In a Good Cause.

Wife: "George, this burning of the candle at both ends means an untimely grave. It is nearly twelve o'clock. Come to bed." George: "But I'm doing this night work in order to find money enough to buy your birthday present." Wife: "Well, if you will persist in working, of course, I can't stop it. Good-night, dear."

A Thoughtful Girl.

"No wonder the pleasures of courting have declined," said the stout youth. "Just look at the flimsiness of these modern chairs." And he pointed to a slender affair of white bamboo touched with gilt. "You mustn't judge by appearances," said the stout girl softly. "I've had that chair thoroughly braced with the very best of steel rods, and it is now guaranteed to stand a pressure of sixty pounds to the square inch." Then they both sat down on it as a final test.

On the Benches in the Park.

Mr. Rice: "May—may we sit here, sir?" Confirmed Celibate: "If you're perfectly sure that you love each other just as much as ever you did, and that you ain't sorry a bit, and that you never did love anybody else as you do her, and that it ain't too cold for popsy-wopsy in this night air—why I can stand it. But don't you try me too hard, young man. I've been here for six weeks and encountered seventy-nine couples."

His Business-Like Way.

Young Mr. Bizz (briskly, to fair proprietor of photograph gallery): "I've dropped in, Miss Frame, without much preparation, in the style I usually do when I make up my mind I want anything. Can you take me just as I am?" Miss Frame: "Certainly, Mr. Bizz. What style do you wish—cabinet or carte?" Mr. Bizz: "What style? Great Cæsar! Did you think I'd come in with these clothes on to have my photograph taken? I'm asking you to marry me, Miss Frame."

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of Short Stories.]

The Absent Lover.

Depressed is engaged to a young American girl, whom he met while in the States. She stayed here for several months with some friends, and was on the most intimate terms with her lover. However, Depressed believes the girl's parents are not in favour of the match, though they did not object when it was announced.

* * * * *

Some weeks ago the girl returned to America. She has now been there some weeks, and to the concern of Depressed her letters to him have been couched in the coolest of terms—quite different from the tone which marked their own meetings.

* * * * *

Depressed believes the girl's parents have been saying things against him, and, as he is three thousand miles away, and has no direct evidence, he does not know what to do. Can I advise him of a course of action? He fears that if something is not done, the girl may be induced not to return to Britain.

* * * * *

Before you jump to conclusions, be sure you are right about the mischief-making you suspect. When people are abroad—particularly in such a hurrying country as America—they are apt to neglect such necessary things as letter-writing altogether, or else they write in a hasty manner.

* * * * *

Perhaps your sweetheart is having a very busy time, and is therefore not giving you as much attention as you might expect in her correspondence. That is, of course, inexplicable in a case where there is real love, though it is not so serious a matter that you can regard it as dangerous. I should write to her, hinting that your affection for her has not altered in any way, and hope that it is the same with her.

* * * * *

I quite understand that the whole thing must be causing you great anxiety, and can only offer you my sympathy. Unless you are yourself able to go to America to see things put right, you are handicapped. If you have an intimate friend over there, he might be able to do a diplomatic service to you by inquiring how things are working.

* * * * *

I cannot believe that if the girl really loves you, as evidently she does, she would be turned away from you. If so she must be a very weak, changeable character. Girls away from their lovers are rather apt to go to the extreme of writing to them too often, to the neglect of their friends. I hope you will find things will turn out all right. The next mail or so may put an entirely new complexion on matters.

A Wedding Problem.

John A. has been invited to a wedding. He believes a girl will also be there to whom he was once engaged. They, however, have spoken scarcely at all since the breaking-off. He believes she would like a reunion, but fears it would not be so acceptable to himself. Would I recommend his going to the wedding?

* * * * *

Weddings have a strange influence over love affairs generally. They have often been known to hurry on other weddings, and to bring about reconciliations. I should go. You do not know how you may feel towards the girl when you see her again under such conditions. I should give it a trial, at any rate. Do not be too sure as to your own feelings.

Should He Emigrate?

"Crypt" is engaged to a young man, and as they cannot foresee any prospect of being married for many years, he wishes to go out to Canada in order to better himself. "Crypt" wants to know whether it would be selfish of her not to let him go, and whether she ought to promise to bind herself to him for an indefinite time.

* * * * *

I can quite understand you find it hard to let your fiancé go "Crypt," but though Canada may sound attractive it will not be well for him to go unless he has a definite situation there. In Canada well paid work is just as hard to obtain as here. I would advise you to wait until prospects here seem more favourable—even though it be a matter of years—unless he can get a definite post abroad.

* * * * *

Regarding your question as to whether you should promise to wait for him if he really does go away, that is a matter in which you yourselves should be the best judges. It will be more comfortable, I think, for both of you, if no definite agreement is come to, as so many things may happen during years of absence, and though in many cases "absence makes the heart grow fonder," such does not always follow.

The Persistent Lover and Indifferent Girl.

"Heartsick" is in love with a girl who apparently does not return the affection. He is a most persistent lover, however, and for a time she seemed as though she really loved him, but now she is quite indifferent to all his attentions, though her friends tell him that she does care for him. What is he to do?

* * * * *

I think your best plan, "Heartsick," will be to settle the matter once and for all by stating your intentions to the girl, letting her see that you are quite serious, and then abiding by what she says. From what you say in your letter she is evidently unable to make up her mind, and the sooner you let her see that you mean business the better.

* * * * *

I am sorry to have to acknowledge that some girls like to keep a man dangling in a state of uncertainty, little thinking what his feelings are during the time of probation, and the girl you are fond of may be one of these, though you say that she only accepts your presents under protests. Perhaps she cares for someone else, but does not like to give you your congé until she is assured that her affection in that quarter is returned. Anyhow, she will feel bound to give you a definite answer one way or the other, if you let her see that you are serious in your proposal.

Cynthia

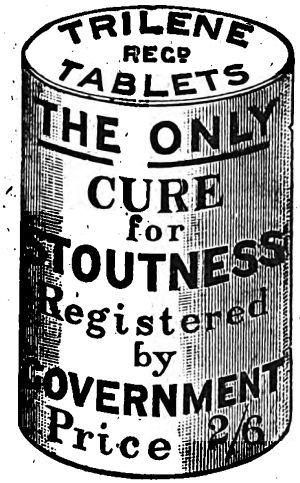
Printed by Horace Cox, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

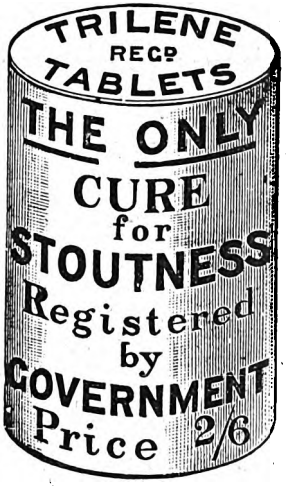
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.



SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.
Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely.
"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, s/o Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."
"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

COUNT EHRENWAUD, of Liatorp, Sweden, writes, 9th Oct., 1899: "The person who took Tablets lost 18lb. during the cure.

Mr. GIBBS, 147 Richmond Park, Kimberworth, Rotherham, says: "Since I began with them they have reduced me 2st. 8lb., and I am pleased to say I am a great deal better in health and in every way."

Mrs. FENTON, 11 Wood Street, Tyldesley, writes: "Been fat all my life, but now your Tablets tell a tale. I have lost 17lb. already and am delighted."

Mrs. MARY WILLIAMS, of Old Yard, near Tredol, Bagillt, Wales, writes Nov. 22nd, 1898: "Your Tablets reduced me 2st., and have benefited me greatly."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mrs. PEARCE, Armstrong Road, Benwell: "Reduced from 12st. to 9½st., and do not get any heavier."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says: "A man in our regiment in 1901 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs. ROLLITT, of North Farm, Letwell, says: "Tablets have done a world of good—reduced 14lb. already without altering diet."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets.

Miss JANE CARTER of Forthampton House, Tewkesbury, says: "The Tablets are of the greatest valu I am reduced many stone, and shall be pleased to recommend them."

Mr. THOS BLAKELY, of 37 The Grove, Bedford, writes: "I have lost a little over 42lb. since taking your Tablets, and my case causes much local interest."

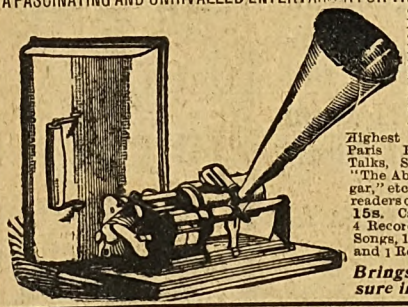
Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

ASK FOR
"G.P." Government Tea
Eighteenpence Everywhere.
RICH, RIPE, REFRESHING.
You May Know It by Its Red Tape and Seal.
WRITE FOR FREE SAMPLE TO G.P. GOVERNMENT TEA CO., 16 AMERICA SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

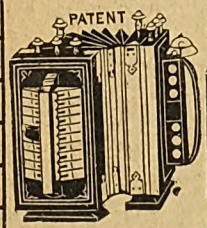
"THE MACHINE THAT TALKS."
CAMPBELL'S GRAPHOPHONE is the best Talking and Singing Machine in the Market at the Price.
A FASCINATING AND UNRIVALLED ENTERTAINER FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.



CAMPBELL'S HOME GRAND GRAPHOPHONE. This is no German manufacture, but the new American 20th Century Talking Machine, which gained the Highest Awards at the Paris Exhibition, 1900. Talks, Sings, and recites "The Absent-Minded Beggar," etc. Special price to readers of Short Stories, £2 15s. Carriage paid, with 4 Records free. 2 Vocal Songs, 1 Orchestral Piece, and 1 Recitation.

Brings Endless Pleasure into the Home.

CHARMING MUSIC FOR THE HOME.
CAMPBELL'S Gold Medal MELODEONS



With Organ and Celestial Tone, and Sweet Bell Accompaniments. No Home should be without one. No Knowledge of Music required. Used throughout the world.
200,000 TESTIMONIALS.

Special Offer to the Readers of Short Stories
Campbell's "Gem" Melodeons, price only 6/9
Campbell's "Miniature" Melodeon, „ 10/9
Campbell's "Paragon" Melodeon, „ 14/-
Campbell's "Favourite" Melodeon, „ 16/6
Cut out this and send P.O.O. for the amount
Either sent carriage paid to any address in Great Britain & Ireland.

All lovers of music should at once send for Campbell's New Illustrated Privilege Price List of all kinds of Musical Instruments for Season 1901-2, now ready. 200,000 sent out yearly. Send 1d. Stamp to—
CAMPBELL & CO., Musical Instrument Makers, 116 Trongate, GLASGOW.
Established 50 Years. BEWARE OF WORTHLESS IMITATIONS.

MACKINTOSH'S
IS DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!
PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.
A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.
EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

ASK YOUR BUTCHER
FOR Swift's
AMERICAN
BEEF
Choice and Tender.

BRITANNIA CLEANS HER HELMET WITH "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH
AND EVERY BRITISH HOUSEWIFE SHOULD POLISH ALL METALS WITH IT TOO.
Manufacturers: THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH Co. Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

EASTER HOLIDAY NUMBER. GREAT NEW COMPETITION.

SHORT STORIES.

No. 745.] Week ending April 11th, 1903. [Price One Penny.

HE GAVE A START. THE HEAD OF THE DIVER WAS THAT OF A YOUNG AND LOVELY WOMAN!

Digitized by Google

(A Dramatic Incident from our Serial, "HELD APART." See inside.)

A KODAK for 5/-

The No. 1 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 2½ by 2½ Inches.

Despite its small size and low price the No. 1 Brownie is a thoroughly efficient little camera, and yields photographs as clear and distinct as possible. No dark room is needed for changing the films. In use the Brownie Kodak is simplicity itself.

THE NEW BROWNIE KODAK

The No. 2 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 3¼ by 2½ Inches.

MARVELLOUS VALUE PRICE 10/- ONLY.

Finders for vertical and horizontal pictures. Everset time and instantaneous shutter. New and convenient spool-holding devices. Improved non-detachable winding key. Loaded and unloaded in daylight.

Ask for the Kodak Catalogue of all Photographic Dealers or of

KODAK LTD., 43 Clerkenwell Road, London, E.C.

Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold Street, Liverpool; 72-74 Buchanan Street, Glasgow. Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, London, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, London, E.C.; 115 Oxford Street, London, W.; 171-173 Regent Street, London, W.; 40 West Strand, W.C.

GRAVES'

"SAFE AS THE BANK OF ENGLAND."

This is the feeling of those who deal with the firm of J. G. Graves, because all goods are sent out to handle and examine at leisure, and need not be kept unless they give the fullest satisfaction.

THE 'COMMERCIAL'

Sterling Silver Horizontal Watch,

will be forwarded Post Free to any address on receipt of a deposit of only 3/6; the balance can be remitted in nine more MONTHLY payments of 2/6; or, HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT for full cash payment. 25/

LET'S TALK OF GRAVES

. . The Largest . . Watch-Sales Firm in the World.

SPECIFICATION. Horizontal Movement, Rim Cap, Fully Jewelled Escapement, White Enamelled Dial, Extra Strong Sterling Silver Cases.

This Watch is Warranted for Five Years and will give Perfect Satisfaction.

You would be pleased with our No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Cutlery and Plate, and Fancy Goods, which we supply GRATIS and Post Free to all applicants. Please send Post Card for a copy.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in every town and village. No Risk. Good Commission.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

WATCHES

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely, that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

Free Wheels. New Departure Hub, Bowden Brakes. All Improvements—Lamp, Bell, &c. Carriage paid.

Carr. Paid.

For Cash or 12 Monthly Payments of

£8 8s. 15/10 | £9 2s. 17/6
£9 16s. 19/3 | £10 5s. 19/3

Juno Motor Cycle is the King of Motor Cycles, £32 or 60/- mo. Accessories at lowest prices; Acetylene Lamp, 2/11; Cycle Stand, 1/8; Motor Horn, 5/6.

Write for new Season List, 136 pages and 300 illustrations, sent post free.—METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co. Ltd. (S.S. Dept.), 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C. West End Showrooms: Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

TOWLE'S PILLS

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

of all Chemists, or Post Free on receipt of 15, 34, or 56 penny stamps or P.O.O. from the Sole Proprietors,

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Nottingham, Eng.

IF

you buy another Cycle and afterwards see a MERLIN, you will be very sorry that you have purchased. Catalogue Free:

MERLIN CYCLE CO.,
Martineau Street, BIRMINGHAM.

SPECIAL BARGAINS

ANY SENT ON APPROVAL WILLINGLY.

SAVE £ d $

GENT'S 18-ct. Gold-cased KEYLESS HUNTER, jewelled movement, lever balance, exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; sacrifice, 10/6; approval willingly.

POWERFUL FIELD GLASSES by celebrated optician (Le Gautier, Paris); 30 miles range; 8 achromatic lenses (guaranteed), nickel silver eyeshades, in leather sling case; sacrifice 10/6.

GLADSTONE BAG, 24in., superior quality, real brown cowhide, strong leather straps, nickel silver fittings, &c.; in perfect condition; unsolled; cost 4 guineas; accept 25/-; approval.

LADY'S pretty 18-carat gold-cased KEYLESS WATCH, extra fine quality, jewelled movement, beautifully ornamented dial; perfect timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; sacrifice, 12/6; approval before payment.

FASHIONABLE LONG NECK-CHAIN, genuine 18-carat rolled gold (stamped), beautifully finished elegant West End design; sacrifice, 9/6.

MAGNIFICENT 5-ROW PEARL COLLARETTE; finest quality; mounted with four bars of lustrous Orient diamonds, in velvet-lined case, complete; sacrifice, 12/6; approval willingly.

LADY'S lustrous DIAMOND & RUBY RING, 5 large, matchless double rubies and 8 real diamonds, solid gold, hall-marked setting; sacrifice, 12/6.

CURB CHAIN BRACELET, with paddock and safety chain; 18-carat, rolled gold (stamped and guaranteed), in velvet case; sacrifice, 7/6; approval.

MANDOLINE, genuine Italian (Stridente, Naples); very fine tone, real rosewood, pearl inlaid, in saddler-made case; sacrifice, 19/6; approval willingly.

ORGAN-TONE MELODEON, magnificent 26/- instrument. 12-fold bellows (metal bound), 3 sets steel bronze reeds, 4 acting stops, powerful tone; perfect order, sacrifice, 10/6; approval willingly.

HANDSOME REAL MARBLE CLOCK, highly finished lever movement, 9in. high, in perfect order, guaranteed 10 years; sacrifice, 10/6; approval.

FEATHER BOAS; bankrupt stock, special bargains, real Ostrich Feather Boas, beautifully curly, perfectly new, in box colours, grey and white, black and white and natural. Prices 10/6 and 12/6. Original price 30/- and 42/-; each approval willingly.

LADY'S 6-guinea solid gold (stamped) KEYLESS WATCH, jewelled in 10 rubies, richly engraved case, splendid timekeeper; 10 years' warranty; week's free trial; sacrifice, 21/-.

A full list of Special Bargains, New and Second-hand, can be had free on application.

R. H. DAVIS, Pawnbroker and Jeweller, 284 Brixton Road, London, S.W.

THE CORNER PICTURES IN THIS NUMBER ARE TYPES OF HANDSOME MEN OF EVERY COUNTRY.

SHORT STORIES

No. 745.] [ONE PENNY.

Week Ending April 11th, 1903.

A RATIONAL WOMAN.

And How She was Won by an Irrational Man.

BERTRAM FERRARS, a rising young barrister, was very much in love with his fiancée, Agnes Dalton, in spite of the disparity of years, tastes, and ideas.

Mutual friends marvelled at this engagement; Agnes Dalton was, they thought, so little like the girl on whom such a man would lose his heart.

Studious and reserved, Ferrars had mostly spent his life amongst his books. He hated society, noise and racket of every description, but, suddenly, he reached the turning point in his life, and his views on most subjects changed, owing to the glance of two lovely blue eyes.

Agnes Dalton was the very reverse of Ferrars in every way. Her sunny nature and temperament delighted in the giddy vortex of society; she loved dancing, ping-pong, tennis, and boating, all these pastimes she called rare good fun; her creed was to get the most enjoyment possible out of life.

She was sparkling, full of fun and mischief, and young Ferrars fell head over heels in love with her. She was flattered by the courtship of this clever young man, and, when he proposed, she accepted him without a moment's hesitation; it was a delightful privilege to be envied by every girl she knew.

Like most men who are in love for the first time, he took the malady in its very acutest form; he became Agnes' willing slave, ready to obey her slightest behest; she exercised her new power with childish delight, and soon got to love him almost as deeply as he did her, only, womanlike, she did not show it to him.

One morning, as young Ferrars called round at Laburnum Lodge, the suburban villa where Agnes lived, he was met by his pretty little lady-love dancing down the gravel path in a high state of glee.

"Oh, Bert, Bert! Just guess the lovely present I have received from Uncle Henry!"

"Well, little one, what is it that seems to have given you so much pleasure? My presents to you never seem to produce such exuberant joy!"

"Nasty, jealous wretch!" she murmured, looking up archly at him from under her long lashes, and, as they had reached the privacy of the drawing-room, he at once punished her by catching her round the waist and drawing her close to him till her head rested on his shoulder.

"Now, Aggy, dearest, you are my prisoner, and must pay forfeit as having used disrespectful language to me."

"Pay forfeit! How?"

All rights reserved.]

And she opened her big, blue eyes to their very widest extent, looking the very picture of innocent surprise, as if she could not possibly guess what he wanted.

"Aggy, you're a little fraud!"

"Bertie, that's rude, you will have to pay forfeit to me!"

"All right, as much as ever you like!" and he showered down kisses on the dainty little mouth held up so temptingly close to his face.

She laughingly disengaged herself from his encircling arm, and, flying to the other end of the room, at a safe distance from him, menacingly shook her little pink fist at him.

"Now, now, Bert! do be serious, I want to talk business to you."

"Talk business—you, Aggy; well, upon my word, do you want to consult me about the best cut for your doll's dress, or what?"

"Tush, silly man!" and she patted his cheek reprovingly. "This matter is very urgent and very important. Do you bicycle?"

"Bicycle? Well, yes, I rather enjoy a good long spin on a clear, smooth, country road, but I have very little time to indulge in this pastime. But why on earth do you ask?"

"Oh, then it is all right if you do bicycle! I was afraid you would think it too frivolous. The present I have received this morning from Uncle Henry is a beautiful bicycle, and I want to try it this very afternoon. Come and fetch me, please, dear Bert!"

Ferrars never could resist that sweet, childish, pleading voice.

"All right, dearest, I'll put off a rather important engagement, but never mind."

She pouted her rosy lips.

"No engagement ought to be important, compared with the one to me!"

"Dear little goose, of course you are first in all my thoughts, but you must remember that if a barrister does not keep his business engagements, his little wife won't have all the luxuries he means her to have."

Naturally Agnes carried the day, and, punctually at four that same afternoon, young Ferrars turned up at Laburnum Lodge in a neat Norfolk suit and on a well-appointed bicycle. The maid showed him into the drawing-room, telling him Miss Dalton was not quite ready, but would be down in a few minutes. He took up a photograph album and was soon absorbed gazing at different aspects of his little sweetheart at various times of her babyhood and childhood. A slight step, the one he knew so well and loved, made him turn, and Agnes stood before him with a lovely blush crimsoning her cheeks, and even tinting the pallor of her brow. Bertram started to his feet.

Digitized by Google

"Good gracious, Aggy, what on earth do you mean by this absurd masquerade?"

"Masquerade, indeed!" she indignantly protested. "I had it specially made for me in Paris by one of the best tailors!"

"I might have guessed the horrible thing was French, thank goodness they are not worn in England! I can't think what you mean, Aggy, by donning such an unwomanly attire?"

"Mean? Why, I mean to go for a bicycle ride with you, of course!" Her voice was pitching itself in a dangerously high key as her indignation grew.

"You really thought of going out with me in 'bloomers'?" he asked, in the same tone he would have asked if she were going to walk on her head.

"Yes, certainly, this is the rational dress worn by the real up-to-date twentieth century girl."

"Rational fiddlesticks!"

"I think it is a most becoming dress, and it suits me beautifully."

"Why, Aggy, you look positively ugly in this vile get-up!"

"Ugly! You dare call me ugly?" shrieked outraged feminine vanity. The scream of horror ended in a big sob, and she went on piteously—

"I hate you, I shall never, never speak to you again!"

Ferrars, absolutely bewildered by the storm his unwary words had raised, drew near, and tried to take her hand, but she pushed him roughly away.

"Go away, leave me, don't touch me. I never want to see you again! Good-bye for ever, Mr. Ferrars!"

She rushed from the room, leaving him standing speechless with pain. The words she had just uttered in her wrath seemed to enter his heart like a knife, especially did it strike him as an ominous knell to all his hopes—the fact that she had called him Mr. Ferrars. After a few moments he rang the bell, and, when the maid appeared, he bid her go to Miss Dalton and tell her he awaited her pleasure in the drawing-room. Within a very short time space of, the servant returned with a curt message from her young mistress—

"Would Mr. Ferrars excuse her coming down, she felt too ill to leave her room."

The young man mournfully left the house. Good Heavens, it could not be that he had sinned past forgiveness, that Aggy meant, as she had said, never to speak to him again, and to break off their engagement. He had been rash, impetuous to denounce this horrible rational dress so very candidly, but then he had been inexpressibly shocked and grieved to see his darling attired in this masculine garb. It seemed to go against all his old-fashioned notions on womanly modesty and feminine dignity. His Agnes, the idol of his heart, his angel of purity and paragon of perfect womanhood, to have donned coarse, vulgar bloomers, the very thought was maddening. And now he had offended her, she declared, past all forgiveness.

He spent a sleepless night and came round early next morning to call at Laburnum Lodge.

"Miss Dalton?" he queried.

"Not at home," was the immediate answer from the maid, Jessie, who tried to convey in her tone and manner as much respectful sympathy as she could express. Ferrars was quick to notice this, he had at least one friend in the camp, and by this one ally, he hoped to gain admission into the presence of his irate little lady-love.

"Come, Jessie, nonsense! Miss Dalton isn't out at this hour of the day! You're telling me a fib!"

Jessie, looking embarrassed, fumbled with the hem of her dainty, spotless apron.

"Well, sir, I'm only telling the fib Miss Aggy told me to say!"

"Ah, I thought as much! What did she say to you?"

"Oh, please, sir, don't ask; if I tell you it will hurt you awfully hard!"

"Never mind, Jessie, I would rather know the worst!"

"Well, Miss Agnes, she never slept all night, I could see it this morning by her poor, sweet, pretty eyes that looked as if she had been crying for hours, with great rings under them, and when I brought her a cup of tea and the dainty, crisp toast she loves, she pushed the tray from her."

"Take it away, Jessie, I am not hungry this morning."

"Poor little lamb," thought I, "she is just breaking her own heart by quarrelling with her young man!"

Then, just as I was leaving the room, she called me back.

"'Jessie?'"

"'Yes, miss!'"

"'If Mr. Ferrars should call to-day at any time, you are always to say I am not at home.'"

"She gulped down a big sob, poor, motherless dear, I felt someone must comfort her, and, though I am only her maid, she had no one else at the time, so I came quite close to the bed and said soothingly—

"'Oh, come, Miss Agnes, dear, you don't mean it! Why, Mr. Ferrars and you are engaged!'"

"'No, we are not engaged,' she snapped, 'and I shall never see him again, never read another of his letters; he told me yesterday I was ugly, yes, positively ugly! Those were his very words'—and she began to cry again as if her poor young heart would break. Oh, sir, how could you say such a thing to my beautiful Miss Agnes?"

"Ah, Jessie, you may well ask, but I was mad, beside myself, it was that horrible dress did all the mischief. But, Jessie, you must admit me, let me see her once more, and I shall crave her pardon on my bended knees. She must, she will forgive me, if I can only see her."

"But, sir, I dare not, she would dismiss me at once."

Bertram fumbled in his pocket and drew out a bright new sovereign, which he tried to slip into the girl's palm, but she drew back with a proud toss of the head.

"No, sir, I wouldn't do it for money; if I let you in to see my young lady, it is only because I think it is for her good. I know she is wretched at having quarrelled with you."

"You're a good girl, Jessie, and I shall find some better means of requiting you."

"Well, sir, it is just this way—my young man, he is a sailor lad in the King's service, and I know if I had fallen out with him I should be ready to pluck my hair from my head, so I can just imagine how bad poor Miss Agnes feels. Come, I shall take you to her, and just trust to your making your peace with her, in which case she won't dismiss me."

"God bless you, Jessie," said Ferrars heartily, as he followed Jessie with a soft and careful tread up the carpeted stairs till they reached the drawing-room. The girl opened the door, and signed to him to go in.

"There, sir," she whispered, "Miss Agnes sits yonder in the morning-room, go in and tell her she is the prettiest girl on earth, and she'll soon forgive you!"

Bertram paid no heed to the maid's parting words of advice, he hurried through the drawing-room, paused on the threshold of the next room, then he gently moved the heavy velvet drapery which hung across the opening and gazed in. Agnes sat on a low couch her eyes red with recent weeping; on a small table at her elbow was placed a cabinet photograph of young Ferrars which he himself had given her; on her knees and on the couch by her were all the letters and notes he had on various occasions written to her, also the sundry presents and souvenirs he had bestowed on her, such as books, music, bouquet-holders, and scent-bottles, fans, and bangles; all the miscellaneous gifts a young fellow thinks of to bestow on the lady of his choice.

Digitized by Google

A slight movement of his revealed his presence, and she turned hastily. When her eyes met his, a hot flush suffused her cheeks, and she rose angrily to her feet, all the letters fluttering to the ground.

"You here, Mr. Ferrars?"

"Yes, Agnes, darling, I have come to implore you to forgive me."

"I really thought you were gentlemanly enough not to force your way into a lady's presence, when she refuses to hold any sort of intercourse with you in future," she said scornfully, pointedly averting her gaze from him while she spoke.

"Agnes."

"Call me Miss Dalton, please."

He bent his head in acquiescence to her haughty command.

"Be it as you will, but, Miss Dalton, may I inquire if you wish to dismiss me so entirely from your thoughts, why I find you seated with all the little gifts I ever gave you?"

"I was preparing to pack them and send them back to you," came the chilling answer.

"Indeed! And these letters?"

"I was going to burn them."

"And this photo?"

"Was meant to share the fate of the letters."

Quite coolly and deliberately Bertram walked back towards the heavy velvet hanging, waved it back with one hand, then turned and bowed coldly to Agnes.

"I see my best and wisest course, Miss Dalton, is to bid you good-bye, and the sooner I put your name and personality out of my thoughts the better for my peace of mind."

So saying he strode rapidly out of the room, and Agnes thought he had for ever passed out of her life. She was aghast, she never expected him to take his dismissal so calmly, she thought he would beg and implore her forgiveness, instead of which he was content to go at her bidding, and his sudden departure overwhelmed her with despair.

She flung herself on the couch, burying her face on the softly-tinted Liberty silk cushion.

"Oh, Bertie, Bertie, my darling, you never loved me," she moaned piteously.

As she uttered this agonised wail, two strong arms lifted her in a close and tender embrace.

"Aggy, Aggy, my own darling, why your Bertie loves you so, that your cruelty drove him to the brink of despair!"

She gave a little gasp and made a feeble pretence at freeing herself from his encircling arms, but she soon gave up the attempt, and, nestling her head on his shoulder, murmured:

"Oh! Bertie, I thought you were gone for ever, that I should never see you again!"

"Well, little one, and was it not what you desired me to do?"

She looked roguishly up into his face, so dangerously close to hers.

"You dear old goose, don't you know yet that a woman always expects a man to do the opposite of what she bids him do?"

"Indeed, well this is a thing to remember in my married life later on, such scraps of knowledge come in useful when the fetters of wedlock hold a man in their thraldom. By-the-bye, Aggy, I suppose we are to be married after all?"

She pursed up her lovely rosy lips into the most bewitching of pouts.

"I suppose I must overlook your atrocious conduct?"

"Ah! so far so good. And must I call you Miss Dalton?"

"Don't be silly, Bertie."

"Aggy, may I kiss you?"

"Certainly not."

The words were hardly out of her mouth ere he kissed her lips, cheeks, and brow. She struggled so to free herself this time, that she accomplished the feat, and, taking up her post by the window, exclaimed:

"Here, at any rate, I am safe, you will hardly venture to kiss me so that all the neighbours over the way can see you!"

"Hang the neighbours; you need not look so indignant at me. Aggy, you ordered me to kiss you!"

"You horrid wretch, telling such a monstrous fib!"

"You told me not to, and that, I have it from your own lips, amounts to an imperative command do to it."

"Nonsense. But tell me, Bert, is it not very generous and Christian-like of me to forgive you, when you have never even apologised?"

"Apologised for what?" innocently queried the offending culprit.

"For what?" she shrieked, "he dares to ask for what, when he brutally avowed to me that he thought me ugly?"

"I absolutely deny the charge! Darling, how could I call my Queen of Beauty ugly! Why, before your charms the golden rays of Phœbus pale, the silver beams of the moon shine dimly when compared with the lustre of your eyes!"

"Flatterer!" But, notwithstanding, Agnes beamed on her appreciative lover. "Still, deny it as you will, you did call me ugly when I wore the rational dress."

"Impossible, my dear girl, you must have dreamt it!"

"Then," she retorted triumphantly, "I shall put it on this afternoon, and you will take me for a ride on my new bike?"

She said this, half fearing this bold and final test of hers to see if his repentance were indeed sincere.

"Good gracious, Aggy! What on earth do you mean by this absurd masquerade!"

Digitized by Google

"Certainly, darling, you are absolutely free to wear whatever attire you think best."

This new-born blind deference to her wishes delighted Agnes. It was worth all the agony of quarrelling with Bertie, if only to come out so triumphantly from the debate.

* * * * *

Punctually at two o'clock that same afternoon, Jessie came up to her young mistress' bedroom, she seemed to be convulsed with suppressed laughter and held her handkerchief well choked over her mouth, as if she feared her unseemly mirth might break forth.

"Please, miss, Mr. Ferrars is in the drawing-room and wants to know if you are ready?"

Aggy was putting the finishing touches to her rational dress.

"Yes, in a few minutes. Jessie, how do I look? Don't you think these bloomers are the sweetest things in the world?"

"Yes, miss, you're all right—but Mr. Ferrars, he does look funny," and she giggled audibly.

"Don't be an idiot, Jessie, what's the matter with you laughing in that silly way, and what in the world do you mean talking like that of Mr. Ferrars?"

So saying, as she had just put the finishing touches to her masculine dress, she hurried down to the drawing-room. But she stopped aghast on the threshold thinking her eyes must be playing her false, or else that she was the victim of an extraordinary optical delusion. Bertram stood before the glass over the mantelpiece, complacently admiring the grotesque figure cast back at him by the mirror. Indeed, his get-up was ludicrous in the extreme. His athletic figure was robed in the complete outfit of a lady bicyclist. His dainty pale pink blouse was tucked in at the waist with a belt and buckle, the dark blue serge skirt fell in graceful folds just above the ankles, while on his head was set the jauntiest of white sailor-hats; a white spotted veil shaded his bronzed face, and fell over his hirsute moustaches which protruded in the most aggressive way.

"Bertie!" Aggie exclaimed, her voice bristling with indignation, "what on earth do you mean by this absurd get-up?"

"Mean, my angel, why I mean to take you out for a ride on your new bicycle."

"What! Attired thus?"

"Why not? If you insist on usurping the garb of a man, well then nothing remains for me to do but to sink my personality in that of a woman!"

"Bertie, do give up this nonsense, go and change at once!"

"Impossible, my pet, you see I leave you free to dress as you think best suits you, surely you might leave me the same liberty, and allow me to attire myself as my fancy prompts me to do."

"But, Bertie, this is a mad freak," and she stamped her tiny foot, in her sore vexation at the new and unexpected turn of events.

He bent his head in acquiescence to her haughty command.

"Why so, darling? If you will wear the breeches, nothing remains to me but the distaff and spindle. Come, let us be starting."

"What, do you think I should go out with you so?"

"Well, darling, to tell you the truth, I must confess I really think the pink of this blouse and the white veil suit my complexion to a T. I never thought myself good-looking till I donned all this feminine gear. You ladies have the advantage over us in the way of finery," and he once more turned to the mirror and cast admiring glances at himself.

This was too much for her, she burst into a merry peal of laughter.

"Oh, you excruciating goose; why, Bert, you are as ugly as one of the chimpanzees at the Zoo, and quite as comical!"

"That's better, Aggy, love; I like to see you laugh, because then I know you are not going to vow and protest you don't mean to marry me. Though I am sure you really do."

"Well, I shall certainly not go to the altar with you in this rig out!"

"No doubt for that propitious day you will yourself consent to don a skirt, so that I can wear trousers as the badge of my manhood! Otherwise you could not possibly expect the poor parson to unite in the bonds of holy matrimony two persons wearing men's attire. He would get horribly mixed up in putting the right question to each of us; he might tell me perchance to obey you instead of only loving and cherishing you!"

"You are very pat with the service for the solemnisation of matrimony!"

"Well, Aggy, it's only wisdom to prepare one's self for coming events."

"Bertie," she said softly (unwilling to assume the appearance of giving in, and yet she felt there was nothing for it but that) "wilful man must have his way; if I consent to give up wearing my beautiful Paris suit, will you promise me to throw off this grotesque costume and never to let me see you arrayed so?"

"Darling, of course I'm willing to sacrifice all my personal tastes to your wishes. You know connubial bliss consists mainly in reciprocal concessions on the part of husband and wife. The only thing that worries me is to know which character you really mean to assume, the man's or the woman's; take your choice, dearest. I am not particular, I only wish to know definitely, and then to take the part you do not wish to enact."

"Oh! Bert, you are too silly for words." Still, she could not help laughing, "off with you now, and mind you come back in an hour's time properly dressed, and I shall then be ready to go for that long postponed ride, with a bicycling skirt. There, are you satisfied now, oh, most obstinate of men?"

"Delighted, I am sure. The fact is, so long as you insisted on being a rational woman I had to be an irrational man."

Lily Butler.

Digitized by Google

Under False Pretences.

THE TALE OF A DANCE AND ITS SEQUEL.

I WILL endeavour to relate how two foolish mistakes on one occasion resulted most excellently, and brought the first glimpses of romance into the life of Margaret Chalmers.

Pale-faced, underpaid little work-girl, her existence had been grey and monotonous indeed; and trudging wearily along with thin shoes and tired eyes, over Blackfriars Bridge one murky evening, in company with a vast multitude of other brave toilers, she inevitably fell to pondering over the uselessness of it all.

Margaret reached a dingy side street eventually, pushed open a door without knocker or paint, and mounted the stairs towards an attic on the fourth floor.

"Miss Chalmers, is that you?" piped a shrill woman's voice from the basement.

"Yes, Mrs. Muggridge, I shan't want any tea this evening, thank you," she responded, calling to mind the smallness of the funds in hand.

"Oh, very well. There's a letter for you on the mantelshelf."

"A letter for me! Oh, thank you!"

When one receives on an average one per annum, it will be understood that the arrival of a letter is an event of extreme importance. Margaret forgot all her weariness as she eagerly snatched the packet from the mantelshelf. It was an imposing, crested envelope, addressed to "Miss Chalmers," and a myriad of confused, expectant thoughts surged through the girl's mind.

The mysterious communication was as follows:

"Woodstock,
"Grosvenor Terrace,
"West Kensington,
"24.11.'02.

"Mr. and Mrs. Hartley Mannering are giving a small dance at the Kensington Town Hall on Thursday, 1st January, New Year's Day, and would esteem the pleasure of your company upon that occasion.
"8 p.m. until 3 a.m."

"It must be some mistake, of course," Margaret mused, twisting the letter in her fingers, and examining it minutely. "I've never even heard of the people. Besides, who would dream of asking me to a fashionable dance. If it were a fancy dress, though, I could go as Cinderella, perhaps—in her kitchen rags."

Having reviewed the situation from every possible point of view, an adventurous spirit came over the girl, and she retired that night determined at all hazards—mistake or no mistake—to attend the dance. With infinite care she indited a careful note in the morning, accepting the invitation.

The idea seemed so quaint that she laughed to herself at intervals during the day.

"It will be something to talk about, at all events, I can quite easily manœuvre a dress "for one night only," she went on merrily. "A cab will be absolutely necessary as well. I do hope that no titled personage will be fascinated by my charms. He'll be most grievously disappointed, and terribly cross, methinks. Any way, the invitation is addressed to Miss Chalmers, and Miss Chalmers will endeavour to do herself justice.

* * * * *

On the evening of New Year's Day, it was really a delightful little personage who alighted from a hansom at Kensington Town Hall, and demurely presented herself to Mr. and Mrs. Mannering. They received their guest most graciously, and the only possible obstacle to complete enjoyment was removed.

Margaret, after a time, became quite convinced that no mistake had been perpetrated after all. Someone, perhaps, had heard of her straitened circumstances—even taken a passing fancy for her—and hence the invité.

As a matter of fact, the girl, slim, graceful, with curiously pretty, nut-brown hair, and refined features, distinctly held her own, and found quite a circle of admirers. One young gentleman in particular appeared to be greatly impressed with Miss Chalmers—and introduced as Reginald Cleaver, fair-haired, with well-favoured, clear-cut features, typical of buoyant youth, he became distinctly impudent, and pleaded for the favour of six dances in succession.

"Most decidedly not," piquantly retorted Margaret. "It would be quite unfair to the others, and extremely bad taste in addition."

"Nonsense, Miss Chalmers! Why people should be regulated by a code of absurdly narrow regulations, compiled by old fogies, I have never been able to understand."

"I am much afraid that some people need regulating all the same."

"You are really unkind! I form my own code of rules to correspond with my circumstances and company. Given an elderly spinster as partner, I am content to be strictly orthodox, and have but one dance. Given you, Miss Chalmers, the system is idiotic. We no sooner become interested in conversation, and—in each other, than you are claimed by some apology for a man who will bore you to death."

"Oh, I am not so sure of that! Mr. Woodford is really an excellent fellow, whilst there are——"

Mr. Cleaver became seriously in earnest, and interrupted impetuously.

"I know! There are scores of them, all buzzing round you. For that very reason I ask you what I do. Miss Chalmers, please, please let me have six dances—I have so much to say to you—will you?"

Digitized by Google

"Yes!"

The state of affairs now became somewhat dangerous. During the six dances in question, Mr. Cleaver became annoyingly inquisitive, and Margaret's attempts to evade his thinly-veiled questions were decidedly exciting.

"Have you a great distance to go to reach your home, Miss Chalmers?"

"Oh, no! A cab will take me there for one-and sixpence, I believe. Isn't this a delightful waltz, Mr. Cleaver? Do you remember its title?"

"'The Dance of Pierrot!' It is rather original, distinctly out of the ordinary sort. Have you danced much this season, Miss Chalmers?"

"Oh, yes, very frequently."

Margaret told the fib most elegantly.

"It's wonderfully strange that I have never met you."

"Quite possibly you have. One can't remember everyone one meets."

"That may be, but I have never met you before, Miss Chalmers. No one could dance with you and forget it."

"Do I dance so very badly, then?"

"I do wish you would not treat my remarks as jokes. I feel more serious, somehow, to-night, than I have ever felt in my life."

The conversation continued in a varied strain until supper. As Margaret descended with Mr. Cleaver to the ball-room to resume the programme, the inevitable occurred.

"Miss Chalmers, will you grant me a very great favour? May I escort you home to-night?"

Margaret blushed with confusion. She would have given all her possessions to consent, but the thought of exposure was unendurable.

"I'm afraid not, my father will be here to meet me."

"At least, then, you will introduce me to him?"

"Oh, yes, with pleasure!"

At this critical juncture Miss Chalmers did the only thing she thought possible under the circumstances.

Whilst Mr. Reginald Cleaver was waltzing severely with a stout member of the aristocracy, a cab was hailed, and Miss Chalmers, in Cinderella fashion, was whirled away from the scene of her triumph.

Arrived at the attic, how sordid and gloomy everything appeared after the glittering glamour of the dance.

Margaret surveyed her elegant self in the broken mirror, and laughed with glee. She looked at the dismal surroundings, thought of the morrow, realised that the end of the adventure had come, and burst into tears.

In all the days of her monotonous, weary, work-a-day life, that following the dance was at once the most dreary and dismal. The same pale-faced work-girl trudged wearily home.

"There's another letter for you to-night, miss!" With strange forebodings Margaret absolutely ran upstairs, and tore open the envelope.

From Reginald Cleaver! Her heart beat with joy, for perhaps the end of her delightful escapade had not come, perhaps only the beginning. The letter would show.

"Why had she left so hurriedly without a good-bye? Had he done aught to offend her? To add to his misery he had overheard that she had left alone, her father had not called. She was unkind indeed not to accept his escort. Might he take the great liberty of calling upon her one day? Would Miss Chalmers drop a little note giving permission?" It was a plaintive letter, but the curious part to Margaret was the postscript.

"You will wonder, Miss Chalmers, by what means I obtained your address. Please allow me to call, and I will explain. I also want to impart to you an important secret—not entirely unconnected with myself."

The girl finished the epistle in a state of complete bewilderment. To allow Mr. Cleaver to call upon her in a dingy attic was a preposterous idea. To arrange an interview with him outside would appear mysterious, evasive, and yet it was the only alternative.

She would meet him and confess everything. The matter would end for ever—it was absurd and wicked to carry the deception further. In her secret heart, however, I am afraid that Miss Margaret Chalmers was not quite so convinced that the affair had ended, as she determined to explain to Mr. Cleaver.

* * * * *

A crisp, wintry morning at Kensington Gardens, and a well-set-up young man was pacing vigorously up and down the length of the Flower Walk. Ten minutes late, Margaret appeared, unusually rosy and happy.

"Ah, Miss Chalmers, I am really delighted you have put in an appearance. I began to fear this appointment was another caprice." He looked at her steadily.

"Another caprice? How do you mean, Mr. Cleaver?"

"Your sudden disappearance from the dance, without bidding good-bye to a soul—it was too cruel!"

"I could not help it—I—I—felt suddenly unwell." And then, stifling her confusion with an effort, "What did you wish to see me about—something about—yourself, I believe?"

"Yes, something very important. I ought to have told you before. I have been a cad, Miss Chalmers!"

They were not seated, and the man tapped the gravel uneasily with his stick. Margaret flushed, glanced at him suddenly, and lowered her eyes.

"I don't understand!"

"It would be wonderfully strange if you did!" A slight awkward pause of a few seconds, and Reginald Cleaver turned to the girl suddenly, blurting out—

"Miss Chalmers, I'm not a gentleman, you see!"

Margaret looked inquiringly, and he continued—

"I went to that ball like a cad, under false pretences. I intended it just for a prank—to meet you, Miss Chalmers, forgive me for saying so, is to love you. I commenced by deceiving you, and hadn't the heart to tell you the truth. You see, I'm not a gentleman, Miss Chalmers, only just a valet."

Another long pause, and he glanced cautiously at Margaret.

"Well, Miss Chalmers, what have you to say to me after this confession?"

Margaret laid her hand upon his arm.

"Mr. Cleaver, if I were to tell you that I also went to the dance under false colours, that instead of being a Society girl I am merely an overworked dressmaker, hardly able to live decently, what would you say to me, then?"

"I could say to you, Miss Chalmers, what must have remained hidden for ever otherwise, that I love you!"

"And, because you are a valet, Mr. Cleaver, I can say that I learnt in those six dances to care for you very much indeed."

The remainder of the conversation which passed between these young people on the day in question, is strictly private and confidential. As they strolled arm-in-arm from the Gardens, the crisp, winter sunshine came forth, and the vista of happiness before seemed very bright indeed.

"Reggie, did you ever guess before I confessed, that I was not a lady?"

"I shall always refuse to think you anything but a lady, Meg, but when a fellow in evening-dress chases a cab containing a runaway girl, to a modest district over the water I, pretty well thought——"

"Yes?"

"Well, I thought there might be a little chance of a happy new year for me, after all!"

Harry J. Robinson.

Digitized by Google

BRAND NEW COMPETITION. Start To-day.

Cash Down. Cash Down. Cash Down.

1st Prize, £50. 2nd Prize, £25. 3rd Prize, £10.

And 25 Gramophones.

THIS IS AN ENTIRELY NEW COMPETITION AND IS NOW PLACED BEFORE THE PUBLIC FOR THE FIRST TIME. IT IS EXCEEDINGLY SIMPLE, AND IS OPEN TO EVERY PERSON WHO READS "SHORT STORIES."

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below will be found six paragraphs containing the buried names of Railway Stations in the United Kingdom (or words that sound the same as the names). You must write in the spaces given the names of the Railway Stations so indicated.

No word or part of a word may be used more than once in making up the name of a Railway Station. In the event of the name of a Railway Station occurring more than once in a sentence, it should be underlined and written down each time. In case of more than one person finding the same number of words for each or any sentence, those words containing the largest number of letters will have preference.

When you have discovered the names of Railway Stations in the sentences, underline (in ink) the words which go to make up the names (or words that sound the same as the names) and then on the line underneath each sentence write (in ink) the correct names of the Railway Stations to be found in each.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to Bradshaw's Guide, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or Room Eight, SHORT STORIES, 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The names of the Railway Stations consist of one word or two or more consecutive words, or consecutive parts of one word, or two or more consecutive words.

The first prize of £50 will be given to the Competitor who fills in the greatest number of railway stations under the conditions stated.

The second prize of £25 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in the order of merit.

When you have filled in all the names you can find, cut out the list below and keep it by you. Don't on any account send it to us until the closing date is announced in SHORT STORIES. A fourth list of sentences will appear next week.

In the event of a tie a further list (or, if necessary, several further lists) of sentences will be submitted to the tieing competitors until one wins the first prize outright.

CUT THROUGH HERE

EXAMPLE.

The oaks were swaying in the breeze, the cows were grazing peacefully, when out of the park tore a huge black bull.

The Oaks, Sway, Cowes, Grays, Park, Black Bull.

THIRD LIST.

13. The vessel which was floated in the New River would carry considerably more than its present cargo.

14. They fell over the cliff when staying at the sea-side, though warned to look out for the spot which had been a danger to numberless people.

15. We went to the church down in the valley. It was on the border of three counties, was surrounded by a privet fence, and approached by a bridge.

16. There was a large rookery in the grounds of the County School. One boy left owing to the noise the birds made.

17. He made the horse leap a high gate. It then tore across hills and dales until it was exhausted.

18. That table-cover would make twenty mufflers for the crew of the brig which is lying at Swansea now.

NAME_____ ADDRESS_____

Digitized by Google

GREAT NEW SERIES. YOU CAN BEGIN HERE.

Confessions of a Self-made Girl

The writer of these Confessions relates in this series of articles the true story of her life, from the time when she left Cornwall, an unsophisticated but ambitious girl, until she made her name and fortune. Her name is well known to you.

[For the purposes of these Confessions I am calling myself Maud Cardew, as my real name is too well known for me to wish to make the story of my life public in this manner.]

MY HEART'S DESIRE.

I am a native of a seaside village in Cornwall. As I grew up I began to tire of the monotony of the life and determined to go out into the world and make a name for myself.

One day when I was in the ruins of the Old Keep, which is on the cliffs, two strangers—tourists evidently—suddenly appeared. They told me that they had decided to stay in the neighbourhood for a few days, and asked if I knew of any lodgings. I said that my father would be glad to put them up at the farm, and accordingly they came home with me.

Their names were the Honourable Robert Lestrange (commonly called Bobbie) and Di Northcote.

I told these two Londoners of my desire to see the world, Bobbie encouraged me in my ambitions, but Di advised me to stay at home. When he saw that nothing would shake me from my resolve, he promised to try to find something for me to do when I arrived in the great city.

Bobbie met me on my arrival in London. Owing to a fog we got separated, and as I stood on the steps of a house I heard a man's voice asking me to come inside and wait until the fog cleared. Feeling that it would be hopeless to find Bobbie, I accepted the invitation. I remained there some time when Di happened to call, and he took me to my lodgings in Bloomsbury, where Bobbie was waiting; he told me that the man in whose rooms I had been was Lord Cecil Trevor, one of the worst "men about town."

Di came in next morning to tell me he had found me a place as trier-on in the firm of Philips and Philips, mantle and jacket makers. He also gave me some advice which I rather resented. I didn't like my work at all, and as I felt I ought not to live alone I got Lizzie Brown, a new girl, to share rooms with me.

I met Lord Cecil Trevor on several occasions, and Di and I fell out because of my friendship with him. I accepted an engagement for a small part on the stage at the suggestion of Lord Cecil. Soon afterwards we became engaged to be married. We were dining in a restaurant one evening when a woman, who had been eyeing us a good deal, came up and said:

"You can't marry Lord Cecil. He is a married man!"

The Story of Lord Cecil's Wife.

For a moment I was struck dumb with amazement, and could only stare at her stupidly.

"A married man!" I gasped at last, while the room and the people in it grew unsteady to my eyes. "Do you mean that he has a wife living?"

"Yes. She sits before you now!"

"You?" I asked incredulously, conscious for the moment only of her shabby attire and unmistakably gipsy-like appearance.

"Yes," she answered firmly, "I am Lady Cecil Trevor."

Then Lord Cecil broke in angrily.

"This is a positive farce," he said. "You Lady Cecil Trevor, indeed! Come, Maud, let us go away; it is evident no one here has the pluck to give her in charge!"

The girl looked round coolly at the collection of people now watching us breathlessly, and then turning to me, said—

"Ask for a private room if you like, but don't go away with him. He will only tell you lie upon lie."

I looked from one to the other in distress, almost wishing that the floor would open and swallow me.

"Nonsense!" Lord Cecil exclaimed. "I can't allow it, Maud. You must come away with me at once!"

"If you do," said the girl, "I will follow you and proclaim what I have to say in the street."

Again I looked up in bewilderment, utterly at a loss what to do, and almost at the same moment Di's quiet voice said—

"Can I be of any service to you?"

Where he sprang from I do not know, but there he was sure enough.

I glanced at Lord Cecil and saw a scowl of malignant hatred come over his face, but I had quickly regained my self-possession under the instant feeling of security in Di's presence, and said—

"This girl wishes to tell me something. Will you procure a private room and come with us?"

Lord Cecil remonstrated vehemently, but it was no use, and finally he had to follow the three of us.

Then the girl drew a paper from her pocket, carefully guarding it, and, handing it to Di Northcote, said—

"What does that tell you?"

Di read it through in silence and then returned it to her.

"Tell the lady," said the girl, and Di turned to me.

"It states," he said, "that Cecil Trevor went through a ceremony of marriage with Rose Whitehead four years ago in Berlin."

Digitized by Google

"I am glad you said a ceremony," put in Lord Cecil sneeringly. "Ask her to show her marriage certificate!"

"You blackguard!" said Di, with cutting deliberation, and the look Lord Cecil threw at him made me shudder.

"Certificate or no certificate," Di continued unmoved. "This woman is undoubtedly your wife."

"And I say she is not!" he asserted.

The girl laughed, a hard, hopeless laugh that rang in my ears for weeks.

"Oh, he will go on swearing that!" she said. "He would swear his soul away if it suited him. I don't mind, I've had quite enough of him, and as long as I'm well I can earn enough for me and the children. Two there are," she added, "the youngest is nearly two years old, and he's never set eyes on her, nor given a farthing towards her keep!"

I recoiled in horror, while Lord Cecil swore at her under his breath.

"I have many friends," she went on, in a queenly way natural to her, "and I can get along just as well without him, but I have sworn to myself that as long as I live and have the power, I will stand between him and any other woman he would make a victim of."

She turned to me.

"I am of gipsy blood," she said, "but only through my mother, and I have never followed the caravan. Still, the tribe acknowledges me, and partly through this I am here to-night.

"Our ways are not your ways, but we hang together and help each other in all things. I have no more to say. You will take the lady home?" looking at Di, "and I shall vanish again till I am once more needed."

She turned to the door without so much as a glance at Lord Cecil, and with that calm simplicity of purpose that made it impossible for us to doubt her story.

"Wait a moment," said Di, and taking out his pocket-book drew from it a five-pound note.

But she shook her head. "We can do without money," she said proudly, "while we can work."

"For the children," he said simply, and her face changed. She seemed to hesitate, as if torn between conflicting desires, and finally, with a little, sad smile, held out her hand.

"For the children," she repeated slowly, and, taking the bank-note, bowed her head and vanished. As Di handed it to her, he handed with it one of his cards, and on it he had scribbled, "If you are ever in need come to me—for the children's sake," but this I learnt long afterwards.

Meanwhile Cecil Trevor had turned his back upon us, and now stood scowling up at a picture.

As Di and I were about to leave the room, I turned back and looked at him, and, as though led to it by some unseen force, he at the same moment turned to me. I don't know what possessed me, but after a moment's hesitation I said to Di—"Will you wait for me outside. I should like to speak to Lord Cecil alone."

Di did not half like it, but he could not very well do other than comply, and in a few seconds we two were alone in the room.

"Well," he said, "do you want to taunt me?"

"No," I answered, steadying my voice with an effort. "I want to say a word for that poor girl and her children!" I stepped near, and supported myself with a chair back, for the past scene had unnerved me.

"What has passed between you and me, and the wrong you meant to do me, need not come into the question now," I said. "What matters most is your treatment of her."

His face took a sullen expression, but I refused to be daunted and went on.

"Whether you are properly married or not I do not know, but it is certain you went through some form with her which she believed the right one. If it was not, marry her now," and I leant towards him pleadingly in my earnestness.

"Impossible!" he muttered. "I was a boy at the time and did not know what I was doing. Now I am a man I refuse to tie a mill-stone round my neck."

"I think it will be there whether you wish it or not," I said. "You owe this girl a name and a position. She is beautiful still, make her Lady Cecil Trevor, and perhaps you will drop the mill-stone, instead of binding it firmer."

"It is impossible!" he said again. "I do not love her, and I will not be tied to her. It doesn't affect me as you seem to think. I tell you I don't care. I don't care for anything. When a man gets to feel about things as I do, there is no right and wrong!"

"I don't believe it," I said resolutely. "You are not so wicked as you would make out."

"Oh, yes I am," he said, with a little, harsh laugh. "Much worse, in fact." He stopped short suddenly and looked up.

"If I had met you sooner," he said, "it might have been different—I don't know—but if anyone can make a man walk straight I guess it's a woman like you. It's a pity they're so scarce.

"You are the one and only specimen it has been my lot to come across. All the rest were more or less bad, or at any rate, so weak a fellow couldn't possibly care for them except as playthings."

He paused, then added in a voice from which he could not quite stifle the feeling—

"There have been a good many times since I met you when I have been sorry about things, but it's no good now. You came too late, you see; the die was cast and the pattern could not be changed. If you had married me I should have gone straight. Now it's all up with me!"

"Oh, don't say that," I cried. "You are only a young man still."

"No," he answered brusquely, "I am an old one; years go for nothing really; it is only experience that counts. I am going now—good-bye. I have no respect for your sex—it is impossible—if you knew what I know you would understand.

"But there is this difference now, I have met one good woman. I am glad, and I shall not forget. If there were more of you it would be better for all the world. Good-bye!" And without another word he hastily left the room and went out of my life for ever.

But I do not think of him harshly. In spite of everything I am only sorry to think that there are women who so degrade themselves as to give men a bad opinion of our sex.

When I walked home with Di that evening I was very meek indeed. If he had chosen to scold me I should have taken it like a lamb.

As it was, however, he scarcely spoke at all, and I began to be afraid he was mortally offended with me and had only helped me through my recent difficulty for Bobbie's sake.

When we were nearly home, however, he remarked abruptly—"You are looking very thin; I hope you are taking care of yourself?"

"Oh, yes," I replied carelessly, "I'm quite all right." I hesitated, then added, half bitterly, with Cecil Trevor uppermost in my mind, "Of course, I know you think I'm a silly little fool, but, well—" I stopped short.

"Yes?" he said encouragingly.

"No, I won't defend myself," I continued resolutely, "I was a silly little fool, only I think it was the illness that did it."

Digitized by Google

"Have you been ill?" he asked quickly.

"Yes, I had influenza, and Lord Cecil took care of me. He was awfully good."

I saw him bite his lip, but he showed no other sign as to how he felt about it.

"It must have been while I was away in France," he said. "I only returned last week, and heard of your engagement at once."

"I wonder what you thought?" I could not resist remarking.

"I did not stop to think," he replied abruptly. "I set to work at once to find some way of proving to you what kind of a man he was."

"And in the end?" I asked.

"In the end I met with his wife."

"What! You brought her!" I exclaimed.

"Yes, but I did not intend to have a public scene. I meant to bring her to you here to-night. She was too quick for me. I suppose she saw you go to the restaurant and could not wait."

We had reached my door now, and I turned to him impulsively.

"You have been good to me; let me thank you," I said; "but I cannot understand why you take all this trouble about me."

"Do you want an honest answer?" he asked.

"I do," I replied, keeping my eyes fixed on his, in spite of a quickening pulse and sudden, uncontrollable nervousness.

"Then to tell you the honest truth, I don't know," he answered. "I do not believe in any woman very deeply, and as for liking, they are all more or less the same to me. You interest me, and I would like to believe in you, but it is a question for the future to decide."

"Thank you," I replied. "I, at any rate, like an honest friend. If you are inclined to be pals again, I will try to behave better in future," and I held out my hand. I smiled a little as he shook it. "Only you mustn't be too dictatorial," I added, "because my temper wasn't built for that kind of comradeship."

Two days later Bobbie burst into my room, after three months' absence, and the old régime began again; that is to say, the old régime when Bobbie was my faithful friend and caretaker.

I remained on the stage, but with another, and far better, company, through Di's influence, and the past miserable weeks became like a bad dream.

Looking back now, I think the three months that followed my unfortunate experience with Cecil Trevor were the happiest I remember.

I was so pleased with my new part, small though it was, and with the new order, that my ambitions were lulled to rest for a little, and I gave myself up to enjoyment pure and simple. In this Di only played a very insignificant part.

Beyond helping me when I needed help, he seemed indisposed to have anything more to do with me, and kept out of my way.

I did not feel flattered by any means, but I nursed my determination to make him feel some day, and banished him as far as possible from my mind. Indeed it was not difficult, for Flip Harcourt was back in London also, and he and Bobbie between them gave me little enough time to think.

We went about a great deal, in a quiet way, and were more like three happy children than anything.

Then Flip was ordered off to India, and a gloom fell upon us. We did not know what it was—he had been crazy to go a few weeks before—but now everything seemed different.

The last evening but one he fetched me from the theatre, and as Bobbie was engaged at home, we were alone.

He was so quiet that I felt vaguely uncomfortable, and at last it all came out.

Well, I have no mind to tell you just what that dear boy said to me, but no woman need want a sweeter or a truer wooing. When we said "Good-bye," I could not see anything for the tears in my eyes, and I could hardly find voice to speak. I wished so much it had not ended so. I tried to say it, but he interrupted me.

"No, don't wish that," he said. "I would not have an hour different, except you loved me. I shall not forget what splendid times we have had, and from first to last there is not a word or action of yours that anyone could blame.

"I'm glad I'm going out to India though," he ran on, with a catch in his voice; "many poor chaps would have had to stick on here, and grin and bear it. I couldn't do that anyhow, and I'd sooner go to the war than anything."

He broke down a moment then.

"I hope I'll get a bullet through me," he finished, "and die in the firing line."

Ah, poor Flip, poor Flip! and you had your wish dear, only it wasn't merely in the firing line, but winning the Victoria Cross. And I have got the little keepsake you meant for me.

They found it in your breast pocket, with two notes I had scribbled to you, a little curl of hair, and a tiny lace handkerchief marked with my name. I wonder when you stole that little curl, Flip? I wonder if you kissed it sometimes? I wish—oh, I wish I could have given you all you wanted.

Soon after Flip had sailed a new order again commenced for me, and the whirlwind of circumstances swept me forward.

It dated from a certain night when I was so late for the theatre that I jumped into a hansom, and told the man to drive fast. He was practically drunk I soon discovered from the giddy way in which he swerved round corners and across the road, but I had no time to change, so held my seat and hoped for the best.

We reached the theatre safely, but the roads were greasy, and in drawing up sharply the poor horse lost his footing and fell heavily.

I was out in a second to find the driver had shot down from his seat head first, and being quite incapable of picking himself up, remained stupidly on the ground, not much better off than the poor horse.

No one was at hand except a few children, the stage door being in a back street, and everyone else, no doubt, busy in their dressing-rooms.

"Fetch someone quickly," I exclaimed to the biggest child, and went at once to the horse. The poor beast had got nastily twisted, and I could see was in pain, so I set to work at once to unbuckle what harness I could get at.

He kicked a little, but I was not afraid, having had a good deal to do with horses on my father's farm, and just then a big man, who had apparently seen all that passed, came out of the theatre door to help. Before anyone arrived we got the animal free, and coaxed him to his feet, then I looked round anxiously.

"I am horribly late," I said, "and the man is quite incapable. Someone ought to give him in charge."

My companion, who had been watching me more or less closely ever since he came to the rescue, at once signified his willingness to stay, and with a hurried thanks I fled to my dressing-room and thought no more about the incident.

Two days later, much to my surprise, I received a request to present myself at the manager's office in the afternoon at three o'clock.

Hoping I was not in disgrace about anything, but I must confess a little anxiously, I called at the appointed time and was at once ushered into the formidable presence.

Digitized by Google

A big man, standing at the window, turned as I entered, and while he surveyed me with a quick, keen scrutiny, I recognised my helper of the cab difficulty.

The manager introduced him to me as Mr. Gregory, and after the usual greetings he went on to tell me that he was the manager of a large theatre in New York; that he was going to produce a very successful American play in England, and that his leading lady had just met with a serious accident, and could not fulfil her engagement.

Further that Mr. Gregory had been much struck by my appearance, and my promptness over the cab disaster, and later, by the way in which I played my little part.

Finally that he wished to enter into negotiations with me, with a view to my taking the part of the leading lady in his new play.

I was so astonished at first that I literally gasped. He seemed amused at this, and I conceived a liking for him at once, which only increased steadily throughout our intercourse.

"I am not at all satisfied with Miss Weldon's understudy," he said, "and I have been going the round of the theatres in search of an actress to play the part instead of her. If you will take it home and study it carefully, I should be glad to see you again to-morrow."

The part proved a delightful one, and I am quite sure it will remain my favourite to the last, just as it will doubtless be the one with which my name is chiefly remembered. When I saw Mr. Gregory the next morning I told him at once that I knew I could play it, and my frankness pleased him.

"Confidence in yourself is often half the battle," he said. "I have not the least hesitation is giving you a trial. I have had a talk with Mr. Grange, and he is willing to release you from your engagement with him, to free you to prepare for the rehearsals at once."

When I left the theatre that time I went straight to a telegraph office and wired to Bobbie. I felt as if fame had dropped upon me from the skies, and I must do something out of the ordinary to give vent to my wild, inward elation. He, as I anticipated, was scarcely less excited than I, and ready for anything.

In the end we took stalls at a theatre, and dined at the Carlton. I remember that evening so well. Already I saw myself one of the great actresses of the day, and I'm sure I carried my head an inch higher than I had ever done before.

A new consciousness of beauty and power came to me, and as I met on all sides the usual admiring glances, I felt my heart swell with a new intensity of the joy of being and doing. Bobbie scarcely took his eyes off me.

"I did not think you could look lovelier than I have already seen you," he said; "and yet to-night there is something altogether fresh about you—something that even makes you more beautiful. What is it—you witch? Are you going to have the eyes of all the world upon you, and not be content any longer with poor Bobbie?"

A little later, digging his hands deep in his pockets, and staring moodily at the drop curtain, he remarked:

"I believe I'm beginning to wish old Gregory and his blessed new play at the bottom of the sea."

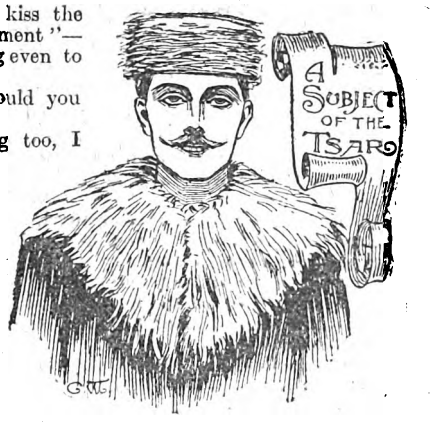
I tried to rally him. "Why?" I asked; "I expected you to be more glad than anyone."

"Then you shouldn't expect anything of the kind," he grumbled. "Good Heavens, Queenie!—am I likely to be glad about anything that robs me of you?"

"Robs you of me?" I repeated vaguely; "whatever are you dreaming of, Bobbie? I'm not going to die young that I know of."

"I know what I'm dreaming of well enough"—in the same disconsolate voice—"I'm seeing a picture of you at the top of the tree, dropping a few favours here and there with great condescension, among a small army of the human species in male attire, grovelling on their knees at your feet."

"Looking for ping-pong balls?" I asked irrelevantly.



"No, trying to kiss the hem of your garment"—not condescending even to smile.

"And where would you be?" I asked.

"Oh, grovelling too, I suppose — unless —unless——"

"Unless you were occupied with some other fair lady?" I inquired, smiling.

"No, unless I was on your right hand as your king, just as you are my queen."

"Oh, Bobbie! Bobbie!" I moaned; "please don't get sentimental."

"I can't help it," he said; "I'm madly in love with you, and I'm so beastly afraid all this success will come between us."

I laughed uneasily.

"You really are talking arrant nonsense, Bobbie," I asserted; "I don't know what's happened to you."

"I'm in deadly earnest, anyhow," he said; "right down, thundering, deadly earnest.

"But what about? I don't know what you're driving at."

"Then you're as dense as you are beautiful," he answered; "any girl with the ordinary amount of commonsense, in your place, would know that I wanted to marry her."

For a moment I was taken aback. It was the first time, in anything beyond the most palpable jesting, that Bobbie had spoken to me of love, and naturally I had taken it for granted all our intercourse and familiarity were more or less of a jesting nature.

We were pals pure and simple, and I was always prepared for Bobbie, one day, to confide to me the name of some fine lady he had chosen to be his bride.

Now I could hardly believe my own ears.

"Look here, Queenie," he remarked suddenly, before I had time to say anything; "I hate sentimentality as much as you do; let's be very businesslike. I want you to marry me—of course I do—I have done so for months—and I don't see that there's any reason why you can't. Let's fix it up next week."

"But my dear Bobbie!" I gasped; "what on earth are you going to do with me when you have married me?"

"Well, I didn't think of beating you just yet," he remarked drily.

I was silent a few moments, then I turned to him earnestly.

"No, don't be in earnest, Bobbie," I pleaded, "I like you so much, frivolous and irresponsible, I don't want you ever to be different. We've had such lovely times together—do let us go on just the same."

"No," he said resolutely, "I won't. I tell you I am in deadly earnest, and I intend to remain so. But it's not going to make any difference to the fun. We'll go on just the same, only I shall ask you periodically—in halfpenny numbers, don't you know, to be my wife; and if you don't give way for any other reason, you probably will in the end for peace and quietness."

He spoke half-jestingly, but his face was very white and determined, and I was frightened, for I knew perfectly well I should never marry him.

I felt I must convince him of this at once, I waited until we were going home, however, and then returned to the charge.

"Do you see this picture, Bobbie?" I said, glancing up at it; "it is a bit of Cornwall, and a bit of me. Those cliffs are drawn from life—they are some of the wildest and grandest in England. There is not much shadow of turning about them, is there? Not much wavering or giving up? It doesn't matter how fierce the sea, nor how wild the elements, they just brave them steadily, like adamantine walls."

Digitized by Google

I went and stood in front of him, stirred to my innermost being by my own strong feelings.

"I was born beside them, Bobbie," I said; "they are some of the first objects I ever remember opening my baby eyes upon; my small brain was almost reared upon thoughts of them. Whatever came and went, whatever befell, those giant cliffs frowned serenely on—steadfast, immutable, sublime.

"They caught my fancy before anything else, and have held it ever since—whatever I own of steadfastness, or resolute purpose, I feel I owe to them.

"Bobbie, just think it out a moment—nothing but an earthquake will make those cliffs change their purpose of holding back the sea. And I drank in the spirit of them, from my earliest infancy!

"Do you understand, Bobbie?—nothing but a miracle will change me now from my set purpose.

"I own a few weeks ago I wavered, but it was largely ill-health and a terrible depression. It is gone now and I am stronger than ever."

I stopped suddenly with a little laugh.

"How I am ranting, Bobbie," I said apologetically; "you must think I've gone off my head.

"But you understand, don't you? By going to the top I don't really mean the top of the theatrical profession—I mean a higher level still—I want to be a peeress, and since I can only become so by marriage, it is evident that I cannot marry you."

He got up then and strode down the room, kicking angrily at anything that came in his way.

"Drivel!" he said, coming back; "pure schoolgirl, mawkish drivel—I'm more than surprised at you—I'm—I'm—disgusted!"

I made no reply, and presently he added—"It's so beastly commonplace, too—every silly fool wants to be a duchess, and Heaven knows!—it's a poor enough game at best. You'll be sick of it in a year, I'll lay a quid. If your precious duke drinks and gambles you'll wish yourself at the bottom of the sea."

"I don't think he'll do that," I said quietly; "I'm not such a fool as you seem to think. I'll take that bet, Bobbie, just register it in your pocket-book.

"Only don't go on thinking about marrying me, because it can never be. I don't believe I could, even if I wanted to—my will wouldn't let me."

He came up to me and put his hands on my shoulders.

"I've got a will, too, Queenie," he said; "we'll just let the two of them fight it out to the end. Whichever way Fortune turns, I am your slave to the last, don't forget that."

(Next Tuesday I will tell you of my first appearance in a leading theatrical part.)

BIBLIOTHECA BODLEIANA

THE FALCON.

An Italian Story of Love and Sacrifice.

In Florence there was once a young man named Federigo, son of Master Filippo Alberighi, esteemed in feats of arms and in courtesy above every other young lord in Tuscany. Once upon a time, as usually befalls gallant men, he fell in love with a noble lady called Mistress Giovanna, in her day ranked among the fairest and most charming women of Florence; and to win her love he jousted and fought, gave feasts and made gifts, and lavished his wealth without measure or check.

But she, no less honourable than beautiful, took no notice of those things done for her, or of him who did them.

As Federigo then spent far beyond his means and gained nothing, it easily follows that his riches came to an end, and he remained poor. There was nothing left him but a little farm of his, on the income from which he lived wretchedly, and besides this a falcon, one of the best in the world.

And so, more in love than ever, and seeing it beyond his power to live in the city as he longed to do, he went to dwell at Campi, where his farm was. Here flying his falcon when he could, and asking no man's help, patiently he endured his poverty.

Now it happened one day, after Federigo had thus come to grief, that Mistress Giovanna's husband fell sick, and seeing death near, made his will. In this, being wealthy, he made his son, a sturdy little fellow, his heir, and then, because he had greatly loved Mistress Giovanna, provided that all should pass to her if the son died without lawful issue; and he died.

Mistress Giovanna, thus left a widow, went in the summer, as the ladies are wont to do, into the country with her son to an estate of hers not far from Federigo's.

So it came about that this lad began to grow intimate with Federigo and to take delight in birds and dogs; and having often seen Federigo's falcon fly he liked it hugely and mightily longed to own it, yet was unwilling to ask for it, seeing it was so dear to its master.

While matters stood thus it happened that the boy fell ill.

His mother, greatly afflicted by this, since she had no one else and loved him with all her heart, remained near him all day long, never ceased comforting him, and often asked him if there were anything he wished, begging him to tell her, for if it were possible to obtain it she would surely see that he had it.

The boy, after hearing these offers many times, said:

"Mother, dear, if you will get me Federigo's falcon I believe I shall get well soon."

When the lady heard this she remained quiet for awhile, and began to think what she ought to do.

She knew that Federigo had long loved her, and had never had from her a single look, so she said:

"How shall I send or go to ask him for this falcon, which, from what I hear, is the best that ever flew, and besides is all that keeps him alive? And how can I be so heartless as to wish to take from a man the last joy that is left him?"

And embarrassed by such thoughts, as she was perfectly sure she would get it, if she asked for it, she did not answer her son, but was silent, not knowing what to say.

Digitized by Google

At last, love of the child so overpowered her that in order to satisfy him, she determined that, whatever came of it, she would not send but would go herself for the bird and bring it to him ; and she answered him :

"Cheer up, my boy, and make up your mind to get well, for I promise you that the first thing I do to-morrow morning I shall go for it and surely bring it to you."

The child, happy in that thought, seemed to grow better the same day.

The next morning, accompanied by a friend, the lady went for a walk to Federigo's cottage and asked for him. Because the weather was not suitable for flying his falcon he was in a field of his, overseeing certain tasks.

Hearing that Mistress Giovanna was at the door asking for him he was greatly astonished, and ran there joyfully. When she saw him approach she rose to meet him with a womanly charm of manner, and when Federigo had courteously greeted her, she said :

"Good morning, Federigo," and went on, "I have come to make amends to you for the harm you have received through me, loving me more than you should have done ; and the compensation is this, that I mean, with my companion here, to breakfast with you in friendly fashion this morning."

Federigo humbly answered her :

"My lady, no harm do I remember ever to have received through you, but rather so much good that if I was ever of any account it was through your worth and through the love I bore you. And surely your generous coming to me now is much dearer to me than it would be if I had the power to spend again as much as I have spent in the past, since you have become a poor man's guest."

And so saying he received her shamefacedly into his house and from there took her into the garden, and having no one else there to entertain her, he said :

"My lady, since there is no one else this good woman, the farmer's wife, will keep you company while I go and have the table set."

Although his poverty was extreme, he had not yet learnt as he ought to have done that he had foolishly spent his wealth.

But this morning, finding nothing with which he could feast that lady, for love of whom he had before feasted countless men, made him think ; and, afflicted beyond measure, he reviled his luck, like a man out of his senses, running this way and that, finding neither money nor a thing that might be pawned.

When it was already late and he was eager to honour the fair lady with something at least, and unwilling to ask of anyone, even his own father, he happened to catch sight of his good falcon upon its perch.

And so, having nothing else to turn to, he took it, and, finding it plump, he decided that it was worthy food for such a lady. Therefore, without more thought, he wrung its neck and had his maid-servant dress it and put it before the fire and roast it carefully ; and having spread the table with white cloths, of which he still had a few, he returned gaily to the lady in the garden and said that such breakfast as he could furnish was ready.

The lady, with her companion, rose and went to the table, and, without knowing what they were eating, together with Federigo, who served them faithfully, they ate up the poor falcon.

When they had risen from the table and lingered awhile in pleasant conversation with him, it seemed to the lady time to say what she had come for, so with a friendly manner towards Federigo, she began :

"Federigo, when you recall your past life and my regard for my honour, which perhaps you considered harshness and cruelty, I have no doubt that you must wonder at my presumption when you hear the principal reason why I come. But if you had children, or had had any, through whom you might know the power of love for them, I should be certain that you would partially excuse me.

"But although you have no child I, who have one, cannot escape the laws which govern other mothers ; and as I must yield to their force, without any regard to my pleasure or to the proprieties, I am constrained to ask of you a gift which I know is precious to you—and rightly so, for your evil fortune has left you no other delight, no other diversion, no other comfort. This gift is your falcon, of which my boy is so fond, that if I do not take it to him I am afraid he will grow so much worse that I shall lose him.

"Therefore, I beg you, not by the love you have for me, which places you under no obligations, but by your noble nature, which seems to make you more courteous than anyone else, consent to give me the bird. Then I may say that by this gift I have kept my son alive and so placed him under eternal obligations to you."

Federigo, hearing what the lady asked, and regretting that he could not serve her, because he had given it to her to eat, began to weep before he could answer a word.

The lady at first believed that this weeping came more from grief at having to give up the good falcon than from anything else; and she was almost on the point of saying that she did not wish it, but she checked herself and waited for Federigo's answer, which came, after many tears :

"My lady, since the time when by God's will I gave you my love I have found Fortune hostile to me in many things, and have complained of her ; but all those things were nothing in comparison with what she is doing to me now—a thing for which I shall never forgive her, when I think that you have come here to my poor house, where you never deigned to come when it was a rich one, and you seek from me a little gift, and Fortune has so contrived that I cannot give it to you ; and I shall tell you briefly why this cannot be.

"When I heard that you—and I thank you for it—wished to breakfast with me, I considered it fit and proper, with regard to your rank and your worth, to honour you with more precious food, so far as lay in my power, than those viands which are generally used for other persons.

"So, when I thought of the falcon which you now ask me for, and of his value, I judged him to be fit food for you, and this morning you have had him roasted upon the platter, and I thought that was an excellent use for him, but now when I see that you have wished for him in another way, I feel such grief because I cannot serve you, that I am sure I shall never give myself a moment's peace about it."

And saying this he had the feathers and feet and head brought forward as a proof.

When the lady saw and heard this, first she blamed him for having slain such a falcon just to give food to a woman ; and then in her heart she praised highly the greatness of his soul which poverty had not been able to lessen. She went away sadly and returned to her son.

The boy, either from grief because he could not have the falcon, or from the natural progress of his sickness, not many days later, to the great grief of his mother, passed from this life. She, after giving herself up to tears and bitterness for a time, being now rich and still young, was often urged by her brothers to marry again.

Although she was reluctant, yet, seeing herself tormented by them, she remembered the noble qualities of Federigo and his last act of generosity—namely, his killing such a falcon to honour her—and she said to her brothers :

"I would rather remain a widow if you were willing ; but if you still wish me to marry I shall certainly never marry again unless it be with Federigo degli Alberighi."

Her brothers in derision said :

"Stupid, what are you saying? How can you want him, when he has nothing in the world ?"

She answered them :

"Brothers, I know that it is just as you say ; but I want a man without wealth, rather than wealth without a man."

Her brothers, hearing her decision and knowing Federigo to be a true man, although he was poor, gave her to him with all her wealth as she desired. And he, finding himself the husband of a lady so beautiful and whom he had so much loved, and besides that being now wealthy, became a careful manager and spent the rest of his life with her in perfect joy.

F. A. Sturt

Digitized by Google

ONLY A WEDDING CARD!

A Love Story with a Sad Ending.

LIGHT of heart, plain even to homeliness, large-nosed, thin-cheeked, square-jawed, with his long limbs hanging loosely to his body, laughing at all hours and places and things, happy apparently from morning to night, and entirely free from business cares and worries, Richard Morrison surely took life as easily as any man in or out of Workingham.

Those jealous of his disposition said he was too well satisfied with himself to be in earnest, and that he was wearisome; but the power he showed at entertaining women and children by the hour, without eliciting a yawn or a depressing lot of condescending monosyllables, would seem to prove him quite the opposite.

A capital dancer and a thorough society-man so far as frothy remarks and subtle flattery went, he found a welcome everywhere, and was considered as indispensable at dances and card-parties as the refreshments themselves. Indeed, some of the lately-opened buds had been heard to remark that he was even more enjoyable than ices and bonbons. But they had not known Dick very long.

If he had been handsome or very wealthy, he would have fallen into some designing mother's hands and have been turned into a benedict; but as his income was only modestly large, and as his face, as inelegantly described by his best friend, Hartman Lawson, would eventually hang him, light-hearted Dick still remained a bachelor, and every indication pointed to his finally filling—I quote Mr. Lawson once more—a bachelor's grave.

Dick had two peculiarities: he did not drink, and he fell in love ever so often. The first, in such a town as Workingham, stamped him as a different being from the rest of mankind; the second made him interesting to every woman he knew.

All the way through the upper, middle, and lower strata of society in and about Workingham Dick penetrated, loving as freely and as often as he laughed, happy and miserable as regularly as he was thrown over or quietly "forgotten," but believing through it all that he would find a girl at last who would care for him enough to marry him and help spend his small income.

* * * * *

"Come in," said Hartman, in answer to a nervous knock on his door one evening.

As the door opened he looked up from under the lamp to see who it is, and his eyes met those of Dick.

"That you, Richard? Take a chair," and he politely kicked one towards his visitor.

"I haven't time to stay," Dick explained, as Hartman pointed silently to the tobacco-jar and array of pipes on the mantel-piece. "I am packing. Eh? Yes, going away."

"Ah," said his friend, finishing a paragraph in his novel and turning it face down on his knees. "Where?"

"Goatstone. I don't suppose you know it, but——" He stopped and going to the door closed it carefully, then he came to his friend's side and rolled up one of his loose sleeves.

"Look at that," he said, bringing his bare arm into the soft light of the shaded lamp. Lawson put on his eye-glasses and looked down at the member; touched the little callous spots which almost covered the forearm, with a gentle thumb and finger; and pursed his lips.

"Too bad, old man!" he said; "how long?"

"A year or more. I first began taking the stuff that time I was so ill and when I couldn't sleep—you'll remember that, because you used to suffer from my everlasting walking up and down the room. I thought it would go away—the desire for it—but I was decidedly mistaken. It's got me fast, and it will end me if I don't end it."

"Sit down," said the other, quietly motioning to the chair again with his pipe, "and tell me all about it."

"Precious little to tell," replied the younger man, the laughter missing from his voice and homely face now. "The fool of a doctor gave it to me in the first place, and hadn't sense enough to warn me about it. You see, I wouldn't know that the thing becomes a habit unless someone told me so every now and then, and he didn't even mention it once—at least, not more than once, anyway.

"It ran on without worrying me till a month or so ago, when I forgot to get some tablets one night. I suffered horrors for twelve hours—not only physically, but mentally; for it was the first time I had realised what a hold the morphine had on me. At daybreak, I got round to the chemist and roused him up, and so slept all the day. But at night I began to make a stand against the stuff, and no one knows how hard I tried to overcome the need for it.

"I walked all night, up and down the streets, fighting every step of the way against the awful appetite for my poison; and when dawn came again, I thought I had conquered, but it fooled me. The minute I got home, I rushed for the syringe, and not ten thousand devils or saints could have kept me from it, though I tried with all the power left in me to stop.

"Yes, it is all up with me. I can't stop it myself, so I'm going to Dr. Harper. It's the only way. What I came to ask you to do for me is to throw the fellows off the track, if they come asking you questions. If they find I have gone to the doctor's hospital, they'll swear it's the D.T.'s; and you know yourself it isn't that, though it is just as bad, if not worse."

Dick stopped abruptly and coloured as he realised what a long speech, for him, he had been making.

"I understand; you want me to put the boys off when they ask me where you are. How long will you be gone?"

"They claim they can cure a man in three weeks; but I'll be there a month. I don't want any half-way business in mine, and this once must be the first and last time I go there. You will do this for me?"

"Of course, old man. You are doing right to go before it is too late, and I certainly hope you'll come out of it all right. But, Dick——"

Digitized by Google

"Well?"

"I knew it long ago."

"You did? How?"

"Never mind. Only I wanted to tell you that I had an eye on you, and I was thinking to-night of opening the subject with you. Just another case of coincidence."

"Yes. Well, I'm much obliged to you for thinking of me, and I'll be more so if you keep the boys out of the way. I'll be off now; start at seven in the morning, so I won't see you. Take a look in my rooms every now and then, old man, and make yourself at home whenever you feel like it. I'll leave a key for you. I—— Good night," and he held out his hand.

Hartman shook it heartily, and Dick was at the door before he spoke.

"Richard!"

"Well?" again.

"Hadn't you better tell me the rest?"

"The rest?"

"The rest."

"How did you know there was any rest, Hartman?"

Hartman smiled. "Anyone could have told that," he said. "Go on; has she promised to wait until you are—well again?"

"No," said Richard eagerly, the look of hope and love which his friend had seen so often coming into his eyes once more. "I wouldn't let her do that. She started to say something, and there were tears in her eyes, bless her, but I would not stay. I told her everything.

"First I told her how much I loved her"—Hartman smiled, but Dick went on—"and that I wouldn't want her to say she would wait for me. I told her, if I deserved her, I would have her and her love when I got back.

"I know she loves me, but I couldn't stand hearing her say so; it would have broken me up so I wouldn't have been willing to start to-morrow. So, as quick as I got through telling her my plan, and before she could say a word, though she tried, I got away and came home."

"But are you sure of yourself this time?" asked Hartman.

"Sure of myself? I wish I were as sure of Heaven as I am of myself! I love that girl, Hartman, with everything—heart, soul, and body—and I mean to have her in the end, if honest working for her will count. I don't want you to tell me a word about her while I am gone, and she isn't to write to me, because I haven't strength of mind to stay away from her when I think or hear of her too much. When I come back, I'll tell you the rest—all of it."

"That's a good plan; you are right not to make a regular engagement of it, old man; it is more fair to both of you. But are you in earnest this time, Dick?"

"Now, ook here, Hartman," exclaimed his friend impatiently, "every man is in earnest once in his life, even if he is of no account as I am, isn't he? Well, I tell you, this is my earnest time, and no mistake about it. I'm going to prove it to you. Good night," and he was gone before Hartman could even ask him her name.

As Dick's own door closed behind him, Hartman took from his pocket a tiny photograph—the picture of an exceedingly pretty girl. He smiled at the winsome face, and then kissed it once or twice. He was usually a hard, practical man, but very few of us are not foolish once in a while.

One day, about a month after, Dick, free from his trouble and looking much more like the Dick of twelve months ago, came quietly home.

He had not told Hartman even that he would be back that day, and he met no intimate friends as he went to his rooms in the quiet little street. In an hour he was settled as comfortably as ever, and all the afternoon he was answering letters that had come while he had been gone.

After dinner he went for a short walk; and, as he ran down the steps and drew in a breath of the fresh Spring air, he felt that his cup of happiness was almost full. and that soon the tortures he had suffered—hidden under his accustomed gaiety, though none the less deep on that account—would be repaid a thousand-fold.

He started for the club; but his feet took him elsewhere, and ten minutes later he was unlatching the gate at her house.

He found her at a little desk in the corner of the room, writing; and, as she rose to receive him, he saw scattered about on it innumerable envelopes which she had addressed.

She caught his inquiring glance, and a pretty colour came into her face as she laughingly handed him one of them. He opened it with a queer feeling at his heart, which was not relieved when he began to read the plain little engraved sheet within:

"Mr. and Mrs. L. S. Torence request the pleasure of your company at the marriage of their daughter Lizzie——"

Dick read no further. For a moment everything seemed to turn black around him, and he set his teeth hard to keep back the groan which rose to his lips.

But it passed quickly.

He put the card back into its envelope, and that into his pocket; then he turned to her with his old smile.

"I congratulate him, Lizzie," he said, quite steadily.

Late that night, after the theatre, Hartman ran whistling up the stairs to Dick's rooms. He had just heard that he had got back, and he had determined to drop in and scold him a bit for not notifying him, before he himself turned in.

The door was locked; but Hartman had the key he carried while Dick was away, and he put it softly in the lock, and, turning it, stepped quietly into the room.

A slight breath of air, which made the gas-jet burning near the table waver and flare up again, swept past him, laden with the odour of crushed rose-leaves, and it carried him back, as sweet odours only can carry one back into the past.

He smiled thoughtfully and looked down.

Stretched at full length before the long mirror, face downwards, was Dick himself, and the cheerful words of greeting died on Lawson's lips. He closed the door hastily, and, running forward, knelt beside him. No breath, no motion, no sound.

He turned him over slowly, and the wide-open eyes of careless Dick did not smile back into his own as they had always done. He touched his pulse with his finger, but it was still.

In one thin hand the dead man held the fragments of a small bottle which had been crushed under him as he fell; in the other, a crumpled sheet of rich paper.

Lawson took the paper gently from his cold fingers and held it under the gas. He started back when he saw what it was, for it was one of his own wedding-cards.

His hand trembled, and the paper fluttered to the floor.

"Dick!" he whispered hoarsely, touching the body with his foot and springing back in horror again at his own action. "Dick, get up! Why didn't you tell me who it was? How could I know? I did not mean —— Dick, I say! Dick! Oh, Heaven! He is dead, and I——"

He passed his hand quickly over his own white, wet face, and sank down, overcome with his feelings.

For Richard Morrison's earnest time had come—and gone!

M. E. R.

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIAL. START TO-DAY.

Held Apart

The Story of a Strange Double Fraud and its Influence upon some Young Hearts, a Great Name, and a Famous Fortune.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Author of "The Golden Dwarf," "A Daughter of Mystery," etc.

THE FIRST CHAPTERS.

Moira Davenal is sitting in the little cottage on Groudle Quay busy with her ribbon work. Sir Guy Vanbrugh is talking to her.

"Moira, I love you so much," he says. "Won't you——"

He pauses. There is a heavy step in the hallway of the cottage, and a burly figure enters the room.

"Good evening, Mr. Davenal. I'm off to London for the week-end and was just leaving a message for you with your daughter. How goes on the task of raising the Sylph?"

"I've found the last hole, Sir Guy," says John Davenal, who is a diver engaged in raising Sir Gu 's yacht. "She'll soon be afloat."

After Sir Guy has gone a sailor appears at the door singing in drunken tones the scrap of a chorus:

"Give my love to Nancy, the girl that I adore,
Tell her that she'll never see her—her sailor any more."

The diver rises to his feet.

"Hullo, Hartigan!" he remarks loudly. "Glad to see you. Come in and make yourself comfortable."

While Moira goes out on an errand a conversation takes place between the two men, from which it appears that Moira is really Hartigan's daughter.

The sailor—who is a ship's steward—sits back in his chair and begins to sing again the drunken chorus.

He halts abruptly, for the door slowly opens, and a blind woman comes in.

Dennis Hartigan recognises her as his sister Kate. She tells her brother that she heard the song he was singing—sung in just the same way—once when she was sitting on a breakwater at Groudle. She also adds that the man who was singing said, evidently to someone with him: "This is out far enough. In with it;" after which there was a splash.

Hannah Davenal (Hartigan's wife and the diver's sister) is maid to Lady Tarleton. She is possessed of a secret with which she continually blackmails her mistress.

One afternoon Lady Tarleton and Hannah Davenal go down to Groudle Tower, and together they make a mysterious journey at midnight.

Two mornings later Hannah is found dead in bed, a towel smelling of chloroform is on her face, and over that a pillow on which are some dirty finger marks.

The police are informed of the tragedy, and Detective Sergeant Ussher is sent from Scotland Yard to investigate the affair.

Edward Stormont, the owner of Groudle Tower, and Lady Tarleton's brother-in-law, now arrives at Groudle with his friend Paul Jerome, a war-correspondent, and the following day Irene Tarleton comes in response to her mother's summons.

Dennis Hartigan is arrested on suspicion of causing his wife's death, but is soon released. He has a mysterious conversation with Lady Tarleton regarding a child.

"If—if the child were no longer in my path," Lady Tarleton murmurs, "I would give ten thousand pounds—to the man who told me so. Think it well over."

"I will, my lady," Hartigan answers.

On his way back to Groudle Tower Hartigan encounters his sister Kate. They return by way of the level-crossing. A train is in sight, rounding the curve. Dennis leaves his blind sister standing in between the metals along which the train is coming. She is rescued just in time by Paul Jerome, who is out riding. He leaps one gate, picks Kate up, and then leaps the other gate.

After leaving Kate in safety Jerome comes up with Hartigan, and tells him that he saw all that happened, and leaves him with a warning.

Lady Tarleton discovers that her daughter is very friendly with Jerome, and takes her to task about it. She wants Irene to marry Sir Guy and does not know that they have each agreed to go their own way.

Davenal and Hartigan go for a walk on Groudle Quay, where they have a heated and rather unfriendly conversation regarding Moira. They part and Hartigan hurries on. He hides behind a fence near Davenal's cottage and when the latter comes along stabs him in the back.

Guy Vanbrugh goes down to Hawthorn Cottage to see the diver, not knowing that he has been murderously attacked. He tries to comfort Moira and takes her in his arms.

Suddenly the wicket-latch clicks, and Moira looks up. It is too late. Lady Tarleton, pausing on the threshold of Hawthorn Cottage, has glanced into the small entrance hall, and perceives none other than Sir Guy Vanbrugh with a fair and ruffled head pillowed on his breast.

Digitized by Google

FOURTEENTH CHAPTER.

Guy Vanbrugh is Detected.

Blushing painfully, Moira released herself and stepped back. The new-comer put up a tortoiseshell-rimmed lorgnette, and regarded her with a penetrating stare, whose affectation of indolent disdain could not conceal its ferocity. Lady Tarleton's glance travelled to her nephew, and her lip curled in a coarse, though subtle sneer.

Guy Vanbrugh had coloured slightly. He drew himself up to the full height of an athletic five-feet ten and squared his young shoulders. A proud, if somewhat embarrassed smile flickered about his mouth. Lady Tarleton was the first to break the silence. Conspicuously ignoring Guy Vanbrugh, she addressed herself to Moira.

"I am sorry to interrupt your philanderings, my good girl," she remarked, with a brutal self-possession, "but I understand that some persons named Davenal live here. I am Lady Tarleton."

Moira retreated to the rear of the little hall.

"Will you come in, please?" she said nervously.

Guy Vanbrugh opened the inner door, Kit had gone out of the room, and the pleasant, simple apartment was empty.

"Allow me, aunt," he interpolated deftly, as Lady Tarleton swept by him, "to make you acquainted with Miss Moira Davenal. She is the daughter of my friend, John Davenal, and is to honour me by becoming something more than a friend. Moira, my aunt; aunt, my future wife."

Lady Tarleton struggled for breath—her nephew's swift, cool candour had taken her off her guard. The blush that had begun to fade from Moira's cheeks returned to them. But she looked up at Guy Vanbrugh and her eyes shone with a soft, sweet confidence in him. He had met the situation in a fashion befitting a gentleman and a loyal lover.

"This is scarcely the time," he went on calmly, "I should have chosen to take anyone, even yourself, aunt, into what has been hitherto rather a secret. But I cannot allow you, for a moment, to think that Miss Davenal would permit me to indulge in an aimless and, indeed, dishonourable flirtation."

A shrill little peal of laughter burst from Lady Tarleton's full white throat.

"Oh, my dear Guy," she exclaimed, "how picturesque you are, and how seriously one takes these things at your age. But, I assure you, I am quite discreet, and if worldly wisdom should prove in the end stronger than youthful romance, why I shall not have mentioned your—your flirtation, as you call it, to a soul."

Guy Vanbrugh forced a smile, but his expression had darkened.

"I should prefer that you had received my explanation in a less jesting spirit, aunt," he replied; "but Miss Davenal will, I hope, not need to be told that you are rather fond of banter, even of a somewhat cynical order."

Moira's nostrils contracted, and she lifted her delicate eyebrows. But otherwise she made no response to her lover's tactful observation.

"Won't you sit down, Lady Tarleton?" she suggested, and indicated, with an almost disdainful gesture, the high-backed, cushioned chair that was the diver's favourite seat; "no doubt you called upon some matter of business, my Aunt Hannah was your maid, I believe?"

Lady Tarleton put up her lorgnette once more. She was no mean judge of character, and there was a ring in the refined though girlish tones, which told her that Moira Davenal was a cultivated and intelligent woman. She shrugged her shoulders.

"Quite so," she said, sinking into the chair; "I had no idea that my visit would result in surprising so highly romantic a secret. My object, Miss Davenal, was simply to inquire after your father. Your aunt was really a most deserving person and her shocking death touched me deeply."

The speaker coughed and glanced around her with an air of supercilious toleration.

"I need not say," she continued, "how grieved I was to hear that a murderous attack had been also made on your father. The chief of the detectives, it seems, fancies there may be somebody who had a grudge against both your father and my poor Davenal. It is very sad, very."

She yawned behind her tightly-fitting slate-grey glove.

"And so," she said, "as I had to drive into Groudle for the inquest, I thought I would call and ask how your father is, and if I could do anything for you in your great trouble. I trust both yourself and my dear Guy here will forgive me my unintentional intrusion. You really made a most charming picture—quite idyllic."

Guy Vanbrugh laid a hand on Moira's brown fingers—they were resting on the edge of the plain serge tablecloth. It was as if he were seeking to fortify her against the mocking politeness of Lady Tarleton. Moira withdrew her hand. There was something in the latter's insolent regard that made her lover's caress distasteful to her.

"My father is very ill indeed, Lady Tarleton," she said, with grave courtesy; "it was kind of you to think of us. But we want for nothing, thank you very much all the same."

Lady Tarleton looked at the tiny bracelet watch on her wrist, folded her lorgnette, and rose.

"Not at all," she answered. "I hope your father may do well. And now you may show me to my carriage, Guy; it will give you an opportunity to assure me that you bear no malice."

She dropped Moira a bow of amused patronage, and took her departure. Guy Vanbrugh escorted her out of the cottage, and, notwithstanding her intimation, put her into her victoria without remark. He was silent, almost repellant. Lady Tarleton tapped him with her lorgnette.

"Guy," she murmured, "what an awful mistake you are making. You poor boy, how you will regret it one of these days. Yet there, all you men are alike where a pretty face is concerned. That is, till the gilt is off the gingerbread. However, if you should come to your senses in time, remember that I am your friend, and, especially, that I shall not breathe a word of this—to Irene."

She motioned to the footman and the victoria was whirled away before he could reply. Under cover of her parasol, Lady Tarleton glanced back, and saw that he was just entering the gate of Hawthorn Cottage.

"The fool!" she said, "the hot-headed young fool! But at least I know—my Lady Bountiful call has, indeed, served me better than I meant."

She relapsed into thought, playing with the thick gold ring of her parasol.

"The girl is dangerously pretty," she muttered, "and even more dangerously clever. I—I wonder who she reminds me of."

Lady Tarleton pondered irritably as the carriage rolled through the irregular, sunny streets of Groudle, to the weather-beaten, grey stucco block of public offices where was to be held the inquiry into the death of her murdered maid.

FIFTEENTH CHAPTER.

"I Promise, Guy, Dear."

"You must forgive me blurting it out quite so theatrically, my darling, but really it was the only thing to do."

Digitized by Google

Moira turned from the window of the cottage. Sheltered by one of its looped muslin curtains, she had been watching the departure of Lady Tarleton's victoria. Guy Vanbrugh crossed the room, drew her from the casement, and put an arm about her.

"I feel as though you had really become mine, now, dear," he said; "I ought to have spoken to your father myself and at once. Nothing but vexation can spring out of secrecy in an engagement such as——" He stopped awkwardly. Moira winced.

"Such as ours," she concluded; "that was what you were going to say, wasn't it? I am beginning to feel that ours isn't the ordinary sort of—of engagement. I'm not quite sure that it is the right sort."

Guy Vanbrugh started.

"Moira!" he said; "you don't—you can't mean——"

Moira shivered.

"That woman," she answered slowly, "pities and laughs at you, and sneers at and despises me. Are all your friends going to do the same?"

"Heaven forbid!" cried her lover. "Lady Tarleton is simply a disappointed matchmaker. If she had had her way she would have married me to her daughter Irene and spoilt four lives in doing it. For if I have given you my heart, I'll be sworn Irene has given hers to Paul Jerome—a fine fellow, who, because he is merely a war-correspondent and was once a newspaper reporter, Lady T. will consider as much out of Irene's station as, in her opinion, be it understood, you are out of mine."

He put a gentle hand under her firm little chin, and compelled her to look up into his face. The tears flooded to her blue eyes.

"Moira," he said, "are you going to turn coward because a soulless, money-worshipping dowager spits at you the characteristic venom of her species? My dear child, you will have dozens of such creatures fawning on you for a dinner or a dance card as soon as you are Lady Vanbrugh. I took you for a clear-headed little woman, surely you are not going to be frightened of that arrant humbug, 'Society's verdict'?"

The strong, yet masculine fingers held her remorselessly, and Guy Vanbrugh's gaze seemed to probe the very depths of her being. She shook her head mutely—she could not speak. He was mastering her by sheer force of his fearless man's will, and she, woman like, was happy that it should be so. He stooped and kissed her, lip to lip.

"We two against the world, dear," he murmured, "for the best and rarest thing in it—true love. Swear it, my darling, or bid me go—go because you are only a weak woman and must needs yield one triumph the more to the old and evil system which sells human hearts over the golden counter of Society."

Moira buried her face on his breast, overcome by the sudden, if somewhat melodramatic, eloquence that love had lent the reserved young Englishman.

"Oh, I promise, Guy, dear," she faltered; "but if I am ever really certain that I am not making you happy, or that, after all, I am not a fit wife for you, I shall go away and hide myself where you will never, never find me."

"And where will that be?" demanded her lover gravely.

Moira choked back her emotion.

"I—I don't know," she stammered, trying to speak lightly; "but I shall know then."

Guy Vanbrugh studied her.

"You are very proud, my darling," he said, "and yet I like you for it. Well, and now that momentous question is settled, what am I going to do about rendering this engagement of ours decorously public?

"I have told Lady Tarleton, it is true, and indeed she ought to be the most suitable person to tell, yet she is scarcely likely to deal with the information in a fashion satisfactory to us. You see, I have so few women relatives; until I set eyes on you and discovered how much I liked Groudle, the Close, like the Tower, was in the hands of servants. All I did was to use it as a shooting-box."

He reflected, but Moira intervened hastily.

"Oh, please," she begged, "don't do anything, or say anything, till I can tell father. He—he will feel it terribly, my leaving him—I know he will—and I want to break it to him myself before he hears it from anyone else."

"Then we will allow matters to remain just where they are," said Guy Vanbrugh, "until Mr. Davenal gets better, or until——"

Moira checked him with an impulsive motion.

"Don't!" she gasped—"don't! I can't bear to think of that; he—he must get better—he must! Oh, why should anybody have wanted to hurt him; why would anybody want him to die?"

Guy Vanbrugh sought to comfort her.

"It is a terrible riddle, my darling," he said, "but we must hope for the best—we will hope for the best."

A footstep sounded on the staircase that gave access to the floor above, and the door from the small hall-way of the cottage whined. The lovers moved apart, and the blind girl reentered the room.

"Moira," she observed, "your father has been asking for you once or twice. He is asleep now, but nurse says if you will go and sit by him so that he can see you when he wakes, it may excite him less than having you sent for."

"Then I will not keep you another moment, Miss Davenal," said Guy Vanbrugh formally.

He stopped, remembering that it must be ten minutes or more since he had bidden farewell to Moira in the hearing of Kate Hartigan. However, there was no opening for him to an explanation, and he could not be sure that it would be advisable to volunteer one.

The blind girl impressed him as being an extremely shrewd little personage. He pressed Moira's hand, looked the adieu he did not speak, and went away abruptly, letting himself out.

The blind girl knitted her brows as the door closed behind him.

"So he didn't go," she said.

Moira replied in the negative.

"Lady Tarleton called," she added evasively—"Aunt Hannah's mistress, from the Tower, to ask if there was anything that could be done for father. Sir Guy knew her and came back with her. But she did not stay long."

"Oh," remarked Kit drily.

Moira hesitated, as if she were inclined to investigate the reason for the odd inflection of the blind girl's voice. Her hesitation terminated in inaction, so far as Kit was concerned. She stepped towards the stairs and stole noiselessly up them to reach the wounded man's chamber.

Kit opened the front door of the cottage, and, passing out into the garden, stood suddenly still. The sunbeams shone warmly upon her childish, tear-stained countenance, and the sea-breeze stirred her clustering brown curls. Kate Hartigan was a creature of the open-air, and now, after the long and sleepless night that had followed the mysterious attack upon the master of Hawthorn Cottage, she sought in it refreshment and consolation.

Digitized by Google

As she stood there motionless in an ecstasy of sorrowful silence, the beat of iron-shod hoofs rang upon the cobble-stones of the neighbouring quay. It was not the uneven clatter of the draught-horse's clumsy feet, but the quick, rhythmic walk of well-bred, well-broken animals.

The hoof-beats ceased, there was a pause, and the gate-latch clicked. Paul Jerome, giving his reins, with a laughing apology, to Irene Tarleton, had leapt from the saddle of the white hunter and entered the wooden wicket. He approached the blind girl, speaking as he came that he might not startle her.

"Well," he said cheerfully, "and how is Miss Hartigan? None the worse for her adventure at the crossing, I trust."

Kit took an impulsive step in the direction of his voice.

"Oh!" she exclaimed, "I am glad to see you again." The war-correspondent noticed that, from force of habit, she said the same phrase as a "sighted" person would have done.

"I happened to be riding by," he answered, observing with a new interest, the sensitive, petulant features of the blind girl, "and saw you standing in the sunshine. So I thought I would inquire after Mr. Davenal. He and I met up at the Tower the other day and I was extremely sorry to hear this morning that he had been seriously wounded."

Kate Hartigan's lips trembled.

"Yes," she faltered, "they found him last night lying at the gate there. Someone had stabbed him in the back as he came in at it, the doctor says. He is a little better now, the nurse thinks, but he is very ill."

"Poor fellow!" said Paul Jerome, and added, still fixing his keen, bright eyes on the blind girl's face, "I should not have thought him the sort of man to have enemies—and he had not been robbed, I hear, so the deed must have been dictated by motives of revenge or hate."

"We—we think," murmured Kit, "that perhaps he was mistaken for someone else. But it all happened so quickly. He had gone out for a walk with my brother, who left him to go home to his lodgings, and it was not an hour after they left here together that he was brought in bleeding to death."

The war-correspondent frowned reflectively and looked over his shoulder at Irene Tarleton. She was watching them curiously from her seat on a tall brown mare, half saddle, half carriage horse, one of the single pair kept at the Tower stables.

"If—if only Dennis had not left him," went on Kit, unconscious of his inattention; "but there, I daresay he would have run away from the wretch with the knife, as he did from the train at the crossing."

An odd expression flitted across Paul Jerome's shrewd countenance.

"You are hard on your brother," he said.

Kit sneered.

"I hate a man to be a coward!" she retorted. "Why should Dennis be one—he is big and strong? You are brave."

"I am used to exciting situations, if that is what you mean," responded the war-correspondent; "courage is often only a kind of use."

He hesitated and glanced again towards Irene; the brown mare was pawing the cobblestones restlessly. Kit moved towards the gate.

"You have your horse with you," she cried childishly; "do let me pet him a little. He is brave, too, and clever, or you would have been killed by the engine as well as me."

The war-correspondent held the wicket open for her, and, following her through, took the bridle of the white hunter and drew him to the kerb for the blind girl to caress.

"This is the young lady who figured in my adventure, Miss Tarleton," he remarked; "safe and sound, as you perceive."

Irene Tarleton scanned pityingly the pale face and sightless eyes.

"I am very glad to know that you came to no harm," she said, stooping from her saddle to speak to the blind girl; "won't you tell me how it was—Mr. Jerome is too modest to describe his own exploits."

Kit had been listening intently to the clear, sympathetic tones—"seeing with one's ears," as it has been called. Her absorbed expression relaxed; she was satisfied.

"It was very dangerous, miss," she answered; "the train was almost on me when he jumped the crossing-gates on this dear old horse and picked me up like a dropped handkerchief. When I came to my senses, miss—for I had fainted with the fright of it all—I was in the lane on the other side of the crossing, and him trying to bring me out of my faint."

Irene shuddered.

"What a fearful experience!" she murmured. "You must be more careful of the trains in future."

The blind girl shrugged her shoulders.

"Oh, yes, miss," she said drily, "I'll be more careful, you can be sure of that."

She patted the white hunter's sleek withers.

"Good-bye, you big, brave thing!" she exclaimed, and stepped back to the wicket; there had been a pause and her instinct had told her one or other, if not both, of the riders, was anxious to be gone.

Paul Jerome sprang to his saddle.

"Good-bye," he said to her. "I will bring him to see you again one of these days. I shall want to know for myself how Mr. Davenal goes on."

"Good-bye," added Irene; "and do be careful of that terrible level-crossing, won't you."

Kit nodded and smiled as they rode away. A groom who had been waiting at a neighbouring corner walked his horse leisurely after them. When the three had turned away from the sea-front and were ascending the hill towards the Tower, Irene spoke.

"Mr. Jerome," she said, "I do think it was fine of you to risk your life like that. You ought to have the V.C."

"Nonsense!" replied the war-correspondent, "it was very easy. But even if it had been really difficult I should be more than repaid by a word of praise—however undeserved—from you."

Irene coloured and laughed. The white hunter had swerved under Paul Jerome's knee, and the war-correspondent was riding very close to her. She glanced back.

"You do flatter most delightfully," she rejoined; "but pray don't forget that I have a chaperon."

"The dickens take that groom!" exclaimed the war-correspondent.

"Poor man!" said Irene. "No, let us send him to——"

"Where?" asked Paul Jerome eagerly.

Irene regarded him with demure self-possession.

"To my aunt in Yorkshire," she retorted provokingly, and shook the brown mare into a trot.

The war-correspondent surrendered to her mood of coquetry. After all, Lady Tarleton's threat of banishment might have been no idle one, and, though few would have suspected it, the war-correspondent was, by nature, a deliberate person.

Also, at the back of his head, Paul Jerome was thinking of Kit Hartigan's words: "He went out for a walk with my brother." "He" was John Davenal, and now John Davenal, stabbed through the lung, was lying at the point of death. "He went out with my brother." And "my brother" was Dennis Hartigan—the man who had left his blind sister on the railway crossing to die.

Digitized by Google

SIXTEENTH CHAPTER.

"You are My Dear Father."

In his small, white-curtained bedroom at Hawthorn Cottage, John Davenal lay asleep. The holland blind was lowered to shut out the rays of the sun, and the wounded man's pillow was darkened by the shadow of a tall screen placed between it and the casement. But the window was open, and the sound of the still-flowing tide came in with the salt sea-air.

The diver breathed, even in his sleep, with painful quickness. His body had been sorely drained of blood, and the stout heart in his broad and heaving chest fought hard to keep circulating what was left in the depleted veins.

Moira, sitting by the fireside, listened with an anxious intentness to the tell-tale respirations.

The nurse, standing by the window, listened also, but with the quiet self-possession that comes of a long intimacy with the mysterious powers displayed by life in its battle with death. She was a pleasant, pink-cheeked Englishwoman, with the bright, yet gentle demeanour of her class.

Suddenly John Davenal's breathing changed, and he opened his eyes. In his blanched face their grave, grey pupils gleamed as they fell upon the golden head at his side. He lay motionless for a moment, and then spoke, faintly, unsteadily.

"Is that you, Moira?" he whispered.

Moira leant over him.

"Yes, dad," she answered.

John Davenal moved his head on the pillow. The nurse had come softly to the foot of the bed; the diver turned his gaze upon her.

"You might let us be awhile," he said; "I've a word to say to my lass here."

The nurse hesitated—it was alike dangerous to thwart or to indulge him.

"You ought not to talk," she said, reprovingly; "but if you will promise me not to sit up and to stop the minute I come back, I will do as you wish."

John Davenal smiled weakly.

"I'm obliged to you, nurse," he said. "I can't rest until I've settled something with Moira, but she'll not let me be foolish, will you, my lass?"

Moira shook her head, and the nurse slipped away.

The diver moved slightly on his pillow again, and his glance sought the old-fashioned bureau near him.

"Open yon," he murmured; "in the well in the middle of the desk, there's something flat and three-cornered, wrapped in paper. Fetch it, just as it is. My keys are on the dressing-table—I had them put where I could see them."

Moira obeyed, and, unlocking the upper "drawer" of the ancient piece of furniture, gained access to the inner recesses of the concealed "desk." She found the packet he had referred to, and brought it to the bedside. The diver looked from it to her and his blanched skin grew ruddy with the spasm of emotion that thrilled him.

"My lass," he faltered, "doctor says I'm not to excite myself, and I'll not, for I want to live, if it's to be Heaven's will. But I've a strange thing to tell thee." He relapsed into a broader dialect than that which he ordinarily employed. "Thou'rt my daughter in love and in duty, but not in blood. I've deceived thee all these years. It was for thy own good and happiness, lass, yet haply thou'lt find it hard to forgive me."

His grey eyes suffused with tears and Moira saw them. The throb of surprise that had stung her died away, she sank on her knees by the bed, took his hand in hers, and put her cheek to it.

"Dad," she murmured, "dear, dear dad, I have nothing to forgive. What does it matter? Real fathers are often not kind, and you have been, oh, so good to me always. You are my dear father in the very best way. I couldn't love you any better if you were my real father. Don't think about it any more until you get well, and then, if you want to, you shall tell me the rest."

John Davenal clasped the little fingers that were caressing his own.

"My heart's light to hear you speak like that," he said; "it's cut me to the quick often to think you weren't my own child, and I, all the time, willing to give everything in the world to have you so."

"You were very foolish, dad, dear," whispered Moira, "and now not another word, or nurse will be very cross."

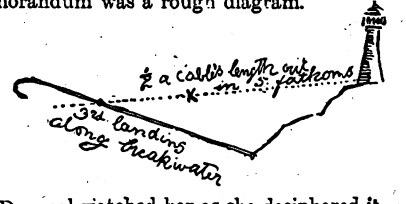
The diver knitted his brows.

"I must tell thee more, my lass," he said; "much more, but first look in the paper you have there."

Moira did so. In the folded white sheet there lay the fragment of engraved metal that the diver had brought out of Groudle Bay.

She gazed with astonishment at the flat, irregular triangle, with its imperfect wording. There was her own name, and—lacking the dates which should have followed them—the strange syllables—"Born" and "Died."

On a flap of the paper was written, in the diver's bold hand, "Brought up off the breakwater in Groudle Bay." Below this memorandum was a rough diagram.



John Davenal watched her as she deciphered it.

"Those are the bearings of the place I brought it up at," he said. "At first I thought nothing of it, and yet I hid it from my men lest they should talk, and, knowing you weren't my own child, I was nervous. But now the thought of it's come back to me, and I'm not sure that it mayn't mean something—something to you, my lass."

Moira studied the fragment of metal, fascinated by the blurred letters that spelt her own name. The diver studied her, almost jealously aware of her interest in it.

"It's—it's a bit of a coffin-plate," he gasped; "if—if only I had got the other half of it! Yon piece was caught in a niche of the rock under the yacht's bow, and I plucked it out more by chance than anything else. The other bit might have told us what I'd have been glad to know, now I lie here, lass, for I'd fain believe that he who calls himself so was not your father—you being what you are, and him what he is, a wastrel and a blackguard."

The diver's utterance had quickened excitedly; it grew thick and indistinct, then failed altogether, and his eyes closed. Alarmed, Moira stole to the door. The nurse was already entering. A glance at Moira's face, and she passed her quickly to gain the bedside. John Davenal had re-opened his eyes; they sought for Moira.

"You have been talking quite long enough, Mr. Davenal," said the nurse, quietly and soothingly, "not another word. Moira must run away for the present. She can come again later on."

John Davenal's gaze travelled to the unfolded paper on the bed and the piece of metal that lay by it. Moira understood his meaning and took them up. The nurse wiped the beaded sweat from the wounded man's forehead, and Moira,—thus temporarily screened—crept out of the room.

Digitized by Google

Her brain was numb with the amazement that had fallen on her at John Davenal's strange and all too incomplete confession. She paused to gaze at the broken metal. "Moira"—who? And yet it could not be she, for she was not dead, and the plate said, "Died ——" What else could the diver—her father no longer—have to tell her? Would he live to tell it to her?

SEVENTEENTH CHAPTER.

What Paul Jerome Saw.

"No, I think we'll get ashore now, my venerable friend. I have emptied the sandwich-box, you have accounted for the whisky and water and are half a hundredweight of codling to the good besides. I have to get up to the Tower and dress before seven. It is after six, and we shall have to dodge in against what wind there is."

"Aye, aye, sir, you're right about that," was the cheery reply, and the speaker—a grizzled Groudle veteran—threw down the hooks and sinker that he had been about to overhaul, and stepped to the stern sheets of the broad-beamed fishing-coble in which the war-correspondent and he had been beating along the rocky fringes of Groudle Head.

Paul Jerome moved to the tiller, and brought the heavy boat up into the wind. The fisherman loosed the sheet of the foresail, and pushed the boom of the mainsail over. The boat gybed and began to beat back towards the little town.

The light was fading, and the green waters of the Irish Sea shimmered under the dull yellow sunset; the irregular puffs of air that eddied across them impelled the fishing-coble slowly towards her goal.

Rounding the bluff promontory, on whose seaward slope stood the tall tower of the Groudle Light, the little vessel made for the harbour. The fitful breeze was blowing off the land, and they were able to hug the shore. All was singularly quiet and lonely, the bay was destitute of shipping, and the granite walls of the pier and breakwater shut in the activities of the harbour.

The fishing-coble breasted her way across the triangular bit of sea that lay between the breakwater and the promontory above. Suddenly the boatman uttered an exclamation—right before them lay a large smack, her mainsail apeak, her anchor down.

"That's odd, sir," he said; "there's diving going on there again, where Sir Guy Vanbrugh's yacht sank. It was only the other day that they got her up and took her into the harbour."

He eased the mainsheet of the coble, and she kept out to pass the other vessel. The little craft forged slowly by the larger, and Paul Jerome got on his feet to look at the group in the waist of the smack. The helmet of the diver had been unscrewed—a rough sailor-like fellow in a sou'-wester was just lifting it off.

The war-correspondent started—the head of the diver was that of a young and lovely woman, whose masses of fair hair rained over her shoulders as she stood shrinkingly in the clumsy diving-dress.

(Another long instalment next week.)

WIFE: "Are you pleased with our new maid?" Husband: "Very much." Wife: "I thought so. I have discharged her."

"MISS CAYENNE is a very smart young woman," he remarked admiringly. "Does she say clever things?" "Better than that. She sees the point when somebody else says them."

GUSHLEY: "Would you think of me if I were ten thousand leagues away?" His Fiancée (from College): "As the maximum diameter of the earth is only eight thousand miles, Clarence, your supposition is an impossible one."

Your Editor Chats.

THE third list of sentences in our popular and novel competition appears on page 455. Any reader who has not made up his mind until now to enter it can obtain the issues of Short Stories dated March 28th and April 4th, which contain the first two lists, by sending threepence in stamps to the "Publisher, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, London, W.C." It will be well to send at once in order to prevent disappointment in case the numbers are sold out earlier than is expected. The first list of sentences was also published in Pearson's Weekly and Home Notes, both dated April 2nd. The lists in these papers are available for the competition.

If you have any friends who are not regular readers of Short Stories, and whom you think may perhaps have missed the numbers containing the first lists of sentences in the competition, you should not delay a moment in telling them of it. The finding of the names of the railway stations will be such a pleasant occupation for the Easter holiday evenings.

THE reproductions of picturesque men's heads, about which I told you a few weeks back, will be found on various pages of this paper. I shall be glad to hear what my readers think of them, and whether they would like me to try to secure some others for reproduction on a future occasion.

I TAKE this opportunity of reminding my readers of the article on the FRESH AIR FUND, which was published last week. I hope that everyone read it and will do all they can to help on this noble work of brightening the lives of the poor little mites from the slums. It is not London alone that is benefited, but most of the other large towns in the kingdom.

If you are not able to afford a large donation out of your own pocket, perhaps you can get up a concert or entertainment of some sort, hold a bazaar, or by some other means raise money for this most deserving cause. Remember that every penny of the money subscribed is spent on the children—in railway fares and food. All the expenses of management are shared by the Ragged School Union and C. Arthur Pearson, Limited.

Last year 126,000 children had a day in the country; this year it is hoped to send many more than that, but it will not be possible to do so unless everyone helps. Think of it! Only ninepence is required to provide enjoyment for one child for a whole day, with plenty to eat and drink. Such a cheap charity is absolutely unique. All subscriptions, which will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly, should be sent to the Hon. Secretary, FRESH AIR FUND, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W. C., who will also forward collecting sheets on application.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

THREE LETTERS.

Telling of a Proposal and its Businesslike Acceptance.

YOUNG Mr. Dusenberry asked Miss Lucretia Elphinstone to marry him. Miss Elphinstone was the daughter of a candidate for Parliament, and shared her father's cautious nature. She told her lover that she would consider his proposal, and send her answer in a few days. Within a week the young man received the following letter:

MR. THOMAS DUSENBERRY,

Dear Sir,—On last Thursday night you notified me that I had been honoured with the nomination of queen of your heart and wife of your bosom, and you urged me to accept. I replied then that I would let you know my decision in a few days. I have now the pleasure of informing you that I accept the nomination, and of setting forth the programme of principles upon which I stand.

I unhesitatingly arraign and condemn the practice of too many men in doing all their love-making before marriage. I shall expect as much kissing and petting after the honeymoon wanes as while it is at its full.

My position on the tobacco question you already know. It is most pronounced. The drawing-room curtains must and shall be protected from the fumes of a pipe and cigar.

I am unalterably opposed to the free and unlimited coinage of excuses for remaining out late at night. The latch-key is an article so liable to misuse that the only safety is the entire abolishment of that cause of so many domestic disagreements.

I believe in the utmost freedom of the wife in regard to her own actions, and unhesitatingly assert that every husband should esteem it a privilege to supply her with the necessary funds, not only for housekeeping, but also for the purchase of articles of apparel and adornment, for religious and charitable uses, and for pin-money. It should never be necessary for the wife to ask her husband for money. He should turn over to her, on salary day, his entire receipts, deducting only the small portion required by him for 'bus fares and lunches for the current week.

It is the wife's privilege to invite her mother to make visits of any length, and also to extend occasional invitations to other members of her family, without waiting for the consent of her husband, and it is the duty of the husband to treat such relatives of his wife, while under their roof, with profound consideration.

The wife's right to maintain and keep a pug-dog shall not be impugned by deed, word, look, or manner.

Hoping that these sound principles will meet with your chearful acceptance, and that our married life, conducted under their beneficent influence, will be a long and happy one, I have the honour to subscribe myself.—Your loving fiancée,

LUCRETIA ELPHINSTONE.

DUSENBERRY'S REPLY.

MISS LUCRETIA ELPHINSTONE,

Dear Madam,—Your reply to my proposal of marriage was received yesterday. I did not answer it immediately, because its somewhat unconventional style seemed to require some deeper consideration than is usually accorded to a letter accepting a proposal of marriage.

I have considered your programme clause by clause, and I find it extremely difficult to bring myself to accept its principles with the same earnestness with which you seem to have formulated them.

I have no objection whatever to your first clause. Married men should continue their love-making after marriage with the fervour which marked the engagement stage. The honeymoon should be kept constantly full.

Your position on the tobacco question is too pronounced. I do not think that a wife should entertain for her drawing-room curtains a deeper affection than for her husband.

On the question of latch-keys, my position, though different, is as fixed as your own, and cannot be altered. The right of a husband to have a latch-key must and shall be maintained.

Regarding the financial system you declare yourself in favour of, I have only to say that it can have no place in the domestic government of this age. My wife shall be supplied with all the money she can reasonably want for all proper purposes, but no self-respecting husband can hand over to her his entire salary, "deducting only the small portion required by him for 'bus fares and lunches for the current week."

Your views regarding your mother's visits and the proper treatment of your relatives when they call are approved without reservation.

I now reach the final and exceedingly important pug-dog clause. On this point we are at irrevocable variance. Since you have raised this pug-dog issue, I feel it incumbent upon me to meet it squarely. I quote your declaration of principles on this important question. You say: "The wife's right to maintain and keep a pug-dog shall not be impugned by deed, word, look, or manner." Permit me to say that you speak of a "right" which does not exist.

I cannot endure the steady company of an animal whose only recommendation is his ugliness, whose chief characteristics are stupidity and perversity. Your devotion to Cæsar marks you as a double-hearted girl. One lobe may beat for me, but the other beats for him. This I cannot endure. I will brook no rival at my altar. The other clauses in your programme to which I have taken exception are matters of moment, but the pug-dog question is the rock on which we split, and which must separate us.—Yours very truly, THOMAS DUSENBERRY.

A day or two later Mr. Dusenberry received the following letter:

MR. THOMAS DUSENBERRY.

Dear Tom,—The pug has been drowned. Come and see me to-night.—Your loving LUCRETIA.

The engagement of Mr. Thomas Dusenberry and Miss Lucretia Elphinstone was announced within three days of the receipt of the last note.

A. E. Porson.

Digitized by Google

In Love With a Name.

The Story of a Woman's Ideal.

"You won't go, then, although I have secured seats?"

"No; I had rather not."

"Well, I can't make it out! You have always been so enthusiastic about the man; while I know that you have a special hiding-place among your treasures for Neil Stuart's photo."

"Now you are rude! Of course I appreciate the trouble you have taken in the matter; Mr. Stuart as 'Millionaire Midas' is also, I admit, a tempting inducement; but—I have my reasons for not going."

"Then there is an end of it!—though you are certainly missing a good thing, and Neil Stuart himself saw to the selection of the seats; the best in the house."

"That was very good of him," said Evelyn Hood, with a pleased smile, and flushing ever so slightly, "I was not aware that you knew Mr. Stuart personally."

"Know Stuart!—why, I am vain enough to think, that if there is one man in all the world who has succeeded in getting behind the curtain of Neil Stuart's reserve, I am that man!"

"Really, Wallace! and—and what have you found?"

"Ah! now she wakes to life! this emotionless fair one! What have I found? why, a heart as big and as true, as ever beat in the breast of man!"

"I knew it!" said Evelyn, half under her breath; yet not so quietly but that Wallace Rayne caught the exclamation.

"Knew it! why you have never spoken to him! never even seen him act!"

"Yes—I know!" she said in some confusion; "and—and you are too quick to take me up, Wallace; but it is a little strange, that my estimate of Neil Stuart, formed only from hearsay, reading, and pictures of him; and yours, founded on personal knowledge, should agree so completely."

"I suppose it is. But I tell you what it is, Evelyn!" he half jokingly added; "if this sort of thing continues, I shall begin to be a little jealous of Stuart. Only that I know him to be a thorough woman-hater, and that, therefore, the chances of the sweet girl adorer are absolutely hopeless, I should fear for my own matrimonial prospects, Evelyn; I should indeed."

"Wallace!—you are just horrid!" said Evelyn, an angry red spot showing on either cheek; "you had better take Cora Holroyd with you to the theatre to-night; there will be no need for fear, with regard to your matrimonial prospects in that direction!"

"Perhaps you are right!" replied Rayne hotly. "Still, I am not disposed to adopt your suggestion, for the simple reason (here he took an envelope from his pocket, which first deliberately tearing into half a dozen pieces, he dropped into the fire by which they were standing) that the tickets no longer exist."

* * * * * *

Evelyn Hood and Wallace Rayne had been an engaged couple for some two years before Neil Stuart, the actor from the North, had by his wonderful playing of the title rôle in his own play, Millionaire Midas, revealed to Londoners that a dramatic star, of the very first order, had risen above the theatrical horizon.

Young Rayne, a Foreign Office clerk, while being hot-tempered and a trifle overbearing, was not by any means a bad fellow at heart. At any rate, until about three months before the conversation above between them, Evelyn regarded him as the beau ideal of what a husband should be.

They were both of them passionately fond of the "play," and devoted "first-nighters."

Perhaps had Wallace Rayne been a little more reasonable when his fiancée decided not to attend the opening night of Millionaire Midas; and, instead of expressing sullen surprise, good-humouredly looked upon it as a whim merely, he would have been saved much trouble in the future. But he was one of those men who, offence once given, neither forgive nor forget, until the offence is purged. So, knowing Evelyn's admiration for the famous actor (admiration in his opinion, absurd, seeing that she had never seen Neil Stuart in the flesh), he never ceased in his endeavour to lure her to witness the piece and the man; his last persuasive being a box from the hand of the actor himself. When even this had no effect he lost control of himself; his thoughts inclining to an insane, unreasoning jealousy.

Long before Neil Stuart's London appearance, the public had been well-informed through the Press of almost every detail in his career. Portraits without number had appeared in the illustrated weeklies, and in the current monthly magazines, so that the theatrically-disposed were made familiar, not only with the actor's history, but with his features.

Now this so-called history was defective in one very important particular; the private side of it—Neil Stuart's life off the stage—was absolutely unknown, except to the very few. At the close of each performance, he left the theatre, immediately after changing his costume, and no man, save his business manager, and two intimate friends (of whom Wallace Rayne was one), knew the place of his abode, or his manner of life.

His somewhat sad cast of countenance, spare, almost emaciated frame, and ascetic features, gave rise to many stories concerning him, which, manifestly, were impudent fabrications.

It was impossible to get an interview with him for journalistic purposes, both before and subsequent to his coming to London, so that popular impression of him was based solely on imagination, and was consequently erroneous.

Evelyn Hood was a girl with the imaginative faculty very strongly developed. The preliminary puffs and obviously mendacious accounts of the coming star had no effect upon her; but, after reading a clever appreciation of the actor in the part he had made his own; and studying the features of the man, through a photograph given to her by Wallace Rayne, she gradually began to build up in her own mind a conception of him; to set up an ideal, as utterly unlike the literary and journalistic portrait as possible.

Digitized by Google

By the time that the curtain was ready to rise on the Metropolitan production of Millionaire Midas, the ideal had become the hero, and, dreading disillusionment, she would not risk it by coming face to face with the object of her strange worship.

She loved her betrothed; was hurt at his new tone and manner, after her final refusal to accompany him to the theatre; but she somehow felt that, given the realisation of her "ideal," the parting with the original man of her choice, would not mean for her much "sweet sorrow."

Mention has been made of Cora Holroyd, who posed as Evelyn's bosom friend and confidant, but who was in reality her ever-scheming rival.

People wondered at the long intimacy between the two girls; at, what they called, Evelyn's shortsightedness in failing to see Cora's persistent policy of standing well in the eyes of Wallace Rayne.

But, whatever might be the latter's mistaken idea with regard to Evelyn, he was certainly guiltless of any tender feeling in connection with Cora Holroyd. That designing young woman was in the nature of his bête noire, so much so, indeed, that he was always on the defensive when opportunity threw them together.

Time went on and at the end of nine months, Millionaire Midas was at its zenith, artistically as well as financially. But the lease of the theatre being up, and no other house being available, the production had perforce to be withdrawn in the very heyday of success.

At midnight after the last performance, Rayne sat at supper with Neil Stuart in a private room at the Carlton.

It was by way of a farewell feast, as the actor was to leave London for the North the following morning.

"Rayne," said the player, with a weariness born of a long run, and the exigencies of a trying part; "I should like to have seen your wife that is to be, before I left. You know London will not see me again for nearly two years; perhaps never; for life is so uncertain, isn't it?"

"I suppose it is," answered Rayne.

"We know it is! But, tell me, what is Miss Hood's reason for refusing either to meet me, or to see me act?"

"My dear Stuart! you are as wise as I. But if you don't mind, we will change the subject."

Neil Stuart was a man of over forty, and with a larger experience in matters of the heart than most people gave him credit for.

Years before, when but a novice, and with all his triumphs to come, he had met with and loved a girl, who seemingly returned his love, and in whom he placed his faith, even to the uttermost.

As an actress she had talent, some said genius, and this in time led her up the professional primrose-way.

Even this would not have divided them; for though more slowly, as surely he too advanced towards the coveted tree-top. But there came along the inevitable man with the money bags, the illiterate plutocrat, who purchases his wife as he would any other marketable article, and with the giving of the receipt Neil Stuart's life-dream of love and happiness vanished for ever.

Not naturally given to suspicions or unkind thoughts of his fellow creatures, he rigidly kept aloof from society, burying himself, in the intervals of theatrical engagement, in the heart of the ruggedest part of Sutherlandshire. Here he had what had once been a shooting-box, but which he had converted into a comfortable, if not luxurious home.

On the loch, near his home, he had a steam yacht, and as the loch communicated with the sea, he was enabled to gratify his taste for cruising, without taking anyone into his confidence.

He was a solitary man; a man who, outside his profession, lived a veritable hermit's life.

In the neighbourhood of his retreat he was simply worshipped; the distinguished actor, who, having the world at his feet, declined response to its advances, being scarce recognisable in the tweed-clothed, homely-mannered gentleman who made friends with the poorest on the country side.

He was rich—very rich, and was never so happy as when helping his poorer brethren who needed his assistance.

His last word to Wallace Rayne as be bid him "good-night" at parting, showed that the matter of Evelyn's strange attitude towards him, was still uppermost in his thoughts, as an unsolved riddle.

"My dear fellow!" he said, placing both hands on his friend's shoulders; "I feel sure that for some inexplicable reason, you and your sweetheart are drifting apart. Am I right?"

"You are more than right. Six months ago—in fact, almost from the day you sent that box—Evelyn joined the nursing fraternity. Three years ago, she served her probation; not from necessity, but because, I believe, she liked nursing. Now, it is different, she has definitely adopted the profession, and we are no longer as we were."

"I am sorry," said the actor, sighing deeply, as at some new-stirred memory; "and I can only sincerely wish, for both your sakes, that it were otherwise. You are coming to my Highland home to see me, you know, and I shall expect then to hear that all is well. Again, good-night, and—good bye."

* * * * *

Next morning all London was startled to read that Neil Stuart, who, the night before, had spoken his farewell acknowledgments to an enthusiastic and crowded audience, was lying, the victim of a terrible carriage accident, in one of the surgical wards of Charing Cross Hospital.

It appeared that on leaving the hotel, the carriage went up the Haymarket, turned to the left at the top, and made to cross Piccadilly Circus, in the direction of Regent Street.

Half-way across, a motor-car, driven at high speed, and evidently by incapable hands, bore down upon the brougham, which, unable to escape collision, was literally smashed to splinters.

The horse was killed on the spot; though the coachman miraculously escaped; but the unfortunate actor received injuries that made it doubtful whether he would survive removal to the hospital.

Wallace Rayne's first action upon hearing of the catastrophe, was to drive to Charing Cross.

He could only make inquiries; no one was as yet allowed to see the patient.

He learnt that Neil Stuart's condition was so grave that it was advisable that his friends should be sent for. And then a fresh surprise was sprung upon everybody.

The famous actor and dramatist, the wealthy man, had not a relative in the world. Rayne knew this, and communicated his knowledge to the hospital authorities.

There was nothing then, than for his friend to be allowed to see him.

As Rayne entered the ward, which was a small and semi-private one, he saw that the doctors had just left the injured man, leaving a nurse in charge.

The latter's back was towards the visitor, but something about the height, figure, and poise of the head, made him start with a sense of familiarity.

The sound of his footsteps caused the nurse to turn her head. It was Evelyn!—who motioned to him with finger on lip.

"He will not be able to recognise anybody for at least another hour; and, perhaps, not even then," she whispered to him.

The drawn, ascetic face, looked death-like, in its unearthly pallor; it seemed almost impossible that Neil Stuart would live to act again.

Through that day Evelyn Hood watched the flicker back to consciousness, when she sought rest for an hour or two.

When, the next morning, she stood by the bedside, with Wallace Rayne near by, the sick man looked first at his friend and then at her, a half smile upon his face.

Digitized by Google

"I know you," he said faintly; "you are Rayne's dear love—I have wanted much to see you, and—I am glad."

* * * * *

It was fully three weeks before Neil Stuart was fit to leave the hospital.

It was in the morning, early; but the previous day he had sent for Rayne to come and see him.

"What will you give me," said the actor; "if I give you back something, which, I think, you value very highly?"

"I don't quite follow you," replied Rayne.

"No?—well, what would you say then, if I have discovered why the girl of your heart has acted so mysteriously these past few months?"

"I don't know," said Rayne, who, however, began dimly to see what the other was driving at.

"Ah! It's not a pleasant thing to have to confess, but I'm afraid that this foolish little woman, to whose good nursing, by the way, I owe my life, full of romantic notions, fell in love, not with my humble self, but with my photographic presentment. I came to this conclusion, after much artful talk with Miss Evelyn, and yesterday, by way of atonement and reparation for having been the innocent cause of strife between you, I painted for the young lady such a terrible picture of myself, in even my mildest moods, that she fairly threw the whole thing overboard."

"But, Stuart——"

"Wait a moment! I once suffered by the cherishing of an ideal; I was not going to see my friend's happiness, and a charming girl's best interests wrecked upon the rocks in like fashion, if I could help it."

"Stuart, I told her long ago that you were the best of good fellows!"

"Did you?—then you have only yourself to blame for a big part of the mischief. However, I don't intend to always play the beast to your prince, and when you are married beyond redemption, shall do my best to disabuse your wife's mind of all uncanny things concerning myself. Meanwhile, you resume your part, and play it for all it is worth, while I, in the Fairy Queen, seek health and strength sailing the Mediterranean."

* * * * *

Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Rayne not only six months ago, paid a visit to the Sutherlandshire actor-hermit, but the latter is pledged, on her wifely honour, to be present at the forthcoming reappearance of Neil Stuart in London, in a new piece of his own, which is expected to take the town by storm.

Ralph Edwards.

THE GRAND HOLIDAY NUMBER of The Big Budget contains many screamingly funny comic pages beautifully and artistically printed in six colours. Some of the drawings are by Yorick, F. Opper, R. Dirks, the Wilkinsons, and other well-known artists. And there are besides two thrilling complete stories and long instalments of UNIQUE SERIALS.

These are "The Syndicate of Death," a story of Britain's Alien Peril. "For King or Kaiser?" telling of Prussian University and Military Life. "The Adventures of Captain Kettle Junior," the smartest yarn ever penned of a School at Sea, and one by Mr. Henry Farmer, author of "Fettered Lives."

This magnificent Double Number of The Big Budget is now on sale at all newsagents and bookstalls.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE FOLLY OF FATNESS.

A Pleasant Permanent Cure.

To remain in a condition of physical deformity—for extreme obesity is a deformity—not to speak of the excessive discomfort, is very unwise when the means of a speedy, pleasant, and entirely permanent cure are ready to hand. The person labouring under a burden of superabundant fat also runs considerable risk of fatty degeneration of the vital organs, which might ultimately prove fatal. The means to which we have alluded is the famous "Russell" treatment for the cure of corpulency, a sure and safe treatment which has received the full endorsement of many eminent physicians as a rational and scientific process of fat reduction, harmless even to the most delicate subject. The "Russell" treatment, by a simple and quite comfortable action, brings about a decrease in weight varying from ½lb. to 2lb. per diem, commencing within the first day and night of the initial dose, and this decrease goes on steadily apace until the patient regains his or her proper symmetrical proportions. Mark this, too: The reduction is not merely abdominal, but the subcutaneous fat of the whole organism is proportionately reduced. Face, figure, hands, feet—wherever there is a superabundance of adipose tissue—every part is equally affected by the "Russell" treatment, and this without the slightest discomfort or inconvenience. Many processes of fat reduction require the most exhausting and unpleasant restrictions and conditions: violent exercise, sweating, a continuous use of cathartics, and a starvation dietary. None of these things enter into the "Russell" régime. The liquid compound, which is the chief item in the process, is a harmless vegetable preparation, not disagreeable to the taste, but, on the contrary, very refreshing and thirst-assuaging. It contains nothing that is not purely herbal, and, indeed, Mr. F. Cecil Russell, the originator of the system which bears his name, has given to the world in his well-known book, "Corpulency and the Cure," a full list of the ingredients of which his wonderful preparation is compounded; this is chiefly to demonstrate its entirely harmless nature. The compound is a tonic and an appetiser, as well as a potent fat-reducer, so that while the decrease of adipose tissue is proceeding rapidly the appetite is improved, more nourishment is taken, the blood is enriched, and all the vital organs receive renewed vitality and functional activity, the clogging fat around the heart, kidneys, etc., being gradually cleared away and eliminated from the system. We have perused "Corpulency and the Cure" with the greatest interest, and strongly recommend our stout readers to do the same. It is certainly the standard work on the subject of obesity cure, and contains many useful hints which may prove of great value even to those who might be disinclined to follow Mr. Russell's simple and admirable course of treatment. "Corpulency and the Cure" is the vade mecum of the stout, and the outcome of more than twenty years' scientific research. In short, what the author does not know about the formation and the elimination of fat is not worth knowing. If any of our corpulent friends are desirous of becoming authorities on the cure—i.e., the permanent cure—of obesity, let them send three penny stamps to Mr. F. Cecil Russell, Woburn House, Store St., Bedford Sq., London, W.C., and they will receive by return, under private cover, a copy of "Corpulency and the Cure" (256 pp.)—one of the most useful publications ever noticed in these columns.

Digitized by Google

The Old and the New.

OR, AN ALTERED ENDING.

THERE was a block in the vehicular traffic, and several persons were waiting on the kerb for a chance to cross the road. One was a woman of thirty or thereabouts, whose countenance still showed signs of the beauty that had belonged to it when the woman had been a girl; that face also exhibited traces of deep suffering—mental rather than physical suffering. Near her, but unconscious of her presence, stood two young men, watching impatiently for a chance to dodge under the head of a horse and reach the other side.

"I say, Clark," remarked one of them suddenly to the other, "don't you think it would be a good idea to offer good remuneration to the man in the street or the woman at home to tell his or her life story, provided that it contains romance? I've a good mind to suggest that to the chief. He wants good stories, and the best are those taken from life. Truth is stranger than fiction."

"You might have omitted the last sentence and have made a more original observation!" laughed his companion. "Don't fancy that your idea will work. You see, if you advertise, the advertisement will reach the eyes of only a few who have a really good story to tell, and only a small percentage of those will care to tell it. A few guineas will not tempt them. The very people you wish to get at are just those who don't read the journals and newspapers, because they can't afford to take them in."

"I don't agree with you altogether. I think—— Hallo! Here's a chance at last! Quick!"

The woman saw them make a dive, as it were, and they had vanished. She could not cross so quickly, so she remained standing on the kerb; and she continued in that position long after the traffic had cleared.

She had heard the remarks of the young men, who were apparently members of the staff of some weekly journal. Write her life story, if there were romance in it! Romance? There was more than enough for one; she felt that she had had more than her share. Write for money? Could she do that? Could she lay bare the story of her girlhood—for money?

"No, no!" she cried at length, with a shudder. "I want money, badly enough, and the 'few guineas' of which that young man seemed to speak so lightly would be a small fortune to me, but I can't do it!"

She went on her way to the firm which gave her work to do in the form of painting slides for magic lanterns. She handed in the work which she was carrying, and was told that the half-crown earned thereby would be paid on Saturday at the usual hour. No, there was nothing more just then; there was not much doing just at that time.

She returned to her attic room in the dingy street. The squalor of the neighbourhood made her shudder. Her own room was scrupulously clean but contained very little furniture. She sat down on the wooden chair by the deal table near the window and meditated.

Steadily increasing poverty had driven her from one place to another, always lower; she had been compelled to sell the piano because pupils did not come in sufficient numerical strength to enable her to live and pay the rent in a good neighbourhood, and she was now reduced almost to want. Her rent for this room was in arrears and food had been scanty of late.

"Why should I not write it?" she cried, after a long silence, and there was a ring of bitterness in her voice. "I want money; I want it badly! There is only one person left in the world who would recognise it, if it met his eyes, but he went to Australia, and it isn't likely that he will see it! Shall I? Yes, I will!"

From a little shelf within her reach she took a penny bottle of black ink and a pen, then a small packet of notepaper. She opened some of the doubled sheets of paper in order to obtain a size which, she thought, would be nearer to that used in newspaper offices, and seized the pen nervously.

"Shall I tell my own story in the first person—shall it be 'I' all the way through? Yes, I can write it better, more naturally, in that way. I must leave the title till the last; I can't think of one just now."

Another moment of hesitation, and then she began to write; after the first few lines she forgot that she was writing for money—she was writing a confession. She lost all thought of her surroundings and lived the story over again:

"My father was a village squire, a man of means and local position, and with good connections in London. I was his darling, and he would have done anything for me. I had all I wanted and my life was a happy dream.

"People said I was pretty, and my father's sister, who had married Lord Rutcliffe, and was one of the leaders of London Society, said that I ought to be presented. My dear father, always desirous to make the most of me, consented to my going to stay with her and 'coming out.'

"I was nearly eighteen, and, although perfectly happy and contented where I was, the novelty of the proposal attracted me. In due course I prepared to go, and it was not till then that a drop of the bitter fell into the cup of sweetness. I saw the look of sadness in Clive's eyes, and I was sorry.

"I had forgotten Clive Wilson. We had been companions since childhood, and it was quite understood that we were to marry as soon as I was old enough. Clive was three years older than I. It was one of those family arrangements which everyone, even the two most interested parties, accept as a matter of course. And, strange as it may appear, it was so much a matter of course that we almost lost sight of the fact!

"Clive did not like my going to London and joining the fashionable element, but I only laughed at him and called him a foolish boy.

"'Anyone would think I was going away for good!' I cried. 'I shall come back to father and you!'

"Clive still looked gloomy, but I was really too much occupied with my preparations to pay attention to him. I dismissed him from my presence and then from my mind, and began to live, as I imagined it would be, the life I was to lead in London Society.

Digitized by Google

"I suppose I did see Clive again; I have a hazy idea that he was at the station to see me off; but I cannot remember distinctly. I was in a whirl.

"I stayed with my aunt till the great day, when I was presented and 'came out.' My father returned to the Hall, and left me to the care of his sister.

"I was very little more than an unsophisticated country girl, and my aunt was unaccustomed to the care of young girls, not having children of her own. Lord Rutcliffe was a prominent figure in clubland, and the numerous guests whom he invited to his town house were not always fit companions for a girl. There were numerous parties and functions at my aunt's house, and my life seemed to be passed in a continuous round of pleasure. I was dazed and taken out of myself.

"One constant visitor was Albert Glover, who paid me the most marked attention; he was reputed to be a man of wealth, and he certainly belonged to a good family. Looking back, I see that my aunt was not careful enough, and she herself admitted it sorrowfully when it was too late. Albert fascinated me; his passionate declarations made me captive, and left me without so much as a desire to keep from him. In short, when I left the metropolis to spend the off season with my father at the old home, I was engaged to Albert Glover, and wore his diamond betrothal ring on the third finger of my left hand.

"'My dear child,' cried my father, as he helped me to alight from the train. His voice faltered and he pretended to be busy with some wraps. 'Clive is not here,' he added, 'but he expects to be with us to-morrow. You know that he has secured a very good appointment in Manchester?'

"I remembered having heard something about it, but I said nothing, for the mention of his name there, in the old place, recalled the fact of the life-long engagement. I went away engaged to Clive, and I had returned as the promised bride of another man! It had only happened two days ago, and my father knew nothing of it.

"My father caught sight of the ring almost as soon as I took my gloves off. He thought that Clive had given it to me and when I told him the truth he looked grave.

"'I hope you have chosen well, Allie, and my only desire is for your happiness,' he said gently, 'but it will be a blow to Clive. Didn't you like him well enough to marry him?'

"'Yes, I think so!' I faltered. 'That is, I—— Oh, I'm so wretched! I was mad!' And I burst into a fit of weeping.

"Truly, it was a sorry home-coming!

"When I came down on the following morning, I was not wearing Albert's ring. It galled me like a fetter, and I was glad to lay it aside, but the chief reason for doing so was—I dared not let Clive see it.

"He came that afternoon—Clive Wilson, with his honest, manly face and truthful eyes; not the gay Society man, with his exaggerated phrases and compliments, his talk of merely empty functions and theatres, but plain, sterling manners and straightforward conversation. When I contrasted him with Albert Glover, my eyes were opened, and I wondered how I could have remained so long in ignorance of Clive's worth, how I could so easily have been taken captive by Albert. I almost trembled when I thought of the ring upstairs.

"Clive spoke to me in the old way; he made no allusion to my engagement to him, but all his attention implied that it was still in force. I began to detest Albert Glover, and I determined to tell him the truth, and break off the new engagement at once. I was realising, too, the advisability of being off with the old love before I was on with the new.

"That night I wrote to Albert and returned the ring; I told him that it was like a fetter, that I could not bear to be bound by it, and that I had deceived him, for I was already engaged to Clive Wilson. I felt light-hearted when I had sent that letter off, but it was only the beginning of my trouble. I did not

A Great Australian Discovery.

Australia, that mysterious country of gold, has been the birth place of many wonderful things. Foremost amongst them is the discovery by an eminent scientist of a natural vegetable substance which acts more beneficially upon the liver and digestive system than any medicine yet discovered. Chas. Forde, the discoverer of this substance, had long been impressed with the remarkable freedom from disease of the Australian natives.

On this subject the great Captain Cook wrote: "I did not observe (amongst the natives) any appearance of disease or bodily complaint or eruption of the skin. Very old men without hair and teeth showed no signs of decrepitude and were full of vivacity." There must be some reason for this, and Chas. Forde, armed with the implements of modern scientific research, sought for that reason amongst the rich profusion of Australian herbs which had been the sole medicines of the natives. After years of research he found himself the happy discoverer of a vegetable substance which acted on the liver and digestive organs differently and in superior manner to any medicine known. The best laboratories, the most modern appliances, and all that science dictated as being best for the purpose was requisitioned in the compounding of this substance into convenient medicinal form; and the result of it all was the production a few years back of Chas. Forde's Bile Beans—the most perfect medicine of modern times.

On their appearance, Bile Beans — the product of modern science—had to compete against the ancient and imperfect medicines which had been before the public for nearly half a century, but the public soon decided in their favour, and Bile Beans are now the most widely used family medicine; over three-quarters of a million doses being taken daily.

The superiority of Bile Beans lies in the fact that they do not merely purge, giving temporary relief only, like the old-fashioned, so-called remedies of forty or fifty years ago. They act directly on the liver and digestive organs, strengthening and stimulating those organs to perform their natural duties. They produce a gentle action on the bowels, curing or preventing constipation, cleansing the stomach and ridding the system of all impurities.

Do not be misled by claims of half a hundred pills in the box, where probably four to six constitutes a dose, and the doses cannot be discontinued. One Bile Bean is one dose, and they can be discontinued after the cure is effected. They are purely vegetable; they contain no harmful drugs, and they are the safest family medicine. Of all chemists at 1s. 1½d. or 2s. 9d. per box.

SULPHOLINE LOTION.

For clearing the Skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%

The Birkbeck Almanack, with full particulars, post free

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

Digitized by Google

know the evil heart of Albert Glover; as yet I knew only his handsome face and honeyed tongue.

"Clive had to be off again at the end of three days, and on the fourth day Albert was announced. Although he tried to hide it, there was an evil gleam in his eyes that was apparent to me.

"'What is the meaning of that letter?' he asked coolly. 'I decline to give you up! You are mine, and although you may say differently, you know that you are mine, and mine only. You think that you love this man, but it is wrong! You love me!' He took me in his arms, and, pressing me passionately to his breast, he gazed deep into my eyes, as if he would penetrate to my very soul. "You love me!" he added. 'Deny it, if you can!'

"I tried to get free, to tell him that I loved Clive, but I seemed powerless in his grasp. His eyes still fixed on mine; holding me spellbound, he approached his lips to mine, and kissed me again and again. And I, poor bird, under the fascination of the serpent, I kissed him in return!

"I scarcely know what happened, but when I felt thoroughly able to realise the position Albert was gone, and I was wearing his ring. I remember staring at it stupidly; then I uttered a cry, and dragged it off my finger. My strength came back; I seemed to have suddenly become possessed of a will, a woman's will, and I resolved to free myself from the terrible fascination of this man.

"I wrote to him again, and he came to me two days later.

"'You shall not marry Clive Wilson!' he declared as soon as he saw me, and without even a greeting. 'You will marry me at once, or you will rue it! Look!'

"He took a bill from his pocket and unfolded it. I had seen a similar bill outside a London police station; it was a notice to the effect that a man named Clive Wilson was wanted on a charge of forgery; he had absconded, and his description was published—not exactly accurate, but sufficiently so to convince me that it was my Clive. He next showed me a newspaper cutting, giving particulars of the crime, and making a statement that left no doubt that it was my Clive who was meant. I felt the room going round, and Albert held me to prevent me from falling.

"'You have played with me, Alice Harland,' he cried. 'but I am not to be played with. I know where this lover of yours is, and if you do not consent to marry me immediately and by special license, I will set the officers of the law on him! Choose!'

"I chose to marry Albert Glover in order to save my beloved; I sacrificed myself for him, and as soon as it could be arranged I married Albert, comforting myself in my misery by the thought that I was a martyr for Clive's sake. I wondered how he could have fallen so low as to become a felon, and yet I felt that if I had had the chance, I would have flown with him to a new country to begin life afresh.

"My married life was unhappy. For a time Albert treated me kindly, but his love soon wore away. I found that he was really possessed of very moderate means, and had expected to make a brilliant match in marrying me, fancying that I should inherit a lot of money from father, and come into all my aunt's money. Alas! He had not long to wait in order to be undeceived. My father died within a year, and it was found that the property was mortgaged up to the hilt; in fact, when all was cleared off, there was nothing for me. Father, it seems, had counted on my making a good match with Clive Wilson, whose position was likely to improve as time went on. As for my aunt's money, she had speculated with it and lost it; she told me quite frankly one day, when discussing the position at the Hall after my father's death, that she had no money, and that Lord Rutcliffe would leave his to his own people.

"From that moment Albert Glover neglected me; he turned gambler to make a living, and there were times even then when I was not certain of a meal, although he usually 'made' enough to keep a fairly good house going. The life was distasteful to me, but I had become his wife and I did my duty.

"He died, and I was left alone in the world, my well-meaning but careless aunt having followed my father. Since then, I have eked out a living somehow, sinking lower and lower in poverty, despite my strenuous efforts, till I am now reduced to write the wretched story of my life in the hope of earning money for bread!

"What became of Clive Wilson? Someone told me that he was in Australia, whither he had gone on learning of my marriage; but that cannot be for he must have run away before he knew of it, in his endeavour to escape the consequences of his act."

Her story was finished, and Alice Glover laid aside her pen with a sigh. She had written feverishly, and the effort had exhausted her. She would not trust herself to read it through either to detect mistakes or to see if the style was suited to the journal to which she intended to take it. She carefully tied it up, after having written a note to the editor, and having addressed an envelope for the return of the MS. if unsuitable. Then, to spare expense, she walked to the office of the journal and dropped it into the letter box.

She waited anxiously for the result. The idea opened a new field of work; if accepted, she might gain a footing there, and write other stories, not so true, perhaps. Those who would read her true story would believe it to be fiction, so she might as well write fiction another time.

Nearly a week passed before she received a letter from the office; it was an ordinary envelope, so her MS. was not rejected. Perhaps it contained a cheque. She opened it with trembling hands; the editor would like to see her concerning her story, and he named the time.

She went to the office and was shown into the great man's room. He was seated with his back to her, and it occurred to Alice that this was an awkward position for him, and that he would be better if his desk faced the other way. She walked up to him, and waited for him to turn round.

The editor rose, taking up her MS. as he did so, but not turning to face her.

"This story is a good one," he said slowly, "and it interests me greatly, Mrs. Glover, but I should prefer a happier ending."

"It is a real story, sir," she faltered, "and in real life things do not always end happily."

"They do sometimes, Alice," he cried in an altered voice, facing her abruptly, "and if that is the explanation, then it can end happily!"

"Clive!" she gasped. "I thought you——"

"That man played us both false, Alice," said he sadly. "I never committed such a crime, and that bill and newspaper cutting were printed by him expressly to deceive you. He must also have written the letter which I received from you, saying that you no longer cared for me, and asking me to release you and go abroad, so that we might never meet! I went to Australia, where I became a journalist, and a year ago I came back and accepted the editorship of this journal. Alice, I have never ceased to love you. Is it possible for us to make this story end happily? Do you love me still?"

"Oh, Clive, my love!"

He clasped her in his arms, and she nestled against the breast of her real lover.

George Day.

EVERY AMATEUR GARDENER SHOULD PROCURE

Small Gardens

And How to Make the Most of Them.

By VIOLET BIDDLE.

Price 1s.

This handbook teems with information, hints and wrinkles invaluable to amateur gardeners.

At all Booksellers, or Post Free on receipt of 1s. 2d. from The Book Publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Alarming Medical Report on Deafness.

THE reports of three different authorities, including one from a Government expert, lately published in a medical journal, show that deafness prevails among school children to an alarming extent; in fact, that more than one-half have defective hearing and ear diseases. It is most important, therefore, that parents should be aroused to their responsibility in this matter, as attention to an ear trouble in childhood would prevent the development of obstinate deafness later in life.

To aid in educating people to the dangers of neglecting ear affections, a London Medical Institute has published a pamphlet containing much interesting information on the subject. The question of hygiene is well treated, and there is an article on the different systems commonly used in the treatment of ear, nose, and throat diseases. There is also a description of the new treatment, based on outward applications behind the ears, acting by absorption through the skin. This treatment, which can be applied at home, is said to have wrought cures in a large number of cases previously supposed to be hopeless.

Persons having children whose hearing is defective, or who are affected themselves, should write for this pamphlet which is distributed or forwarded gratis. The address is, The Secretary of the Drouet Institute for the Deaf, 10 Marble Arch, Hyde Park, London. A patient's Report Form is also issued to those who may wish to write for advice, for which no fee is charged if given by correspondence. Whenever possible, those who seek advice for deafness or ear, nose, and throat ailments should visit the Institute for a personal Consultation with the Medical Staff. Consultation hours are, weekday mornings, ten to twelve; afternoons, two to four. For personal Consultations a small fee of 5s. is charged.

GIVEN AWAY
with this week's
HOME NOTES
(No. 482.)

PAPER PATTERN of this
Boy's Coat and Knickers.
Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.
PRICE ONE PENNY.

MACKINTOSH'S
Is DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!
PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.
A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.
EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

BORAX
Starch Glaze.
Certain success
crowns the efforts of the Laundress when Borax Starch Glaze is in the starch. All the trouble that discourages comes from the endeavour to get satisfactory results with starch alone—an absolutely impossible task.
There is no need to suffer future irritation and disappointment.
A penny packet of Borax Starch Glaze, which is good for several ironings, will enable even the inexperienced to produce the finest laundry finish at home in an easy and pleasurable manner.
Nothing else can give that finish.
That's why Borax Starch Glaze is so popular.
Every Grocer and Oilman in your town sells it.

Facsimile Packet.

FREE SAMPLE PACKET AND SOME NOVELTIES if you name this paper and your grocer.
BY SPECIAL APPOINTMENT MAKERS TO THE KING.
The Patent Borax Co. Ltd., Birmingham

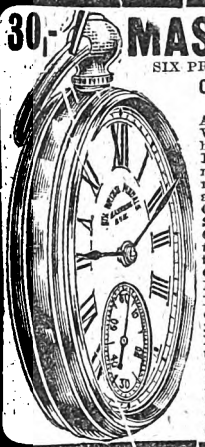
Headache
Kaputine cures the most obstinate Headache or Neuralgic Pains in ten minutes. Is the only preparation of its kind having the confidence and recommendation of Medical Men.
Kaputine THE SAFE REMEDY
Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., says:
There can be no hesitation on the part of anyone suffering from Neuralgic troubles to employ Kaputine—the safe remedy.
The only remedy of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and Infirmaries.
Packets of 18 doses 1s.
KAPUTINE LTD., HUDDERSFIELD.
Neuralgia

Digitized by Google

30/- MASTERS'

SIX PRIZE MEDAL

CAPPED LEVER WATCH.



A most compact Watch, fitted with high-class Jewelled Lever movement, covered with removable Dust-and-Damp Proof Cap, extra heavy Solid Silver Cases. Warranted an accurate timekeeper. Strong Crystal Glass Front. Nett Price 27/- cash. Or supplied for 30/- on our monthly payment system. First send 2/6, and 30/- watch will be sent you. If satisfactory, send 2/6 on receipt, and 5/- a month till paid for.

Large . . .
Illustrated .
Catalogue . .
Post Free . .

MASTERS'

New Design

CUCKOO CLOCK.

18/- on Credit. 3/- First Payment

CUCKOO! CUCKOO!!

"How sweetly the Cuckoo is calling!"

A beautiful Cuckoo Clock, carved light oak case, 13½in. high, accurate timekeeper, and the Cuckoo over the dial sings out "Cuckoo!" once for one o'clock, twice for two o'clock, etc. Price 16s. Cash, or on easy terms.

Sent to any address on receipt of Postal Order value 3/-

If approved of send 3s. a month for 5 months, or you may send 16s. (cash price), and have the Clock on approval. If not satisfactory, we will refund your money in full if Clock is returned at once.

Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Rings, etc., Post Free.

MASTERS ltd., 157 HIGH STREET, RYE, ENG.,

"NO BETTER FOOD."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's

Pure Concentrated

Cocoa.

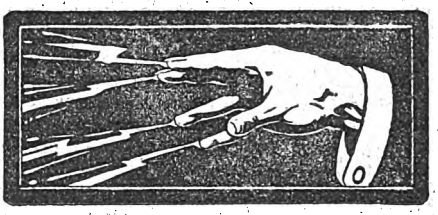
300 GOLD MEDALS, ETC.

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its

ABSOLUTE PURITY.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—Sold only in tins with gilt top.

HYPNOTISM



PERSONAL MAGNETISM

Can you hypnotise? Can you exercise that strange influence, known as personal magnetism? Would you like to know more about these things? Then write to our London Office for the wonderful little illustrated FREE BOOK, "The Power Within."

This little book deals with the most interesting and important subject in the world—the influence of the mind upon human life, health and affairs.

How to use the mind power, or mental magnetism, to attract friendship and success, to break up depressing conditions and influences, to hypnotise, to maintain health, to kill fear and nervousness, to develop a strong, magnetic, attractive personality—these things are what investigators have been lately working upon.

In the free book, above mentioned, they tell you of their fascinating work and how you can reap the benefit of it. This little book is a brilliant suggestion to those who are groping in the dark for something practical and tangible in occultism.

Thousands of people have been delighted with the work of these men. Glowing testimonials come in every day's mail. Are you going to let this valuable opportunity pass? The book is free for the asking. We give it away because we want to arouse a popular interest in up-to-date psychic literature, publishing which is our speciality. Please do not ask for it unless you are sincerely interested. Address (enclosing 1d. stamp for return postage),

PSYCHIC RESEARCH CO. (Dept. 437),
Temple Chambers, Temple Ave, London, E.C.

Knew the Symptoms.

"You're a nice little boy, Tommy," said Mr. Newman. "That's what they all say when they first meet sister," Tommy remarked.

Sure to Catch It.

"Only ten minutes before my train goes! Can I ever catch it?" exclaimed a pretty girl, flying downstairs. "Just imagine it's a man, and you'll catch it," called the crusty old bachelor after her.

Gave the Show Away.

Miss Gushington: "I admit, Arthur, that this is not the first time I have been engaged, but I'm sure your noble, generous heart——" Little Brother: "Sis, the baby's got your bunch of engagement rings."

Such a Coarse Girl!

George: "You do not call on Miss Rosebud now?" Jack: "No, I got disgusted. She has such a coarse laugh." George: "I never noticed that." Jack: "You would if you'd been within hearing when I proposed to her."

Only the Bric-a-brac!

Algernon (making a call): "What are these noises I hear, Miss Maud?" Miss Maud (whose mother is vindictively making a wholly unnecessary noise in washing the dishes): "It's dear mamma. She dearly loves to sort over the bric-à-brac."

The Cheek Remained.

Her head had dropped upon his shoulder. "If only," he whispered, "thy cheek could remain there for ever." Little thought he what was to be. Little thought he until he got home and tried to remove the cheek from his dress coat with ammonia and alcohol.

Was It the Dye?

Mrs. Youngwife: "Just think, Harry, all our chickens died to-day." Harry: "Is that so? What ailed them?" Mrs. Y.: "I'm sure I don't now. It's a great disappointment to me, too, for I had fed them with different coloured dyes so they would lay Easter eggs."

No Light Affection for Her.

"I do love you, Mabel! You know it is 'in the Spring a young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of love.'" "So I thought. No, Mr. Brown; no light Spring business for me! I want the honest affection that shows itself in the Autumn, when the theatres and concerts commence. Good-bye, Mr. Brown."

Not Possible.

"I see by the paper," said Mrs. Hicks, "that you can buy a sealskin from the Esquimaux for two iron hoops and a tenpenny nail." "Very true," returned Hicks; "but I can't spare the time to take the hoops and the nail to the Esquimaux, and my bank wouldn't honour a cheque for two hoops and a tenpenny nail, so I don't see how we are benefited by that state of affairs."

Held a Better Hand Then.

She (half suspiciously): "Did you ever hold a hand that you would like to hold better than mine?" He: "Only once, darling. Then I went nap."

Bad Signs.

Mrs. Oldfidget is much worried about her daughter. The other night she kissed her, and the young lady murmured in her sleep: "Oh, Charlie, you've shaved off your moustache!"

Proof of It.

Country Lover: "Do you really love me, Jane?" Jane (impatiently): "Goodness me! You know well enough I do. Do you s'pose I would have lent you a shilling last summer to put on a 'hoss' race if I didn't?"

Hard Luck!

Photographer: "Can you assume a more pleasant expression than that? Just think of your best girl a few minutes." Young Man (sadly): "It wouldn't do any good. She refused me about a week ago."

The Right Expression.

Stage Manager: "You do not inject enough contempt, spite, and venom into that word." Actress: "I can do no better." Stage Manager: "Nonsense! Speak it just as you say 'plush,' when you meet a rival in a sealskin jacket."

The Horrid Man!

She: "No, thank you; I don't care to know him. He is a most detestable person." He: "There must be some mistake. Everybody speaks well of him." She: "I don't care. He was one of the judges at the dog show, and he wouldn't give poor little Fido a prize."

Something Like It.

Her fiancé (who has not known her very long, and is inclined to be jealous): "Er—er—Clara, dear, did you ever have a—er—er—an experience like this before?" Clara (innocently—she was sitting on his knee): "Well, George, I once sat on the top rail of a fence."

Sweet Innocence.

He had just bought a few acres in the country and proposed to set himself up as a gentleman farmer. "Well, Ethel, I am going over to old Mossback's this morning to buy a cow that will give good milk." "Yes, we want good milk, Charles; and we also want a cow that will give good cream."

Didn't Want to Marry Her.

She: "It is useless to urge me to marry you. When I say no, I mean no." He: "Always?" She: "Invariably." He: "And can nothing ever change your determination when you once make up your mind?" She: "Absolutely nothing." He: "Well, I wouldn't care to marry a woman like that."

Misunderstood Her Remark.

"Yes," said Mrs. Catchem, "those are my daughters over there on the sofa. They have half a million between them." It was not until they were married to those daughters that the young men who overheard the remark found out that Mrs. Catchem referred to the rich old man who sat on the sofa between the girls.

Dictated With His Arm.

Doctor: "From the condition of your hand and arm, I should say you are suffering from writers' cramp—too much exercise of one set of muscles." Young Business Man: "But I never write. I employ a typine." Doctor: "Um—engaged to her?" Young Business Man: "Yes." Doctor: "Do you—er dictate with your other arm?"

A Boarding-House Saint.

Bloomsbury Landlady: "Poor Mr. Lightweight died last week, and if anyone ever deserved to go to Heaven he did." Mr. Heavyeater (who is slightly in arrears): "Why?" Bloomsbury Landlady (weeping): "He always paid his board in advance, never complained if his bed wasn't made up, and oh, such a delicate appetite as that poor saint had!"

Digitized by Google

IN CONFIDENCE

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Household Matters.

"KARKI."—I have handed your inquiry to "Isobel," who will, no doubt, answer it in her page of Pearson's Weekly. Will my readers please note that I only answer questions dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette, and not questions regarding recipes and other household matters?

Regarding Engagement Rings.

THE design of an engagement ring, "LOVELORN," is purely a matter of taste. The half-hoop pattern is certainly the most usual, but it is not an uncommon thing to see the stones in a cluster. As regards the number of stones in the ring, that is a matter to be decided by the taste of the prospective wearer and the pocket of the giver. Most engagement rings contain either three or five stones; there is said to be luck in odd numbers.

Is it Love?

LAST year "KITTY" became very friendly with a young man. They went out together and were introduced to each other's relations. During the course of a few months he went out to Canada to try to better his prospects. "KITTY" saw him off from Euston, and during the seven months he has been away they have corresponded regularly, but no word of love has been mentioned.

* * * * *

One thing that makes "KITTY" believe he cares for her, in a way other than ordinary friendship, is a remark he made to the effect that he didn't think it right for a fellow to get engaged, or bind a girl in any way, unless he were able to marry her right away, if need be. She wants to know whether she is right in assuming that he means anything.

* * * * *

You needn't apologise, "KITTY," for your long letter. I am always glad to be of service to anyone in trouble, and it is much easier to give advice when the full facts of the case are stated. I think you will be quite right in assuming that your—shall we call him friend?—really cares for you in no ordinary way, otherwise it is hardly likely that he would continue to write to you after so long an absence.

* * * * *

Three years will soon pass, you will find, and if he discovers that his prospects are brightening, he is sure to write something definite before long. Meanwhile, perhaps in some of your letters you can put out a feeler; say how you miss him and hope the day when you will meet again will soon arrive, or something of that kind. If his intentions are matrimonially inclined, he will take the hint; if not, there is no harm done.

A Troubled Lover.

"NINA" has a lover. She is not engaged to him, however. Most of her time is spent away from home, but when she goes there, which is usually once a fortnight, for the week-end, her lover is very attentive. During her absence, however, "NINA" has letters from her girl friends saying that he flirts with them. She has forgiven him many times, but at last is tired of doing so. Her friends say he has taken a turn for the better lately, and now he has written to her asking forgiveness again. What ought she to do?

* * * * *

You say you love him very much, "NINA." If so, I should advise you to send him your forgiveness; but at the same time tell him quite plainly that you do not approve of his conduct in carrying on with other girls during your absence from home. Of course, it may be that he is only flirting with you in the same way as he does with your friends. If this is not the case, it is about time you came to some definite understanding as to whether you are to become engaged or not. Next time you see him endeavour to lead up to the subject, and if he tries to turn the conversation, you will know that he is only trifling with your affections.

Wants an Introduction.

"F. H. R." is a soldier, and he knows by sight a young lady to whom he very much wants to get an introduction. So far as he is aware, they have no mutual friend, and though he knows her father, he does not like the idea of getting him to introduce them, for fear of meeting with a rebuff.

* * * * *

It looks rather as if the girl's father knew something about you which was not to your credit, "F. H. R.," otherwise it would surely be quite an easy matter to call in to see him one evening when you knew the daughter would be at home. An introduction in that case would follow naturally. If your relations with the father are quite friendly, I would recommend you to call in as I suggest. If not, it would be better to give up any idea of obtaining an introduction.

Chance Acquaintance.

"FALSE SQUALLER" sings in the choir at the church he attends and is getting very fond of a young lady in the congregation. He managed to scrape up an acquaintance with her, but has not seen her now for some time, and fears that she is offended with him for speaking to her without an introduction. He does not know her name or address, and wonders, if ever he sees her again, which he quite hopes to do, how he should greet her.

* * * * *

You hardly tell me sufficient about your acquaintanceship, "FALSE SQUALLER," for me to be able to advise you properly. You do not say how many times you spoke to her. If only once, it is quite likely she might be offended, but I do not think that would make her stay away from church. She is probably ill or away from home.

* * * * *

If you have only spoken to her once, and she appeared to resent your forwardness, do not take any notice when next you see her. If you have spoken to her several times, and she did not seem to object to it, I should certainly say that you might speak to her next time you see her.

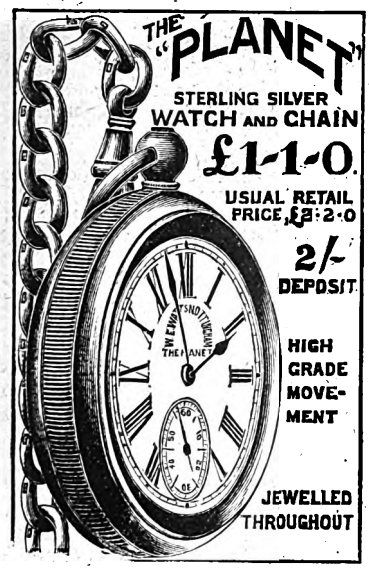
When to Cut the Cake.

IN reply to "A CONSTANT READER'S" inquiry, the proper time to cut the wedding cake is just before the bride goes to change her dress preparatory to starting on the honeymoon. If a breakfast is served, she should cut it at the conclusion of the meal.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google



TWO SHILLINGS

DEPOSIT (and subsequent weekly or monthly payments to suit the convenience of purchaser) secures one of these handsome and thoroughly reliable Watches and Chains for £1 1s. instead of £2 2s., the usual retail price. When writing please mention this paper.

SPECIFICATION.

The Gent's Silver "PLANET" Watch and Chain at £1 1s. is a marvellous production, and equal quality and value has not been attempted by any other firm in the World. The Watch is fitted with a horizontal movement of excellent quality; it is fully jewelled, carefully fitted and finished and thoroughly sound in every respect. The cases are Sterling Silver throughout, of extra strength and beautifully finished. Keyless or Key-wind as preferred. The Chain is Sterling Silver, Hall-marked on every link, of extra strength and thickness; it is of full length, but owing to want of space this cannot be shown in the illustration.

The Watch and Chain are forwarded post free, complete with signed warranty for ten years. They are produced by special and greatly improved machinery, and are supplied direct to the purchaser at a small commission on the actual net cost of production.

NO DISCOUNT WHATEVER can be allowed to customers sending cash in full with order, but they will be entitled to a week's free trial of the Watch & Chain; and the full amount of cash paid will be refunded if the articles are not approved.

W. E. WATTS FOUNDED 1858 WHOLESALE DEPOT 106-108 DERBY Rd THE ONLY ADDRESS— NOTTINGHAM.

PIANO VAMPING (BOOK 16 PACES.) 2/8 to £1 may be earned nightly by anyone having good knowledge of above. No knowledge of music required. A genuine work. Post free, 2/-; Colonies, 3/-. Agent (Dept. A), 16 Eton Rd., Southsea, Hants.

Ten Days Free Trial is allowed on every cycle we sell. The full price and all carriage charges returned if unsatisfactory in any way. 1903 Models, fully warranted, £3.10 to £6.10 New Departure Coaster Brake Front Rim Brake and highest grade genuine British made fittings and accessories. 200 Good Second-Hand Cycles £1.10 to £2.10 Don't Fail to get our big illustrated catalogue before deciding on your 1903 machine. We save you money. Rider Agents Wanted in every district to buy sample cycle at special price and take orders for us. Large profits easily made in spare time. Address Dept. MEAD CYCLE CO. Liverpool.

Do you not envy the woman with a "pearl-like" skin? Then use "Peralia" regularly. It soothes, refreshes, clears and beautifies, making the skin smooth and healthy. Preserves a fine complexion and restores a faded one. Makes the hands and arms like velvet. Endorsed by society and professional women all over the world. Gentlemen find it extremely pleasant after shaving; relieves irritation—cools the skin. Use it for Spots, Blackheads, Freckles, Tan, Redness, and especially for Red Nose.

Doctor's certificate guaranteeing its purity, and testimonials, sent with each bottle.

In Bottles, 1/- 1/6 2/6 Postage, 3d. extra

CHICKEN HATCHING EXTRAORDINARY FOR 2/6

The Texas Egg-Hatcher and Rearer combined supersedes all incubators. Hatches above and rears little ones below simultaneously all the year round. A money-making home industry requiring neither capital nor labour. Turns 1d. eggs into valuable Chickens or Ducklings. Millions selling in America. 15-egg size 2/6; 30-egg, 5/-; complete for use. Address, AMERICAN POULTRY SYNDICATE (Room 101), 7 Albion Grove, Stoke Newington, London, N.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

Or Flat Footed? If so, try our Elevators, which will increase your height from 1 to 4 inches without detection. Comfortable to wear. Price from 5/6, Lady's; 6/6 Gent's, per pair. Send stamps for further particulars. Peralia Co. (Dept. 14), 73, Camden Street, North Shields.

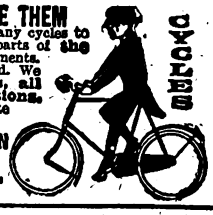
NOSE

If your nose is large or badly-shaped in any way, use our Nose Machine, price 10/-. Cheek Plumpers for thin or sunken cheeks, 10/- pair. Ear Instruments for standing-out ears, 10/- each. Send stamp for further particulars. Peralia Co. (Dept. 14), 73 Camden St., North Shields.

CLERGY ENDORSE THEM

We sell a great many cycles to clergymen in all parts of the world on easy payments. No guarantors required. We supply both sexes, all ages, all occupations. We want YOU to write for our circulars.

SYMONDS' LONDON STORES, 125-128, City Rd., London, E.C.



CRIMPOLINE HAIR CURLING FLUID.

Curls the hair naturally in a few days, and, what is more, the hair will keep in curl. Does not change the colour or destroy the hair but makes it soft and silky, and will curl or frizz into natural curls. No tongs needed. Not sticky or greasy like other curling fluids, which only keep the hair in curl. After the hair has become curly it is not necessary to continue using Crimpoline. Give Crimpoline a trial—the result will astonish you. Use it for Ladies', Gents', and Children's Hair. 1/9 and 2/6 per Bottle, Postage 3d. Ask your Chemist or Hair Dresser to get above preparations for you; if they are out of stock, we will send it direct to you securely packed.

Have no other or you will be disappointed.

Under Royal Patronage. Used by Madame Patti, Vesta Tilley, Minnie Palmer, etc.

PERALIA PERFUMERY CO. (Dept. 14), 72 and 73 Camden Street, North Shields.

Hygiene of the Skin explains how the famous Natural Icilma Water and the preparations made with it keep the skin healthy and free from lines, chaps, chilblains, sunburn, rashes and irritations. Free offer to those who have not yet tried it The only absolutely safe Natural remedy for the complexion. Send postcard, with address, to ICILMA (Dept. 17), 142 Gray's Inn Road, London, W.C.

DO YOU WANT A GOOD CYCLE?

Write for my Lists. I deal only in the Best Coventry made Cycles, and by contracting for thousands annually, I BUY CHEAPLY and SELL CHEAPLY.

Premiers, Rovers Coventry Challenges, Triumphs, Swifts, Humbers, Centaurs, Raglans, Singers, etc. The QUALITY is there. Get my prices, save money and ensure satisfaction.

A High-Grade COVENTRY CYCLE for £6-0-0.

Two Years' Guarantee. Easy Payments without publicity. Cycle sent on receipt of first payment. EDWARD O'BRIEN, The World's Largest Cycle Dealer, COVENTRY.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

From Factory to Rider.

How Does This Suit You? Handsomest & Best of Cycles right away after payment Month's Instalment—or Deposit—as you wish. £14 14s Grade for £6 10s Write, H Dept, Williams' Direct Supply Mfg. Co., 12 Approach, London Bridge, London.

HYPNOTISM

BE A HYPNOTIST AND MAKE FUN AND MONEY.

It takes but a few hours to learn, the study is both easy and fascinating. Hypnotism is an endless source of fun and wonder. If you know how to hypnotise you can perform the most marvellous feats imaginable. You can do a thousand amazing things that other people cannot do. You can surprise all your friends and make yourself famous. You can place anyone you wish under this strange and magic spell. You can compel them to think, act, and feel just as you wish. If you want to make money you can do it by giving entertainments; curing diseases, or teaching the art to others. These are three sure and easy ways to win a fortune. Why be poor, why work for others, when you can master this money-making profession so easily? Investigate now. You can learn at home without cost. I will send you my BIG FREE BOOK for the asking. It tells all about Hypnotism. It is the most elaborate and valuable work of the kind ever published. It contains many beautiful pictures, and explains all the mysteries and secrets of the art. Anybody can learn from it all about the Hypnotic spell, how it is operated, how it sways the will of its subjects, heals the sick, reforms the degraded, wins undying love, helps to trade or position, amuses an audience for profit, and gains for the operator himself health, wealth, and happiness. It also treats fully on Personal Magnetism, Magnetic Healing, and kindred subjects, and how to CURE YOURSELF of any pain, ache, or disease. Remember the book is ABSOLUTELY FREE. Simply write for it, and it will be sent by next post, all charges paid. Don't send any money or stamp but send your name and address TO-DAY.

PROFESSOR WILLIAMS, Blenheim House, Oxford St., LONDON, W.

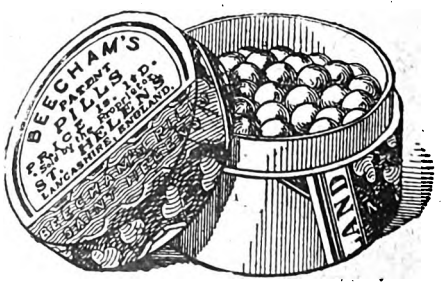
A Pointed Talk.

"Prevention is better than cure," we are told. Next time you feel 'out of sorts,' just take BEECHAM'S PILLS and so prevent a seemingly small ailment growing into serious trouble. BEECHAM'S PILLS prevent illness as well as cure it. Most people take them to keep themselves in good health. These are wise and happy ones—they hardly ever know what bad health is. There is no medicine in the world to compare with BEECHAM'S PILLS. They will not harm the most delicate—and the strongest will benefit by using them. They are a tried remedy — the trusted friend of thousands of families all over the world. You will soon feel better after taking them, and you will know what to resort to in future. REMEMBER, "Prevention is better than cure," so always have a box of BEECHAM'S PILLS handy and TAKE A DOSE when you feel YOU NEED ONE.

▼

BEECHAM'S

PILLS.



Digitized by Google

TURN TO PAGE 495.

SHORT STORIES.

No. 746.] Week ending April 18th, 1903. [Price One Penny.

"BOBBY, THAT'S YOUR DADDY! TAKE THIS LETTER AND TELL HIM I WROTE IT FOR HIM. TELL HIM THAT YOU ARE HUNGRY."

Digitized by Google

Worth a Guinea a Box.

BEECHAM'S PILLS.

No other medicine in the world can claim so many regular users. Thousands of families always keep a box of BEECHAM'S PILLS in the house, so that, on the first sign of any irregularity of the system, a timely dose may be administered, and further trouble and suffering averted. Nine-tenths of the BEECHAM'S PILLS sold are purchased by those who HAVE USED THEM BEFORE and have found them indispensable as

A FAMILY MEDICINE.

Sold everywhere in Boxes price 1s. 1½d. (56 pills) and 2s. 9d. (168 pills).

Headache

Kaputine cures the most obstinate Headache or Neuralgic Pains in ten minutes. Is the only preparation of its kind having the confidence and recommendation of Medical Men.

Kaputine THE SAFE

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., says: There can be no hesitation on the part of anyone suffering from Neuralgic troubles to employ Kaputine—the safe remedy.

The only remedy of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and Infirmaries.

Packets of 18 doses 1s.

KAPUTINE LTD., HUDDERSFIELD.

Neuralgia

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

Free Wheels. New Departure Hub, Bowden Brakes. All Improvements—Lamp, Bell, &c. Carriage paid.

Carr. Paid.

For Cash or 12 Monthly Payments of

£8 8s. 15/10 | £9 10s. 17/6
£9 16/8 | £10 5s. 19/3

Juno Motor Cycle is the King of Motor Cycles, £32 or 60/- mo. Accessories at lowest prices; Acetylene Lamp, 2/11; Cycle Stand, 1/8; Motor Horn, 5/6.

Write for New Season List, 136 pages and 600 illustrations, sent post free.—METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co. Ltd. (S.S. Dept.), 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C. West End Showrooms: Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

E·P PS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

CYCLISTS' GOODS

Immense stock, at prices that defy competition. No trash, prompt deliveries on orders by post. Brakes, Pedals, Bells, Lamps, Tyres, Inflators, Tools, Oils, Free Wheels, Shoes, Carriers, Chains, Bags, Saddles, Road Maps, etc. Send for No. 9 catalogue, post free.

SYMONDS' LONDON STORES, 124-128, City Road, London, E.C.

To CURE Drunkards

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

15 Buns for 1d.

You can make 15 large, light, delicious, and wholesome buns from 1d. packet of Eiffel Tower Bun Flour for a total cost of 3½d. It is so easy to use that a child can make delicious buns with certain success.

Ask your grocer for it, or send a Postcard for FREE SAMPLE (enough for 15 Buns) to Foster Clark and Co. 115 Eiffel Tower Factory, Maidstone.

PUREST & NICEST.

PINK'S JAMS

A good housekeeper thinks
The "pink" of Jams is PINK'S.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 746.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending April 18th, 1903.

How Easily Things Go Wrong.

The Tale of a Misunderstanding and a Reconciliation.

Containing the Incident Depicted on the Cover.

"OH, how easily things go wrong!" That is the opinion of a poet, and proofs of the accuracy of his words are to be found all about us. The story of Robert and Agnes Mason is one of those proofs, with its lesson for all who care to learn it.

Can things be righted again? Not easily, and the poet says that they are "never the same again; yet in some few cases a quarrel and subsequent misery are effaced by the greater happiness—the more solid joy—that follows. Whether this was so or not in the case of Robert and Agnes Mason, the following narrative will show.

It would be difficult to say exactly when the change began. No two people could be more fond of one another than they when they married, and if they had overheard the remark of an elderly woman who saw them leave the church, they would have laughed her to scorn.

"I fear they are a fair-weather couple," she observed, shaking her head slowly; "and they will be happy so long as trouble keeps away from them. Yet, perhaps trouble will do them good in the end!"

No trouble could shake their affection for each other, they would have said, but the change did come. Robert Mason had been brought up by his doting father in a manner suited for a man of large means; he had received a public school education, and had travelled.

On attaining his majority, he had vaguely anticipated that money would be his, but he learnt that his father had none to give.

John Mason had lavished money on his son with the idea that his education and travelling would so sharpen him that he would be fitted to take up some line of work and carve a road to fortune for himself. The particular kind of work was left to circumstances; "the boy would discover what he was most fitted for," was the father's conclusion.

Robert tried several things and contrived to exist with the aid of a small sum which his father was able to allow him; at the end of two years, when his father died, he was making a fair living with his pen.

Not having too large a share of the circulating medium, he arrived at the paradoxical conclusion that it would go farther if divided between himself and somebody else. He had fallen in love with Agnes Torrens, an attractive young woman; they were both full of the hopefulness of youth, they both believed that Robert was bound to make a name and earn a constantly-increasing income, so they married.

All rights reserved.]

A year passed very, very happily, but after the birth of the baby there was a change in their circumstances. Robert determined to try a novel, and for that reason had relinquished some of the regular journalistic and literary work which had supported them.

Money was becoming scarce, and they were running into debt, but it was all to be set right when the novel was finished. Robert indulged in dreams of the extent of the sum which would be paid to him for the copyright, if he sold it, or the total of the royalties he would receive on the sale of so many thousand copies of his work. They would be rich.

It was a great shock to Robert and Agnes when the novel was refused by the publisher to whom it was first offered; and the refusal was repeated by all the chief publishing firms as he tried them one after another.

The book had good points, but——. Then followed a reason that differed every time. Robert Mason became morose; angry with Fate, he turned his attention to the work he had secretly despised before the failure.

This trial brought out the weakness of both natures. Agnes told him that he ought to have made his characters do this or that, as she had originally suggested, or thought she had suggested; her husband was annoyed, his pride was hurt, and he answered that she knew nothing about it.

In less than another six months, things had gone wrong with their happiness; there was constant quarrelling—petty quarrels, just bad enough to make life miserable, no blows as with many others, but sharp speeches that cut quickly into the sensitive natures.

If Robert had had success in his journalistic career, all might have gone smoothly, but ill-luck pursued him and his earnings dwindled until they were living in genteel poverty.

At last it came to a bitter altercation, in which each said more than he or she had intended.

Stabbed, figuratively, by the unrestrained language of the other, the two young people stood facing each other with flaming eyes and hot cheeks.

"I could keep myself and baby better than you can keep us, if I were free from the worry of this wretched place!" she had said in a fit of ungovernable rage, and the words rankled in his heart.

"I'll leave you to do it!" were his last words, as he opened the door of the apartment and passed out.

She heard his steps as he descended the stairs, and then came what Tom Hood called a wooden oath—the slamming of the door—and she was alone.

Digitized by Google

During the remainder of the day she had time to reflect and she felt that she had gone too far; yet he had done the same and it was not her fault! She first tried to excuse herself, and then she began to say that he didn't mean it and would come back at night.

As the time wore on and evening approached, she felt rather awkward; Robert would be back shortly—how would he greet her and how would she receive him. The first moment would be a trying one, but she resolved to act bravely and welcome him frankly, should he enter in sullen silence.

But evening became night and her husband did not return. The cold pain at her heart grew more intense as the minutes ticked away by the cheap clock. She waited until two o'clock, when she threw herself on the bed and cried herself to sleep.

With the morning her mood changed. If he cared so little for her she could get along without him! Perhaps he would return after two or three days, thinking that his absence and the prospect of gaining her own livelihood would have frightened and humbled her. He would find out how mistaken he was!

She gathered a few things together and called the landlady.

"We owe you several weeks' rent, Mrs. Amer," she said quietly. "If Mr. Mason comes back, he will settle with you. If he doesn't, there is enough furniture here to repay you."

The landlady was not particularly surprised; it was not the first couple who had parted while living as tenants in the house she rented. It was none of her business, although she felt a little sorry for both, and the furniture would cover the back rent, there was just enough for that purpose.

"Very well, ma'am!" she said indifferently. "I suppose Mr. Mason will know where to find you?"

"Oh, there is no need to worry about that!" declared Agnes.

Mrs. Amer, finding that her departing tenant was not inclined to be communicative, did not condescend to say more, but retired. Agnes managed to get a cab and soon afterwards drove away with her few belongings and her baby boy, going to another part of the great city where she had lived four years previously.

It was during the evening of the same day that Robert Mason returned. He had received a commission to explore a district of the East End by night and he had carried out the task and had written his description of what he had seen.

In his anger, he had decided not to send word to Agnes, telling himself that it would do her good to think that he had taken her at her word and kept his threat. He returned with a couple of sovereigns in his pocket and feeling somewhat ashamed and penitent.

It was a silly thing to quarrel and he regretted the scene. It was not all his fault; Agnes was quite as much to blame as he and she had a bitter tongue when she liked to let it run loose; yet he was the stronger partner and he would restrain his own feelings and try to make things go more smoothly.

Agnes was gone! She had left no note for him, but there was no doubt about it, for the ransacked drawers told the story.

He called the landlady, only to receive confirmation of his fears. Robert Mason's heart grew hard against his wife and the feeling of repentance vanished.

It did not occur to him that his own silence had been the chief cause of her disappearance; he did not, in his disturbed mental condition, rightly understand what Mrs. Amer said and he jumped to the conclusion that Agnes had left soon after his departure on the preceding day.

His mind was quickly made up; he was able to pay some of the rent and thus redeem a few of his household goods, and with those he removed to another lodging.

Two days later he called on Mrs. Amer and left his address, in case Agnes repented.

"I will not destroy all trace and all chance of a reconciliation!" he muttered.

But no sign came from Agnes and, to drown his troubles, Robert began to drink, spending most of his earnings in intoxicants and steadily going the path that leads to disaster.

The months went by, Robert Mason did not know how many. Sometimes he would be pulled round by friendly advice or a slight accident, and he would go on steadily and soberly for a time, only to lapse again.

During these intervals he would try to find Agnes, and it was probably failure to trace her that caused the lapse.

It was while under the influence of a convivial gathering that he found her and lost her again because he did not know it. Yet that incident marked a change for the better and brightened his life.

He was proceeding rather unsteadily along a wide thoroughfare when a woman spoke to him. She was dressed in ragged garments and her face was pinched with want.

She was holding a child by the hand, and she addressed him with feverish eagerness, like one who had made up her mind to a course of action beset with difficulties and yet shrinks from it.

It was Agnes Mason, seeking reconciliation and forgiveness. She had tried to find him for many weary weeks, for her child was often on the verge of starvation and her mother's heart was lacerated by the child's suffering.

For herself she cared little, yet she yearned for the happy life of those first months and wished—oh, so ardently!—that it were possible to forget the later months.

She sacrificed all her pride for her child, and went to the old lodging to humble herself, ready to take all the blame on her own shoulders, for the sake of the boy. It had been a hard struggle for her, and her health had failed her.

Mrs. Amer was there no longer, and the new landlady knew nothing of Mr. Mason! Agnes had sought him in vain, and now she saw him coming!

"Robert!" she cried, raising her hand to place it on his arm.

He looked at her stupidly, but she did not notice the dull appearance of his eyes and the wooden expression of his face. He pushed her aside roughly and passed on. She sank with a moan to the pavement. He had pushed her from his life; he did not want her!

She arose hurriedly as a thought struck her. Catching the child by the shoulder, she pointed to the retreating figure which was still only a few yards distant.

"Go to that gentleman, Bobby, and tell him that you are his little sonny, as you tell mamma sometimes! He is your daddy. Take this letter and tell him I wrote it for him! Don't let him go! If he tries to leave you, cry loud! He has the pennies to buy you something to eat and he will give you something. Tell him that you are hungry!"

She pushed the boy along with the same feverish haste, running with him almost to the man who had spurned her. Then she left the child to give the message as best he might and hid herself in a doorway to watch the result.

Her heart beat high as she saw Robert Mason stop and listen to the boy. She saw him take the letter. An impulse prompted her to run up to her husband, but she crushed it down. She might spoil all by intruding.

Robert would probably care for the boy, it was his responsibility, but he would not want her—he did not want her! Something in her heart told her that the child would be all right, so she turned and fled from the spot.

Robert Mason tried to read the letter, but his eyes were dimmed. What was the child talking about?

Digitized by Google

"What do you say?" he asked, trying to speak softly and encouragingly.

"Mamma says you're my daddy! I'm hungry!" the child, about three years old now, spoke in a tone more befitting an older boy. He would have been dubbed "old-fashioned" by grown-ups. "I want a cake, daddy!"

"This is amusing!" muttered Robert, striving to fix his attention on the child and so clear his own muddled brain. "He's quaint! I say, what's your name, now?"

"Robert Mason!" pronounced the child, quite distinctly, showing that he had learnt it as a special lesson.

"What?" cried the man in amazement. "Here, come into this—. No, not there! I'll find a tea-shop!"

He caught the boy up in his arms and moved off with him. He didn't know what he was going to do exactly, but the haze was clearing from his brain. By the time he had seated the child on a chair in a cheap tea-room, holding him with one hand, Robert Mason was not far from sober.

"It's true!" he gasped. "The boy's the very image of her! What's it mean? Yes, this note!" He read it and his face became ashen in hue. "Did your mamma give you this? Where is she?"

The child replied in two or three broken sentences, and Mason gathered an idea of the truth. He caught up the child again and literally ran back to the spot where the child had come up to him, as nearly as he could remember, but he found no trace of Agnes. She had slipped from him once more.

* * * * *

Another two years have gone, and they have wrought a great change in Robert Mason. The entrance of the child into his life, the constant reminder of his lost wife in the boy's striking resemblance to her, had been the means of turning him aside from the path he was following, and making him work with dogged stubbornness to gain a name as a journalist and author.

After much hard work the tide had turned and he was on the road to success.

His great opportunity had come in connection with a play for a provincial touring company; a man for whom he did a good turn in an unexpected manner gave him this opportunity and he was able to take it. This was such a success that his reputation spread and he was soon represented on the London "boards," but the public did not know him as Robert Mason.

"My dear fellow, you must have a more fetching name than that, to take my public!" expostulated the manager of the touring company. "We must alter it. Let me see. Mason, Masson, Marston. Yes, Marston is all right. We have added a little, that's all! Robert Marston? H'm! How would Marston Roberts do?"

"You are adding more now!" laughed Mason, thinking of the addition of the "s" to "Robert."

"You've hit it!" cried the manager. "Marston More! See? Sounds like Marston Moor—historical name, you know; a big battle fought there. We'll call you that. You're not the first man who has taken the name of a place as his pseudonym!"

And so it came about that Agnes, watching for any sign of her husband, heard of the fame of Marston More, dramatist and novelist, and did not know that it was Robert Mason's assumed name.

"Now, Bobbie!" exclaimed Robert Mason gaily to his five-year-old son. "I'm going to take you to the theatre to see the ladies and gentlemen saying the things that dad puts down on the paper."

"I like the ladies and gent'men!" declared Bobby comfortably.

"If this company treats you as the others did at rehearsals, you ought to like ladies and gent'men!" laughed his father. "They'll spoil you."

He looked much older than the man who had slammed the door behind him so many weary months ago. His face had a calmer, stronger appearance, and the lines, wrought by sorrow, gave his face a nobler look.

His manner was that of a man who is happy with a chastened joy. He had not forgotten his wife, but he had found delight in the possession of his son. He thanked her in his heart for having given the child to him.

It was very cold and Robert hailed a cab to take them to the theatre. Their appearance was hailed with acclamation by the assembled company, and the ladies took Bobbie away to give him goodies and otherwise spoil his appetite and disposition. Father and child were almost inseparable, and in the theatrical world they were acquiring such titles as "The Two Bobs."

Business began. Little Bob was placed in a corner and for the time his father forgot him. The manager had allowed some relations of the supernumeraries to be present in the auditorium, just as a treat for them and to avoid the rather depressing effect which an empty theatre would have on the actors at rehearsal.

At least, that was his explanation, but everybody understood that his good-nature prompted him to allow poor people to come in at times, out of the cold or wet, and he also gave them a coin as a souvenir.

Extraordinary conduct, as some persons said, but he was an extraordinary man altogether, which probably accounted for the position he had acquired.

In the midst of an important scene, Bobby became tired of inactivity and suddenly ran forward. At the same moment one of the actresses, in the performance of her part, rushed across the front of the stage.

There was a collision, immediately followed by a cry of fear and pain from the child and a general shout from the other members of the company. The two sounds drowned one more that was uttered at the moment by a woman standing in the theatre at the side. She sprang forward and scrambled to the stage.

"My boy, my Bobby," she screamed. "You have hurt him! It is my boy! Oh, let me come to him!"

She was a pitiful object, in rags and faint from exposure and want. She staggered forward, but the effort to get on the stage had exhausted her. She reeled, threw out her arms for support, and was caught by the author of the new piece.

"Thank Heaven!" he cried fervently, while the spectators looked with wide-opened eyes. "I have found her again!"

The sound of his voice sent a quiver through her frame. She opened her eyes to gaze at the face of her lost husband, and, seeing nothing but the deepest love and sympathy therein, she instinctively nestled nearer to his breast and wept tears of joy.

"Me, too!" said a child's voice.

And Bobby struggled to obtain a share of his father's embrace.

"We'll give up the rehearsal for to-day and take it up to-morrow at the same time!" whispered the kindly manager to the several members of the company. So they dispersed and left the stage to the chief actors in a drama of which they knew nothing.

B. E. Garden.

Maud: "What do you do when a man persists in asking for a dance, and you don't care to dance with him?" Marie: "Tell him my card is full." Maud: "But supposing it isn't, and he still persists?" Marie: "Then I insist that it is, and let him see that it isn't."

Digitized by Google

A Deed = = Repaid.

A Story of a Girl's Choice and its Transfer.

PROLOGUE.

In the Teeth of the Storm.

It was late afternoon, and storm-clouds were scudding overhead, heralding a dark and premature night.

An hour before the blue waters of Crag Bay had smiled and danced beneath a still bluer sky. But a storm had risen, and the wind was now lashing the surface of the bay into foam-crested billows, above which the stinging spray flew and hissed in the teeth of the gale.

The tide was on the flow, and the storm increased as the torn and broken water poured in between the distant headlands. Outside, the deep boom of breakers told of a tossing, turbulent sea.

Presently the figure of a girl came into view, walking, high up, along the narrow path which fringed the cliff over-looking the bay.

To walk there in such a storm was neither an easy nor a pleasant task, but Ida Sherwood loved nothing so well as to come here in the teeth of a storm and witness the grand but awful battle between wind and sea.

Slowly she traversed the narrow path, gazing out over the jagged, seething waters. Soon she came to the further side of the bay, where the water was dotted with huge black rocks.

When the sea was calm, it was easy to leap from rock to rock, but they were only approachable when the tide was low. A sheet of broken water now lay between the rocks and the shore, for the tide was on the flow.

Suddenly the girl stood still, and a little cry escaped her lips. Far out on the rocks, she saw a solitary figure, standing terror-stricken in the midst of the seething, storm-swept waters. Around him hissed the spray, lashing his white face with stinging salt drops.

Gazing helplessly shorewards, he caught sight of the girl, standing motionless on the edge of the cliff, and, with an imploring gesture, he lifted and waved a broken crutch, which he held in his hand.

It was now too dark and he was too far off for the girl to recognise him, but his signal of distress told her who he was. He was the cripple son of a fisherman in the village—a man of ill-repute, who was regarded, even by his drunken associates, as a man to be feared.

The boy, too, appeared to be following in his father's footsteps, in spite of the ill-usage to which the latter subjected him, for though he was as yet but ten years old, he had already found his way to the notice of the local police.

But these things—though not unknown to the girl—were considerations of small importance now. The boy was in peril of his life.

The cruel waves leapt around him in a veritable dance of death. She must save him! But how? He had wandered on to the rocks, and the rising tide had cut off his retreat.

Suddenly a thought came to the girl. There was but one way to save the lad.

To summon assistance would be fruitless, for the little village of Crag Bay lay two miles off. She looked below, and her eye rested on a small boat-house at the foot of the cliff. Her breath came quick as she realised the peril of the task before her. But her mind was made up.

Catching up her skirts, she descended the steep cliff by a rough, precipitous path used by the fisherfolk of the village, and, racing over the shingle beneath, reached the shed where the boat was kept.

With a strength born of desperation, she dragged the boat out on to the beach and ran it down to the water's edge.

The tide was higher now, and the foam-crested waves were sweeping over the rock upon which the trembling boy stood. One glance at those hungry black, froth-flecked fangs in the angry maw of the sea, and, with a quick, brief prayer for strength, she ran the boat out into the breakers and leapt within it.

A few strong strokes with the answering oars, and she was out among the leaping, foaming waves.

Time after time the oars were nearly torn from her grasp, but she still held on, keeping the head of the frail craft pointed out towards the line of black rocks and putting in a stroke or two wherever she could.

Slow—very slow—was the progress she made against storm and tide. The exhausted little figure on the rock was tottering now under the stress and fury of the gale, while the angry billows leapt up as if to clutch him and draw him into their embrace.

But nearer and nearer came the boat, until barely a dozen yards separated it from the white, scared figure in the midst of the seething waters. Close to him was a great rock, and under the lee of this she steered the tiny, tossing craft. Then, reaching out an oar to the terrified boy, she cried to him to jump.

Dropping his crutch into the boiling sea beneath, the boy sprang, with a terrified cry, across the narrow, gleaming strip of angry water separating him from his rescuer and sank in a heap into the bottom of the boat.

For a moment it rocked and swayed, while the girl caught her breath in fearful apprehension that the tiny craft would be engulfed. But soon that danger was over, and the girl exerted all her remaining strength to turn the boat's head in the direction of the shore.

There was no need to propel the frail craft now. High on their white crests, the roaring billows lifted it and swept it on. But the oars were now even more indispensable, for the boat's head must be kept towards the shore, or the girl well knew what would be the result.

Painfully she toiled, while the boat swept through the angry waters.

Nearer and nearer, skilfully handling her tiny craft and watching every opportunity, the girl gripped the bending oars and glanced momentarily backward at the oncoming billows. And then they rose high on the crest of a great wave, bounding forward like an arrow from a bow, till, falling once more, they heard the keel grate upon the shingle and knew that they were saved.

Digitized by Google

The Choice.

Ida Sherwood stood by the window of her little sitting-room at Crag Farm, and looked out over the soft green meadow-land beyond. But to-day the smiling landscape had but few attractions for her.

She was in some perplexity, as was evident by the puckering of the pretty brows and the impatient pouting of the ripe lips, for she knew that, ere long, she would be called upon to make a choice in which the most vital considerations were at stake.

For some time past two men had been paying her marked attention, and she knew sufficient of mankind to be aware that, in both cases, this would terminate in a proposal. She liked both men, but she loved neither—or, at least, she thought so.

There was no particular need for her to marry. Her father was a prosperous farmer, and not at all disposed to part with his beautiful and accomplished daughter.

Being free to follow her own sweet will, she had chosen literature as a vocation, and was already blossoming into a writer of some repute. But she held certain strong and vigorous opinions on the question of marriage, regarding it not only as a desirable but a necessary step, demanded of all true women.

So she had at last decided that she would give an affirmative reply to one of the two, when he should put his question. But which one? That was her present difficulty.

As she mused, a boy came past the window, and, seeing her within, held up a note which he carried in his hand. It was the cripple boy whom she had rescued from those cruel rocks two years before. He was twelve years old now, and a sharp, intelligent lad. People said he had changed for the better since Miss Sherwood had taken to noticing him.

She opened the window and the boy handed her the note. She unfolded it and read as follows:

"I am sketching in Glen Wood by the brook. Shall be there till dusk. Can you run over some time during the day? Have an idea for a story which I think would admirably fit in with this lovely spot. Perhaps your quicker imagination could make something of it, and I might illustrate. "Frank Desmond."

The girl considered for a moment.

"Are you going back?" she asked the boy.

"Yes, miss," was the reply.

"Very well," said Ida. "Tell Mr. Desmond I will try to be there by three this afternoon."

"I hope I'm doing the right thing," she said to herself as the boy moved away. "He has only been in the neighbourhood six months or so, but he is not a bad fellow, and—he is very handsome.

"Besides, his co-operation with me in my work is of more value to me than I care to confess. He is polished, too, and would appear to advantage in any society.

"Now, Rupert Woodville, on the other hand, is—— But he is a good fellow, too, and—and rather good-looking. But—but he's so quiet, and looks at one with those deep, earnest, steadfast eyes of his as though he would read one's inmost heart. Yes, Rupert Woodville is a man, every inch of him, but—but Frank Desmond is—a gentleman!"

She stopped and once more looked out through the open window.

"Yes," she said presently—"I think it will be Mr. Desmond. I know I do not love him in the least, but—but that may come later. At any rate, he is—a gentleman!"

And, having thus determined on her course of action, she dismissed the subject from her mind until the afternoon.

The shade was deliciously cool beneath the overhanging trees when she stood at last by the brook in Glen Wood. Frank Desmond had left his easel, and was stretched on the soft green sward.

At the sound of Ida's footstep, he leapt to his feet and greeted her with unmistakable tenderness. She stepped up to the easel and examined the picture upon which he had been engaged.

As she looked, an admiring light flashed into her lovely face, which the artist at her side was not slow to notice. And then they sat down on a fallen log and began to converse upon subjects interesting to them both—of literature and art—until Frank Desmond, having thus skilfully yet unobtrusively shown the always enthusiastic girl at his side how many and varied were the interests they had in common, led up to the great question which had inspired him to seek a meeting with her in the woods—not of a prospective story, but of his love.

There was something that jarred upon the girl as she listened—something she could not explain or understand—but she had already made her choice, and, when at last she left the soft shade of Glen Wood, she had promised to become Frank Desmond's wife.

The shadows were lengthening as she neared Crag Farm on her return home. She had reached the last field, and stood leaning against a stile, lost in thought. So occupied was she, indeed, that she was unaware of the presence of a tall figure standing at her side, till a voice said:

"Good afternoon, Miss Sherwood. You are wise in preferring the air out of doors to the house this hot day."

Ida started and looked up. Dr. Rupert Woodville—a tall, handsome man of thirty—was looking down at her with deep, earnest eyes. In spite of herself, the girl coloured.

"Yes," she said, trying to retain her self-possession—"is it not beautiful? It makes one glad only to know one is alive!"

Rupert Woodville smiled. His smile was wondrously winning and made his handsome face still more attractive.

"That is the voice of a perfect constitution," he said.

Ida smiled and turned her face towards Crag Farm.

"You are on your way home?" said the doctor. "I wonder if you will be so good as to give me a cup of tea?"

Ida could not restrain a feeling of vexation, yet she could do nothing else but respond: "With pleasure, Dr. Woodville!" and together they walked along the narrow path through the smiling meadow towards the farm.

The cup of tea was very fragrant, and the girl who presided over the little tea-table looked sweet and dainty.

Rupert Woodville forgot his former statement that the air out of doors was preferable to the house, and lingered long after the evening shadows had stolen over meadowland and orchard. He could talk well, and his words were well worth listening to.

He was not so brilliant, perhaps, as Frank Desmond, for he was not a genius, but he possessed that strong undercurrent of shrewd common-sense which gave point to his remarks.

So topic after topic came up for discussion, till at last, tempted by the fact that they two were alone in the little sitting-room, Rupert Woodville entered upon more delicate ground, treading lightly, as if he feared to startle the girl whom he loved. But in a flash she read his intention, and her sense of honour bade her speak.

Digitized by Google

"Dr. Woodville," she said, "I have a little piece of news which, though as yet unknown, will soon be common property. Mr. Desmond has to-day asked me to be his wife, and—and I have accepted."

There was a dead silence in the little room for a minute or two, and then the doctor said in a low voice:

"Miss Sherwood, no one deserves more than you do to be happy. I earnestly hope you may be."

There was so much earnestness in the words that they fell on Ida's ears almost like a prayer, and the girl was touched. She held out her hand impulsively, and it was held in a strong, firm grasp.

Then the doctor rose, and with a quiet, courteous farewell, took his departure. But it was with a very grave and troubled face that he went his way homewards across the dark fields, while Ida, sitting still where he had left her, murmured softly to herself:

"I believe he is a gentleman, too!"

The Transfer.

It was a month later, and the soft green meadows of Crag Farm gleamed beneath the silver rays of a harvest moon.

The day had been excessively hot, and, though the hour was now late and the twinkling farm-lights had one by one been extinguished, Ida Sherwood still sat at her casement window, and looked far out over the moonlit landscape.

She had attired herself in soft white dressing-gown and slippers, and the cool, fragrant air, wafted over blossoming flowers and ripe corn, fanned her cheeks and soft white throat with its perfumed breath.

The month had brought many disquieting reflections. A vague foreboding that Frank Desmond was not quite what she had believed him rose repeatedly in her breast, and though she resolutely thrust it from her on each occasion, it returned anew to fill her heart with vague unrest.

Musing thus, she became aware of a figure hastening through the moonlight in the direction of the farm. A moment later, and she recognised him as the boy she had rescued on the rocks of Crag Bay.

A vague sense of uneasiness took hold of the girl's mind as she watched the now rapidly advancing figure. Something must be wrong, she argued, or he would not come so quickly, for she was well aware that so much effort involved no small pain to the little cripple.

Rapidly descending the stairs to the hall beneath, she unfastened the door and waited for him to come up. At last he reached her, and, sinking breathlessly down on the white stone step, said in quick, terrified, gasping words:

"Go to—boat-house—on the beach—you know—where you got—the boat—to save me! Go now—or be too late! There's danger—Mr. Desmond—I can't tell you—I shall be killed if I'm caught! Be quick!" And he went off at a great pace over the moonlit meadows.

For a moment the girl stood petrified. Then, without waiting to think what she was doing, she ran breathlessly up the dark stairs, exchanged her slippers for stout walking-boots, and, waiting to do no more than cover her dressing-gown with a long, dark, waterproof cloak, she darted out of the silent house and was soon speeding down the path from the cliff to the beach.

All was quiet when she reached the boat-house, and she stood leaning against the dark cliff, where the shadows were deepest, and waited.

Presently she heard a step close at hand and, peering out, saw a man approaching, whom she immediately recognised as Frank Desmond.

She was just about to spring forward from the shadow of the cliff and tell him of the strange message she had received, when another footstep sounded on the shingle, and the tall figure of Rupert Woodville reached his side.

"Well?" said Dr. Woodville sharply. "You sent for me, and I am here. Now, what is it you want?"

"My purpose in bringing you so far from home," replied Frank Desmond, "is to tell you, plainly and emphatically, that the conditions contained in your letter of to-day are quite impossible. I shall not leave Crag Bay, either for you or anyone else, and I shall not give up Miss Ida Sherwood!"

"Pardon me," said Rupert, with quiet emphasis, "but you overlook one thing. If you do not readily undertake to do both thsese things, I shall feel it my duty to disclose one or two facts which have come to my knowledge in regard to your former career, in which case both conditions will be forced upon you."

"You dare not!" said Frank Desmond.

"And pray why not?" asked Rupert Woodville with a smile.

"Because," retorted the other pointedly, "you would not only not be believed by the person most concerned, but your motive in making the disclosure would be interpreted by that same young lady in a manner scarcely likely to raise you in her estimation."

Dr. Woodville's face flushed angrily, but he controlled himself with an effort.

"I shall chance that," he said quietly.

For a moment or two they stood gazing straight into each other's eyes.

"Look here," said Frank Desmond at last, "I do not want to kick up a fuss. You have no right to interfere with my plans, but I will make one concession. If you will promise to keep your information to yourself, I, on my part, will promise not to marry Ida Sherwood until my wife is dead."

The shrinking girl in the dark shadow of the cliff caught her breath and drew still farther back.

"You hound!" said Rupert Woodville sternly. "Do you think I would consent to such a fiendish proposal!" And his strong hands clenched in sudden and overpowering anger.

"It is only a question of time!" continued the other coolly. "She can't live much longer. She bored me to death with her ailments before I left her. But they are real enough, poor wretch, and the end can't be far off. And then there will be no legal obstruction to my marriage with the lovely Ida——"

With an angry cry, Dr. Woodville leapt close in front of his opponent.

"Stop!" he cried, "or, by Heaven, if you use that name again, I will strike you to the earth!"

For a moment, Frank Desmond cowered before the tall, threatening figure, and then, once more mastering himself, he said coolly:

"So you reject my proposition?"

"With the scorn it deserves!" replied Rupert Woodville. "From such a consummate scoundrel as yourself no proposal could for a moment be entertained by a man of honour and integrity."

"Then take the consequences!" exclaimed Frank Desmond hoarsely; and, drawing from his pocket a whistle, he blew it shrilly three times.

Instantly a man darted out from the shadow of the boat-house where he had stood concealed, and, assisted by Frank Desmond, threw himself upon the unsuspecting doctor.

Rupert Woodville made a brave fight, struggling desperately with his two assailants, but the odds were against him, and he was soon thrown down and pinioned. Then Frank Desmond pointed to the boat-house

Digitized by Google

"Get out the boat," he said excitedly, "and use that little auger of yours on the bottom. Dead men tell no tales, and the water of the bay is deep."

Without a word the man rushed to the shed and drew from it the boat in which, two years before, Ida Sherwood had saved the life of the little cripple. But now it was to be the means of death, and not of rescue.

The girl, terrified and bewildered, heard the sharp rasp of the auger as it cut its way through the bottom of the boat, and then, with a wild, inarticulate cry, she bounded from the shadow of the cliff and stood in the broad moonlight, confronting the two villains.

In her haste and agitation the dark cloak had slipped from her shoulders and she now stood, a dazzling, white-robed figure, with the moonlight shining about her with an almost unearthly radiance.

The man at the boat, with the credulity of the ignorant fisher-folk in the supernatural, uttered a terrified cry, and, letting fall his auger, rushed off over the hard shingle and disappeared into the darkness.

Then the girl turned to Frank Desmond, who stood sullenly watching her, and pointed with her finger up the narrow path which led to the top of the cliff.

"Go!" she said imperiously. And he, overawed by her presence and muttering an oath, slunk away in the direction she indicated.

Quickly she knelt down by the prostrate figure lying at her feet, and, with trembling fingers, cut the thongs that bound his arms and feet, while little suppressed sobs rose in her throat and choked her.

In a moment Rupert Woodville leapt to his feet and, picking up the cloak which his eyes alone had noticed, put it tenderly about the girl's shoulders.

"Miss Sherwood," he said softly, "you have saved my life!"

"Don't!" she said brokenly. "Thank God it is not too late to retract! Oh, whom is one to believe?"

"Try me," said Rupert softly. "I have loved you for years, dear, and can know no happiness apart from you."

The girl looked up shyly into his handsome face.

"I think," she said softly, "it is you I have loved all along, only I did not know it."

And so they went back to the quiet little village, happy, trusting and silent, for love needs no words to manifest its presence.

It was not till later that Ida learnt to what happy circumstance she owed the information which had led her to Crag Bay that never-to-be-forgotten night.

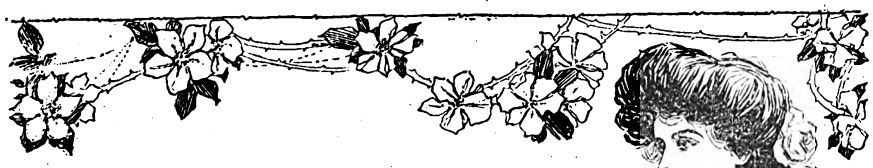
Rupert Woodville, discovering almost by accident the character of the man to whom Ida Sherwood had promised her hand, had written him a stern letter, demanding his immediate disappearance from the village and his complete surrender of that lady's favour.

Frank Desmond determined to brook no such interference in his plans and ready to perpetrate any crime to compass his end, sought out the father of the cripple, and, with his assistance and co-operation, formed the plan which had so nearly succeeded.

But the little cripple had overheard the foul plot and, vaguely conscious that it in some way menaced the girl who had saved his life two years before on those terrible black rocks in Crag Bay, had, at the peril of his own life, rushed off to acquaint her with the news.

And thus he repaid the deed of heroism which had snatched him from a cruel death—a deed which, in all his after life, he never forgot.

Walter J. Mowbray.



A Borrowed Fame.

Which Brought Happiness to Three People.

"Never mind, Nannie, dear, perhaps something will turn up soon. I haven't heard yet about that last story I sent to the Screecher, they may take it, 'you never know your luck!'" the speaker finished cheerily, though with a half-smothered sob behind her optimistic speech.

"Poor Nora!" said the sick girl, turning a loving look upon her companion, "always so hopeful and so brave. If I were only not like a stone tied round your neck, dear, lying helpless here——"

"A stone round my neck!" cried Nora, going down upon her knees beside her sister's couch, "my greatest blessing, you mean! Why, whatever should I do without you? But let us cheer up, Nannie, my screw for teaching that little fiend of a Harper boy must be due next week, and I have a little money to go on with. If only I could get something to do in the afternoons or evenings, though I should hate leaving you alone, dear," she said, turning involuntarily to her invalid sister.

"Oh, that wouldn't matter, I have my crochet, you know! It's the only way I can make a few pence," the other said wearily.

"We won't talk any more about money," Nora said cheerfully, as she kissed her sister and rose from her knees. "I spent a whole penny on a Daily Telegraph to-day, so as to look at the advertisements, so here goes!" and she unfolded the paper. "This is handsome, isn't it?" and she read aloud—

"Young lady, not over twenty-five, offered comfortable home in high-class family, in return for taking entire charge of three children."

"Humph! I'd rather be the scullery maid at twelve pounds a year, she would at least have her evenings out, and something to dress on! Nursery governess—companion for elderly lady," she continued. "Here, Nannie, here is something for me," and she read excitedly—

"Lady typist wanted from three till seven daily, usual terms, apply three to-day, G.C., 15, Paper Court, W.C."

"Where is my hat? Where are my gloves?" she exclaimed. "Nannie, are you sitting on them?"

"My dear Nora," said her sister more calmly, "you have had no lunch, you mustn't go away hungry!"

"Oh, that doesn't matter!" said Nora, as she hurriedly put on her hat. "If I get the post I'll have a double tea afterwards. There's the postman!" as a knock was heard. "I'll just run and see what it is!"

She came back looking rather crestfallen, with the familiar long envelope in her hand.

"My story back from the Screecher," she said a little bitterly, "I suppose they haven't even read it, for I only sent it yesterday. Well, better luck next time!" she said, trying to smile as she threw the despised M.S. on the desk.

"Oh, poor Nora!" said Nannie sympathetically.

"Never mind, dear, luck must turn some day, but it is hard lines to get my 'Grip of Iron' back, for I know it isn't half bad. Never mind Nankin Blue, I must be off, ta-ta!" and with that she flew down the long staircase.

"Poor Nora!" said Nannie Nugent, brushing away a tear, "with all her spirit and her hope, what is to become of us? What is to become of us?" and she rocked herself to and fro.

Digitized by Google

Until six months ago the Nugent girls were dependent on an uncle. A year before he had seen fit to take unto himself a wife, who much objected to the encumbrance of what she called "two able-bodied women," quite ignoring the fact that Nannie, the elder, had been an invalid almost from birth, and for the last five years quite confined to the sofa.

Nora bore the bride's reproaches and sneers for a year, when she suddenly made up her mind to cut the matter short by deciding that she and her sister should come up to London—that grave of many vanished hopes—and search "for something to do," the vague "will o' the wisp" which has lured so many souls to destruction.

The girls had a tiny income from a small legacy left them by their grandmother, and, so far, had managed to rub along, their only outside means of subsistence being a miserable pittance Nora earned by daily teaching, and what Nannie could make by her beautiful work.

Nora's heart beat high as she ran up the narrow, dirty staircase which she was told led to "the advertisement."

On the landing outside the door were four or five persons of various ages, with clothes in various stages of decomposition.

One elderly woman, with straggling grey hair, leant wearily against the stair-rails; another, even more anxious-looking, had seated herself on a broken box outside the door, while in a corner two or three of the class known as "shop-girl," laughed and giggled together.

"'E don't mind keeping ladies waiting," said one of these, as Nora arrived on the scene, "'ere's another," she continued in a whisper, "looks a toff, don't she?"

At this moment a noise was heard upon the staircase, and a head appeared upon the landing below.

"Good Heavens!" said a man's voice, "there's a crowd there!" as he looked up and saw the response his single advertisement had brought forth.

"Sorry to keep you waiting, ladies," he continued, as he unlocked his office-door. "Now, how shall I interview you? Perhaps you will come first?" he said politely to Nora, after a hurried glance at the other applicants.

"It's a shime!" the giggling girls said, as the door was shut. "And 'er the last to come. That shows what a cheeky face and a smart 'at will do!"

"Bless you!" replied her companions, "we all know what that means! For my part I'm off to pastures new. Come along, Liz—'urry up, Bess, I'm 'alf frozen waiting here," and they ran downstairs arm in arm, singing loudly as they went out of the door.

The two elderly women left looked at each other with mutual pity in their eyes.

"We can't stand against the young," said the one with the grey hair streaked over her forehead, as she turned sadly and went downstairs.

The other waited a minute or two, there came a laugh from within, and a man's voice said—

"Very well then, Miss Nugent, that is settled!" The woman rose wearily from the broken box, and turned to go.

* * *

"Now, Miss Nugent," said Geoffrey Churnside, cheerfully, as he hung up his coat and hat, "we'll have a good long evening's work at the novel. These miserable 'pot boilers' have kept me back half the week, I only sent Jones half that story for next month's Rambler, but if he wants the rest, he is to let me know to-morrow, and it will have to be done somehow.

"I generally finish these odd things Saturdays and Sundays, and devote the serious part of the week to the novel. By Jove, it is cold, isn't it? I think we'll have some more coals on, eh?" he said, as he heaped up the fireplace.

Nora shivered slightly, this unexpected spell of cold weather came hard on people who had a very meagre supply of winter clothing.

Mrs. Harper had failed to pay the quarterly instalment of what she called "the governess' wages," and the money in her sister's exchequer was very low.

Nannie had tried to smile brightly, and say she didn't feel at all cold, as she covered up her feet with a well-worn rug, and declared it was no use lighting the fire until Nora came back, "it was such a bother to keep up," all the time conscious that only a decent sized shovel of coals was between them and freezing point.

"Yes, it is cold," said Nora, becoming acutely conscious that she had eaten nothing since her early breakfast of tea and bread and butter.

"You look wretchedly cold, are you ill, Miss Nugent?" and, as Geoffrey looked at her, he became conscious of a sudden feeling of interest in this typewriter girl, whom he had hitherto looked upon as only a part of his machine.

"No," said Nora laughing, as she imagined, cheerily, "I can't afford to be ill."

"Hard lines, isn't it?" said Geoffrey, "but I say," he continued, looking at her again, "are you sure you take enough care of yourself? Isn't this rather thin for a day like to-day?" he said gingerly, touching the well worn black cape which was Nora's sole outer covering, "and are you sure—women are so careless about that sort of thing"—he said apologetically, "are you sure you have had a good lunch to-day?

"Forgive me if I seem impertinent, but I know the sort of thing—bread and butter"—or without the butter, Nora thought—"water, tapioca, that is what my sisters used to be so fond of, but in London, you know, one must eat well. Now, what you want, is a good strong beefsteak. Will you do what I ask you?" he said more gently.

"What is it? I think we are wasting time, Mr. Churnside, we had better get to work," she answered.

"Come down with me to the restaurant round the corner, and have some lunch—to please me—now do?" he pleaded.

Poor Nora's eyes were swimming in tears—half from hunger, half from gratitude for the unaccustomed care lavished upon her.

During the intervals of devouring lunch she told him some of her troubles, of Nan's weakness, her own inability to keep the wolf from the door.

"Sounds like the tale of a budding novelist," said Churnside. "I've been hungry myself before now. You ought to take to writing, Miss Nugent."

"I do write," she replied timidly, the hot blood mounting up in her cheeks.

"Oh, you do, do you?" the man replied, half amused. "For fashion papers, and that sort of thing, I suppose?"

"No," said Nora indignantly, "not at all, I write stories!"

"But," he continued more kindly, "you haven't had much luck yet, perhaps?"

"None," she replied, with great emphasis, and a certain bitterness.

"Dear, dear," he said sympathetically, "but luck will turn, you know, it does for us all some day. Bring me some of your work to-morrow, I will have a look at it. Now we must go back to the novel."

Nora built a good many aerial castles on the foundation of the hope his words had opened out to her, and it was no small disappointment next day when he seemed to have as utterly forgotten the conversation—as if it had never been uttered.

Digitized by Google

She had brought the "Grip of Iron" neatly tied up in a parcel in her muff, but the whole conversation seemed to have slipped from Mr. Churnside's memory, and her typewriter had to fly more quickly than usual, to complete the requisite number of pages, as her employer was obliged to go out early, on account of an appointment.

He was in such a hurry, he hardly waited to say good-bye, and Nora felt a curious feeling of desolation, as she was left alone with the neatly-typed sheets before her, instead of the exultation which would have been hers a week ago, on knowing that she was free to return to Nannie an hour earlier than usual.

She had not hurried to put on her cloak, and as she at last rose to do so, heard a step ascending the stairs.

The postman's double-knock meant a parcel, and she hastened to bring it in. The printed label on the packet showed that it was from the Rambler office.

"They may want the rest of it typed—I had better open it and see, I could do it at home for him, if they are in a hurry," she said aloud.

To her astonishment, instead of proof-sheets, an unused MS. was disclosed as she unfolded the paper. A note lay on the top; which read as follows:

"Dear Churnside.—This is not quite up to your usual, and after some hesitation, we have decided not to use it. Can't you send us something in one number, more in the style of the last you sent. Please let us know at once, if you have anything suitable ready, and if so please send to-night. I will forward cheque on receipt."

Nora felt like a condemned criminal, as she stood with the letter in her hand.

"I oughtn't to have opened it," she said, "but"—then her eyes fell upon the parcel in her muff, in which "the Grip of Iron" lay concealed.

"Why shouldn't I?" she said, "I'll tell him afterwards, it may be mean—but, oh! if it brought in some money!"

In a moment the deed was done—she had typed a short note saying that "Mr. Churnside inclosed a new and original story, which he hoped would be suitable for the Rambler."

Nora thrust the rejected MS. into an unused drawer, and walked home, feeling more miserable than she had ever done in her life.

* * * * *

"Can you explain this, Miss Nugent?" said Churnside, two mornings later, as Nora arrived upon the scene.

All the day before she had tried to pluck up courage to tell him what she knew—sooner or later he must inevitably find out—but the words seemed to stick in her throat as she tried to utter them. Now she felt instinctively that crime was discovered, and the terror of the honest wrong-doer took hold of her.

"Do you remember," continued Churnside, "what I called that story of which I sent the first part to the Rambler? I thought it was 'Romance of a Summer,' or something like that, but they must have muddled me up with somebody else, for they call it 'A Grip of Iron!' They're mighty complimentary, too, I must say," he added. "Listen:

"Dear Sir,—We have read with attention your short story, and think it the best thing we have hitherto had from you. Send us as much as you like of the same sort, and we can guarantee insertion.

"You will notice cheque inclosed is at an increased rate of remuneration, and we consider 'The Grip of Iron' worth it."

"Now, did you ever hear anything like that?" he concluded in a puzzled voice; "very nice if I deserved it, but I never wrote the thing in my life!"

Nora's face had turned to a ghastly pallor as he read, while her eyes glittered as she saw the amount on the open cheque he held in his hand.

"Mr. Churnside," she began, and with speech greater strength came to her—"I have a confession to make to you. The Rambler sent back the part of the story you had sent to them, they—they said it was not very good—not suitable, I mean," she hastened to add—"they wanted a story complete in one issue—I had brought down the MS. of a story I had written to show you—you remember, you asked me to do so?" and she gained courage to look at him.

Churnside merely bowed his head.

"You had evidently forgotten all about having done so," she continued timidly, "but I had the MS. with me, and the temptation was too great. I sent it to the Rambler as if from you. Believe me," she implored, "I did not mean to do you harm—I only wished to insure that my story would have the justice of being read. They say beginners' work is never read—I did not mean to hurt your reputation—indeed, indeed I did not."

"Seems to me you have increased it," Churnside said rather bitterly. Did it never occur to you, Miss Nugent, that you were doing a dishonourable thing in opening my letters, and a dishonest one in using my name?"

"I opened the letter with no dishonourable intention," she answered indignantly. "you left early on that day, and you had told me they might want the second instalment of your story in a hurry—so I opened it to see, and meant to leave a note for you, saying I could either return to type it that night, or do it at home, if you sent me the rough copy.

"I was very wrong in what I did, and I am sorry, but if you think me dishonest, I had better go"—and she turned towards the door.

"Stop a minute," said Churnside, as he fingered the cheque. "This is yours, I had better sign it in your favour, and then you can cash it. I shall write to the Rambler and explain—as they think so highly of your work, they will probably take more of it—but of course you understand, I cannot run the risk of your opening any more of my letters."

"You mean," said Nora, as she turned and indignantly faced him, "that you dismiss me from your service? I think I told you, I was going, without waiting to be dismissed—but listen one moment," she cried passionately, "before you send me away in disgrace. I have not stolen your money.

"Much as I require it, I would rather not take the cheque. I did not mean to steal your reputation—I only wished to insure my tale being read—for I felt it had grit in it—I have made a dreadful mistake, and I am sorry, but you don't know—you don't know what it is to be starving like we are.

"The lunch you gave me on Wednesday was the first meat I had tasted for weeks; we have no fire in this bitter cold weather—and I am trusting to what you owe me to meet the rent of our poor little room.

"My other employer has not paid me yet for teaching her wicked little boy—because she says the arrangement is to pay half-yearly, and I don't know what to do—I don't know what to do," she wailed, as she burst into tears. "I don't mind for myself, but for my sister, I would work myself to death for her—but it's no use—it's no use," and she sobbed bitterly.

Churnside's heart began to smite him, as he heard the piteous tale, and saw her bitter distress.

"By Jove, what a pretty little head she has," he thought, as he stood helplessly looking at her.

In a few minutes the sobs ceased, and she again rose to go. Quickly he stepped between her and the door.

"Miss Nugent, will you forgive me?" he said gently, "I was a brute, I confess I was angry and jealous of your being able to write better than I could—and I lost my temper. Here, take the cheque—it is you who have earned it—buy what you need, and come back to-morrow at the usual time."

* * * * *

The novel of the year—some two years later—was said to be one by the joint authors, "G. G. and N. Churnside," but Geoffrey always says he owes the greater part of the fame he now enjoys to his clever and original wife.

Kitty Smart.

Digitized by Google

LOVE versus MONEY.

The Romance of a Rich Man's Wooing.

I AM a very rich man—not quite a millionaire, but rich enough to be able to get anything that money can buy. One thing I desired, that was love—love for myself alone, not for my riches.

My wealth brought me in contact with many women; in fact, threw women in my way. How, then, was I to tell whether they would have sought me for myself—for my own worth?

I saw every day the fairest, most amiable girls, girls possessing even to me every charm and virtue but one, and that one was that they would marry without a blush men to whom I knew their hands and not their hearts were given. I longed inexpressibly for love, the disinterested love of a woman, and felt I could have sacrificed my all for it, for her.

Why not? I asked myself. It was easy—at any rate for the time being, I would live poorly, humbly; I would earn my own living. I would stand on my own merits, and see what came of it. Not here, that would be difficult, but in a big town where no one would know me, nor smile at and excuse me as eccentric.

A week later I had installed myself as one of the salesmen at the silk counter of a large and flourishing firm. There were a number of girls employed in the establishment, and I remarked them closely.

They were all affable and obliging, and some of them were pretty and unaffected too, but I did not find my fate among them, and two or three weeks later I had begun to be disheartened with my model mode of life when an incident occurred that served to bind me to my resolve more firmly than ever.

It was a wet day and business was rather slack, when I noticed come into the shop a girl who instantly riveted my attention. It was not that she was beautiful, or in any way striking looking, but she was pretty and charming, and her whole bearing was graceful in the extreme, and at a glance she became possessed of that nameless attraction for me which is termed love at first sight.

How I hoped that her shopping would bring her to my counter, and that it would fall to my lot to serve her with silk or satin. Yes, that was evidently what she had come to buy, for now the shop-walker was conducting her towards me, and another minute she had seated herself in a chair opposite me.

As I asked, "What is your pleasure, madam," the customary formula did not sound so trite to me as usual, and seemed even to have become endowed with a subtle meaning of its own.

"I want to look at white silks and satins," she said, "something suitable for a ball dress."

I brought out all my choicest goods and spread them before her; she selected the very one I would have chosen for her myself—a rich, soft satin, that was worth every penny of the rather high figure at which it was priced, but when I reckoned it up and told her what the whole dress length would come to, she put it aside and said she was afraid it was too expensive.

She looked very disappointed as she began to make a second choice, remarking that she did not like the other fabrics nearly as well, and I thought it was a great shame if she should have to forego her fancy for the sake of a few pounds.

I was so madly in love with her already that I was only dying to gratify her every wish, and a hasty plan came into my head by which she might have the satin, and yet no one be a bit the wiser.

I appeared to reflect.

"If you will allow me to remove these, madam," I said, gathering together the pile of silks, not forgetting the precious satin, "I think I remember to have a dress length very similar to the one you have chosen, marked at half price, owing to a slight damage; but it is so very slight that I am sure it would not interfere with the making up in the least. I will show it to you."

I retired with my armful of silks in great excitement at my ruse, and presently returned with the identical piece of satin, which I had now metamorphosed by various snips of the scissors along the edge, added to one or two dusty finger marks in the middle.

She looked at it carefully.

"It really seems quite as nice as the one you just showed me," she exclaimed in delight.

"It is absolutely the same thing," I said, preserving my countenance, "going at half price because of the damage, and it's only just at this end too. You won't lose half a yard by it in the whole piece."

"I think I'll decide on taking it," she said. "Thank you very much; that is all I require to-day. Will you please send it to Miss Lily Grahame, Ashburnham Grange."

I made out the bill, and after a moment's mental arithmetic announced, "That will be £3 17s. 6d. if you please." But needless to say I settled it at the desk for twice that sum.

"I'll let you have the bill with the parcel," I said guilefully, as I counted out her change, for it is scarcely necessary to add that I meant to take particular care not to inclose it at all.

"Yes, that will do nicely, thank you," she said. "Good morning."

"Good morning," I responded, trying to reconcile myself to her departure.

It came on to rain heavily after she had gone, but the rest of the day was sufficiently bright for me. I had got her name and address too, and though I did not know either, I trusted I should soon find someone who did. I wondered for what ball she was buying her dress, and wished I knew, so that I might also, by hook or by crook, get an invitation.

In my spare hours I took to haunting the road in which she lived, but I never by any chance saw her, and two or three weeks passed; but whatever purchases she found necessary to make, at least they did not bring her to my counter.

I began to despair, when one afternoon I had occasion to pass through the flowers and feathers department, and saw her with an elderly lady, whose attention seemed to be wholly given to a box of roses of every shade and colour that was being displayed to her.

Digitized by Google

I loitered behind a corner that I might watch the girl I loved, and I heard the lady with her say, "None of these are quite what I want, can you show me something else?"

"Certainly, madam," answered the assistant, and she mounted a short pair of steps to reach down some more boxes.

It was not a dangerous position if she had taken ordinary care, but somehow the steps slipped, and she reached out desperately to save herself, and a whole shower of heavy boxes came tumbling down with her. She was herself unhurt, but in her fall she carried Miss Grahame to the ground also.

Fortunately I saw the boxes coming, and was there to spring to the rescue of my love, but even then I was not quite in time to save her wholly; one of the heavy boxes had struck her on the temple, and she lay motionless on the ground.

I raised her in my arms, and sought to reassure the trembling old lady with her.

"She is only stunned," I said. "See, she begins to open her eyes already."

And, sure enough, before the distracted shop-girl who had caused the accident, returned with restoratives, Miss Grahame had opened her eyes to look into mine, and find me bending over her, while her head still nestled unconsciously against my shoulder.

"Where am I? What has happened?" she asked, struggling up.

I guided her to a chair, but insisted on still supporting her as between us we applied the restoratives, and presently she began somewhat indignantly to repudiate our ministrations.

"Come, let us go home," she said. "I am quite able to, now."

"Do you really feel better?" asked the lady with her. "There is quite a bruise on your forehead. Now, I do hope it will be well for Lady Brancepeth's ball next week."

"Oh, yes, I'm sure it will!" said Miss Grahame hastily. "I feel all right now. Thank you so much," she added, turning to the shop girl, who stood somewhat tearfully at her side.

The other lady looked severely in her direction.

"It has been a very narrow escape," she said, "and if it had not been for this young man's providential presence of mind, such carelessness might have had very serious results. My dear," she continued, turning to Miss Grahame, "this young man has saved you from a very nasty accident, and been most helpful too. We shall not forget you," she added condescendingly to me.

Miss Grahame looked at me and blushed, and I felt like blushing too.

"I'm sure I ought to thank you very much," she said, in an embarrassed but wholly charming manner, while, as for me, I was so overcome by this direct speech and look from her that I could only bow awkwardly, and disclaim having rendered any service that called for thanks.

I escorted them to their carriage, and, as they drove away I distinctly heard the old lady remark—

"A very gentlemanly young man, my dear, quite a superior person!"

Then the irony of the situation struck me, and I could not help laughing as I returned to my duties. Well, I could afford to laugh, for I knew at least one ball that my divinity would grace, and that was Lady Brancepeth's.

She was an old friend of my mother's when they were girls together, and I felt sure if I ran through my correspondence of a month back I should find her invitation among others, if not already destroyed.

I soon discovered it, and lost no time in resigning my position on the staff of Messrs. Price and Hunter's establishment, as I felt that that episode in my life had served its turn.

I awaited the night of the Brancepeth ball with impatience, and over and over again I wondered how she would receive me.

When I reached Lady Brancepeth's, and saw her surrounded by admirers, men of every grade and fortune, my determination to be loved for myself alone, wavered.

I felt that to win her I could even stoop to use my wealth as a lever, even if needs be myself come to play the rôle of unloved bridegroom.

When Guy Brancepeth, my college chum, came up to me and patted me on the back, and asked, "Don't you want an introduction to the belle of the ball?" indicating Miss Grahame, glorious in the white satin I had sold her, my feelings had become very mixed indeed, and I was almost incapable of speech when, without waiting for my answer, I found he had transported me to her presence, and pronounced the mystic formula over us which culminates in orthodox acquaintance.

Yes, she recognised me, there was no doubt about that, but if she felt surprise or annoyance she concealed them both admirably. I could almost have thought that pleasure lurked in her greeting to me.

She spared me more than one dance on her programme, and, when she was whirled away from me by an eager partner, I felt that I could not rest after to-night without knowing my fate.

I knew I risked much by putting it to the test so soon, but I was longing to stand well in her eyes, to clear myself from a false position, to prove that I had something to give as well as ask.

"Would you?" I asked, when, in the course of the evening, I had succeeded in getting her to myself in a quiet corner, "marry for love or money?"

"They never go together, do they?" she said, with a little catch in her voice, "It's bound to be a choice nowadays, isn't it?"

"But that's begging the question," I said.

"The question?" she said absently. "Oh, well, of course, I'd marry for love if I had the choice, but I haven't, you see!"

My heart sank. Was she too, like all the rest?

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"Oh, well, you see," she said carelessly. "I've no money, not a penny in the world. I live with my aunt, but I'm really only a sort of paid companion to her. Would you not change all that for love, money, and independence?"

"Then," I said, "you love the man?"

She laughed merrily.

"No. I don't love the man."

I was dumfounded.

"But you are going to marry him?"

"I suppose so. I don't know!"

"And you," I said sternly, "can tell me this after having just owned that of your own choice you would marry for love rather than money."

"Yes, but then I never had the choice," she said, innocently, "because I never loved anyone till now."

Her words were calculated to dash my last hope to the ground. "She loves, she is loved," I said to myself, "she is not for me!" Filled with despair I raised my eyes to look at her. Her own were downcast, and her face covered in burning blushes.

In a moment I ventured to put a new interpretation on her words. Her blush proclaimed them unguarded.

"Could you love me?" I asked softly, bending towards her.

The sweet lips trembled. I tried to catch their answer, but it was sufficient that they granted me unresistingly a lover's privilege.

"And you won't mind," I asked presently, "if I am poor?"

"No," she said, nestling against me, "and some day you shall have a shop of your own, and I'll trim the hats."

I laughed outright, she was such a child.

"But what would you say," I asked, "if I could buy the shop already?"

She clapped her hands.

"Oh, but could you? Could you?"

I smiled.

"I think I may say I could buy you the inside of any shop you like, and not of one shop, but a hundred. And," I said gaily, "we don't buy shops with kisses, you know, but with money—pounds, shillings and pence. Although sometimes," I added slyly, "you may get a length of satin for love."

And after that speech, naturally, I was called upon to explain myself.

Ellice Beere.

Digitized by Google

GREAT NEW SERIES.

Confessions of a Self-made Girl

The writer of these Confessions relates in this series of articles the true story of her life, from the time when she left Cornwall, an unsophisticated but ambitious girl, until she made her name and fortune. Her name is well known to you.

[For the purposes of these Confessions I am calling myself Maud Cardew, as my real name is too well known for me to wish to make the story of my life public in this manner.]

The Principals in the Story.

MAUD CARDEW.—The self-made girl.

HON. ROBERT LESTRANGE. (Commonly known as Bobbie.)

REGINALD (DI) NORTHCOTE.

Men who had helped her to come to London and befriended her on her arrival.

MY SUCCESS AS AN ACTRESS.

Twenty-four hours of the most intolerable nervousness is what I think I remember most about the First Night of the new play. It was a time in which I could neither sit nor stand, run nor walk, eat nor sleep—I was almost paralysed with dread.

"What if I fail?"—I kept asking myself. "What if I fail?"

It was my chance—I knew that well—a chance that would perhaps never come again. I must succeed.

Yet the nervousness grew upon me, and at last in desperation I wired for Bobbie. When he arrived he asked me what on earth was the matter.

"You look like a boiled owl," he said; "with its head on the wrong way."

I explained to him my hopeless condition, and, instead of being in the least concerned, he threw back his head and laughed boisterously.

"Oh, this is highly interesting!" he said. "The prima donna struck by stage fright, and the kneeling multitudes waiting anxiously. Don't be a little fool, Queenie! Why, you can't fail! If ever success were certain, yours is. I wish it weren't, then you'd have to marry me to console yourself."

I smiled at him. "That would be a poor bargain for you, Bobbie," I told him; "I'm sure you've far too much sense to throw yourself away on any girl who only took you as a consolation prize."

"Not at all," he answered blandly. "The main point about matrimony is to marry the girl you want. The sweetest creature that ever strayed out of Heaven is no good to a man if she doesn't happen to be the girl he wants. And in nine cases out of ten she isn't, for sweet creatures are apt to get a little bit tame."

"Oh, Bobbie!" I interrupted; "and I fondly believed you considered me sweet."

"What—you sweet!" he echoed, in feigned amazement. "But, my dear Queenie, look at your temper, and your obstinacy, and your pride! Why, when a chap comes to see you, he never knows whether he's going to be shrivelled up by a glance, or shattered by an attitude, or floored by a sarcasm—unless you happen to be in a particularly good humour, and then you are sublime, and the poor chap feels so pleased with himself because he imagines it is all his doing.

"It's fascinating, you know," running on; "a girl's deadly dull if she's always the same."

I can't say that I felt very flattered, but I was grateful to Bobbie for his chatter, and gladly kept him all the afternoon. At teatime Di arrived, considerably to my surprise.

"I thought I'd just look in," he remarked coolly, "and see that you were all right."

"All right!" laughed Bobbie; "why, she's been shaking like an aspen leaf all the afternoon!"

Di looked at me keenly, and I daresay I was rather pale.

"I ordered some champagne as I came up," he said; "you'd better have two good glasses before you start. It will help you to forget that there is such a thing as failure, and that matters most the first night."

"It might also make it very easy for you to imagine your audience is nothing but a field of cabbages—which I have heard is a great help in overcoming nervousness," said Bobbie wickedly.

Later on Di drove me to the theatre, for which I was grateful.

"You'll be all right," he said, at the last, eyeing me with that keen glance of his. "You've got your colour back, and you look like success."

I smiled and thanked him, going into the theatre with regained self-confidence.

The piece opened with a pretty scene at a fashionable watering-place near New York, in which I was only a country girl selling oranges, but towards the end I had a piece of difficult acting to do in overhearing the story of a gigantic fraud, then being most successfully carried forward by a lady high in American Society, and one or two accomplices.

I owe it to the girl who took this part to say that she acted superbly. Had mine not been the more pleasing and promi nent character, the palm must assuredly have gone to her. As it was she contributed largely to my success, and could only take the second place.

The plot hinged chiefly upon the detection and unravelling of this fraud, in which I became gradually mixed up through no fault of my own, until by a daring stroke, the real offender managed to throw all the suspicion upon me.

There were one or two exceedingly fine passages, notably the one in which she tried to work upon my feelings to clear her for her son's sake. But I had a lover, and for his sake I turned a deaf ear to her passionate pleading, until it came out that they were one and the same person—her son and my lover.

I understood then how true were her words when she had told me this son worshipped her, for I had often heard it from his own lips, and I was confronted with a terrible problem. Either she or I must go to the wall! Which should it be! Which would spare him the bitterest suffering?

In the end I take her guilt upon my shoulders, and one of the finest scenes of all is that in which I and my lover meet afterwards.

It was a beautiful piece to act—I have never liked any scene so much since, and Yorke Donovan was perfect in it. It begins with passionate intreaty that what he has heard is untrue, followed by the upbraiding of unendurable pain, and then a silence upon both of us that is more terrible than either.

It was an act that I always felt supremely, and it took more out of me than all the rest of the play together. It had in it that element of intensity that I have always welcomed in my life, and without which all life to me has looked colourless and dull. A calm, easy-going life had absolutely no attractions for me.

Sometimes when acting that scene, I was conscious of a fine irony towards the crowded house of beautifully-dressed people. I could see, partly perhaps, with my mind's eye, the eager interest struggling to rise to real feeling, against the inborn inanity, discontent, or boredom of the Society woman. I felt I wanted to turn round and address them.

"You!" I would have said scornfully; "what do you know of life beyond your dressmaker, and your admirers? What can you appreciate truly of any depth? The supreme sacrifices and loves that make it real—what are they to you but an 'idle tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing.'"

By my special wish we never appeared after that act. The curtain rose once upon my lover sitting with his arms upon a table and his face buried in them, while I turned to take one last, long, yearning look from the door, then fell silently. There was no bowing, and little applause—the whole thing was too intense. Mr. Gregory only gave way after a good deal of persuasion, but in the end he was glad, and Yorke Donovan was with me all through.

"If we drop suddenly to the commonplace by bowing for applause, the whole scene loses its grip," I urged, and he soon came to see it in that light himself.

I wonder it is not a rule followed more by others in the profession. Many a fine scene has seemed to me to lose very much by that sudden drop to the commonplace of the bowing actors, where we should do better to remember them as the men and women they have just been personating.

The final act, when the mother dies, just on the point of confessing, is a powerful piece of writing, but it lacks much of the simplicity of the former acts. There is a slightly forced air of unreality about it. One feels the writer's chief idea was that everything must come right somehow.

For the benefit of those who have never seen the play, I may add that the son never learns the truth about his mother, and there is a striking instance in which his love for her, as he believed her, saves him in an hour of temptation.

A junior at the bar, who is his devoted friend, eventually brings us together by proving to him that I am absolutely blameless, without betraying the real culprit, whom he also proves they have discovered after her death.

This is a clever piece of writing, because it has a most convincing effect, and one is strung to a high pitch of anxiety lest the son should want to know too much, and discover the truth.

It was when Yorke Donovan clasped me in his arms just before the curtain fell, that we realised truly the extent of our success. The applause was literally deafening, and calls were at once made for the author, Yorke Donovan, and myself, the applause the whole time continuing tremendous.

When at last they allowed us to retire, I was growing quite exhausted, and beginning to feel that my overstrung nerves could not hold out much longer. But I had not half done yet, for several critics were waiting to congratulate me, and Mr. Gregory was almost beside himself with delight. I gave them my hands a little vaguely, and looked round for—Di.

I have smiled about that since and wondered not a little. Di had not done half to make me look for him that Bobbie had, and yet there was no hesitation about my glance. Was it that I knew in spite of his apparently apathetic nature he had in reality the deeper feeling?—or was it that I was curious to discover how he liked the piece, and if he had felt at all?

Well, I do not know, for I cannot analyse my feelings about Di even now; I can only reluctantly confess, that though he sometimes irritates me almost past endurance, I invariably turn to him at once in any time of distress. That evening my eyes quickly met his, though he remained in the background, and made no attempt to come and congratulate me. Yet somehow I felt satisfied. I cannot explain how it was, but I knew quite well that his verdict was good.

As for Bobbie, he wanted to hug me with delight, and I had quite a difficulty to keep him within bounds, though every now and then he would suddenly break off with a doleful lament, that now, at any rate, I should never take him as a consolation prize.

The story of the next few months can be related in a few words. I received numberless letters of congratulation, mostly from people I had never seen—the seats sold far ahead—the piece was announced a brilliant success—and I was the popular actress of the season.

I moved into a West-end suite of rooms, accompanied by a comfortable middle-aged lady, whom I had engaged as chaperon and housekeeper, received visits from, and was entertained by, some of the highest in the land—and generally shook hands with myself and all the world.

Meanwhile Bobbie continued my devoted attendant. He came and went just as he pleased, talked slang, scolded me, smoked cigars in my drawing-room, and made most insulting remarks about any man friend I seemed to favour.

At intervals he asked me to marry him, as he had said he should, always in some more or less eccentric fashion, and with the same absolutely dauntless nerve. Sometimes he worried me, but I would not have been without him for anything.

Di, on the other hand, seemed to avoid me more. He called in the early days of my success and offered to be my banker and general business manager, for which I was most grateful to him, and afterwards his occasional visits were more or less of a business nature. I cannot say this pleased me. As a matter of fact, it irritated me sometimes to such an extent, that I purposely annoyed him. I used to feel that even quarreling with him was better than the stony composure he appeared to cultivate between us.

Digitized by Google

And now I have come to the time when I first sat down to write these confessions, at the flood of my new success, with the world practically at my feet. Perhaps I was a little intoxicated by it all; perhaps I was more impatient than ever of control—I do not know, but at any rate I allowed my obstinacy to lead me into a foolish step, resulting in an awkward dilemma.

Young Lady Filby, who had just got a separation from her husband, but not come off altogether with flying colours, tried to persuade me to go to Switzerland with her and a few others for some skating. Di disapproved of the idea, and came to tell me so.

He called early before I was down, and, knowing his object, I purposely kept him waiting while I changed my dress for one I thought more becoming, and finally sailed into the room with as nonchalant an air as I could muster, conscious that I was looking my best. He was standing on the hearth-rug biting his underlip, as he always did when worried, and his eyes were keen and cold as they met mine.

"You must have thought I was never coming," I exclaimed gaily. "It was too bad of me, but I had mislaid a diamond brooch, and as you are not a busy man, I ventured to keep you waiting while I hunted for it."

"Pray don't apologise," he said, shaking hands coldly. "I hope you were successful."

"Yes. As usual it was only put away fastened into a dress. I am very glad. Prince Kia gave it to me, and I should not like to lose it."

"I, on the contrary, should wish to lose it, were I in your place," he said.

I shrugged my shoulders and laughed lightly.

"From a moral point of view, or because he is of a somewhat inky tinge?" I asked.

"Both," he answered firmly, and shut his lips tightly.

I got up and busied myself carelessly with a vase of flowers, at the same time giving him an opening.

"You have come just in time to say 'good-bye'" I remarked, "I am expecting to start for the Continent next week."

"That is what brought me here before—before you found your brooch," with a delicate sneer."

"Indeed!" I exclaimed. "I imagined it was a business call."

"You can consider it so if you like."

I waited, and he went on in that quiet, masterful way of his, that gave one no loophole whatever. "I should in fact prefer to call it business. I understand you contemplate a trip with Lady Filby's party. Is this correct?"

"Certainly it is," I replied at once.

I cannot tell you why, but just as before, the moment he wished to influence me for my good, a little devil seemed to take possession of me. If only he would not be so arbitrary, I thought, or at any rate so resolutely business-like in all our intercourse. I would have been guided by him. But I could not forgive him the gulf he maintained between us, and the steady reserve, from which only at the merest intervals he ever emerged. Was I not good enough to be his friend? I asked, forgetting that it was his manner to every woman, and steeled myself against him.

"I am sorry," he said, "I hoped I might have been wrongly informed. However, perhaps it is not too late for you to change your arrangements?"

"I am afraid it is," I replied. "And in any case I should not wish to do so." As a matter of fact, I had made no definite arrangements whatever, but the little devil was still prompting me.

"You are very unwise," he said, maintaining his habitual quiet. "I think you should know your world better by this time."

I was rather fond of Lady Filby in a way. She was a pretty, harmless little creature, or at least so I thought, and I chose to be nettled for her.

"What have you to say against my friend, Lady Filby?" I asked, facing him squarely.

"It is not what I have to say," he replied, "nor the Law Courts. It is what Society says."

"You mean I am to listen to the pot calling the kettle black?" I said coldly.

"Not exactly, but even in that case, the chances are the kettle would still be black."

"But not at all to the extent the pot would make out."

"Then you know things are said?" he questioned.

"I have heard that various scandal-mongers have hit upon her for their latest victim," I replied, "but I should scorn to lend an ear to such petty gossip."

"And if I tell you I believe it is true?" he asked.

"What! You turn scandal-monger also!" I inquired, raising my eyebrows significantly.

He flushed slightly under his white skin.

"If I do it is for your welfare," he said.

"I'm sure you are very kind," I answered, with a touch of sarcasm, "but I think you are taking an unnecessary course."

He was silent for what seemed quite a long time, and a curious struggle went on in my heart. I wanted to get up and go to him and say: "Do be friendly and ask me in a nice way, Di, I don't really care a fig about going." Yet something in his expression still repelled me.

"I wish I could convince you," he said at last. "Whatever you may think, I believe Lady Filby to be a clever, designing woman, and you will gain no good, and possibly considerable harm, from travelling in her company."

I got up, and, strolling to the window, drummed upon the sill with my fingers.

"I am sorry," I said, "but we do not see things in the same light at all, so this conversation is eminently useless. I look upon Lady Filby as an injured friend, and what you say, since I do not believe a word of it, will only make me more resolved to stand by her."

"Very well," he answered quietly, preparing to take his leave. "I can only remind you once again that should you be in any difficulty and want help, you have only to send to me and I will do what I can;" and he held out his hand.

"You are very good," I said, feeling inwardly ashamed of myself, and then he rather hurriedly left the room and went out.

I stood a long time looking out of the window, and then I picked up the paper and set myself to read it.

"I would not have gone if you had put it differently, Di," I kept saying, and all the time the words danced over the lines I was reading.

(In next Tuesday's instalment I meet a duke.)

Digitized by Google

BRAND NEW COMPETITION. Start To-day.

Cash Down. Cash Down. Cash Down.

1st Prize, £50. 2nd Prize, £25. 3rd Prize, £10.

And 25 Gramophones.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below will be found six paragraphs containing the buried names of Railway Stations in the United Kingdom (or words that sound the same as the names). You must write in the spaces given the names of the Railway Stations so indicated.

No word or part of a word may be used more than once in making up the name of a Railway Station. In the event of the name of a Railway Station occurring more than once in a sentence, it should be underlined and written down each time. In case of more than one person finding the same number of words for each or any sentence, those words containing the largest number of letters will have preference. No name of a Railway Station may be composed of a single letter, either standing by itself or taken from any word in the sentences.

When you have discovered the names of Railway Stations in the sentences, underline (in ink) the words which go to make up the names (or words that sound the same as the names) and then on the line underneath each sentence write (in ink) the correct names of the Railway Stations to be found in each.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to Bradshaw's Guide, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or Room Eight, SHORT STORIES, 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The names of the Railway Stations consist of one word or two or more consecutive words, or consecutive parts of one word, or two or more consecutive words.

The first prize of £50 will be given to the Competitor who fills in the greatest number of railway stations under the conditions stated. The second prize of £25 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in the order of merit.

When you have filled in all the names you can find, cut out the list below and keep it by you. Don't on any account send it to us until the closing date is announced in SHORT STORIES. A fifth list of sentences will appear next week.

In the event of a tie a further list (or, if necessary, several further lists) of sentences will be submitted to the tieing competitors until one wins the first prize outright.

CUT THROUGH HERE

EXAMPLE.

The oaks were swaying in the breeze, the cows were grazing peacefully, when out of the park tore a huge black bull.

The Oaks, Sway, Cowes, Grays, Park, Black Bull.

FOURTH LIST.

19. They left the city by the south gate; while going along a bare lane one of the horses stumbled on a flint.

20. The box contained over twenty different varieties of seeds, besides ferns and seedlings.

21. They talked of the new buildings in Soho, also of the groin just erected at Pwllheli.

22. In the village post-office I met Hilda Morriston; she was on her way to the travellers' rest near Wemyss Castle.

23. The price of coal fell much lower in spite of the distress among the miners. They would not on any account work.

24. Moira showed Sir Guy her new sewing machine, which her neighbour, Mrs. Grotton, had given her.

NAME ..... ADDRESS .....

Digitized by Google

WILD MAG.

The Story of a Waif.

"VIOLETS! Penny a bunch! Here you are, sir—just do for your button-hole!"

The girl held out the little bunch of flowers in front of the elder of the two young men who were passing, and walked a step or two by his side, in the hope of inducing him to purchase.

It was a bitterly cold night, and she shivered occasionally as the wind pierced her ragged clothes.

It was easy to see that she was not the ordinary flower-girl, yet it would have been exceedingly difficult to explain in which manner she differed from the others. Most of the passers-by who went up and down that thoroughfare regularly, and so knew the girls by sight, recognised the difference, and were puzzled to account for it. "She's one of 'em, an yet she isn't!" was the lucid way in which the policeman stated the fact.

She was known familiarly as Wild Mag, and she owed this nickname to her peculiar disposition. At one time she would be as quiet as a lamb, demure, and even sad; at another she would be the embodiment of wild exuberance. To-day, dejected and taciturn; to-morrow, full of fun, babbling like a brook, ready for any practical joke. And the change would sometimes take place with startling suddenness.

It was currently supposed that there was some Southern blood in her veins, which might explain these vagaries, but nobody knew. She was good-natured to a fault, but she also showed signs of Southern vindictiveness on occasions.

"A penny won't break you!" she continued, thrusting the flowers a little nearer to the man's face, and uttering a merry laugh as she did so. Then the light from the large lamp outside the club fell full upon his features, and Wild Mag drew back involuntarily; she did not like the look of that face.

She did not withdraw quickly enough, however. The man, angry at her intrusion, threw up his arm with brutal force, catching her at the elbow, and sending her reeling. She had great difficulty in saving herself from falling, but after staggering for a couple of yards she succeeded in keeping her balance.

A storm of angry invective rose to her lips; her eyes flashed, and she half raised the little board, on which she carried her bunches of violets, in order to draw the strap over her head and hurl the board at him, but at that moment his companion came up to her.

"I am very sorry, and I hope you are not hurt!" he said, with true gentlemanly feeling. "My friend is worried, I fear, and—that is, I really do not think he meant it!"

Wild Mag eyed him curiously; she was touched by this attempt at apology, and the tenderer feeling struggled with rage for the mastery.

"You excuse me when I tell you I don't quite take it in!" she declared, with strange dignity.

"Oh, but—" began Kenneth Markham, somewhat lamely, adding hastily: "I'll have six bunches—some other time!" He dropped a sixpence on the board, which had been permitted to resume the horizontal position, and hurried after his companion.

Wild Mag watched them till they disappeared in a club. She took up the sixpence, stared at it, and then, with one of those sudden impulses that were part of her nature, she kissed it passionately.

"One of them is the sort of man you could kill" she hissed through her clenched teeth. "The other——" and here the change of expression was marvellous, and the voice became sweet and musical—"is the sort of man you wouldn't mind being killed for! I've got two debts to pay," she continued in a matter-of-fact tone—"a bad turn and a good turn, and I'll pay them some day!"

The two men passed into the club, the one callous and indifferent, and the other regretful, and neither guessed how soon the incident would have its effect or how wide-reaching the effect would prove.

The next morning Kenneth Markham passed through the street alone; he was in deep thought, and appeared somewhat worried.

He was not aware of Wild Mag's proximity till she pressed a bunch of violets into his hand.

"I don't want any. Oh, it is you! Yes, here is the money!" he said confusedly.

"It's paid for!" she cried, with a slight hysterical laugh. "Six bunches! And six dozen, if you'll have them!" And she was gone.

Scarcely knowing whether to be amused or annoyed, Kenneth went his way to the club where he was to meet Reginald Adeney. Thence they made their way to a private house, where the gaming tables were the attraction.

Three evenings in succession this happened, but on the fourth he declined to accept.

"I will take it, if you will take this!" he said quietly, holding out a shilling. "You are cold, and you look hungry. You were not well treated the other evening, and some compensation is due to you. Take this, and we will cry quits!"

It was strange that he should be holding this colloquy with a flower-girl, but he could not help it; the girl impressed him, and he liked the idea of befriending her.

"I'll take it if you'll let me give you some advice!" said the girl suddenly. She took the coin and laid her hand lightly on his arm. "You did me a good turn, and I want to pay it back. Don't you trust that man you go with to play cards and all that! His face is bad—I tell you it is!" she cried vehemently, as he shook his head. "I can see it!"

Digitized by Google

She bent and kissed his hand, and fled swiftly along the street. When she was out of his sight, she almost paralysed with amazement a masculine vendor of matches by giving him the shilling without a word and running off again. A few yards farther down, a policeman was standing contemplatively near the kerb; she gave a shout of mad laughter as she tipped his helmet over his eyes, after which she rushed at full speed down a narrow street till she was out of breath, squatting down on a step and weeping as if her heart would break.

Half an hour later she arose and wandered towards the miserable house where she usually obtained shelter for the night.

Kenneth Markham had an uncomfortable feeling within his breast after Wild Mag ran away; her words made him think. He was conscious of the fact that he had been gambling very heavily, but that Reginald Adeney had in any way lured him into evil paths, or was interested in his downfall, seemed absurd.

Adeney was the best of fellows, always ready to oblige and advise. He was not much older in years than Markham, but he was much older in experience, and this experience was valuable to a young man who had just attained his majority and succeeded to a large fortune.

He was something of a family connection, too, being a second cousin to Marian Laing, on her father's side, and Markham was cousin to Marian on the mother's side and engaged to her. What possible reason could Adeney have for acting against him? Yet, he could not get the "advice" out of his mind.

Wild Mag stood before him, facing the ruffianly assailants.

How queerly the girl behaved! "One might almost suppose that she was—— Pshaw! I mean, she had taken a fancy to me!" thought Markham.

Adeney was there before him and Markham was soon lost in the excitement of the game. He lost a good deal, and all the while he was playing there came to him the thought that he would "cut" this sort of thing in a day or two. Adeney came to his side and whispered that he must be off, but Markham only nodded and went on playing.

It was just past midnight when Kenneth Markham left the house and walked homewards; it was a practice of his to walk, as it cleared his head.

He felt rather "seedy," and regretted that he had not smoked and drunk less.

He proceeded at a fairly brisk pace till he reached a quiet point in a main thoroughfare, when he was roughly pulled up by coming butt against a hulking youth. Angry words followed from the lips of this rough, Markham retorted, and the moment afterwards he was being hustled. He struck out manfully, but he would have stood no chance with them.

As he made an effort to reach the houses, in order to place his back against the wall, another figure came upon the scene. Wild Mag stood before him, facing the ruffianly assailants and speaking with scorn and passion.

"Clear out of it, Jimmy Grimes and the whole gang of you! I know you all, and I heard you hatching this game hours ago! D'ye hear? It's Wild Mag who's talking, and I tell you I'll put the police on the lot of you. Touch him if you dare!"

She stood before them with her arms folded across her bosom, defying them, and they cowered under the threat and the influence of her presence. They knew her, for she was practically one of them, living among them; they knew that she would do what she said, and they dared not molest her. She had inspired both love and respect—the respect that comes from fear, perhaps—and they slunk away like beaten curs.

"You can go safe now!" said the girl, addressing Markham. "They won't touch you again, as they knows I understand their game!" she concluded with a laugh.

"I owe you a great debt," rejoined Kenneth gravely. "They would have murdered me, most probably. How is it that you have this power over them?"

"I told you to look out for that friend of yours," cried Wild Mag, almost defiantly, "and I tell you again! He wants to ruin you! I heard him making a deal with Jimmy Grimes to set on you—heard him not long ago—and I've kept watch ever since!"

Kenneth listened with mixed feelings. He could not believe that Reginald Adeney had done such a thing; he was more inclined to doubt the veracity of this waif of the street; yet she spoke with such sincerity that he felt ashamed of the doubt. In any case, she had saved him, and he owed a debt of gratitude and, moreover, she was worthy of better surroundings. Better dressed, and toned down a little by contact with more refined persons, she would be good looking, yes, really attractive!

"I will try to repay you for your help. No, don't refuse. You ought to be better cared for, and earn your living more easily! Take this card and go to the address I am writing on the back. There is a young lady there whom I—er—think a great deal of; she will take you into her service. I'll speak to her about you."

He could not see the sudden blanching of the cheek which followed the utterance of the words "think a great deal of," or he might have been startled. Mag pressed her hand to her side, and her breath came short. She took the card, and remembered nothing of what followed until he was gone.

"You're a fool, a blind fool, Mag!" she muttered fiercely. "What made you think that you could be a mate for such as he? You! And yet you did think so, so don't deny it! You did, you did! And you can crush it down like this—this!"

She clenched her hand, screwing the card in a ball, while her fingers and her features worked convulsively, telling of the depth of feeling.

"Shall I go to her? Yes, I will! It will give me the chance of seeing him sometimes, and I shall find out whether she is true to him or larks with others and makes him unhappy, and if she does——!" The right hand was raised solemnly, and Mag hurried away to avoid a policeman who was coming leisurely to the scene where a murder was near to having been committed.

Digitized by Google

And thus it came about that Wild Mag entered the service of Marian Laing as maid, and was once more able to save the man she loved in secret.

"How does the new maid get on?" was the query of Kenneth Markham, a week later, and Marian, a quietly enchanting girl of twenty, made a pretty pout and smiled dubiously.

"She is getting a little less awkward," she replied, "and, as she is quick to learn and desirous to please, she will do in time; but she is a trouble in other ways."

"It was very good of you to take her as your own maid," said Kenneth lamely.

"She wouldn't have stopped long in any other capacity!" declared Marian. "And we owed her a great debt of gratitude."

"What trouble does she cause?"

"She is so eccentric and full of—well, mischief. She is just like a great schoolboy at times, and I have hard work to keep her in bounds, especially as I cannot help being amused by her vagaries. But she will get on. Do you know, Ken, she came face to face with Reggie yesterday, and she positively scowled at him! That wasn't proper, so I had to scold her afterwards. She fired up, and said several things about him, but I put it down to her temper—I am sure she has a bad temper!—and I discreetly let the matter drop. I am glad that Reggie didn't notice her look."

"Yes, send for the police," she cried, waving the piece of crumpled paper aloft.

Kenneth said nothing, but he looked grave. Since that night attack he had pulled himself together, as he expressed it, and had ceased to frequent the gaming tables. He had also avoided Adeney, so far as he could without being offensive. He had discovered no foundation for Mag's denunciation, but it made him cautious.

Another week slipped by. Mag had become a general favourite in the house; her fellow servants had learnt her nickname, and, as it fitted her so well, they adopted it. She amused them by her free and easy manner, by her tricks and her witticisms.

She was a capital mimic, and on one occasion simply convulsed them by imitating the somewhat pompous manner of Mr. Laing. Only once did they see her angry; that was when a workman engaged in the house attempted to treat her familiarly. The scene that ensued was one not likely to be soon forgotten either by the man or those who witnessed it.

She was scrupulous and honest to a degree, notwithstanding her rough and mischief-loving disposition, and if anyone had entertained a doubt on the subject, that doubt vanished after the attempt to kiss her.

Wild Mag entered her mistress' room one morning, with a song on her lips, as usual, but the tune died away when she saw Marian weeping.

"What's the matter?" she asked abruptly, placing her hand on Marian's shoulder, and speaking more like an equal than a servant. "What's it about?"

Marian made no reply, and Wild Mag repeated the question sharply.

"You don't understand! You cannot understand!" moaned Marian. "It's about Ken, I mean Mr. Markham. He is in dreadful trouble!"

"What?" gasped Mag, her face assuming an expression of intense anxiety. "What trouble? Tell me, I want to know!"

Marian was too full of her trouble to notice the tone of voice in which Mag spoke. The latter had conceived much affection for her mistress, although she regarded Marian as her successful rival—the woman who had a right to Markham, whereas she had none. She leant over the weeping girl, and stroked her hair, while Marian, feeling the need of confiding in someone, told Mag what had happened.

"He is accused of forging a bill of acceptance in Lord Mallam's name to pay gambling debts."

"That's a lie!" said Wild Mag, with deliberate bluntness.

"What else?"

"He could not get at his own money in time to avoid discovery, they say, as it is in securities which he cannot realise for some time. They suspected him of getting this stolen money, and they found on him a bank note with the number of one of the notes given against the acceptance, and he cannot say how he came by it. Of course, he denies the charge, but they have arrested him!"

"It's a plant! A plot, I mean!" asserted Wild Mag energetically. "Well, I wouldn't cry about it; I'd——"

"You would cry about it, if you loved him as I do!" interrupted poor Marian.

"No, I wouldn't!" muttered Wild Mag, clenching her teeth as if to stifle a pain. "I'd work! And I will work, though I'm supposed not to love him!" Aloud she said calmly, "Someone must work. I've been brought up rougher than you, that's how we look at it differently. I can do the detective dodge. I'm used to prowling about, and I'll find out something. Let me put on some rags and turn flower girl again! He helped me, and I'll help him!"

Marian shook her head helplessly.

"Father is taking it up, but he is inclined to think that Ken is guilty——did it in a weak moment," she moaned. "Mr. Adeney is doing what he can."

"Is he?" sneered Wild Mag. "See here! Do you believe he's guilty?" The question was asked fiercely.

"No!" declared Marian decidedly, looking up boldly. "I do not!"

"That's right!" said Wild Mag, with a sigh of relief. "Now we can go on. I'm going out—to think it over."

On her way out she heard voices in one of the rooms. She put her ear to the keyhole.

She heard a word here and there, but she gleaned enough to convince her that Adeney was doing his best to poison the old man's mind, even while he was pretending to be anxious to get Markham out of the mess. She listened further; after a few seconds she stood erect, and with a triumphant gleam in her eyes.

"I see it now!" she murmured. "He is not rich and he wants money. Miss Laing is rich; he wants her and her money—her money above all. He can't get it while he is in the way! That's good enough for me, and I'm on the track!"

She stood irresolute now. Should she dress up and dog his steps. Quick-witted as she usually was, she seemed at fault now; her head was confused and she clutched at the hall-stand to steady herself.

In a few moments she felt better, and her eyes fell on a hat and coat hanging there. Like a flash her mood changed.

Digitized by Google

She felt the necessity of venting her anger against this man, and her spite took the form of ridicule.

She slipped off her hat and jacket and in a minute had assumed the heavy overcoat, with astrachan collar, and the high hat belonging to Reginald Adeney, and was mimicking him to a nicety.

Smothered laughter caught her ear, and she turned to find three of the servants watching her from a safe distance. She began grimacing about, feeling in the inner breast pocket with an exact imitation of Adeney's mannerism and then exaggerating his gestures.

She dived her hand into this inner pocket and her fingers touched a crumpled piece of paper.

She took it out from its corner, intending to throw it at the grinning servants, but she stopped as another idea occurred to her and she smoothed it out quickly and pretended to read it through an eye-glass, formed by curling her thumb and forefinger.

The servants laughed and waited for the next move, but Wild Mag was really reading. Then the door opened and Adeney and Mr. Laing stood with wide-opened eyes in front of the girl!

"I'll have no more of this nonsense in my house!" roared Mr. Laing furiously. "I've told Marian already that this new maid is—is a bother! It's degrading! She's like a street urchin! How dare you? Take them off instantly and get out of the house!"

"Oh, Mag!" cried Marian, coming down the stairs.

"Send for the police!" cried Adeney angrily. He had recognised the girl before, but he had made no sign, and he was now secretly glad of the chance of being rid of her.

"Yes," cried Wild Mag, drawing herself to her full height and slipping out of the coat, which she threw on the floor and the high hat on the top of it. "Send for the police! I have something to say to them! I want to tell them who forged the paper and got the money, and why it was done!"

She raised the crumpled sheet of thin notepaper and waved it aloft. With a hoarse cry, Adeney rushed at her; it was the slip of paper he had missed and thought he must have burnt with other awkward evidence! He guessed what had happened to it now!

Wild Mag awaited his coming quietly, but as he neared her she lunged out her arm viciously and her clenched fist struck him full in the face.

A great hubbub followed. Wild Mag was ordered to her room, but she held to the paper like grim death. Marian went to her and read the incriminating evidence. It was a note, unsigned, which, short as it was, gave the key to an infamous plot against Kenneth Markham and proved the guilt of Adeney.

Wild Mag heard later what had immediately followed the exposure brought about by her prank, but she did not trouble to understand it fully; all she cared to know was that Kenneth Markham had been released and Adeney had been arrested.

The next thing she knew was that the marriage between Kenneth and Marian was being hastened; Mr. Laing was determined to get the young people settled without more delay.

It was after that announcement that Mr. Laing called Wild Mag into his study and warmly thanked her, at the same time handing her fifty pounds in banknotes. Mag hesitated; the old independent nature begin to assert itself; but she finally accepted.

Back in her own attic chamber Wild Mag was staring into space with set features.

"I cannot stay, I cannot stay!" she wailed. "He will be happy, and she will have him to herself. I want him to be happy, and her too; but I cannot stop to see it! It would kill me, for I love him! I must go, I must go!"

The next morning she was missing; she left a badly-written note to stay that she was off to Australia, and that was all. They tried to find her, but without success. They know that she arrived at Sydney, for she sent a note of congratulation on their marriage; but they never heard again.

F. Brewster.

Your Editor Chats.

The fourth list of sentences in the Competition will be found on page 495. It is not yet too late to enter for it, as back numbers can be obtained on application to the Publisher, inclosing one penny for each copy of Short Stories required, and a halfpenny for the postage of each. Ten lists of sentences will appear in all.

I have had several inquiries from readers regarding some points in connection with the Competition, on which they are not quite clear, and for the benefit of other readers in like difficulties am publishing the inquiries, together with my answers.

Question: Can the letters of the words in the sentences be taken in any order, or must they be taken consecutively?

Answer: It is clearly stated that they must be taken consecutively.

Question: If one word alone makes the name of a railway station, and, combined with the next word, makes another name, can both be used?

Answer: If you will carefully read the conditions of the Competition, you will see that it says that "no word or part of a word may be used more than once in making up the name of a railway station."

Question: Does a "part" of a word consist of a syllable or just letters?

Answer: A part of a word consists of either letters or syllables.

Question: Are country readers as eligible for the prize as those readers who live in towns?

Answer: Certainly they are. If you will refer to previous published competition results you will see that quite a number of names of country winners appear.

One reader points out that in the example sentence there are other names of railway stations which are not underlined. He wants to know why they were omitted?——The fact that only certain words were underlined was not meant to imply that there were no other names of railway stations to be found in the sentence. The example sentence is only to serve as a guide as to how the Competition sentences are to be treated.

In case there are any readers who missed what I previously wrote concerning the Fresh Air Fund, I would just mention the fact that this charity gives a day in the country, with a plentiful supply of good, wholesome food, to a child from one of our big cities, for the small sum of ninepence. Eight pounds two shillings pays for a party of 200 children with the necessary attendants. Last year 126,000 children were benefited by the Fresh Air Fund, and this year it is hoped that even more will do so. Donations of any size will be gratefully received and acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly. All money should be sent to the Hon. Secretary, Fresh Air Fund, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. Collecting forms will be sent on application.

Next week the cover of Short Stories will consist of a reproduction of the Bruce Tartan. The paper itself will contain features appealing particularly to Scottish readers.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

Painting for a Wife.

The Story of a Novel Kind of Wooing.

"Some persons would not comprehend it," murmured Bertram Hardcastle as he stared at the blank canvas on the easel, "but we artists—that is, those whose souls are absolutely in their art—are not quite like ordinary persons, and to me the idea is perfectly intelligible. In fact, it is a natural thing to do! Others may call us cranks, but that is because they can never reach the lofty heights to which the love of our art takes us!"

He continued to gaze fixedly at the canvas and there appeared before his eyes, conjured up by the imagination, the vision of a girl of entrancing loveliness.

The outlines of her form, the cut of her features, the poise of the head—all were perfect. The expression of the countenance was one of ecstasy; it indicated a frame of mind that seized with passion on an idea and became devoted, heart and soul, to it. It was the vision of Nydia Wontner, the daughter of the celebrated Royal Academician.

Mr. Hugh Wontner, R.A., had gained a reputation both as a painter and a teacher of painting; his pupils were all doing good work and bade fair to become celebrated in their turn. He had one great regret—his daughter was not an adept with the brush.

Hugh Wontner had longed for a son to follow in his footsteps, but this joy had been denied to him. He had then centred his care and hopes on Nydia, endeavouring to train her to become an artist of repute, and he had even cherished the belief that one day she would force the Royal Academicians to accept her as one of them.

Nydia was, as already mentioned, loveliness itself, and her adoration of art grew into a mania; but in spite of all her efforts she made no mark in her father's art.

It was a cruel disappointment for both father and daughter, and it seemed incredible that, with her love for it and her undoubted skill in criticism, she was nevertheless little more than a dauber herself. Yet so it was.

Nature is not so blind as some think in her bestowal of gifts upon mortals, for, having plentifully endowed Nydia in other ways, she declined to fill the cup to overflowing.

It was Nature's method of balancing matters. Nydia was lovely and accomplished in other directions, but the artistic skill was denied to her. "Perhaps that gift has been bestowed on another who is not so well endowed physically," observed a worthy clergyman, and Nydia bowed to conceal her grief.

It was precisely this condition of things which had led to the conception of a plan, the promulgation of which had thrown Bertram Hardcastle into such profound meditation. Art was everything to Nydia, and next to it came the longing to afford to her father, as nearly as possible, the pleasure and pride which he had hoped to derive from her abilities.

"I believe that I can inspire within the breast of an artist the passion that will guide his eye and hand to produce masterpieces!" she declared earnestly. "My father says that I inspire him; then I can inspire one or other of his pupils, especially as some of them have hinted at love for me!

"If I help to fame one of my father's pupils, so that the world will say that he owes his celebrity first to his teacher and then to his wife, will it not gratify my father almost to the same extent as if I had been clever with the brush?"

The idea took complete possession of her, and after a week she told her father of her plan.

"There are at least four of your pupils who might become celebrated if they had this inspiring influence," she explained, "and I propose to bring that influence to bear upon one of them. I will marry the one who paints the two best pictures.

"You can tell each of them as they call here; let each choose his two subjects without knowing the subjects chosen by the other three, and let them bring those pictures for exhibition to the gallery where your masterpieces are hung.

"We—you and I—will be the judges. To the world we will announce that you are giving a prize for competition among your best pupils, but only they and I will know the truth!"

"Good!" exclaimed the R.A. "Next to the gratification of my own special desire—which cannot be!—this will please me most!"

He was about to add, as the thought struck him, that the pupils might decline, but he dismissed the notion with a smile; he remembered the slavish devotion with which some of them had watched and attended her, and those were among the most likely pupils.

So the four best pupils were notified, and Bertram Hardcastle was one.

The young artist could not collect his thoughts sufficiently to think of two subjects until two days later. He was completely absorbed by his love for Nydia.

He had always been under a spell of fascination, but he had felt that his love was hopeless, and now the chance of winning her was offered to him. It fanned the flame into a fierce blaze, and he was unable to think coherently.

At last the two subjects suggested themselves; he would paint Nydia in one subject, and it should be as the Almsgiver, while the other picture would be a country scene, a reminiscence of his native village, "The School Treat."

In "The Almsgiver" he would depict Nydia with the tender sympathy of which he was sure she was capable, and in the second painting he might also introduce her as the daughter of the squire, aiding her father's small guests to enjoy the treat. Homely subjects, yet capable of inducing the greatest talent.

The subjects having been approved by Mr. Wontner, the competitors were at liberty to commence their task, but Bertram Hardcastle found it difficult to begin.

He had imagined that he could proceed with the work almost without effort, so great was his passion for Nydia, but now the task seemed too much for him. He began twice, and obliterated the work on the following day.

"I'm as nervous as a kitten!" he groaned. "Yet think of what it means to me, and it will not be surprising that I am in this state! Up till now there had always appeared to be some chance that I might win her, but if I fail in this she is lost to me for ever!

"I can't do anything to-day! I must have a chat with Mrs. Oakley or her daughter. The worthy woman usually calms me down with her sensible, motherly talk, and her daughter seems to be somewhat like her."

He rang the bell and again dropped into a reverie.

"There's a decided difference between Bertha Oakley and Nydia Wontner in looks! By Jove, the landlady's daughter doesn't shine by comparison of looks! A plain face, yet with the same simple attractiveness as her mother's.

Digitized by Google

"She will make a good wife for some mechanic—h'm, perhaps she is fitted for a higher grade, for she is well educated, there's no denying that, and there is refinement about her which suggests more of the lady. That's the danger of the present system of education.

"Of course, if she has it in her it ought to be brought out, I admit, but isn't it going to make her less happy? She will never marry as well as she ought. What chance does she——? Oh, good afternoon, Miss Oakley!" he said aloud, in some confusion. "Let me see, what did I ring for? Oh, give me a cup of tea, please! I'm fagged to-day, and the inspiration won't come!"

"Certainly, Mr. Hardcastle," said the girl quietly, repressing a smile.

"What made me call her 'Miss Oakley'?" Hardcastle asked himself in some perplexity. "I always call her 'Bertha,' and it never appeared out of place till now. Positively, I don't think I can call her by her Christian name again!"

Another pause.

"She and her mother can both help me in the country scene, and I could paint them both in it, of course!" he continued. "Mrs. Oakley naturally remembers the old green better than I do, and I expect her daughter recollects it. It's an advantage in some respects to have a landlady who comes from your native place; she takes a pride in the success of one of its inhabitants, you see!"

Bertha appeared with the tea, laid it out very daintily on the table, and was about to withdraw when Hardcastle stopped her.

"Do you paint now?" he asked suddenly. He remembered how he had given her instruction or hints on several occasions.

"A little, Mr. Hardcastle," replied the girl, flushing.

"That's right!" he remarked approvingly. ("What on earth is she turning red like that for?" he asked himself.) "I have quite forgotten to ask you for—for ever so long!" he added, as he reflected that it was a very long time since he had made any inquiry. "I shall probably want you and your mother to help me," he continued, in an endeavour to be sociable. "I am going to paint a village school treat for a—yes, for a prize."

"That will be very good!" cried the girl enthusiastically, after he had explained the subject of the proposed picture. She appeared to take the greatest interest in it, and evidently looked forward to the chance of being helpful. "It is for a prize? What kind of a prize?"

This question nonplussed Bertram Hardcastle. He had calculated on telling her just as much as he wanted to and no more. It was an awkward inquiry, but he decided to face it boldly.

"A wife!" he said briefly. "If I win, I marry Miss Nydia Wontner!"

The girl rattled the sugar basin against the milk jug and nearly upset it.

"That is a curious idea!" she observed.

"Yes, it may seem so," he admitted; "but she is passionately devoted to art, so she would be just as passionately devoted to the man who could produce a good picture. See?"

Unconsciously it appeared to him that he must justify Nydia's action in the eyes of this girl, although he could not understand why. In fact, he was unable to comprehend why he was thus talking to Bertha at all, yet the conversation pleased him.

"I don't see it that way at all!" replied the girl decisively. "Love should control, not fascination for art."

"Ah, but I am madly in love with her, and she would love me because of my art!" he declared, making the avowal of the state of his feelings without knowing that he had placed his heart on his sleeve. "Then I have to paint another picture; I'll tell you about it!"

He did so, concluding with a glowing panegyric of Nydia, followed by the question, "Have you seen her?"

"Yes, in the park," returned Bertha slowly. "There is the bell. I must go."

She seemed glad to escape. Bertram Hardcastle drank his tea. That talk had somehow done him good, and he made a small beginning with the more important of the two pictures.

The painting progressed slowly day by day; the young artist was not satisfied with himself, and he grew despondent. He tried the effect of alternating the work, and made a beginning with "The School Treat."

Bertha knocked at the door with a letter one afternoon, when he was in a brown study in front of this second picture. He bade her "Come in," and she entered.

"Thank you," he said, taking the letter mechanically and laying it down on a chair. "I say! That child, there, doesn't seem right to me, but I am not very fit this afternoon. Do you see anything wrong about her?"

"Outsiders see more than those engaged!" opined Bertha modestly. "I think the frock is not quite right, and I don't like the expression. It wants just a touch here, and the frock should be just curved there!"

She pointed with a needle which she produced from somewhere, but Hardcastle looked moodily at her. His mind was away from the picture as a matter of fact.

"I wish I could touch it as I see it!" cried Bertha, with a sigh. "But I should spoil it!"

"That won't matter!" cried Bertram carelessly. "It's no good, I know, while I'm doing it! Harry Walton will win, I'm afraid!"

"If I wished to win a wife I should try; I shouldn't turn faint at the very start!" cried Bertha. "I would try, try, try! Nothing should stop me!"

She spoke warmly and her cheeks became suffused with colour. Hardcastle gazed in surprise at her animated face. Now he understood better than ever before how Nydia could conceive her plan—she could inspire! This girl was capable of encouraging and infusing energy into him and life into his work, then how much more so would it be with a beautiful woman like Nydia! He turned for his brush, but Bertha had taken it up and was touching the picture.

"Good!" cried Hardcastle in admiration. "I say, you're clever!"

"No!" she cried hastily, releasing the brush. "Those lines are only daubs, but they show what I mean. You must think me very presumptuous!"

"Not at all!" he told her. He wanted her to stay, but she hurried out of the room.

Mrs. Oakley did not often answer his ring; it was Bertha who came, as a general rule, and he invariably asked her for her opinion on this point or that. He showed her the more important picture and she criticised it, or so much of it as was done, with skill and tact.

Bertram Hardcastle was greatly pleased; this girl was intellectual and discerning, and she was able to point to the faults which had escaped him.

When he felt despondent, which condition was becoming too common to be pleasant, he rang for her on some pretext and then asked for her opinion.

Several days passed and the young artist worked hard, but not one of those days went by without Bertha Oakley looking at his pictures and expressing an opinion. Hardcastle began to regard her criticism as necessary, and he failed to notice that words of encouragement always accompanied the opinion.

Digitized by Google

Men are blind sometimes, although their eyes are wide open; Hardcastle, fascinated by Nydia, was blind to what was occurring nearer to him.

The country scene was finished, but the picture in which Nydia was the central figure was only half done.

"Do you think that is like Miss Wontner?" asked Bertha deferentially, with her eyes fixed on the face painted on the canvas.

"She is more beautiful than that and more kind!" cried Hardcastle enthusiastically. "I can never paint her as she is, and that is why I feel sorry that I chose to do so!"

"You can alter the central figure and make it someone else," said Bertha quietly. "There is time!"

"No, no! It must be she or no one! But why do you ask? Do you not think the likeness good enough to satisfy most people? You have seen her."

"I hardly know," returned Bertha, reddening slightly. "I think—that is, it is difficult to imagine Miss Wontner in that capacity and so the portrait seems——" She stopped in confusion.

"Ah, that is because you do not know her well enough!" cried Hardcastle warmly. "She is goodness itself, I know it! So sympathetic, so lovely, so bewitching!" He pulled himself up abruptly and continued more soberly: "Tell me how you think it might be improved—your advice has been valuable to me, for you have been able to take a calmer view of things than I. Some part of this work must be credited to you!"

Bertha reddened a little more, but deprecated the statement. She drew Bertram's attention to certain details and he made alterations quite as a matter of course.

At last the pictures were completed and sent in. Hardcastle was in a state of great excitement; he made no attempt to conceal his feelings from Bertha Oakley; he treated her now as he would have treated a sister. He was tormented by the fear of losing, and he expressed that fear in order to hear the words of encouragement that always came from Bertha. She spoke quietly, and with her usual unassuming manner, yet with evident sincerity and sympathy.

"I think you will win—I hope you will!" she would say. "That will make you happy, and I am sure that it would please us very much indeed, mother and I, to know that you had attained your desire!"

"Thank you!" he would reply, without even giving a thought to the strangeness of the position in which Fate had thrown them, he and his landlady's daughter.

It was not till the morning of the day on which the result was to be made that this thought occurred to him, and he explained it thus:

"You see, we are from the same village, and the people of our county are very clannish. When they are away from the county they will hold together notwithstanding the greatest difference in social position."

He made his way to the Gallery. It was part of Wontner's plan that the winning artist should learn the result by seeing his pictures with a printed card underneath, on which was the word "Prize."

The four competitors were there at the appointed hour; with straining eyes each sought his own productions. Bertram Hardcastle saw the card attached to the frame of "The Almsgiver," and a similar card under "The School Treat."

His breath came in short gasps; he felt stifled and he staggered from the Gallery into the street. He tried to calm himself, but his head was in a whirl; before his eyes was "The Almsgiver," but the face of the central figure was different—it was Bertha Oakley, not Nydia Wontner!

He placed his hands to his burning brows, but he could not still the throbbing. He saw a hansom passing; he hailed it and told the cabman to drive to his own lodgings. He ought to have gone to Wontner's residence, but something impelled him homewards.

"I've won!" he cried wildly, as Bertha opened the door.

"I'm so glad!" she cried, but even in his excited condition she noticed that his face was deadly pale. "You are ill!" she exclaimed in alarm, as he staggered.

Mr. Wontner waited all day for the successful artist to call and be formally presented to his daughter, and be as formally accepted as her future husband, but Hardcastle came not. He was lying in bed with an attack of brain fever, and he was asking why his brush would paint the plain features of Bertha Oakley in place of the exquisite face of Nydia Wontner. He was delirious, but not wildly so; he was speaking quietly, so quietly and rationally that it was difficult to understand that he was not conscious.

He was in the same condition on the following day, when Mr. Wontner and his daughter called to inquire about him. Nydia was self-willed and refused to stay downstairs.

"Why should I not see him? He is to be my husband, and I have a right to see that proper care is being taken of him!"

Bertha tried to dissuade her, but in vain; so the plain girl led the way, followed by the beautiful, but cold, Nydia, Mr. Wontner, and good Mrs. Oakley.

Hardcastle was talking as they entered.

"It was Bertha who helped me and inspired me!" he was saying in low, distinct tones. "It is her face that I have painted in that picture! Yes, yes, Bertha Oakley is the wife we are trying to win, not Nydia! How was it that I never suspected that she loved me? I see it all now, so plainly, her words of encouragement, her sympathy, the grand expression that came into her eyes and made the plain face beautiful!"

"He is raving!" cried Bertha piteously, wringing her hands and trying to evade the searching look that shot from Nydia's eyes. "You must not listen to him!"

Mrs. Oakley laid a soothing hand on the heated forehead of Bertram Hardcastle, and he was quiet for a time, but not for long. He continued to ramble on in the same manner all the time that Nydia and her father remained.

The Wontners made inquiry twice daily concerning his condition, and they sent dainties when he had recovered sufficiently to take them, but they did not come again.

It was not till Hardcastle had been out for a drive that Mr. Wontner called. He saw Bertram alone; the interview was of some length, and they parted in very amiable fashion. Bertha heard Mr. Wontner say:

"I think this arrangement is the best for all concerned," and Hardcastle assented.

"I said a good many things while I was ill," said Bertram to Mrs. Oakley's daughter when she entered an hour later. "I can guess what they were, from what Mr. Wontner has told me, and what has been running in my mind ever since I fell ill. Well, it's true!"

"What?" inquired Bertha, receding a step as he advanced towards her.

"It's true that I love you, Bertha!" he cried, catching her and pressing her shrinking form to his breast. "And it is true—is it not?—that you love me!"

"I—I don't know!" faltered Bertha, blushing divinely.

"But I know, dearest!" he interrupted, kissing her. "And Miss Wontner recognises that, as we both love one another, the old plan had better be abandoned. To which I heartily assent! I expect she will marry another pupil! I understand that love is more likely to inspire than pride, and that I have at last opened my eyes to the treasure that has been near me all along. I am quite willing that Miss Wontner should marry someone else! Are you, Bertha?"

In reply she laughed a happy little laugh and hid her face on his breast.

G. Hazell.

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIAL.

Held Apart

The Story of a Strange Double Fraud and its Influence upon some Young Hearts, a Great Name, and a Famous Fortune.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Author of "The Golden Dwarf," "A Daughter of Mystery," etc.

SOME INTERESTING PEOPLE.

John Davenal. A diver.
Hannah Davenal. His sister maid to Lady Tarleton.
Moira. Supposed to be the diver's daughter.
Sir Guy Vanbrugh. Moira's lover.
Adeline, Lady Tarleton. His aunt.
Irene Tarleton. Her daughter.
Edward Stormont. Lady Tarleton's brother-in-law.
Paul Jerome. His friend, a war-correspondent and journalist, in love with Irene.
Dennis Hartigan. A ship's steward, and husband of Hannah.
"Kit" Hartigan. His sister, a blind girl.
Detective-Sergt. Ussher. Of Scotland Yard.

SEVENTEENTH CHAPTER.

What Paul Jerome Saw.

For a fraction of a moment the singular spectacle that had presented itself to the vision of the war-correspondent remained in sight. But a puff of wind had caught the sails of the fishing-coble, and she forged past the anchored vessel at a suddenly increased speed.

The little gust stirred the long golden locks that had fallen upon the clumsy canvas shoulders and brass neck-piece of the diving-suit. They framed in an aureole of dishevelled tresses a delicately girlish head, whose flushed features wore an expression of mingled dissatisfaction and embarrassment.

A few seconds more and—relieved of the huge helmet and ponderous, leaden-soled diving-shoes—she had stepped down into the well of the smack and vanished.

Paul Jerome glanced at his companion—the old fisherman was gazing astern of the fishing-coble, his sturdy figure swaying to its motions, his brows wrinkled under the peak of his worn serge cap.

"Did you see that?" asked the war-correspondent somewhat unnecessarily.

The boatman took off his cap to smooth thoughtfully the thin and grizzled thatch it had surmounted.

"Aye, sir," he said deliberately, "it was a woman!" He replaced his cap, sat down on the weather side of a thwart, put the mainsheet under his foot, and cut a fresh quid from a coil of black twist.

The war-correspondent brought the coble round to skirt the end of the breakwater. His companion hauled in the mainsail-boom for the run up the harbour in the gathering twilight. Paul Jerome piloted the little vessel skilfully.

"Till now," he observed, "I have never heard of a woman diver, much less seen one. Is she a professional?"

The boatman pocketed his coil of tobacco. "No, sir," he said, "and I can't make out what she's doing yonder at all. But it's not the first time she's been down, though, for she's a spunky young thing, and a year or more ago she got round her dad—who's a diver himself, sir, to let her have a dip in the suit."

His lantern jaws worked meditatively upon his quid.

"That was only in a couple of fathoms," he added, "up towards the beach, very early one morning, when the tide was at dead ebb, and there was no wind. I saw it myself, leastways I saw the diver go down, and asked John Davenal afterwards if he was breaking in a new hand. And he laughed and says he, 'Aye,' he says, 'my little lass wanted to know what her dad's job was like.'"

"John Davenal!" exclaimed Jerome, amazed. "You don't mean to say that that is his daughter?"

"Aye, do I," answered the boatman, "that's Mollie Davenal. Moira, her real name is, but we call her Mollie. And a pretty lass she is, and a plucky one. But what she wants to come playing herself yon fashion at nightfall, on the wrong side of the breakwater, I haven't a notion, sir. Not to speak of her dad lying ill at home with a knife-stab in his back, as he is, sir."

"Yes," said Jerome, "I heard about that."

The other nodded, and rose to lower the lug-sail, the coble crept forward in the darkening harbour under her flapping jib. The war-correspondent started from a reverie as the anchor splashed into the smooth water about them, and the coble came to rest. He picked up a huge waterproof cape and a much battered enamelled tin sandwich-box, and stretched his cramped limbs.

Digitized by Google

The boatman shouted to the neighbouring landing for a dinghy, and a lounger put off in one, sculling lazily with an oar over the stern of the dumpy craft.

"I can't rightly understand yon diving business," confessed the boatman, returning reflectively to the subject; "it was Mollie Davenal and no mistake, for her father's own men were with her. But what a lass like that wants to go down at this hour in five fathoms or them to let her, fair moiders me."

"Five fathoms!" replied the war-correspondent. "Thirty feet! Surely there are not thirty feet so close to that side of the breakwater?"

"Yes, sir," he was told; "every bit of it, the rocks the breakwater's built on shelve away. When Sir Guy Vanburgh's yacht struck the breakwater and sank, she settled off till she was in full five fathoms. It was all they could do to pump her out at that depth.

The boatman shifted his quid, and watched the approaching dinghy.

"And it's not fit to let a lass go down," he said. "Not but what they must have some good reason for it, though what it can be I can't so much as imagine, seeing, as I said, sir, the yacht was got up a week since. John Davenal did the job himself. But if it were still to finish, there are other divers in Groudle without putting it on the lass. Well, well, here's the dinghy, sir!"

He stooped to hold the gunwale of the shallop that had come from the shore. Paul Jerome lingered to pay for his afternoon's excursion, and then, entering the dinghy, he was rowed to the landing. He sprang up the steps to the level of the quay, and hurried round the harbour to the breakwater. But the smack was nowhere to be seen, unless a vague shadow in the dusk off the ragged cliff of Groudle's head were she.

Paul Jerome shrugged his shoulders. The gesture meant that he had declined to come to any definite decision upon the extraordinary problem over which the ancient boatman had puzzled with such characteristic stolidity.

He bent his gaze upon the now scarcely visible surface of the tide that was lapping at the granite wall of the breakwater. Was it indeed true that a young and comely woman had descended into these chill depths, a task usually reserved for the strong and daring among men?

Was there—could there be any adequate reason for so singular, even so hazardous a proceeding, in which, not foolish and irresponsible amateurs, but practical operators, her father's assistants, had aided her.

Her father—that was John Davenal! So the big, pleasant, grey-eyed Cumberland man was her father! The thought of the distressed feminine face, so delicately shy amid its tumbled masses of yellow hair above the metal collar of the diving-dress, lent a new interest to the strange riddle into whose midst he had been flung—the riddle that linked Lady Tarleton's murdered maid to the sinister Hartigan, Hartigan to the little blind girl whose life he had himself saved, John Davenal to his grim brother-in-law, and all to the astute yet blundering Ussher.

As the thought of the detective crossed his mind, the war-correspondent laughed, shook off his absorption, and turned along the sea front. With long strides he passed through the little town, and made for the black and distant silhouette of Groudle Tower.

His route led him over the level crossing. He was conscious of something like a shudder as he traversed the wooden planks that levelled the permanent way.

It had been a desperate leap that he had adventured—the short take-off, the awkward landing on the planks of the crossing, the standing jump into the lane beyond! Well for him and the blind girl that the gallant old hunter had not failed.

The shudder darkened his countenance with a frown. The recollection of that exciting moment diverted his thoughts from the peculiar doings of John Davenal's daughter to those of the man Hartigan. He had seen the latter lead his companion through the gates, disengage his arm from hers, and leave her on the wooden crossing, himself springing forward out of danger.

Was it cowardice—or——? Was it, then, chance that Hartigan and no other had gone out with John Davenal the night that the latter was found dying at his own gate? Was it chance, or——?

Revolving these sombre questions, the war-correspondent pushed on, regained the high-road, and passed the old wayside hostelry, known as the Half Brick. Nearing the large entrance of Groudle Tower, he became aware that he was overtaking a figure of vaguely familiar gait and appearance. Drawing level with it he saw that it was the ex-steward. Both men by now were threading the avenue by which the Tower was approached.

Dennis Hartigan touched his cap with sullen politeness.

"Evening, sir!" he said.

Paul Jerome acknowledged the salutation. Hartigan stepped to his side, an unpleasantly disingenuous smile showed the ex-steward's teeth in the growing twilight.

"I'm afraid, sir," he added, "you've a bad opinion of me about that affair the other day—my losing my head at the crossing over yonder."

"You are perfectly correct," declared the war-correspondent bluntly.

Hartigan twisted the tips of his stiff, pale moustache with his powerful fingers.

"You must think as you choose, sir," Jerome was told, "but, all the same, I'm a man that's given a good account of myself in many a stand-up fight. I've had the thanks of the Board of Trade for my share in putting down a Lascar riot on a liner.

"It mayn't be modest to mention it, but I saved the captain's life. When a man loses his nerve, however, he loses it, and he isn't to be called coward just because something says to him 'Jump!' and he jumps."

Paul Jerome stalked on, his hands behind his back, one bright eye stealing covert glimpses of the speaker from under its drooped lashes.

"I don't believe you to be a coward, Hartigan," he replied, "I should say myself you had no small amount of both brute courage and brute intelligence. I merely remarked that you were either a coward or——"

He paused, breaking his sentence. "Or a what, sir?" asked Dennis Hartigan, loweringly.

"A most unlucky person," said Paul Jerome; "in which latter belief I am somewhat encouraged by the fact that you were arrested in connection with your wife's murder and that you happened to be the one who went out alone with John Davenal on the night of the attempt upon his life. To be continually brought into positions suggesting—mind I say suggesting—criminality, is the worst of all possible luck."

Dennis Hartigan clenched his fist. "You've a clever tongue in your head, sir," he growled, "and it's a bit beyond me if you're insulting me or laughing at me. But I've said what I had to say, and so good night to you, sir."

Digitized by Google

"Good night," answered the war-correspondent; "and if I were you, Hartigan, I would go back to the sea, or get abroad, anywhere where your bad luck wouldn't be quite so conspicuous. I gave you a certain warning the other day, respecting your sister Kit. If John Davenal dies I shall feel it my duty to suggest to the police that they submit your alibi on a particular night to a searching investigation."

The ex-steward set his jaw, his teeth gnashing audibly like those of an angry animal.

"And I tell you, sir," he said, "that there's a law to protect even the poor from such tongues as yours. Don't you slander me in public, my gentleman, or I'll make you regret it. I'm a man known and respected in my profession, and a man who has been called a hero, by one of his Majesty's consuls. So be warned, Mr. What's-your-name, and you may save yourself a lot of trouble."

With a final snarl, Dennis Hartigan dropped abruptly behind and kept there. The war-correspondent pursued his way calmly to the Tower.

Reaching its forbidding portals as the dressing bell was ringing, he mounted leisurely to the upper portions of the house. Not till he reached his own room did it occur to him to wonder what errand relating to his dead wife's affairs was bringing Hartigan to the Tower.

Moving at a slouching, sulky walk, the ex-steward had attained his destination, and at that moment was expecting admission at the great hall doors. He had vented part of his suppressed fury upon the bell-handle—the doors flew open with some degree of precipitation, and a footman appeared. When he perceived the rank of the caller who had ventured so unmistakably to signify his impatience, he drew himself up in an icy disdain.

"I want to see Lady T.," intimated Dennis Hartigan, stepping over the threshold; "you can say Davenal's husband presents his humble duty and will be glad of a word with her ladyship about the little matter she was so kind as to mention the other day. She will remember—the tombstone over my poor wife's grave."

The servant closed the doors. "It is not at all likely that her ladyship can see you," he said; "the dressing-bell has just gone. But I will inquire; there may, of course, be a message."

The ex-steward sat down on an oaken settle and waited ill-temperedly. At length the footman reappeared, motioning to him from the other side of the hall.

"My lady can give you a moment only," he observed, ushering Dennis Hartigan into the cheerless reception-room where the ex-steward had obtained his first private interview with the mistress of the Tower.

He tossed his hat on to a table and lolled in a drab but capacious settee. Ultimately, with a rustle of skirts and the subtle odour of some smart perfume, Lady Tarleton swept into the apartment. The door of the room closed behind her, and she stood looking at the ex-steward.

Dennis Hartigan rose. "Evening, my lady," he said, approaching her; "your ladyship will pardon my little fairy tale to your flunkey—about the tombstone. I knew your ladyship would understand that I wished to see you about the matter we really did discuss at our last meeting—that matter of ten thousand pounds for a bit of—news."

Lady Tarleton plucked at the lace of her tea-gown. "Well?" she demanded, but there was a veiled eagerness in the query.

The ex-steward smiled as he detected it.

"I've not come to tell your ladyship that bit of news," he answered, "yet."

A shade settled on Lady Tarleton's features. "Then why trouble me at this absurd hour?" she responded irritably.

Hartigan picked up his cap.

"I can go, if you wish it, my lady," he said; "but I am certain your ladyship would regret it later on, specially as I only wanted a clear understanding with respect to one or two matters."

"And they are?" added Lady Tarleton curtly.

The ex-steward tucked his cap under his arm, and tapped his left palm with his right forefinger.

"This ten thousand," he continued, lowering his voice;

THIS IS NOT A PUZZLE: WHAT IS IT?

You have two minutes to spare, haven't you? Of course. You are not in a hurry to catch a train, or pay a bill? Well, then, answer us this question: What is the leading sign of a condition of things in your body, which, if not soon corrected, leads straight to the graveyard; and yet none but healthy persons ever have it, and they have it every day?

You will scratch your head for hours before you hit upon the true answer, and yet it is simple as simple can be. Come to think, you had better read this article straight through, and perhaps the truth will dawn on your mind without our being obliged to tell you outright. Let us then get at it gradually through listening to the tale of a person who once had a very unhappy bit of experience.

Off and on, for twelve years, this lady suffered intense pain in the chest, accompanied often with a feeling of sinking in the pit of the stomach, at times so unbearable that she would roll on the floor in agony. Even when free from pain, which was not often, she scarcely dared venture out of doors for fear of falling—her head went so dizzy and her legs felt so useless. The feeling she would never get better made her terribly low and depressed. She was a wife and the mother of nine children, which made this calamity all the more serious. Dear, dear, what terrible tumbles we take sometimes, don't we? To-day on the hill-top viewing our farm; to-morrow asking employment from its new owner. So life goes. This lady's experience was by no means uncommon, nor was it all cloud and no sunshine, as we shall presently see. But first, let us finish her story. She felt hungry but could not eat. Her tongue was furred and there was a nasty taste ever present in her mouth. A persistent hacking cough shook her from head to foot.

Though constantly under medical treatment, she experienced no benefit, until on the advice of a neighbour she bought a bottle of Mother Seigel's Syrup. This sufficed to relieve the pain and perseverence in its use effected a complete cure. Writing from her home in New Street, Ridley, Kent, she says: "I feel better now than I have done for eighteen years. I relish my food, sleep well and feel well. After twelve years of pain, Mother Seigel's Syrup cured me when everything else failed. I have a family of nine children and attribute their freedom from sickness to the fact that I occasionally give them a dose of Mother Seigel's Syrup."

(Signed) (Mrs.) Sarah Banks.

Now, what is it, in your body which, if not soon corrected, leads to death?—a symptom which none but healthy persons ever have, and they have it every day? Why, hunger, to be sure. Unsatisfied hunger means starvation, and in the end all lingering diseases kill by starvation.

Eat and digest and you live, and are healthy. Lose your appetite and digestion and your death-warrant is signed. Mrs. Banks' trouble began in the mere loss of appetite. When digestion and appetite fail, the wisest course is to restore tone to the stomach and blood by the use of the root and herb tonic which made Mrs. Banks feel better than she had done for eighteen years.

Digitized by Google

"when should I be paid it? When I brought you the news in question, eh, my lady, the news, that is, of the child's death?"

"Certainly," assented the other, unable to avoid a start at the grim significance of the inquiry; "I will provide myself, on any reasonable warning, with notes to the amount I promised."

Dennis Hartigan smiled contemptuously. "I won't insult your ladyship's brains," he retorted, "by supposing that you expect me to risk—what I should risk, on that understanding. I come to you and I say, 'The girl is safely out of the way.' What do you say? 'My good fellow, I am glad to hear it, but now that is so there is really no need for me to part with any ten thousand pounds. As for you, if you don't want to put your head in a noose, you will keep a still tongue in it.'"

Lady Tarleton bit her lip; there was truth in the ex-steward's cynical prophesy. "What do you propose?" she asked.

The ex-steward held up one hand; the first, second, and third fingers stiffly extended.

"I want three out of the ten down," he said; "for that I'll tell you where the child is—then you can be sure I mean business. The rest you can let me have three months after—when you've had time to raise it on your reversion to the estate. As soon as the child is dead you will be the legal heir, at present you are only supposed to be."

"And if you refuse to trust me for ten thousand," sneered Lady Tarleton, "why do you consent to trust me for seven?"

"Because," she was answered, "I shall at least have had something for my pains. And, as your ladyship will see on reflection, if you play me false and drive me to desperation, I may revenge myself by putting my own neck in the noose in order to get yours there."

"On your unsupported word!" said Lady Tarleton. "Do you imagine that I would have risked making this infernal compact before witnesses?"

The ex-steward favoured her with a bullying, sinister glance.

"What did Hannah tell you, my lady?" he rejoined; "'Go down to Groudle Tower and look.' What if I send others to look—that will prove part of my story.

"Do you want the estate thrown into Chancery, or do you want it to drop into your mouth like a ripe cherry? No, my lady, your interest and mine go together, and that's the best fidelity guarantee."

He shrugged his shoulders cynically as he made the intimation.

"Ten thousand will let me get abroad, and settle down like a gentleman. I always did have a fancy for the West Indies; I shall buy a house and some land in the islands—a man can live a rare life out there if he's money. You won't hear of me again when all's done, I promise."

Lady Tarleton went on plucking at her lace—she had picked a hole in one of the cobwebby ruffles at her wrist. "When do you want this—this three thousand?" she demanded.

Hartigan considered the point.

"Let me have it pretty soon," he said; "and not here—I'd rather not come here any more. When the job's done, I'll nip out of the country and let you have my address for the rest of the cash. Just to lend colour to our interviews, you might put up a bit of a stone over Hannah—'Erected by her grateful mistress,' or some such rot."

"Where—where shall I send you the money—the three thousand?" murmured Lady Tarleton.

The ex-steward grinned.

"Bring, not send, your ladyship means," he corrected; "I'll give you a couple of days to get it. You can let me have it the evening of the day after to-morrow. I'll be at—at the mausoleum in the park, about midnight. You can easily slip out. Bank of England notes are good enough for me."

Lady Tarleton stood irresolute.

Dennis Hartigan donned his cap.

"I'll expect you," he said; "and remember, for that three thousand I'll tell you where the child is. Till then, your ladyship, addios, as they say in the West Indies. And the sooner I'm there the better for you and me—if not——" he had paused at the door to make the addition, "or someone else."

He came back into the room. "My lady," he added, "don't forget that if you and I can't do this deal—perhaps I can do one with—with——" He screened his mouth with his hollow palm—"With Mr. Stormont," he said, and retreated, chuckling.

EIGHTEENTH CHAPTER.

"I Wish I Could Tell you Everything."

"Eh, dear, Miss Moira, and are you sure you feel none the worse?"

Moira stepped from the small, dark fore-peak of the smack and turned to help Kit out of the same dingy retreat, where, by the light of a flickering oil-lamp, she herself had been discarding the heavy canvas garments of the diving-dress in favour of her ordinary apparel.

"Not the least little bit, Mr. Travis, thank you," she said, colouring deeply as she faced the trio of rough yet simple souls who had been John Davenal's trusted assistants in many a difficult task and hazardous enterprise.

The smack—making for a sheltered cove on the further side of the Head—was forging through the dusk off the shadowy promontory. The breeze had freshened and she was keeping well out from the rocky foot of the tall cliff.

"You didn't find what you went down for, missy?" pursued her questioner, fingering his harsh black beard.

Moira answered in the negative, and drew Kit to sit to windward of the heeling craft.

"No," she said sadly.

Travis fumbled nervously with the rim of his jersey, he was a lean, hard-featured man, with twinkling eyes that belied his unprepossessing exterior.

"You should have told us what it was, Miss Moira," he said. "I'd have gone down myself in a brace of shakes. You're a brave lass, my dear, and a cool, but there's a knack in seeing under the water, even with the electric light. It didn't stand to reason that you could do much and in that depth."

Moira sighed and answered nothing.

"Not but what I'll be sworn it was just a sick man's fancy," continued Travis, "and nothing there at all. Though what he could have thought he'd lost down there beats me. Anyhow, you can tell the governor you've been down—but if you'd been my daughter, Miss Moira, you shouldn't have done it. I was against your going down that first time, and I was against it now. Of course the governor's word is law, even if it's only a sick man's fancy."

And Mr. Travis repeated his former phrase with an evident appreciation of it. He broke off to issue an order or two, the smack came up into the wind, and one of the men hauled round the dinghy. Mr. Travis himself got in and took the sculls. Moira and her silent companion followed, and the little boat shot forwards over the sheltered waters of the cove.

When her passengers had landed on the dusky beach,

Digitized by Google

Mr. Travis, bidding them a cheerful good-night, prepared to re-enter the boat. Moira laid a detaining hand upon his arm.

"Mr. Travis," she said, "I—I have been deceiving you, just a bit. Dad did not know I was going down—he—he only said he would be happier if—if—oh, I can't explain, Mr. Travis, and I can't tell you any more, but I felt perhaps I—I——" She stifled a sob.

"I didn't realise that it was so strange and confusing down there," she confessed; "I was only down in a couple of fathoms before and in daylight. But you will let the men think it was father's wish, won't you?"

"Y-yes, Miss Moira, by all means," stammered the other, bewildered; "but it's a riddle to me, that's what it is. And it'll beat me to keep the men from talking about it, to say nought of those fellows that passed us just as I took off the helmet for you. But I'll put the best face I can on it, Miss Moira, for your sake."

"Thank you so much," faltered Moira, and the diver's assistant, solemnly shaking his head, got into the dinghy and pushed off. Moira herself took the blind girl's arm and walked up the shingly beach.

For some while neither spoke. The two crossed the beach, mounted to the level of the road beyond, and followed it in the direction of Groudle Town. At last the prolonged silence of her companion aroused Moira.

"How quiet you are, Kit," she remarked; "are you very curious? I wish I could tell you everything. But I can't—yet. Wait till dad is better."

The blind girl gave a little squeeze of affection to the arm that lay in her own. "I'm not all that inquisitive, Mollie," she answered; "but do you mind telling me one thing? Has all this anything to do with somebody throwing something off the breakwater—oh, years and years ago."

Moira stared at the querist. "Kit," she said, "what do you mean—you—you can't know anything—and yet it might have been?"

Kit laughed. "What is it, Mollie?" she demanded.

Moira drew closer to her companion's side.

"Kit," she answered, in a low tone, "I—I don't know—I don't think I ought to tell you till—till father gets better and I can ask him if I may. But can't you tell me what you mean by 'throwing something off the breakwater years ago.'"

The blind girl hesitated. "I suppose I may as well," she said—"not that it's much information when all's said and done. But one night, when I was a mite of a thing—mother and I lived on the quay by the head of the pier then, and the breakwater had just been built. I used to go and sit on the landings out of the wind. I had a little stick to feel the edge of the steps, so I was quite safe."

"Yes, yes," exclaimed Moira impatiently; "and one night——"

"As I was saying," proceeded Kit calmly, "one night I was sitting on the steps, on the north side, and I heard someone coming along the breakwater above me. He—it was a man's voice—was singing in a drunken sort of way. Suddenly he stopped and I heard him say, 'This is out far enough, in with it.' Then there was a splash in the water near me."

Moira stood still. "Kit," she said, "how—how long ago was this?"

Kit deliberated. "Oh, about seventeen years," she answered. "I'm no chicken, Mollie; I'm twenty-five in June, and I was eight then. It made a queer impression on my mind that I've never forgotten."

"Seventeen years!" murmured Moira, "and I am nearly nineteen. It—it—oh, what a horrible riddle it all is! But didn't you hear anything else?"

"No," said the blind girl; "only heavy footsteps on the breakwater above, and then all was quiet."

Moira started forward. "Let us go home, Kit," she exclaimed. "I—I want to get back to the dear old cottage and forget everything except how happy I've always been."

(Continued Overleaf.)

The Blood and the Skin.

How Bile Beans cure Pimples and Blotches.

Skin eruptions are now very prevalent. They are due to blood impurities. The blood filters through the liver. Therefore, if the liver is sluggish and impure so is the blood. If the blood is impure, pimples and blotches appear. Purify the blood: put an end to the blotches. one thing does both—Bile Beans.

Mr. Geo. Davis, of Wreath Quay Road, Monkwearmouth, says: "I was almost covered with unsightly pimples, boils, and blotches. My arms, legs, hands, and body were all attacked, and the irritation and pain was almost unbearable. Apart from the pain I was most disagreeable to look upon, and was ashamed to go out. My liver was out of order (this was the root cause of his trouble). I was always drowsy and listless—as tired in the morning as at night. Sick-headache often overcame me. I was costive, and I felt as wretched as a man can feel. On the advice of a friend I took Bile Beans. They soon ended the constipation, and their action on the liver was manifest by the way in which my blood was purified, and the boils and pimples grew less and less. Within a short time of commencing with Bile Beans my skin was quite cleared. I was relieved of the nasty drowsy sleepy feelings which had been so troublesome. The nausea and sickness also left me. I am now quite cured, and enjoy excellent health. Indeed, I have better health now than I ever remember to have had in my life."

For skin eruptions, liver complaints, constipation, piles, sick-headache, female ailments, dizziness, &c., Bile Beans are the finest remedy. All chemists supply them at 1/1½ or 2/9 per box. Be sure to get "Chas. Forde's." You'll see the name on each box.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM (CLOTTED)

absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil; invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1s. 4d.; 1lb. 2s. 4d.; 2lbs. 4s. 4d., free, supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by

MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%

repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

Digitized by Google

When they were on the verge of the tiny town, Moira halted again and put her arms about the blind girl.

"You won't mind my not explaining for a while, dear?" she asked. Kit kissed her.

"Not a bit, Mollie," she replied; "though it's very puzzling and I am curious."

Moira sighed and they went on, across the top of the harbour and over the dusky quays, to where the windows of Hawthorn Cottage twinkled upon the night.

In the living-room of the cottage a nurse sat at the table writing letters. She looked up as they entered and smiled.

"So you have got back," she remarked; "I hope you have enjoyed your walk."

Moira flushed a trifle—for deceit of all sorts was repellent to her, even the mild subterfuge by which she and Kit had arranged to account for their joint, if brief, absence—and answered gravely in the affirmative.

The nurse put down her pen and rose.

"The doctor has been in again," she said; "he thinks Mr. Davenal quite distinctly stronger. But your father still frets at not being allowed to see you. The doctor was obliged to give in on the point."

She checked Moira's impulsive gesture of satisfaction.

"But he is not to talk," she added; "the doctor was particular your father should promise him that, and you must not say more than a few words to him."

"Very well, nurse," assented Moira dispiritedly. She took off her short cloak and tam-o'-shanter cap and brushed back the yellow curls that the night wind had brought on to her forehead. Kit had stolen to the fire and was warming her chilled limbs—the April evening had grown cold and raw.

The nurse glanced at the clock. "You had better go up now, dear," she said; "for he must settle down soon for the night. I shall be going on duty myself immediately."

Moira stood a moment broodingly, before passing out into the hall and mounting the stairs. At the door of the wounded man's room, she tapped softly. The day-nurse opened it.

"Ah," observed the latter, with the bright unconcern that does so much for the nerves of an invalid; "here is your daughter, Mr. Davenal. Come in, dear. Your father is going to be very good and not talk. He is so very much better that he does not propose to run the least risk of overtiring himself."

Moira stepped forward into the pleasantly warmed and lighted room, and paused at the diver's bedside. His right hand lay on the counterpane, his eyes, meeting hers, travelled to it, and the fingers twitched. There was something in his mute appeal that touched Moira to the heart—she knelt down by the bed and took his hand in her own.

"Father!" she said brokenly, "dear, dear father!"

John Davenal's face shone suddenly and his hand contracted painfully upon hers.

"My little daughter," he murmured; "always my little daughter."

"Yes, father, dear," gasped Moira, and she looked through her tears at the kind, grave features of the strong man laid low.

John Davenal sighed gustily and closed his eyes; his face had relaxed into a quiet contentment.

The watch at the nurse's belt ticked audibly in the silence, and the fire crackled, but all else was still. Once or twice the diver breathed heavily. The nurse heard it and motioned to Moira to withdraw her hand. She did so, with infinite precaution. John Davenal still slept.

Moira crept from the room; the nurse lowered the light and came to shut the door.

"He is doing famously," she whispered; "I am so glad he didn't try to talk much; he seems to live upon the hope of seeing you."

A dry sob forced its way to Moira's lips as she retreated to the lower floor of the cottage. "I wish," she murmured desperately; "oh, I wish he had never told me—never!"

She stopped on a small landing to cover her face and weep noiselessly. Her position stung her to the quick. Not to know who she was or how she had come to the care of the simple, large-hearted man who had been to her both father and mother, not to know whether some ghastly stain might not lie upon her—her, the promised wife of Guy Vanbrugh; it was a situation fraught with too many grim possibilities for her to face it without a pang of misery.

But the pang did not last long. Guy Vanbrugh's words returned to her mind: "You and I against the world, darling, for the best thing in it—love."

She dried her eyes; she would be true to the oath she had taken, she would doubt neither herself nor him. Did not John Davenal love her with all the rough, strong, tender fatherhood of his generous nature? Was not Guy Vanbrugh her plighted husband—the man who had chosen her out of all the world to share his life and dwell in his heart?

Moira comforted herself. At least she was rich in love and she drew it around her spirit like an invisible cloak. But the sob still lingered in her throat—the waters had denied her the secret they held and she felt as vaguely unhappy as a lost child by some good Samaritan's fireside.

NINETEENTH CHAPTER.
What Dennis Hartigan Heard.

"A glass of bitter and some cold meat, and look sharp about it, my dear."

Dennis Hartigan picked a biscuit out of the tray on the bar at the Half Brick as he issued this instruction to the serving-maid behind it. Then he lifted the flap of the counter and stalked through into the sanded parlour beyond.

The room was hazy with tobacco smoke and the mingled odours of "old October" and hot grog; a circle of "habituals" sat round the high black fireplace, puffing all manner of pipes, from a briar to a churchwarden.

Dennis Hartigan nodded to one or two of the peaceful revellers and went to sit down in a corner and munch his biscuit. He folded his arms on his broad chest, drooped his chin on it, knitted his brows, and fell into a profound unconsciousness of all about him.

So sullen and absorbed did he seem as he sat there, his thoughts might well have been as sinister as himself.

The maid aroused him with his meal and he ate it with abstracted deliberation, glancing now and again at the gossippers about the fire.

Unexpectedly a name arrested his interest—it was that of "Mollie Davenal."

An old fisherman, with a grizzled beard and a shiny black "cutty" had taken the latter from his mouth to repeat a prior statement, of which the ex-steward had heard but part.

"Mol-lie Dav-en-al," said the speaker, beating time to the emphatic syllables with his pipe; "I seen her myself with these very eyes, and so did the gentleman from the Tower as was with me. And Peter Travis, John Davenal's own assistant, was taking off the helmet. She'd been down off the breakwater, in full diving-gear, and her hair—she has an amazing lot of fair hair, has Mollie Davenal—was all tumbling loose over her shoulders."

Dennis Hartigan set down the glass he had lifted to his lips. His eyes seemed as though they would start from his head.

(Another long instalment next week.)

Dainty Dishes for Slender Incomes.

Edited by "ISOBEL," of Home Notes.

Cloth, Price 1s., post free 1s. 2d.

AT ALL RAILWAY BOOKSTALLS AND BOOKSELLERS.

Digitized by Google

The "VICTOR"

HALL-MARKED SILVER CHAIN PENDANT WITH REAL GOLD CENTRE DIRECT FROM THE MAKER

TWO SHILLINGS

DEPOSIT (and subsequent weekly or monthly payments to suit the convenience of purchaser), secures one of these massive Hall-marked Silver Chains complete with Medal.

SPECIFICATION.—The Victor Sterling Silver Double Albert is the most useful, best value, and strongest chain hitherto produced. It is of full length, and fitted with fixed drop piece, bolt ring, and two swivels. Every link and ring is Hall-marked, and every connection being permanently closed, the chain is practically unbreakable—a method not previously adopted with even the most expensive gold chains.

The appendage is cut out of a solid block of Hall-marked Silver, mounted with a real Gold centre-piece, on which the purchaser's initials are engraved without extra charge.

NO DISCOUNT WHATEVER can be allowed to customers sending cash in full with order, but they will be entitled to a week's free trial of the chain; and cash will be refunded if it is not approved.

When writing, please mention this publication.

W. E. WATTS FOUNDED 1855 WHOLESALE DEPOT 106-108 DERBY RD THE ONLY ADDRESS— NOTTINGHAM.

From Factory to Rider.

How Does This Suit You?

Handsomest & Best of Cycles right away after payment Month's Instalment—or Deposit—as you wish. £14 14s Grade for £6 10s Write, H Dept. Williams' Direct Supply Mfg. Co., 12 Approach, London Bridge, London.

Do you not envy the woman with a "pearl-like" skin? Then use "Peralia" regularly. It soothes, refreshes, clears and beautifies, making the skin smooth and healthy. Preserves a fine complexion and restores a faded one. Makes the hands and arms like velvet. Endorsed by society and professional women all over the world. Gentlemen find it extremely pleasant after shaving; relieves irritation—cools the skin. Use it for Spots, Blackheads, Freckles, Tan, Redness, and especially for Red Nose.

Doctor's certificate guaranteeing its purity, and testimonials, sent with each bottle.

In Bottles, 1/- 1/6 2 6 Postage, 3d. extra

NOSE

If your nose is large or badly-shaped in any way, use our Nose Machine, price 10/-. Cheek Plumpers for thin or sunken cheeks, 10/- pair. Ear Instruments for standing-out ears, 10/- each. Send stamp for further particulars. Peralia Co. (Dept. 14), 23 Camden St., North Shields.

REMEMBER THE BLACK BEETLES.

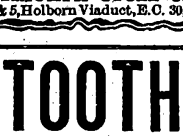
TELL YOUR COOK

To well sprinkle the floor near the fireplace and kitchen cupboard last thing at night with

"KEATING'S POWDER,"

unrivalled killer of Fleas, Beetles, Moths. (Harmless to animals.) Sold everywhere, ONLY in tins, 3d., 6d. and 1s. each.

Patronised by Royalty.



TRIUMPH Cycles

10 Guineas AND 15 Guineas Or from a Guinea per month.

The Best Bicycle that British Workmanship can produce.

TRIUMPH CYCLE Co., Ltd., COVENTRY.

4 & 5, Holborn Viaduct, E.C. 30, Deansgate Arcade, Manchester.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

"As a specific for Toothache it has no equal. I have used it successfully for years."—Prof. W. WILSON, M.D.

THE BEST FAMILY MEDICINE

KAYE'S WORSDELL'S PILLS

Are a certain Cure for Indigestion, Biliousness, Headache, Dyspepsia, Constipation, Liver and Kidney Complaints etc. For Ladies of all ages they are invaluable.

Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s, 9d, and 4s, 6d. per box.

CHICKEN-HATCHING EXTRAORDINARY FOR 2/6

The Texas Egg-Hatcher and Rearer combined supersedes all incubators Hatches above and rears little ones below simultaneously all the year round. A money-making home industry requiring neither capital nor labour. Turns 1d. eggs into valuable Chickens or Ducklings. Millions selling in America. 15-egg size 2/6; 30-egg, 5/-; complete for use. Address, AMERICAN POULTRY SYNDICATE (Room 101), 7 Albion Grove, Stoke Newington, London, N.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

Or Flat Footed? If so, try our Elevators, which will increase your height from 2 to 4 inches without detection. Comfortable to wear. Price from 5/6, Lady's; 6/6 Gent's, per pair Send stamps for further particulars. Peralia Co. (Dept. 14), 73, Camden Street, North Shields.

CRIMPOLINE HAIR CURLING FLUID.

Curls the hair naturally in a few days, and, what is more, the hair will keep in curl. Does not change the colour or destroy the hair But makes it soft and silky, and will curl or friz into natural curls. No tongs needed. Not sticky or greasy like other curling fluids, which only keep the hair in curl. After the hair has become curly it is not necessary to continue using Crimpoline. Give Crimpoline a trial—the result will astonish you. Use it for Ladies', Gents', and Children's Hair. 1/9 and 2/6 per Bottle, Postage 3d. Ask your Chemist or Hair Dresser to get above preparations for you; if they are out of stock, we will send it direct to you secretly packed.

Have no other or you will be disappointed.

Under Royal Patronage. Used by Madame Patti, Vesta Tilley, Minnie Palmer, etc.

PERALIA PERFUMERY CO.

(Dept. 14), 72 and 73 Camden Street, North Shields.

GIVEN AWAY

with this week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 484).

Paper Pattern OF THIS SKIRT.

Of all Bookstalls & Newsagents.

PRICE 1d.

Rider Agents Wanted

in every district to buy sample cycle at special price and take orders for us. Large profits in spare time. 1903 Models £3.10 to £6.10 New Departure Coaster Brake, Front Rim Brake and highest grade genuine British made fittings and accessories. 200 Good Second-Hand Cycles £1.10 to £2.10 Ten Days Free Trial is allowed on every cycle we sell and the full price with all carriage charges refunded if unsatisfactory in any way.

Don't Fail to get our big illustrated catalogue before deciding on your 1903 machine. Address Dept. 44B,

MEAD CYCLE CO., Liverpool.

Digitized by Google

THIS BOOK IS FREE.

The Mysteries of Hypnotism and Personal Magnetism Revealed.

The American College of Sciences of Philadelphia, Pa., has just published a remarkable book on Hypnotism, Personal Magnetism, and Magnetic Healing. It is by far the most wonderful and comprehensive treatise of the kind ever printed. The Directors have decided, for a limited time, to give a free copy to each person sincerely interested in these wonderful sciences. It is the result of the combined effort of twenty of the most famous hypnotic specialists in the world. You can now learn the secrets of Hypnotism and Personal Magnetism at your own home free. Hypnotism strengthens your memory and develops a will of iron. It overcomes bashfulness, revives hope, stimulates ambition and determination to succeed, and gives you that self-confidence which enables you to convince people of your real worth. It gives you the key to the inner secrets of mind control. It enables you to absolutely control the thoughts and actions of whomsoever you will. When you understand this grand and mysterious science you can plant suggestions in human minds which will be carried out in a day or even a year hence. You can cure bad habits and diseases in yourself or others. You can cure yourself of insomnia, nervousness, and business or domestic worry.

You can instantaneously hypnotise people with a mere glance of the eye, without their knowledge, and powerfully influence them to do as you desire. You can develop, to a marvellous degree, any musical or dramatic talent you may have; you can increase your salary; you can develop your telepathic or clairvoyant power; you can give thrilling and funny hypnotic entertainments; you can win the love and everlasting friendship of those you desire; you can protect yourself against the influence of others; you can become a financial success and be recognised as a power in your community.

The American College guarantees to teach you the secret of attaining all these things. It is the largest and most successful school of Hypnotism in the world. It is chartered by the State laws, and carries out every promise faithfully. If you want a copy of its free book, just send your name and address, no money, to the American College of Sciences, Dept. WL 39, 420 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa., U.S.A., and you will receive it by return mail, post paid.

CURES ANY DISEASE.

A New and Wonderfully Successful Method of Curing all Chronic and Lingering Afflictions.

A Free Trial Package of this Remarkable Discovery will be Mailed to All who Write.

Anyone who suffers from a weak disordered condition of the heart, lungs, kidneys, stomach, blood, liver, skin, muscles or nervous system should write at once for a free trial treatment of a new method that is rapidly displacing the old ways of curing disease.

DR. JAMES WILLIAM KIDD.

Gout, partial paralysis, dropsy, locomotor ataxia, rheumatism neuralgia or any other disease resulting from high living quickly and permanently removed by the new method.

Weakness or debility in any form whether in man or woman entirely eradicated from the system by the new treatment.

Consumption, bronchitis, asthma, catarrh, impure blood, heart disease, kidney and bladder trouble and liver complaint cured to stay cured by the doctor's wonderful remedies.

If you are the victim of any malady or sickness which you have long wanted to get rid of, try one of Dr. Kidd's free treatments and see how easy it is to be cured when the proper means are employed.

If you have aches or pains, don't feel well at times, if you are despondent and discouraged, tired out, it is because you have some terrible disease lurking in your system.

Why not write to Dr. Kidd, get a free trial treatment, and let him show you how quickly you can be cured by his new method. It makes no difference what your peculiar ailment may be, Dr. Kidd will send you a trial treatment entirely free of charge to prove to you that he can do as he claims.

Write to-day, telling the doctor what you wish to be cured of, and receive the free treatment for it by return mail. There are no conditions whatever. Dr. Kidd's generous offer is meant for everybody who suffers from disease in any of its various forms. Address Dr. J. W. KIDD Co., 522 Baltes Building, Ft. Wayne, Ind., U.S.A. No one should miss this grand opportunity of securing the benefits of the doctor's latest discovery, since it costs you nothing.

SONGS COPIED

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page.

Mrs. CONYERS,

Morchard Bishop, Devon.

Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

Digitized by Google

Pa was Coming.

"Flee!" she cried. "You mean fly, don't you?" "Never mind what insect I mean. Just run. Pa's coming."

Earning versus Receiving.

She: "I thought you told me your salary was ten pounds a week?" He: "Oh, no; I said I earned ten, but I only get three."

Too Big for Other Girls.

Ethel (after a tiff): "I presume you would like your ring back?" George: "Never mind; keep it. No other girl I know could use that ring, unless she wore it on her thumb."

The First Signs of Love.

"What was the first indication you had that she was in love with you?" "It was when she began to examine my coat to see if she could find another woman's hair on the shoulder."

He Wanted to Go, Too.

"It's a shame," cried the young wife; "not a thing in the house fit to eat. I'm going straight home to papa!" "If you don't mind, dear," said the husband, reaching for his hat, "I'll go with you."

Spoilt the Story.

He: "What a daring bicyclist that Miss Dashley must be. I hear that when out riding the other day she went right over a cow lying in the road." "Yes, Miss Dashley went over, but the bicycle remained on the other side."

Why Kate is Single.

She told him her age was twenty-two, but he had looked the family Bible through you see, and knew her to be fully thirty-three. It grieved him thus to see the maid grossly prevaricate, and that's the reason why, 'tis said, he didn't marry Kate.

An Impossible Situation.

Mr. Wickwire: "What ridiculous, impossible things these fashion plates are!" Mrs. Wickwire: "I know they used to be, but most of them are engraved from photographs nowadays." Mr. Wickwire: "This one can't be. Here are two women going in opposite directions, both with brand new gowns on, and neither looking back at the other."

Her Happiest Moment.

"Until I met you, Matilda," he murmured in a voice husky with emotion, "I believed that all women were deceitful, but when I look into your clear, beautiful eyes, I behold there the very soul of candour and loyalty." "George," she exclaimed with enthusiasm, "this is the happiest moment I have known since papa took me to the London oculist!" "London oculist!" "Yes, dear, you never would have known that my left eye is a glass one." Then the moon went under a cloud, and George sat down and buried his face in the sofa cushion.

Where the Wool Came From.

She: "What is this mineral wool one reads so much about?" He: "Mineral wool? Why, that's the wool they shear from hydraulic rams!"

Managing a Husband.

He: "There isn't enough on this breakfast-table to feed a canary bird." She: "I know it, my dear; but there are several things I want you to order from the shops, and I know you'll forget all about it unless you leave the house hungry."

Stuffed Daughters.

Our Gallant Colonel: "Your daughters, my dear Mrs. Tympanum, are looking delightful to-night—simply delightful!" Mrs. Tympanum (rather hard of hearing, and very intent on a roti of ducklings): "Yes, aren't they? I've had them stuffed with sage and onions."

An Improving Young Man.

Maud: "How is Mr. Blushman getting along? Has he proposed yet?" Edith: "No, but he is improving. The first night he called he held the album in his hands all the evening; the second night he had my pug dog in his arms; last night he held Willie on his lap for an hour. I have hopes."

She Frightened Him.

Young Saphead: "Do you know, Miss Biggal, I've a gweat mind to fwighten you by wocking the boat?" Miss Biggal (an athletic young woman): "A young man like you tried that with me once, and the boat upset." "Did it weally? What did you do?" "I swam ashore and notified the coroner."

Too Expensive a Luxury.

"I know we are poor, dear papa," said Evelyn, nestling her head against his shoulder, "but Charles is brave and hopeful, and he says that love will make a way." "I know it will," said the old banker grimly. "It made away with two tons of best coal and two pounds' worth of gas last winter, and before long we will begin again, I suppose."

Time to Go.

"Claribel," called out the old gentleman in a loud, rasping, and emphatic voice from the head of the staircase at 11.30 p.m., "you tell that long-haired, sallow-faced, spider legged feller in the parlour there to take his hat and walk off; and if ever he comes here again I'll kick him right through his necktie." "Alfred," murmured the young woman pensively, "something seems to tell me we'd better part."

A Vile Plot!

"John, my dressmaker called to-day, and I must have the material to-morrow," said Mrs. Adam, "Eh? What? You said you had written to her not to come until next month," replied the husband. "Yes, I did, but she never got the letter." "Woman! This is a plot—a vile plot!" cried Mr. Adam, clasping his hand to his breast-pocket. "If you really wanted her to stay away you would have posted that letter yourself; you wouldn't have given it to me."

A Man Without a Heart.

"You have no heart!" Pale but tearless she stood before him, and looked him squarely in the eye. She was poor, but proud. Adverse fortune had reduced her wardrobe to a calico basis, driven her and her only surviving mother to the top flat of a back street house, and hardened the lines about her still beautiful mouth, but it could not dim the lustre of her blue-black eye, or tame the unconquerable spirit that animated every fibre of the lissom form, standing erect with unconscious grace, and awaiting his answer. "You have no heart!" she repeated. "No, miss," replied the butcher, "but we've got some very good liver. Will that do just as well?"

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Regarding Pseudonyms.

READERS have been adopting such long and awkward pseudonyms lately that I must ask them in future to use either their initials, or names which are quite short, for this purpose.

Wants a Wife.

"A NEGLECTED MAN," who lives in Cape Colony, is thirty-two. He is earning a good income, but up to the present has not been able to find a girl suitable to become his wife. He is expecting to visit England next year, and in the meantime would like to correspond with a young lady with a view to matrimony, or find some other way of leaving the state of bachelordom.

* * * * *

I am sorry I cannot help you to find a young lady, but I did not undertake to become a matrimonial agent. There surely must be plenty of nice girls in Cape Colony, on one of whom you could bestow your affections. If you have not found one by the time your visit to England takes place you perhaps will have better luck then.

Eighteen and Twenty-three.

"PADDY'S DARLINT" is eighteen, and is keeping company with a man of twenty-three. Her parents think the difference in age is too great for marriage to result. "PADDY'S DARLINT" is going away from the town in which she lives, and wants to know whether it would be wrong for her to write to the young man during her absence—it is his suggestion that she should do so.

* * * * *

I should hardly consider a difference of only five years a bar to matrimony, "PADDY'S DARLINT." If it were more than that there might be some reason for your parents' objections. As regards writing to the young man during your absence, you must be guided entirely by your own inclinations. If you really care for him, by all means write. If not, your going away will be a good opportunity for dropping him.

How to Become Engaged.

"S. H. Y." is in love with a girl, and his affections are returned. He is wanting to become engaged, but hasn't the slightest idea how to set about it; whether he ought to ask the girl if she is willing to marry him or what.

* * * * *

I suppose you intend your engagement to end in marriage, "S. H. Y.," so, of course, you must ask the girl if she is willing to marry you—that is always the first step in a serious engagement. I am really very surprised that you should ask such a foolish question.

An Explanation Necessary.

"W. S." (Alloa), who is a man, was asked to a dance by a lady who had always been very affable to him, but at the dance she was decidedly cool, and when asked for an explanation of the coolness would not give any. "W. S." was rather persistent in asking for an explanation, and at the end of the dance she would hardly speak to him. He now wants to know whether he should write and apologise for his persistency, or not take any further notice of her?

* * * * *

If I were you, "W. S.," I should wait for a few days in case you might meet her, when you would see how she treated you. If she was quite friendly, you could apologise for your persistency; if otherwise, you could do nothing.

* * * * *

If you do not meet her inside a week, I should write her a letter asking why she was so cool to you on the night of the dance, and offering to call on her if she would allow you to do so, in case an explanation might be necessary. You would have to be guided by her reply as to your future behaviour.

A Disheartened Lover.

"T. L." (Glasgow) is very much in love with a girl. He is a Protestant, but she is a Roman Catholic, and she says they could never marry because of the difference in religion. "T. L." has offered to become a Roman Catholic, but she will not hear of it. She does not appear to return his love, and he has written to her, but received no answer. What ought he to do to get to know if she really cares for him?

* * * * *

I should advise you to do as you suggest; that is, write asking her to meet you at a certain place. You should then declare your love for her and ask her if she cares for you in the same way. If she does not, then, of course, you can do nothing else but give up all hope of ever winning her. If she does love you she will tell you so, and then your difficulty will be at an end. I must say, however, that I do not counsel marriage between Protestants and Roman Catholics; it is difficult for people holding such widely different beliefs to live happily together.

Wants an Introduction.

"F. G." has fallen in love with a girl whom he sees every evening in the train. He knows where she lives, but doesn't know her name, and thinks that they have no mutual friends, so he wonders how they can obtain an introduction.

* * * * *

If you have no mutual friends, "F. G.," your best way of getting to know the young lady will be to perform some little act of politeness to her in the train. You can open the door for her when she wants to get out, reach her umbrella or parcels down from the rack, or perform some other little service. If you do this repeatedly—don't make yourself too obtrusive when doing it—in time you will feel that you know each other quite well, and a formal introduction will be unnecessary.

A Lame Lover.

PUZZLED has fallen in love with a young lady who keeps a tobacconist's shop. Their courting has been conducted over the counter, and he has only just discovered that the young lady is lame. What ought he to do in the matter?

* * * * *

There is no reason why a lame girl should not make just as good a wife as one without an infirmity, provided the lameness does not prevent her getting about easily. So I see no reason why you should not propose marriage to the young lady if you really love her.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ARE YOU USING "WILL POWER"

YOU satisfied with yourself? Are you as successful as you wish to be? Is your health what it should be? Have you perfect control over your nerves and body. . . . . Are SURE that you are making the best of your mental abilities? Are you not often desponded and discontented? ALL your discomforts, worries, all your NERVOUS AILMENTS, in particular, can be overcome by THAT precious gift, with which Nature has endowed all of us, namely, a . . . . . strong THOUGH we all have that gift, yet many put it to a wrong use, or fail to train, exercise, and strengthen it in the right way. Once YOU HAVE RELEASED YOUR . . . . . .WILL- success, happiness, and health is assured you. A rational system of training and strengthening Will-Power is now offered to the public by Prof. EBBARD, whose publishers will send you full particulars free of charge on receipt of a post-card to

DEPT. 38, THE MODERN MEDICAL PUBLISHING CO., 57/58 CHANCERY LANE, W.C.

"NO BETTER FOOD."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's

Pure Concentrated

Cocoa.

300 GOLD MEDALS, ETC.

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its

ABSOLUTE PURITY.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—Sold only in tins with gilt top.

10,000 RUGS GIVEN AWAY

GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

This Phenomenal Offer is made to the readers of Short Stories (18/4/1903) only. On receipt of Postal Order for 5/-, or 62 stamps, we will forward, DIRECT FROM OUR LOOMS to your address, one of our 10/6 genuine SEAMLESS WOVEN, REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, etc., handsomely bordered and woven in 30 different patterns, and large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room. These Carpets will be sold as an Advertisement for our goods, below the Actual Cost of production. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained direct from our Looms, thus saving the purchasers all middle profits.

With every Carpet we shall ABSOLUTELY GIVE AWAY a very Handsome Rug to match, or we will send Two Carpets and Two Rugs for 9/6.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED. THOUSANDS OF UNSOLICITED TESTIMONIALS RECEIVED.

GALAXY ILLUSTRATED BARGAIN CATALOGUES OF CARPETS, HEARTHRUGS TABLE LINEN, CURTAINS, ETC., POST FREE,

if mentioning Short Stories (18/4/1903) while writing.
Cheques and P.O.'s payable to

F. HODGSON & SONS (Dept. S.T.S.) Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants,
WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

"G.P." ASK FOR Government Tea

Eighteenpence Everywhere.

RICH, RIPE, REFRESHING.

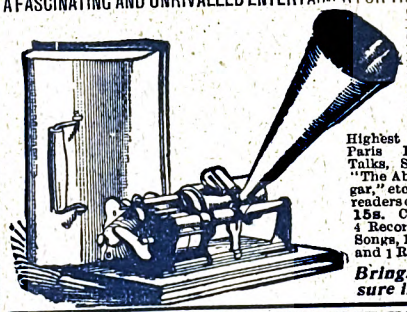
You May Know It by Its Red Tape and Seal.

WRITE FOR FREE SAMPLE TO C.P. GOVERNMENT TEA CO., 16 AMERICA SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

"THE MACHINE THAT TALKS."

CAMPBELL'S GRAPHOPHONE is the best Talking and Singing Machine in the Market at the Price.

A FASCINATING AND UNRIVALLED ENTERTAINER FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.

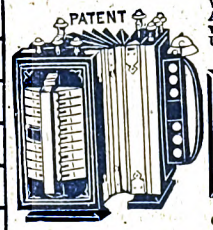


CAMPBELL'S HOME GRAND GRAPHOPHONE. This is no German manufacture, but the new American 20th Century Talking Machine, which gained the Highest Awards at the Paris Exhibition, 1900. Talks, Sings, and recites "The Absent-Minded Beggar," etc. Special price to readers of Short Stories, £2 15s. Carriage paid, with 4 Records free. 2 Vocal Songs, 1 Orchestral Piece, and 1 Recitation.

Brings Endless Pleasure into the Home.

CHARMING MUSIC FOR THE HOME.

CAMPBELL'S Gold Medal MELODEONS



With Organ and Celestial Tone, and Sweet Bell Accompaniments. No Home should be without one. No Knowledge of Music required. Used throughout the world.

200,000 TESTIMONIALS.

Special Offer to the Readers of Short Stories

Campbell's "Gem" Melodeons, price only 6/9
Campbell's "Miniature" Melodeon, „ 10/9
Campbell's "Paragon" Melodeon, „ 14/-
Campbell's "Favourite" Melodeon, „ 16/6

Cut out this and send P.O.O. for the amount. Either sent carriage paid to any address in Great Britain & Ireland.

All lovers of music should at once send for Campbell's New Illustrated Privilege Price List of all kinds of Musical Instruments for Season 1 01 2, now ready. 200,000 sent out yearly. Send 1d. Stamp to—

CAMPBELL & CO., Musical Instrument Makers, 116 Trongate, GLASGOW. Established 50 Years. BEWARE OF WORTHLESS IMITATIONS.

MACKINTOSH'S

IS DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!

PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.

A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

THE ONLY PERFECT FIRELIGHTER.

BREAKFAST READY IN FIVE MINUTES.

OF OILMEN EVERYWHERE.

BRITANNIA CLEANS HER HELMET WITH

"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH

AND EVERY BRITISH HOUSEWIFE SHOULD POLISH ALL METALS WITH IT, TOO.

Most foreign polishes set up acid, are sticky in use, and require much labour in cleaning. "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH spreads evenly over the metal, and produces easily and quickly a lasting brilliancy. "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH is entirely made in England, and by using it you support British Trade.

Manufacturers: THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH Co. Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

SHORT STORIES

THE DAINTY HOME STORY PAPER.

TARTAN COVER — No. 9.—BRUCE.

No. 747.] Week ending April 25, 1903. [Price One Penny.

A KODAK for 5/-

The No. 1 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 2½ by 2½ Inches.

Despite its small size and low price the No. 1 BROWNIE is a thoroughly efficient little camera, and yields photographs as clear and distinct as possible. No dark room is needed for changing the films. In use the Brownie Kodak is simplicity itself.

THE NEW BROWNIE KODAK

The No. 2 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 3½ by 2½ Inches.

MARVELLOUS VALUE PRICE 10/- ONLY.

Finders for vertical and horizontal pictures. Everset time and instantaneous shutter. New and convenient spool-holding devices. Improved non-detachable winding key. Loaded and unloaded in daylight.

Ask for the Kodak Catalogue of all Photographic Dealers or of

KODAK LTD., 43 Clerkenwell Road, London, E.C.

Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold Street, Liverpool; 72-74 Buchanan Street, Glasgow. Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, London, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, London, E.C.; 115 Oxford Street, London, W.; 171-173 Regent Street, London, W.; 46 West Strand, W.C.

J. G. GRAVES

CUTLERY

THE "ENTERPRISE" PARCEL, 25/-

Contains: 6 Table Knives and 6 Dessert Knives, made of reliable Sheffield Steel and fitted with polished white 'Ivorette' Handles. "Ivorette" is the best substitute for genuine African Ivory. The Plate consists of 6 Table Forks, 6 Dessert Forks, 2 Table Spoons, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Tea Spoons, 6 Egg Spoons, 2 Mustard Spoons, 2 Salt Spoons, 1 Pair of Sugar Tongs, 1 Moist Sugar Spoon and 1 Pickle Fork.

Casting "Columbian" Silver.

The Spoons and Forks are made of 'Columbian' Silver, a hard white metal. It is the finest substitute for Sterling Silver known, will wear white throughout, and is unaffected by acids or exposure.

THE "ENTERPRISE" PARCEL of Household Cutlery and Plate, 25/-

J. G. Graves is the only Manufacturer who supplies the Public direct, and the whole of the above Goods are made in the Firm's own factory in Sheffield.

TERMS. Send 5s. with order and complete purchase in five more monthly payments of 4s.; or HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT for full cash payment.

All orders are executed under 'Positive Agreement' to refund the full amount of the deposit if you are not perfectly satisfied.

Send for No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Cutlery, etc., Post Free.

Good Agents Wanted. No Risk. Good Pay.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

Headache

Kaputine cures the most obstinate Headache or Neuralgic Pains in ten minutes. Is the only preparation of its kind having the confidence and recommendation of Medical Men.

Kaputine
THE SAFE REMEDY

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., says: There can be no hesitation on the part of any one suffering from Neuralgic troubles to employ Kaputine—the safe remedy.

The only remedy of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and Infirmaries.

Packets of 18 doses 1s.

KAPUTINE LTD., HUDDERSFIELD.

Neuralgia

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

SOLD BY ALL UP-TO-DATE DEALERS

THE

"OCEANIC"

THE UP-TO-DATE

HALF-GUINEA

BRITISH BOOT.

STYLISH—DAINTY
DURABLE—COMFORTABLE

ASK FOR AND SEE THE STAMP 'OCEANIC' INSIDE EVERY BOOT.

SHORT STORIES

No 747.] Week Ending April 25th, 1903. [One Penny.

The Chronicles o' Glencrackit.

By G. VINCENT HOLYTOWN.

The Witch o' Linogil.

At the side of a mossy path which wound its way through the heart of Glencrackit Woods, a wizened old woman sat crouching by a fire of twigs.

Over the blaze a little pot swung from a low-hanging branch, and she was gazing steadfastly on its bubbling contents, mumbling to herself the while.

"Aye, bonnie laddie," she muttered, "what a day o' bitterness lies afore ye; an' a' for love. What though I warn ye tae turn, it'll mak' ye but the keener tae gang on. But I'll warn ye, for your guid, a' the same."

Elspeth Strachan, reputed amongst the superstitious to have powers of witchcraft, bent closer over the pot. She seemed to see therein something of surpassing interest.

"There, he's left the hoose noo," she whispered hoarsely. "He'll pass this wey within half an 'oor."

* * * * *

Captain David Ogilvy, the Laird of Linogil Estate, was the descendant of a long line of soldiers, with an oft recurring fatality for dying in battle. When not quartered with his regiment he spent his time on his estate, looking after the interests of his tenantry. Twenty-seven years of age, handsome, dashing, and generous, he was deservedly popular with all.

To his humbler tenantry he was particularly agreeable. Poor old Elspeth had held her lowly cot, rent free, with a pension thrown in, for four generations of Ogilvys, and was probably the humblest of all. She was, therefore, the recipient of the courtly Laird's special attention, his kindly attitude towards her being that of one actually honoured by her tenancy.

No wonder then that the "Witch o' Linogil" adored her Laird.

On this lovely morning things seemed fair and full of promise to the Laird of Linogil. His cheery whistling broke in upon the rustling of the forest, stirring the very birds to chorus his joy, and the quick time of "My love is but a lassie yet" heralded his sprightly gait.

A raucous voice arrested his progress. Turning he beheld old Elspeth beckoning him to approach.

"Come here, ma braw son," she was repeating.

"Oh, is that you, Elspie!" said the Laird genially.

"Yea, Laird, it's me. I've come three lang miles tae prevent ye in the day o' your calamity."

"Come now, Elspie," bantered the Laird, "you mustn't talk to me about calamity to-day. You should prophesy good about me and not evil. They tell me you're a bit of a sorceress, Elspie, so you can spae me a golden fortune, and I'll cross your palm with a golden piece."

"Na, na, Laird," replied Elspeth, "I'm nae witch, wi' pooers o'er guid an' evil, sae I canna mak' or mar your destiny. Ye speak like Balak an' Ahab. But whiles I ha'e the gift o' second sight an' I'll tell ye, withoot fee or reward, what'll happen tae ye between noo an' sunset."

"Well, well, Elspie," said the good-humoured Laird, "tell me the worst," and he leant against a tree in a pose of smiling resignation.

The old woman fixed her bright black eyes on his face and responded abruptly:

"Ogilvy, there's danger aheid, turn back!"

"For that very reason, Elspie," laughed the Laird, "I must push on. An Ogilvy never turns his back on danger."

"I ken that, my laddie, so ye maun e'en gang for'a'd. But, eh, sir, ye little reck the anguish that awaits ye."

"Never mind, Elspie, tell me all about it," said the Laird tolerantly. "Forewarned is forearmed, you know."

"Then list ye, Ogilvy o' Linogil," she began. "Your lady love will this day refuse ye——"

The sceptical smile faded from Ogilvy's face, and he shifted his posture uneasily. He was astounded that Elspeth was aware of his intention, that very day, to seek the hand of Lily Allen in marriage. Impressed thus by her knowledge of fact, he was impelled to attach some weight to her prophesy. To believe it, however, meant the premature blasting of his fondest hopes, and his buoyant heart struggled against belief.

"If she does so, Elspeth," he said gravely, "I shall ask her again on a happier-omened day."

"Ye will not, Linogil," she responded decisively. "It's written that this day, but never again, will ye ask her to mairry ye."

Captain Ogilvy did no longer doubt but that Elspeth's words would come to pass. Pale-faced but calm, he stood bolt upright now, like a soldier receiving sentence of death.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"You talked of danger, Elspie," he said gently. "I see nought but sorrow in your words."

"Ye havena heard me oot, Ogilvy. Your troubles only begin then."

"Not so, Elspie, all else after that can matter little. Robbed of all hope——"

"As ye will be!"

"Robbed of hope, life itself would lose its charm."

"Oot o' despair springs the danger o' cooardice. Remember ye're a sojer, Ogilvy, an' resist it. But that'll no' be your chief danger. Ye'll be tempted sair tae dae evil. Ye maun wrestle wi' temptation an' vanquish it. The Deevil himsel' will proffer ye the cup o' specious bliss. Dash it frae your lips, Linogil, for, as surely as ye quaff, it will be bitterness in the latter end. Be wary, ma son, o' the first stranger that speaks tae ye, but mind that he comes tae nae hairm. Further than sunset ma second sight grows dim, an' I canna tell ye mair. But suffeecient for the day is the evil thereof, an' may Heaven grant ye the strength ye'll need."

Depressed but determined, hoping against despair, Ogilvy resumed his walk through the forest, and the trees seemed to be sighing forth their sympathy for him in his sorrow.

As he approached his trysting-place hope gained the ascendency over despair. He would evade, and defeat, the prophecy by reserving his proposal. The prophecy would fail in that he would not be refused that day. If it failed in part, it would fail in all. He laughed aloud in the joy of his triumph over superstition.

* * * * * *

Lily Allen kept her tryst. They met. The moments sped, bright-hued, and fleeting into hours, and still he lingered in her smile. That sad, sweet smile, which through the three short weeks of their acquaintanceship had haunted him night and day. Never had her presence seemed so radiant as on this meeting, when they wandered together, in unwhispered love, on the banks of the brawling Prossen. Reaching at length a pleasant little dell where, amidst a grove of trees, the trickling Burn of Pearsie merges into its noisy rival, they stopped.

"Here is the meeting of the waters," she said softly, adding hesitatingly, "and here must be the parting of our ways."

"Till to-morrow only, Miss Allen," he remonstrated gently.

"Yes, Captain Ogilvy," she responded sadly, "till the to-morrow that never comes. I leave Glencrackit to-day, and you will not see me again."

Ogilvy's heart sank.

"This is the ultimatum of the fate which I cannot evade," he muttered. Then he queried in a voice that quivered audibly, "But why leave so suddenly, and why for ever?"

Her lustrous eyes filled with tears, and her tremulous lips could scarcely frame the simple words—

"Forgive me, I cannot tell you."

Ogilvy's colour returned with added warmth. It seemed that Fate was forcing him to resistance. He feared that resistance would be futile. But nevertheless he would do battle. He felt better now that the first blow had fallen, and thus he spoke—

"Forgive me instead. I did not wish to search out your reasons through mere idle curiosity. My words were the wail of a heart that will break if you pass out of my life. Oh, Lily, you are all the world to me. I have loved no other, I can love no other but you. I ask you now to accept that love. Be my wife, my adorable one, and instead of the parting, let this be the blending of our lives for ever."

The girl was weeping bitterly now.

"It cannot be, David. I love you, ah, how much you will never know. But I cannot marry you. There are circumstances in my life which absolutely prevent me——"

"Lily," he said, looking straight into her truthful eyes, "I care not what those circumstances may be. I love you. You have the word of Ogilvy of Linogil that they matter nothing if you love me and will marry me."

"Love you, for ever! Marry you, never, David! I should be a curse to you, not a blessing. We must part, my love. Good-bye."

She held out her hand. He took it and held it in his.

"May I kiss you once?" he whispered.

"Yes, David, you may, I love you so," she breathed.

He released her hand and folded her in his arms. Responding to his embrace she held up her lips to his. One long, clinging kiss and then murmuring, "Good-bye, my love, be brave," she tore herself free and was gone.

* * * * *

This little love drama had been witnessed and overheard by a third party. Scarcely had the lady disappeared, when the eavesdropper rose from his crouching position behind a clump of foliage. He was a very handsome, well-dressed man of thirty, clean-shaven, barring his neatly-waxed moustache. His features, though prepossessing, wore a look that perpetually flickered between cunning and nervousness, that of a sharker and that of a hunted man.

"I presume I am the villain of the piece," he whispered to himself. "How opportune. I must turn this to account, and quickly."

He was about to advance, when he paused.

"I am a villain, I know," he told himself, "but I have my limitations. I will not interrupt the man at his devotions."

For David Ogilvy had knelt and was praying for strength to bear his great trial.

When he rose he moved over to the broiling pools where the Prossen, congested between rocky banks, plunges over the boulders, with a dull roar of anger. The churning and seething of the water suited the turmoil of his mind.

How he yearned to know what dread obstacle stood between him and Lily Allen, that he might hurl it aside.

Presently he perceived the scent of a cigarette, and, turning, he found himself face to face with the stranger, whose approach had been unheard mid the noise of the waters.

Admirably cool, bland, and even fascinating, the newcomer promptly addressed him.

"I believe I can tell you what you probably wish to know, Captain Ogilvy."

"In regard to what, sir?"

"In regard to your rejected proposal of marriage, which I inadvertently overheard. Forgive me if I seem abrupt. I am in haste, but willing to be of service, ere I go."

The inflection of his voice was delicately polite. The speaker was so obviously a gentleman that his words gave no offence to Ogilvy, whose one thought was to seize the opportunity presented to him.

"Then tell me why my proposal was rejected," he said.

"With pleasure," replied the stranger. "Might I here interpolate that if you could oblige me with the loan of fifty pounds, with I confess, but slender chances of repayment, you will render me an equal service?"

Ogilvy was expecting some request of the kind, and, drawing out his pocket-book, he counted out and handed over in silence the stipulated sum.

"Pray accept my best thanks," said the other, "and, in reply to your query, I may state that the lady cannot marry you because—bigamy is illegal. She is already—unhappily—married."

Ogilvy stared in vacant horror at the speaker.

"Are you sure—you know—the lady?" he faltered.

"Positive. She is my wife," replied the other placidly.

Ogilvy put his hand to his eyes to brush away the mist

Digitized by Google

Why did the landscape reel and totter as it did? Then recovering himself, he replied to a question put to him.

"Your nearest way to a station? Across the suspension-bridge a little lower down. Stop! not that way," he shouted, above the roar of the water.

The other, deliberately disregarding instructions and warning, poised himself on one boulder for a dangerous leap across a swirling pool, to another boulder in the centre of the torrent. He did so successfully, but in taking off again to reach the other bank, he slipped on the slimy stone and plunged headlong into the gushing flood.

Instantly sucked below by the current and jammed between two semi-sunken slabs, his efforts to save himself were powerless against the tons of rushing water that forced him down. He raised a despairing hand in mute appeal for help.

It seemed to Ogilvy that in that instant some foul spirit whispered in his ear, "Let him drown—drink deep of the draught I proffer—quaff the cup of love."

But the horrid suggestion found no lodgment in his mind.

Dropping into the pool, he clung to a fallen tree, and struggled over to the drowning man. Succeeding he contrived to extricate him and drag him to the bank, senseless and bleeding, but alive!

And a wizened crone, witnessing the rescue, clapped her hands with joy. "I kent Ogilvy o' Linogil w'u'd dae what was richt," she croaked.

Ogilvy's exertions were not yet over. The man became conscious but was too weak to walk. He stood in urgent need of medical aid, and Ogilvy bore him tenderly to the nearest farm-house. Elspeth Strachan nodded her approval as he passed with his burden.

"See," she exclaimed, pointing west, "the sun begins tae set, for a' I ken your troubles may be near an end."

Ogilvy shook his head grimly and staggered to the farm-house. She—Lily Allen—stayed there, he knew, and when with blanched, affrighted face she gazed upon him, he laid his burden gently down before her with the words:

"There, Madam, is your husband, I—I saved his life."

She tried to speak but her lips moved voicelessly.

The man raised himself weakly on his elbow.

"I owe you my life," he said to Ogilvy. "That I can never repay. I owe you some money which I will repay now. I owe you more, an explanation, and—the truth. I am Victor W. Allen, escaped convict, blackmailer, fugitive from justice. That lady is not my wife, she is my sister. Disgraced by her relationship to a wretch like myself, she was at least determined that the contamination should not extend to you."

But long ere the explanation was completed, Ogilvy was by her side with his arm around her once more.

"Was that all?" he scoffed. Apparently it was, and seeing he didn't mind, no one else need trouble.

As a matter of fact, no one else knows anything about it. Victor W. Allen is abroad now; nobly retrieving his past.

The gallant Laird of Linogil and his lovely wife are as popular a couple as exist in the whole county. And it may also be suggested that those who wish their fortunes spaed cannot do better than consult Elspie, the "Witch o' Linogil."

Love, the Postman.

The Tale of a Sprained Ankle, a Girl, and a Cyclist.

"I WISH we had brought our bicycles," repeated Nora disconsolately, "and I'd take it myself in a minute."

Her twin-sister raised herself on her elbow on the sofa.

"Are you quite sure there is no one?" she asked.

"Quite sure, all the men on the place are harvesting to within an inch of their lives, even the women are in the fields. If only Martha were here, we might have harnessed the cob between us, and I'd have driven there and back in no time."

"There's the pony," said Dora eagerly, "could you put him in by yourself, do you think?"

Nora, equally a town-bred girl with her sister, looked a little scared at the suggestion.

"If he's in the stable I wouldn't mind trying," she said at last. "I've helped Martha several times, and I believe I know how the straps and things go now."

"Look, look, then," said Dora—"can you see him anywhere in the field?"

Nora went to the window.

"Yes, yes, I see him," she cried distractedly, "he's careering about like mad. I could never catch him."

"Oh, if he's in the field it's hopeless," said Dora wearily. "I've seen Robson try to get him then, and he's too artful for anything. Besides, you're strange to him, and I don't believe it would be safe. Oh, what is to be done. Here I am tied to this wretched sofa and my darling, darling Charlie who loves me so, will think I don't care if he doesn't get my letter by to-morrow. He said so."

"Well, but if you can't post it, you can't," said Nora practically—"suppose you send a telegram first thing in the morning, and I'll be up ever so early so that I can bribe one of the men to put the pony in during their breakfast time."

"Oh, I couldn't possibly send a telegram," said Dora, with a deep blush. "You have never had a proposal of marriage," she went on, with an air of consequence, "so you don't understand, but you can't accept one in that way."

"Well, leave out that part," said Nora, "and just say you would be very pleased if he accepted the English appointment. He says he'll abide by your decision, and as he has to decide to-morrow, you must wire. Yes, Dora, I see no other way for it, you must send a telegram to-morrow."

"I can't—I can't," wailed Dora. "Oh, if it were not for this dreadful sprained ankle, I declare I'd walk every step of the way into Milchester and back, and ask no one to post my letter."

"It's nearly nine miles there and back," said Nora, "and it's pretty late now, but I'll have a try, if you like."

A gleam of hope came into Dora's eyes and died out.

"Oh, no," she said, "I daren't let you, it's such a lonely road, and you don't know the way very well, and it might be dark before you get home, and I know you're frightened of the dark—well, not frightened exactly," she added hastily, "but you don't like it, and it's not as if it were your love-letter either. No, I can't let you even for Charlie, I should work myself into a fever before you got back."

Digitized by Google

But Nora was putting on her hat even while her sister was speaking.

"No, it's all right," she responded, in reply to Dora's expostulations. "I've got a splendid idea. I'll just stop someone riding or driving by and ask them to post a letter in Milchester for me. And mind you write important on the envelope, so that they can't forget it's of the utmost consequence."

"Nora, you're a clever darling," said her sister. "Yes, I'll do that, and be for ever grateful to you. You understand my feeling about the telegram, I'm sure, don't you?

"I couldn't do it, could I? It would make me appear so—so forward. And yet if he didn't hear at all, not knowing how we are fixed, he'd think I didn't care."

"Well, it's going to be all right now," said Nora, "I think I've settled it. Give me the letter; is it ready? Now, don't get anxious if I'm gone a long while. You see, it's no good intrusting it to the first comer. I must just sit by the roadside and wait till I see a good honest, trustworthy, intelligent face."

Nora, having possessed herself of the precious love-letter that was to mean so much to its recipient, set out on her errand with her courage screwed to the sticking-point, for although she would not confess it to her sister, the last few minutes had robbed her plan of some of its brilliancy.

She was shy by nature, and it did not now seem at all an easy task to accomplish, this waylaying of some stranger, whom she was to press into her service.

At this point of her reflections she closed the farm gates behind her, and found herself in the long, lonely, Milchester road, stretching and winding for mile on mile over flat country.

No relief offered in the landscape beyond the occasional clusters of trees which, grouped here and there in a hollow, marked the outlying farms.

Dorothea and Eleanor Conynghame were orphans, and lived with an aunt who chaperoned them, and with whom they shared their small fortune. But she had gone to pay a long promised visit to old friends, and the girls were spending a long summer holiday in a farmhouse amid surroundings that delighted them—an ideal holiday, until one day Dora sprained her ankle, which mishap had since kept her sister almost as much a prisoner as herself.

Nora, rejoicing in the soft summer air and the lazy sense that pervaded everything, sat herself down by the side of a clover field to await the person who was to be her sister's messenger.

Presently the clatter of horses' hoofs broke on her ears, and she strained herself to listen and be on the alert. They came nearer and nearer, and a dog-cart with four young men in it, bowled past.

They were laughing, talking, smoking—Nora was dismayed at the mere idea of asking a favour of them, a more favourable chance, she argued, could scarcely fail to present itself.

After a long interval a countryman pedalled by on a worn-out bicycle; from the groaning of the one and the creaking of the other Nora doubted whether either of them would get much further on their road.

At last her heart beat high with hope, for here were two girls, girls of her own age, bearing down upon her. They were almost within hailing distance, and Nora had actually risen to her feet when they suddenly wheeled about and soon became mere specks in the distance.

Next a boy came past driving a bright business cart, and Nora sprang up.

"Stop! Oh! will you stop, please?"

The boy drew up and got down.

"What is it, miss?"

"Oh, please," said Nora. "I want you to post this letter for me in Milchester."

"I bean't going that way, miss," said the boy. "I be only going as far as Ferrymere Mills."

"Where's that," said Nora, "don't you pass a post-office?"

"I dunno as I do," said the boy, "maybe I shall, maybe I shan't. It just depends on the flour."

This was altogether too vague, so Nora thanked the boy, and decided she must wait again.

After this no one passed for a long time, and Nora had begun to despair, when once again she saw a cyclist coming in her direction.

She watched him anxiously, but he was coming at a good pace, and in fear lest he might pass her before she could stop him, if she waited to convince herself of the honesty and intelligence of his features, she flung herself without further hesitation in his path, waving the letter in front of him.

"Would you please—would you please, post a letter for me," she said, in breathless haste.

The young man, whose progress was thus barred, dismounted not ungracefully, considering the circumstances of the abrupt appeal, and lifting his cap politely, inquired very courteously if he could render her a service.

In spite of his even conventional tones, there was so much veiled admiration in his eyes that Nora felt herself grow crimson.

"It is only," she stammered, with downcast lids, "we are so far from the post; if you are going to Milchester, would you please put a letter in the box for me? It is a very important one," she added, giving him the letter, and raising her eyes to him, "or I wouldn't have asked you."

Lawrence Pembroke smiled at the ingenuousness of the remark. He thought he had never seen a sweeter face or a more bewitching glance.

His way, in point of fact, did not lie through Milchester in the least, but he vowed it did, and took the letter, promising to be a trusty messenger.

Nora thanked him and, her mission accomplished, was about to turn gratefully away, but she saw that the cyclist did not attempt to remount his wheel. Instead he walked on by her side, and when she reached the farm, held the gate open until he was voluntarily compelled to let it swing to behind her.

"Enderby Mills," he read on the gate. "Surely I have heard that name before. I wish to goodness I could remember where, for then I might have a chance of finding out something about that sweet girl, not that it would help me much, I daresay, for she's sure to have a lover already; it must be a love-letter she's given me, what else? Hang the unknown fellow!

"But she looks such a child, she can scarcely be engaged. I wish I had asked her name, though I expect I should have had a fine snub for my pains, and deserved it too. Anyway, here goes, I'm going to look at the address on her precious letter, and find out what I can.

"When a fellow falls head-over-ears in love at first sight, as I've done, he can't stand at trifles, and I'll bet my bottom dollar it's to some man."

The inscription on the envelope proved to have fully justified his speculations, for it represented the name of his most intimate friend:

Charles Manners, Esq.,
19, Hewland Square,
W.

"Charlie, by all that's wonderful," exclaimed Lawrence, "then I'm done! For this must be the girl he's always talking about. Well, I understand his infatuation now. I might have recognised her from her photograph, but no, it doesn't half do her justice

Digitized by Google

"Well, of all the unlucky brutes, I'm one, for I don't believe I'll ever get that girl's face out of my head or the love of her out of my heart. Now I know where I heard the name of the place she's staying at.

"I suppose old Charlie has had that appointment offered him, and he wrote straight off to her, and this is the answer to it. I wonder if it is to be or not to be. I'm as anxious to know as Charlie can possibly be.

"I promised to be a trusty messenger. I'll take the night train to town, and post her letter there myself, and call on Charlie first thing, to know his fate—and mine!"

Early next morning Lawrence called at his friend's place. He found him at his breakfast, perusing for the twentieth time his love-letter just received, and after one look at his face Lawrence felt he scarcely needed to ask the question that trembled on his lips.

"Will she or won't she, that's what I want to know?"

"She will!" exclaimed Manners, "congratulate me!"

"I do with all my heart," said Lawrence. "I acted special messenger to you, old man," he went on, indicating the letter, and slightly stretching his adventure. "You're a lucky chap!" he added enviously.

"And the happiest in the world!" said Manners. "I'm going to start straight off there to-night. She's down at Enderby Mills, you remember I told you. I say you might come with me."

"Yes, and play gooseberry," sneered Lawrence, unable quite to control himself—"a nice rôle! No, thank you."

"Oh, but there's a sister," said Manners. "I've seen her too—Nora—a jolly nice girl, not up to my Dora, of course, but still pretty enough."

"Oh! I don't think I'll come," said Lawrence morbidly. "Girls aren't much in my line."

"Don't you think Dora the prettiest girl you ever saw in your life," exclaimed Manners. "But, I forgot, you've not seen her. Wait till you see her."

"I have seen her, man," ejaculated Lawrence impatiently. "I told you."

"Oh, you saw Nora, I expect. You've mixed them up, the names are so confusingly alike—not to me, though, of course."

"I don't know what you're driving at," growled Lawrence.

"Well, you saw one of them, that's certain," laughed Manners good-naturedly, "and it certainly couldn't have been Dora, because you see what she says—she's laid up with a sprained ankle. That's why I'm going off to her now, the darling. It was Nora, her sister, who gave you my letter."

"Then, which on earth," Lawrence stuttered in his excitement—"which on earth are you engaged to?"

"Dora," said Manners, "not the one who gave you the letter," he explained. And then in view of his friend's altered countenance, a light broke on him, and he exploded with laughter as he began to grasp the situation.

"Upon my word," he said, "if I don't believe you have fallen in love with her twin-sister. Well, she's as free as air, I believe."

"That settles it," cried Lawrence, grasping his friend's hand. "I come with you to Milchester. Start any time you like. I'm ready."

"I'll write at once," said Manners, "and say we'll be with them this time to-morrow."

"Nora," said the pretty invalid, as next morning Charlie Manners' letter fluttered in her dainty hands, "what do you think, you know that cyclist that you admired so?"

"I didn't," protested Nora, with crimson cheeks.

"That you said you did, any way," went on Dora remorselessly, "well, that you gave my letter to. Well, what do you think! He's a friend of Charlie's, his greatest friend, and he's bringing him with him to-day. Now, what do you think of that?"

Whatever Nora thought on the subject she refused to communicate to her sister, but it was noteworthy that she shortly found occasion to leave Dora's room and go to her own, and that when she returned Dora asked, not without a gleam of mischief, why she had put on her new muslin frock.

"For whose benefit is that?" asked the naughty prisoner to the sofa, "not for Charlie's, I hope. Come now, no poaching!"

"Dora, how can you," exclaimed Nora. "I never thought of such a thing. It's so hot and this is my coolest dress."

"And your prettiest," said Dora, "and you look very pretty in it. I foresee Mr. Pembroke will be vanquished with great slaughter!"

"Dora, I shan't stay to listen to your nonsense any longer! I shall just go away and leave you to your fate, and tied to the sofa."

Nora was as good—or as bad—as her word, for in spite of the protestations of her twin, she went downstairs and out in the garden, taking a book with her to sit on the lawn reading.

But her thoughts would wander, and when she heard the click of a gate and the scrunching of gravel underfoot, and descried two male figures standing in the porch they went further afield from its pages than ever.

She reproached herself for not having stayed in the house, and taken Mr. Manners up at once to see her sister. Well, it was too late now, for somehow an unaccountable shyness had possessed her, and she felt that not even for Dora's sake could she enter the drawing-room and make formal acquaintance with Mr. Manners' friend.

But Lawrence Pembroke was a young man who did not usually let the grass grow under his feet.

Mrs. Clay, the farmer's wife, had already carried off his friend to his sweetheart, and his own impatience would not allow him to remain in the pretty flower-scented drawing-room, so he boldly stepped out through the open French windows and went to reconnoitre. Fortune was indeed more than kind for the object of his admiration and his search sat before him in full view.

There was no escape possible for her now, even if she had wished it.

Mr. Manners' friend stood before her, introducing himself.

"Do you remember," he said eagerly, "two days ago you asked me a favour. To-day I am going to beg one of you. Will you grant it as readily as I granted yours, I wonder? That would be only fair!"

"But, but," she stammered confusedly, hardly knowing what she said, "I didn't ask you for myself."

"You darling!" he said delightedly, taking up her words. "No, that's just what I am going to ask you for."

"And if at that moment Nora's answer was not all that an ardent lover might desire, at any rate Fortune usually favours the bold, and events proved that Lawrence Pembroke certainly lost nothing by his impetuous wooing.

Ellice Beere.

"Mary, has anyone called while I was out?" "Yes, ma'am; Mr. Biggs was here." "Mr. Biggs? I don't recall the name." "No, ma'am; he called to see me, ma'am."

Papa: "Yes, my son, you will realise some time, when you are old, that your schooldays have been your happiest ones." Tommy: "Oh, papa, why can't I wait, then, until I grow up, before I go to school, so that I can appreciate it?"

The following Tartans have already appeared on the covers of "Short Stories":

No. 1.—MENZIES	Issue dated	August 2nd, 1902.
No. 2.—MACPHERSON ...	,, ,,	August 16th, 1902.
No. 3.—MACLEOD	,, ,,	September 13th, 1902.
No. 4.—ROB ROY	,, ,,	October 4th, 1902.
No. 5.—MACMILLAN ...	,, ,,	October 25th, 1902.
No. 6.—MACDONALD of SLEAT	,, ,,	November 29th, 1902.
No. 7.—ERSKINE	,, ,,	January 3rd, 1903.
No. 8.—CLERGY	,, ,,	February 7th, 1903.

Digitized by Google

HIS CLEVER RUSE.

Telling of the Discovery of a Hidden Love.

"No, Tom, it is useless. It is not that I do not love you, but marriage at this time would be an obstacle which would prove insurmountable to the working out of my plans and my ambitions. I am so confident of my talents that I know I will succeed on the stage if only given a fair chance."

Tom Lawson was wise enough not to argue the matter further this time. He had watched Cora Barton struggle with other illusions, and knew that time acted as a safe and sure curative.

He would wait for the operation of the same medicine to purge from the girl's mind the complacent belief in her own histrionic ability.

That Cora Barton did possess a talent for theatrical work was a fact not to be denied. She also possessed the temperament, and what was much in her favour, a stage presence that made managers look up and wonder "if something might not be made of that girl."

Her mother and father died when she was quite a young girl, leaving her a competence, and making the girl more or less independent in spirit. The guardianship of a maiden aunt did little or nothing to curb her artistic longings.

At the age of twenty-three, with a seminary education, improved by a few years of travel at home and abroad, she determined to seek a stage career.

Tom Lawson had known her for many years, and so devoted was he in his affection that he had followed her from one end of the continent to another.

Enlisting the services of a friend who was only too happy to show his little importance by securing her an introduction to one of the big theatrical managers in London, Cora Barton had been given a hearing.

The manager was favourably impressed, and in putting on the second play of the season she was advanced several steps on the ladder.

The girl's enthusiasm painted pictures in her mind of the audiences rising from their chairs and demanding her to bow and bow as the curtain would be raised and dropped at the end of each act in plays written specially for herself by the master playwrights of the day. It was at this time that Tom Lawson renewed his suit.

He had been so constant in his attentions that the girl had ceased to consider them as such.

Although he was strongly opposed to the career she had set for herself, he advised her from time to time, and his counsel had been followed with appreciable advancement in the stage work of the young actress.

There was no doubt that the girl would make a complete success on the boards, and this was a source of new discomfort for the man who loved her.

It was always a pleasure for him to see her from one of the orchestra stalls, but upon leaving the theatre he was more ill at ease than when at home reading or wondering what the end of things would be.

Then came the third and decided success. The critics had ceased talking of the girl as formerly a member of Society, and were contented to judge her work on its merit.

Tom Lawson stopped his idling and hovering about the flame of Cora Barton's stage splendour. He went to his clubs oftener, dined out with friends and entered generally into the social pleasures of a very merry winter. His visits to Cora at her home, and in her dressing-room became less frequent.

One night there was a theatre party, and Tom was one of it. The seats were well in front, and very soon after her first entrance, Cora Barton caught sight of her faithful old friend with what seemed a very happy and very pretty girl.

That night the actress repeatedly changed her position on the stage to get a better view of the girl who was seated next to Tom Barton. When she was driving home from the theatre her mind was troubled. She admitted to herself that she did not like things as they were.

The play was an unqualified success, securing for the star an abundance of well-merited praise from critics and public alike. It was such a piece of dramatic art that the theatre lover might find even the second and third performances more to his liking than the first.

This may have been the reason why Tom Lawson and the fair young lady whom he escorted on the evening of the theatre party saw several performances of the play during the first part of its run. They always occupied seats well in front or in the left proscenium box.

The social columns of the newspapers said a great deal of Tom Lawson that winter, and one Society reporter went so far as to hint at his engagement with a girl "fairer than all the fair." Cora Barton read it, and her sweet disposition suddenly changed.

At the performance that night she stuttered over her lines, and the manager said some unpleasant things to her before she retired to the dressing-room after the last curtain.

Other papers made the same insinuations about Lawson, and instead of reading the theatrical news with her morning coffee, Cora Barton found herself running through the Society columns with the eagerness of a débutante.

The girl changed inwardly and outwardly. This was apparent to her companions of the stage, and the manager grew greatly displeased with her work. One day he sent for her and told her that unless more snap was put into her part he would be required to fill it with some one else.

"Why, Miss Barton," he said, "you nearly ruined that scene in the third act last night, and Miss Galter told me that if it were repeated she would not go on with you again. I am sorry, but you see for my own protection I have been forced to put another at work studying your part in case of emergency."

As a climax to her nervous discontent and uneasiness of mind, Tom Lawson, with the same beautiful girl, appeared in their customary places in the left proscenium box on the night following.

To aggravate Cora Barton's disquietude they arrived in the midst of one of her finest declamatory efforts.

The girl finished bravely enough, but she knew in her own heart that when the one scene in which she was supposed to show her talent would come, that this night she would make a signal failure.

It was not exactly a signal failure. The leading lady fumed and said:

"What wishy-washy work that is. Either you or I go, Miss Barton, and"—with a fine sarcasm—"I don't think it will be I."

The manager said:

"Really, Miss Barton, I dislike this very much. From to-night on your part will be filled by another. I may have something for you later in the season, or, if you care to go out on the road, I will place you."

"I might as well give it up at once," Cora Barton said to her aunt the next morning. "Oh, if I could only see Tom. I know his advice would be just the right thing, and he would comfort me in this misery. I wish I were far, far away!"

There was no need to send for Tom Lawson. He knew already what had happened, and when he called upon Cora Barton that afternoon there was an air of assurance about him that portended a victory of some sort.

One hour after he was ushered into the living room of the pretty little flat all was settled, and a honeymoon planned for early in the Spring of the next year. Louis Honig.

Digitized by Google

GREAT NEW SERIES.

Confessions of a Self-made Girl

The writer of these Confessions relates in this series of articles the true story of her life, from the time when she left Cornwall, an unsophisticated but ambitious girl, until she made her name and fortune. Her name is well known to you.

[For the purposes of these Confessions I am calling myself Maud Cardew, as my real name is too well known for me to wish to make the story of my life public in this manner.]

The Principals in the Story.

MAUD CARDEW.—The self-made girl.

HON. ROBERT LESTRANGE. (Commonly known as Bobbie.)

REGINALD (DI) NORTHCOTE.

Men who had helped her to come to London and befriended her on her arrival.

The Duke of Midlandshire.

It was a merry party that Lady Filby brought together for a week or ten days at Grindewald that Christmas. We were having a short vacation lasting until New Year's Eve, so Yorke Donovan was one of us, and Prince Kia was there, and a German Count.

We had a separate suite of rooms at the hotel, and all the men had plenty of money, which, of course, made it jollier for us.

I suppose Prince Kia was looked upon as my particular admirer, but, as a matter of fact, the German Count ran him very close, and Yorke Donovan was too attentive for my peace of mind.

The two first did not worry me in the least, they were both such thorough rogues of a certain class, that I did not care whether they languished with imaginary heartache or not. But Yorke Donovan was a good fellow, not yet spoilt by success.

Lady Filby had set her heart on him for the time being, and I did not want to have any unpleasantness with her. So I shunned him so far as I could, and amused myself with the two foreigners, only hoping I should not get them involved in a duel, or anything of that kind.

The first day we were there we spent all our time on the ice, but the second we boldly ventured forth on a tobogoning excursion. The Prince and Count both tried to persuade me to start down the slide with them, but I insisted that they should go alone first to get their hands in a little.

About twenty yards down the slide there is a sharp curve round the top of a bank, and, if you are not very careful, you shoot over this bank on to your head in the snow. Well, the Prince started first, and of course, when he reached the curve, his tobogan became unmanageable, and over he went, head first down the bank.

Almost at the same moment the Count pushed off after him, and, to my intense amusement, shot off at exactly the same spot, and landed head first on the top of the Prince. For some minutes Yorke Donovan and I laughed so much that we could not speak, and then we became aware that the two men were almost at each other's throats.

"For Heaven's sake don't let them fight!" I exclaimed, and watched anxiously.

"They will, though!" said Yorke, as the voices grew angrier, and the gestures more menacing.

"Oh, it will be horrible!" cried little Lady Filby, "and spoil all the week. Do stop them, Mr. Donovan!"

"I'm afraid I should only make matters worse," he said anxiously, glancing at me as if for advice.

A sudden idea leapt to my mind, and instantly I pulled up my tobogan, squatted down anyhow, and started off along the track. As a matter of fact I think I could have rounded the curve easily, but the quarrel had to be stopped somehow, so I headed for the bank as if I could not help myself, and, with a laughing cry, shot over and toppled in the snow at their feet.

A girl watching at the top told me afterwards that Yorke Donovan exclaimed "Bravo!" and started running forward leaving Lady Filby alone, looking as black as thunder. I fancied it was from that moment she began to dislike me. But I gained my end, for the two enemies were so concerned about me they forgot their quarrel, and we presently returned quite amicably to the top.

"How could you?" were Lady Filby's first words, in a tone of disgust. "My dear, I never saw anything more unladylike!"

"Then I hope you never will!" I replied quietly, and prepared for another descent. This time I rounded the curve and shot to the bottom, including the "devil's leap" without any disaster, and with intense enjoyment.

At the bottom of the slide I found a young man, sitting on his tobogan, awkwardly endeavouring to tie his handkerchief round his right hand. He was an Englishman of aristocratic though somewhat effeminate appearance, and he was clearly in difficulties.

I watched him covertly for a moment, then volunteered my help. He thanked me, and at once held out his hand, which he had cut somehow with his tobogan in a spill, and all the time I was tying it, he sat gazing into my face.

Digitized by Google

"If I am not much mistaken," he said, "I have the honour of being attended by Miss Maud Cardew?"

"You have," I said curiously, "if it can be called such, though I wonder that you should recognise me out here."

"I ought to," he answered, "seeing I have ten photographs of you, and have seen you in the same piece fifteen times."

"You must have been rather hard up for something to do," I said, feeling myself colour, and trying to laugh it aside lightly, and, just then, to my relief, Yorke Donovan shot safely over the drop, and landed at our feet.

I turned to him at once, exclaiming, "Isn't it delightful?" and added, in reply to his questioning glance, "I have just been helping this gentleman tie up his hand as he had hurt it. Come, are you going to be magnanimous, and pull my tobogan back?"

He took the string at once, and, with a casual farewell nod to my unknown admirer, we started the steep, upward ascent together.

That evening there was a big dance at the hotel in which we took part, and I quickly discovered my morning's patient among the gay throng of people. He was watching me, and, when our eyes met, made a step as if to come forward, but I felt I had quite as many followers on my hands as I could manage, and turned sharply away to chat to the Prince.

The whole evening he watched me, though I persisted in taking no notice, and the Count wanted to call him out for it. Feeling as if I had come away with a cargo of bombshells, I implored him to do nothing of the kind, and was considerably relieved when at last we all met in our own sitting-room for cigarettes and coffee before retiring.

But again Fate seemed determined to pursue me with adventures, and, while cutting a difficult figure in a quiet little spot on the ice next morning, a man floundered clumsily into me, and knocked me flat on my back, just as my unknown admirer chanced to skate in my direction.

Of course he rushed forward and commenced to pick me up in the most solicitous fashion. I was really quite stunned for the moment, and glad to be led to the nearest seat.

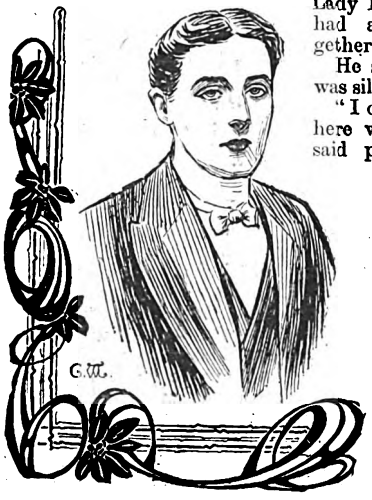
I quickly recovered myself, however, and could not help smiling at the dire imprecations he muttered on the unfortunate individual who had knocked me down. When he saw that I was quite all right, he at once hastened to grasp his opportunity, and I knew that I was caught.

"Why wouldn't you let me be introduced to you last night?" he said. "Or at any rate come and ask for a dance?"

"Because I hadn't one to spare," I replied coolly.

"You mean you didn't want to have one?"

"No, I don't," I told him frankly. "But I am here with Lady Filby's party, and we had agreed to keep together."



He seemed surprised, and was silent a moment.

"I did not know you were here with Lady Filby," he said presently, and something in his speech made me colour. "I concluded you had met here by chance."

"I do not see what difference it makes either way," I answered stiffly. "I think I can skate quite well now," and attempted to rise. I did so very unsteadily, however, and was glad to sit down again.

"I am here to meet Lady Fitzclarence's party," he continued after fussing round me a little. "They arrive to-morrow, are you staying long?"

"No, only a week," I told him. Then I could not refrain from adding mischievously—"That is if none of my bombshells explode unexpectedly, and we have to go before."

He laughed in a boyish fashion that reminded me of Bobbie, and that was decidedly refreshing after my foreign companions, but I wished he had not quite such an effeminate air about him.

He was altogether too pretty, with light, curly hair, carefully parted down the middle, American fashion, blue eyes, and a pink and white complexion. Also he wore an eye-glass and a diamond ring, and I strongly object to both.

At the same time he was emphatically a man who knew his world, and, before we parted, he succeeded in making me promise him three dances that evening.

I remember my two foreigners, or my "menagerie," as he would persist in calling them, looked very black when he came and claimed me, and, as we glided away, he remarked laughingly, "I hope that black chap doesn't carry a knife about with him."

"So do I," I laughed, "for I think I should stand as fair a chance as anyone to make a sheath for it if he did."

"Why don't you palm him off on Miss Delaware?" mentioning another girl in our party; "and tell the German it is a pity his countrymen can't fight or make a living at home; and you would get rid of the two?"

"And what if I don't want to be rid of them?" I asked.

He shrugged his shoulders and remarked with a sneer: "Oh, of course, there is no accounting for tastes."

"No, and a change from one's own countrymen is a positive relief sometimes," I answered sweetly.

He was very sulky after that for a time, and I was pleased, for he was altogether too well satisfied with himself.

By the time our last dance came round, however, he had quite recovered, and was all the nicer for his snub. He got his own back a little though by remarking once: "It must be very nice to be so secure in one's own beauty and charm as to feel able to snub at will."

"Oh, very!" I said, and laughed with real enjoyment.

It was not until Lady Fitzclarence's arrival the next day that I discovered who he was, and then he was named among her party as the young Duke of Midlandshire. Yorke Donovan told me, and I was a good deal taken by surprise.

"Do you think it is correct?" I asked.

"Oh, yes," he told me; "I remember him coming into the dukedom about three years ago. He went abroad big game shooting or something soon afterwards, and it was said it was to get away from various energetic mothers of beauties."

Afterwards I stood on a verandah, gazing at the towering slopes of the Wetterhorn, and thinking about Yorke's information, for it had made me feel thoughtful.

"Here," I said to myself; "is your second chance. Here is your peer."

A few moments later the young Duke himself came and leant his arms on the rail beside me.

"Well," he remarked; "are you looking for chamois?"

"No," I answered, after a moment; "I am contemplating what appears to be the unattainable."

"That's a thing I have never done," he said. "But if I could discover something unattainable, that I genuinely wanted, I should be thankful, and I should move Heaven and earth to get it. As it is, I have found it always a question of wishing and having."

"Because you are a Duke, I suppose?" I said quietly.

"Oh, so you've found that out, have you?" he asked, with a scarcely perceptible sneer.

"I was told of the fact an hour ago," I replied; "I should certainly never have taken the trouble to find it out."

"By Jove, you can hit hard!" he muttered, with an air of relish, and surveyed me with a new interest in his eyes; "I suppose dukes, and princes, and counts are mere dust and ashes to successful actresses?"

"Not at all," I answered; "they are indispensable to a certain extent in establishing her success."

Digitized by Google

"Do you know," he said; "I think you are too sharp. Beautiful women do not need brains, they are only to be looked at. The combination gives a distinctly unfair advantage. Now, if you had only the average brains, I could easily make you my toy—buy you with my position, you know—but, as it is, you are a deal more likely to make me the toy."

"Only as I am not in the slightest need of a plaything," I retorted; "the unfair advantage, as you call it, need not trouble you in the least."

"Ah, I see your menagerie still suffices," he retaliated; "have you taught them any new tobogganing tricks lately?"

For a moment I felt annoyed, then I laughed.

"I think you have made things even," I said; "now I am going to look for Lady Filby."

That evening the Duke introduced me to Lady Fitzclarence, who received me with a good deal of gush. I did not care for her at all, but at the same time, found her amusing. Also she took a fancy to the German count, for which I was most grateful, but I think she was really there on the Duke's account. She had a husband somewhere, but she did not seem in the least clear as to his whereabouts, nor at all interested in them.

"I suppose as you are here with Lady Filby you are very gay," she said to me with a meaning laugh, and I felt myself grow very hot and angry without knowing why.

"It seems to be your handsome hero of the drama this time," she ran on; "I declare Betty Filby does like variety. It was an Italian singing-master last time. Why that fool of a husband of hers did not show her up, I don't know; but I daresay he felt so long as he could get quit of her nothing else mattered."

I got up suddenly, feeling as if I had received a blow, and crossed the room to a cool balcony. There Yorke Donovan joined me presently, looking worried and anxious.

"Ah," he said, in a relieved tone; "I wanted to see you."

Then he sat down and folded his arms, staring somewhat gloomily at the mountains.

I was glad to see him, and waited. I had a feeling that somehow he was like a rock among shifting sands compared with the rest of our companions.

"In some way you have made an enemy of Lady Filby," he said presently; "I think if she could, she would do you an injury."

"Do me an injury?" I exclaimed; "but why?—I have never harmed her and she is so friendly."

"I don't know," he said warily; "but I don't think she is quite what she seems."

I was silent, and he added:

"I only want to warn you to be on your guard. I may be mistaken, but it it is best you should be prepared."

I thanked him, and tried to laugh lightly, but my heart was beginning to sink a little.

That night we all met together in Lady Fitzclarence's sitting-room for a chat, and I must admit the conversation was not eddifying. Tales were told which will not bear repetition, and again and again I was on the point of leaving the room in disgust. I certainly should have done, had I not been a guest, and momentarily expecting the party to break up. When we finally left, the Duke strolled out with us, and persisted in lighting and carrying my candle. My room was at the end of a long passage, and before we came to the door, I stopped and held out my hand.

"There is no violent hurry, is there?" he asked, looking hard at me.

"I am very tired," I said shortly.

"Then I am sure you will drop the candle if I give it to you. If you have a headache, let me come in and bathe it for you."

"No, no," I exclaimed; "give me my candle at once!"

He gave a low laugh that sent the blood rushing to my face.

"I believe you are afraid of me," he said; "and I am surprised you are in such a hurry to send me away. Lady Filby's friends are not usually so particular. I rather expected an invitation to stay a little."

"How dare you!" I gasped, in a white heat of passion; "I have never been so insulted in my life!" And, pushing into my room, I slammed the door to and locked it, leaving him outside still holding the candle.

Then I went to the window and leant out, full of a sudden longing to feel the keen mountain air bathing my face. I felt as if I wanted purifying—as if I had become a loathsome creature because of my associates.

To me a nauseous atmosphere seemed to hang about the inside of the hotel, a hot, sickening, pestilential air of passion and degradation.

I felt as if I would like to go bare-foot up the mountain, and wash myself clean away from all humans, in the pure, eternal snows, nearest the quiet stars.

Instead, I went to bed in the dark, unable to face even my own reflection, and cried myself to sleep, wishing with all my heart I had listened to Di.

But there was worse to come, and I was to learn a good deal before I was safely in my own cosy flat again.

(Next Tuesday I will tell you why I returned from Switzerland.)

Digitized by Google

Just Pals.

How an Illness Brought on a Love Affair.

He smiled at her across the table and she flashed a look of saucy defiance back, and said:

"So you think it has been a great success?"

"Why of course it has—don't you think so?" he answered, with an intonation of surprise.

She lowered her eyelids until he could only see a fringe of dark lashes along the pallor of her cheek, and said slowly:

"Yes, I think it has—for once pure platonics have been tried and found possible."

"You were always the doubter," he said triumphantly, "so you admit that you were wrong."

"I admit that in our case it has worked all right, but I still think that as a general rule it is a very dangerous experiment."

"Well, you see I was quite right, and it is just a year to-day sinced we formed our contract—and I for one, hope that this time five years will see it still in existence."

She thoughtfully drew patterns on the tablecloth with a fork, and still kept her eyes down.

"Five years is a long time," she said. "Did it never occur to you that this may get monotonous, or one or other of us might want to marry, and then our respective husband or wife might object?"

"Yes, but I don't want to marry, don't intend to marry, don't believe in it, as you know perfectly well, and you have always said that you quite agreed with me."

"Well, it is the natural fate of all mankind and womankind too, and I do not see any reason why you should escape it."

"But what is the use of spoiling the present by vague imaginings of what may happen and probably never will."

She made no reply, and he looked at her downbent head wondering—as he so often did—whether all women were alike, and why they could never rest content with things as they were without puzzling and worrying over some mythical future into which it was impossible to see.

Personally, he was perfectly content with the present and could not understand why she was not equally so.

Few men probably would have been surprised that he was—for over a year the girl sitting opposite him had been his constant companion—and few weeks passed without seeing them together, either dining, lunching or spending long hours in Clarice Davenant's little drawing-room, discussing various subjects of vital interest to themselves, although of very little moment to the outside world.

Although only twenty-eight, Miss Davenant was entirely alone in the world, and in spite of Mrs. Grundy, she elected to live a perfectly independent life, without the assistance of the usual chaperon.

Naturally unconventional her life had tended to make her more so, and her contract, made a year ago with Denis Miller, to be "just pals" and no more and no less, as if they were men, instead of a good-looking bachelor of thirty-five and an extremely pretty woman, had been carried out as thoroughly as she did everything she entered into.

At first their somewhat erratic actions had caused much gossip and speculation among their mutual acquaintances, but as time wore on, people were content to let them alone, finding that they seemed to be quite oblivious to outside opinion, and they had adhered rigidly to the terms of their contract. Their dinner to-night was held to celebrate its first anniversary.

Clarice looked sweet enough to have tempted any man to lapse into love-making, however platonic his intentions, as she leant back in her chair, a little smile curving her perfect lips.

Denis Miller, as he looked at her, wondered for a moment why she was still without the golden circlet of matrimony round her slim fingers. He knew that more than one man had tried to tempt her to forsake her independent life for that of "double harness," but without success.

"Well," he said, breaking the silence that had fallen between them, "what are you thinking of—still worrying over the future?"

She laughed and roused herself from her reverie.

"Nothing at all," she said, "I was just dreaming in an aimless kind of way. At any rate, whatever comes afterwards, the present is very charming and you are certainly the most satisfactory of friends."

"And you are the most ideal pal that any man could desire."

"That being so, I think we had better adjourn our Mutual Admiration Society or we shall be late. I only hope you will continue in the same mind."

"Of course I shall—why shouldn't I?" he demanded.

"Oh, no reason at all, except——oh, nothing, let us go," she said hurriedly, rising as she spoke.

He sprang up and came round to help her with her cloak. When he could no longer see her face, Miss Davenant's smile became more decided, in fact in anyone less pretty it might almost have been termed a "grin," and a keen observer would have guessed that she perhaps did not believe quite so implicitly as her companion in the purely platonic theory, in spite of the fact that she pretended to do so.

* * * * * *

A few weeks later Miss Davenant was entertaining a visitor at her flat—it was a depressing November afternoon, and outside in the street the rain fell with that persistent, depressing drizzle which is characteristic of London—not a good, thorough downpour, but a steady drip, drip, drip, which makes everything sloppy, takes hair out of curl, and straightens feathers, and otherwise afflicts the temper of the feminine mind, and, curiously enough, of the masculine too, although they are exempt from the burden of curls and feathers.

But comfort, warmth and light reigned supreme in the little drawing-room, and the good-looking, long-limbed youth who stretched himself lazily in a long chair, while his pretty hostess busied herself with the tea-table, looked the personification of contentment.

It was a curious fact that when in the presence of Clarice the majority of men wore a satisfied and generally-pleased-with themselves-and-everyone air.

She possessed that subtle power which some women seem to be born with and others can never acquire, of making a man feel satisfied with himself—a feeling of being appreciated and understood which acts as a balm to the male mind.

Their conversation flagged a little, and Clements said abruptly:

"Hard luck on Miller getting laid up just now, isn't it?"

"Laid up," she said, with a start. "Is he ill? I have not heard anything of him for three or four days and was wondering what had become of him. What is the matter?"

"I thought you have would been sure to know," answered Clements. "I suppose he was not well enough to write. He got a bad cold, and, instead of taking care of himself, went and got wet and is in bed with—well, I don't know if it's pneumonia, but he will have it if he is not very careful.

Digitized by Google

"He won't have a nurse and he only has a man there, who is an awful ass, as they all are, and no use to keep him in order. I went in to see him, and he was banging about all over the shop and flinging the clothes off, and he was in such a beastly bad temper that I came away. I will look him up again to-morrow. By Jove, I must be off, it is late."

Clarice shook hands with her versatile visitor in a kind of dream, and was conscious of a feeling of intense relief when the door finally closed on him. For some time she stood and gazed thoughtfully into the fire.

"Denis was ill—he would have pneumonia if he did not take care. Supposing he were to get worse, why he might even die—people die of pneumonia very often——"

With an air of determination she walked across the room, and, going to her bedroom, she proceeded quickly and decisively to change her tea-gown for a plain black dress; then from some hiding-place she took out—two large nurse's aprons.

She looked at them with a little smile; relics of some nursing classes she had once attended, she had not thought then to what practical use they might some day be put.

She folded them carefully and put them into a handbag, then she paused and said aloud:

"Supposing he does not like it—if he should be angry with me—what shall I do?"

She hesitated for a few moments and then said decidedly:

"Well, if he is I can't help it. I could not leave him alone when he is ill to run such risks, it would not be acting as a friend if I did."

She put her hat and coat on, and picking up the bag, she returned to the drawing-room. She rang the bell, and when her maid appeared, said:

"Emily, I am going out to see a friend who is ill. I may not be back till late so I shall not want dinner. You need not sit up for me if I am not in by ten."

The maid withdrew, and Clarice moved towards the door. On a table stood a photograph of Denis in a silver frame. She stopped and picked it up, and looked at it steadfastly for a long time. Then with a half-shamed air she kissed it hastily, and went out.

* * * * *

"If you please, sir, there is a lady here."

"Lady, I can't see ladies now. What the dickens do you mean by coming to me with such messages, you——"

The awe-struck countenance of the faithful James was abruptly withdrawn, and was replaced by a vision—outwardly perfectly self-possessed, inwardly the very reverse.

"Clarice!"

"Yes, Clarice. I heard such an account of you from Mr. Clements that I decided there was nothing for it but to come and see for myself what was the matter, in fact, it was my duty—as a pal."

"What did that ass Clements say? I did not mean you to know that I was ill. I shall be all right in a day or two."

"He said that you had caught a very bad cold, and that you had no one here to look after you, and might get pneumonia if you were not taken care of; so I thought about it, and—and I could not rest without coming to see how you were—you are not angry, Denis?"

Her voice shook a little and she turned away, pretending to arrange some medicine bottles.

Perhaps he was weak and more depressed than he had cared to admit, but there was something suspiciously like tears in his eyes, and his mouth quivered under his moustache in a way that it was probably as well that she did not see. He caught her hand and carried it impetuously to his lips as he said in a low voice:

"You are an angel."

A fortnight later Denis Miller—now convalescent—sat in a big arm-chair before a blazing fire and watched the clock and the door alternately.

"Half-past four. She said she would be here by four—what is the matter, I wonder? Hang this pipe, the beastly thing has gone out again." He threw it down fretfully, and at that moment the door opened and Clarice came in.

"At last," he said, "I thought you were never coming. You said four, and it is half-past four now," in an aggrieved voice.

"I am so sorry, I could not help it. Mrs. Carlton came to see me and I could not get away."

"Mrs. Carlton—meddling old busybody, what did she want?"

"Oh, she came to give me some advice that was all—she has very good intentions and means to be kind."

"Her kindness seems to have had a depressing effect," Denis said. "You have been crying."

She turned her face away and began rather aimlessly to poke the fire.

"You need not poke the fire out," he continued. "What did Mrs. Carlton say, something about me, I suppose?"

"Well, she said—oh, that of course it was very kind of me to come and look after you when you were ill, and that of course she understood that we were very great friends, but that I was not a hospital nurse, and that I was young, and—and——"

"Very pretty," he put in. "Well, go on."

She blushed and continued:

"And that people would talk—and that they think it has gone a little too far, and that some people may even refuse to know me any more."

Denis got up and stood with his back to the fire.

"Old beast," he said, I expected something of this sort. Only a narrow-minded old gossip like that would say such things, none of your real friends would think of it."

"But still, Denis, you see you are nearly well now and do not want me so much, and I think perhaps I had better not come any more."

"Yes, I do, I want you more. What am I to do shut up here all alone?"

"You won't be alone, lots of people come to see you, and you will soon be well enough to go out again, and then we can meet as we used to. You see, while you were so ill it was different. You don't really want me now."

"Don't I," he said slowly. "Don't I? I am not so sure about that."

"Well, I don't see anything else for it but for you to get well as quickly as possible. One must consider public opinion a little, you know, and we do not consider it much."

He looked down at her dark head with its rippling hair.

"I do, I see one way that I can see a great deal more of you, every day and always."

She looked up at him with a startled expression.

"What do you mean, Denis?"

"I mean we might get married. Clarice, you have tried me as a friend for a year, don't you think you might try me as a husband now?"

"But you don't want to get married, you only want to be pals."

"Well, can't we be pals just the same and more than ever?"

Then, changing his tone, he said earnestly:

"Clarice, look at me—tell me, couldn't you care for me a little that way—is it too platonic for you ever to think of me in the light of a lover?"

She raised her eyes and looked at him, and they told him all he wanted to know. He held out his arms; she rose and putting her hands on his shoulders said softly:

"It has always been that way with me, Denis—only I thought you never would feel the same."

He put his arm round her and drew her head down on to his shoulder.

"I think it has always been that way with me, too, only I was such an ass I never knew it, and I thought we were only just pals, and we shall be pals always, sha'n't we?"

"Yes, always, only more so than ever," and she put her arms round his neck and sealed their contract with a kiss.

And it lasted more than five years after all.

Beatrice M. Studdy.

Digitized by Google

The Stolen Coins.

Telling of How a Magpie Nearly Broke two Hearts.

Lucy Brand busied herself in her spacious kitchen while John Norton gazed at her with the same intent, yearning look, which had come into his honest brown eyes every time he paid a visit to the "Thorn."

With his back to the fire, which served to render the bright, but chilly Spring day more pleasant, and his right hand passing over his beard in a manner which indicated deep reflection, John Norton's thoughts drifted to the farm half-a-mile away.

His eyes were fixed on Lucy, and his thoughts were fully occupied with her and her good qualities, but he did not see her in this kitchen, it was in the same room of the farmhouse where his imagination transported her, and a sigh escaped him.

"What is the matter, John?" asked Lucy, scarcely pausing in her work, but just turning to glance at him.

Very prim and staid was Lucy Brand; the kind of woman who takes life seriously, who sees a duty to perform, and does it without counting the cost to herself. She was approaching thirty-five, and she had not married because she conceived it to be her duty to remain with her mother and give her whole attention to that good lady.

She was the youngest, and, as often happens, the elders had married and gone away, leaving her to see after mother and sacrifice herself on the altar of filial affection.

When the end came and the mother was laid to rest, the elders thought that Lucy had played her cards well, because the goodwill and the stock of the combined inn and general shop had been willed entirely to her.

Lucy had set her teeth hard when the unkind hints reached her ears, and she had quietly informed the abashed brothers and sisters that she would give them the share to which they considered themselves entitled. She worked up the business, made it profitable, and gradually paid off each one, beginning with the eldest.

The years of devotion to her mother, and the time required to pay off unjust debts, had forced her to remain single, although she had received several good offers.

Of all the four or five young men who had looked with loving eyes at Lucy Brand, only one had remained steadfast through these years, and he was the man to whom she now turned with the inquiry, "What is the matter, John?"

"Eh, what?" asked John in reply, flushing somewhat guiltily. Then he answered more steadily, "I was thinking that the old place up there was very pleasant, these Spring days, but I am sorry that I can't have the place done up this year, Lucy! I haven't so much in hand as I expected to have, so I suppose it'll have to wait till next Spring. It's a nice place, but it's a bit lonely for one."

"The 'Thorn' is a nice place, too, John! It's the place where the old mother lived so many a year, and so ——"

"But surely you'll be thinking of selling the 'Thorn,' or letting it," he added the last clause hurriedly as she turned again to him with a vexed expression, "and be preparing to—to go somewhere else, Lucy!"

"Perhaps!" she responded doubtfully.

"Ah!" sighed John Norton.

He had waited patiently enough for Lucy, yet he had never actually asked her to be his wife. He understood the exact position of affairs, and he remained faithful to her, waiting till the time should come when she would consider herself free to take the step for which he so ardently wished in his easy-going style.

John Norton's wooing had been a silent one; by tacit agreement on their part, and by tacit agreement on the part of the neighbours, they were lovers, and destined to become man and wife some day.

"It's a bit lonely up there," John went on in his deep-toned voice, and the pathetic ring in it moved Lucy Brand this time. "There's no one to welcome me at the fireside when I come in from the fields, nobody but the girl, and she's no pleasant body to talk to.

"I'm thinking sometimes that it would be a grand thing to—to have a wife there. A true wife, who would watch for ye when ye came home, tired, and p'raps just a bit discouraged because things hadn't gone well on the farm, then, it would be a real pleasure to tell her the other side—when things had done well, and I'd got a good price for the corn, or some of the stock.

"And sometimes, no doubt, she would feel a little low-spirited about this or that, and I would cheer her and tell her how people can get through troubles all the easier when they're shared, although joys don't lessen when you have a partner, that's the advantage of joys over sorrows, you see, Lucy. Yes, it's a bit lonely!"

Lucy Brand stopped in the process of tidying the kitchen, and approached her faithful and patient lover; the debts were paid, and she was making money out of the "Thorn," but she was delaying the acceptance of that offer of marriage that was represented by the stalwart figure of John Norton. Why?

The old ties of the "Thorn" had held her, she had been reluctant to give it up, and she had thought of amassing a round sum in gold pieces before going to John. He had had a long pull to get his farm straight, and the mortgage with which the place had been encumbered by a thriftless and indolent father was still hanging heavily over John's head.

It would be nice to take a dowry to John, but was she acting fairly in thus keeping him waiting, and so depriving both of the happiness that was within their reach? By a strange exception, she was seized with an impulse, and she looked John straight in the eyes as she said—

Digitized by Google

"The loneliness will be past soon, John, and you will have someone to welcome you, and cheer you, and share your pleasures!"

"Lucy!" cried John. His hands trembled with a great happiness as he placed them on her shoulders and endeavoured to draw her nearer to him. "Lucy, when will you come?"

She was a good half-head shorter than he; she was gazing up at him, and his eyes were full of ardent love. Then the effect of the impulse wore off; she felt that she had been too hasty, and she drew back.

"I did not say that I would be the one who would welcome you home, John!" she cried in some confusion. "Perhaps——"

"You are the only woman for me, Lucy!" he cried sternly. "The only woman in the wide world who can make it less lonely on the farm, and you know it! I am waiting for you, and I will wait to the end if it is to be!"

She heard his footsteps as he went through the corridor, and out of the house, and she resumed her tidying-up with a heart racked by conflicting emotions; she was rather ashamed of her treatment of John Norton, yet she thought that she was doing right in the interests of both.

"I will go to him soon," she said, trying to silence the still, small voice within. "Then I can make it all up to him!"

John Norton came again on market-day, and she was relieved that his manner showed no signs of reproach. He was full of news.

"There's a circus or some sort of show in the village, in one of Grant's fields," he told her, "and I thought you would like to go, so I've taken tickets for a seat so as we shan't have to push with the others. I thought you would be pleased to go, and I know you don't like crowding!"

Lucy did not favour such variety entertainments to any extent, but as John had gone so far as to purchase a ticket for a seat in the front row for her, she would have gone to the circus but for the fact that she had already promised to let her two maids go while she remained at home to watch over the interests of the "Thorn." This fact caused her to shake her head slowly.

"Oh, it will make a change for you!" cried John, disappointed. "There are wonderful performing animals and birds, and all sorts of things. I've heard that they've got a magpie that will pick out a sovereign from a shilling, or even from a piece of brass gold-plated, and——"

John was proceeding to repeat the lines he had seen in the advertisement, but Lucy Brand cut him short gently, for she appreciated his desire to please her.

"I can't go, John," she said, "for I've promised to let the maids go. Then I must attend to my accounts, and I've quite a lot to do. You had better go, and perhaps you can sell the other ticket, so that the money will not be altogether lost. It's very good of you, John, and I'm sorry I can't go with you!"

"It's a pity you can't see the magpie!" declared John, who was clearly impressed by what he had read of the bird's cleverness.

"The magpie's lost!" cried a customer who had entered in time to hear the last words. He was flushed with the importance of being the bearer of news. "If they don't catch the bird before the performance this afternoon the show will lose a lot of its fun! The bird flew off this morning, I hear, and hasn't come back. The circus man says it's sure to return at dinner time, but I expect he says that because he don't want to spoil his takings."

John went off, promising to look in again as he went to the show in the afternoon.

Lucy Brand sat in her kitchen with the window open a few inches at the top, and settled herself to make up her accounts to the end of the month; this took her beyond dinner-time, and she sat down again to complete the task after the maids had left to see the show, and the "Thorn" was left in quietude.

She was not likely to be disturbed; everyone who could get away would be at the circus, and it was highly improbable that the inn would have a customer till after four o'clock.

Lucy Brand took a small cloth bag from a drawer, and turned the contents into her lap, a little glittering heap of sovereigns and half-sovereigns. Not a great many, perhaps, but numerous enough to represent a good profit on the month's business.

Lucy was not miserly, but the sight of this gold created a feeling of warmth at her heart which was very pleasant. Two or three more little heaps of the same size, added to the figure of her bank balance, would make a nice dowry, and John Norton should have it all!

The ringing of a bell announced the fact that a customer had entered the inn. Lucy, with just a gesture of impatience, tumbled the money into the bag, placed it in a corner of the shelf at the back of her, and hurried to the front in order to wait on this new arrival.

"Good day to you, Miss Brand!" said the cheery voice of an old farmer from the next village. "I thought you might ha' been at the show over yonder in Grant's. I don't like to pass the 'Thorn' without looking in to hope you're well, and have a glass!"

"Good day to you, Master Gibbs!" said Lucy, returning the compliment. "I suppose most of the people are there, or on the way?"

She served him and they began to exchange news. The conversation was interrupted by hasty footsteps along the passage from the kitchen, and John Norton appeared.

"I'm late!" he cried. "So you can't come? Well, I'll run along! Good day, Master Gibbs! Things are pretty backward, eh?"

He was gone. It was not often that John Norton went in for amusement, but he seemed to have set his heart on this circus entertainment. He had passed in by the back to see Lucy, but, finding that she was in the front and engaged with a customer, he had not stopped to say more.

Master Gibbs took his departure, and Lucy Brand returned to the kitchen in order to finish her agreeable task. She went straight to the shelf for the little cloth bag, but it was gone!

She looked on the shelf incredulously; she could not believe that the bag was not there; it must be some optical illusion. Perhaps she had thrust it into the drawer and thought that she had laid it on the shelf?

This idea, however, was dispelled by the discovery of a sovereign and two half-sovereigns on the shelf and a second sovereign on the floor. The money had been taken, there was no room for doubt about it!

A thief in the village! It was an unheard-of event! There had never been any fear of robbery at the "Thorn," and Miss Lucy Brand could not grasp the fact at all. She set to work to discover how the robber had entered.

The window was in exactly the same position as when she left the room, and an examination of the sill convinced her that the thief had not entered by raising the lower sash.

The back door was not in the kitchen itself, but led into a short passage; the guilty person would need to traverse that passage and make three turns before reaching the kitchen. No stranger would know how to do it, and no stranger would do it when he could so easily get in through the window.

That window opened on to the private garden, so that it was impossible for a chance passer-by to have seen her with the money in her lap. Finally, no living soul had known that she intended to make up her accounts!

Stay! A cold chill diffused itself slowly over her whole body and her legs seemed to tremble as with ague. John Norton knew! He had come from the direction of the kitchen, appearing hurried and confused, at a time when he should have been at the circus! She allowed herself to drop into a chair and tried to think it out clearly.

She knew that he was short of money. The interest on the mortgage was due about this time, she remembered. Then, he had said more about marriage, in his diffident way, than he had ever done previously. He had probably regarded marriage as a means of escape from pressing money difficulties, and, finding that she was not ready, had—robbed her!

She tried to get rid of the horrible thought, but the more

Digitized by Google

she reflected, the clearer did John Norton's guilt become in her eyes. No one else could have realised the opportunity; John Norton, yielding to some great temptation, had stolen her gold!

She wiped away the tears that had welled to her hot eyes, wiped them away calmly, decisively, and with a set expression on her white face. She would tell no one about it; the secret of this base act should be kept by the only two who knew it—John and herself.

The old relationship was at an end for ever! For the first time she realised what that meant and she had to shut her teeth hard to prevent the moan that rose from the inmost depths of her woman's heart.

What should she say to him when he next came to her? Perhaps he would repent and return to her with the money and a plea for pardon. Yes, she would forgive him if he did! We are all likely to fall into evil, and we must all show mercy as we ourselves hope for it!

She waited for him to come, but the time passed, the maids returned, the inn was thronged with customers and John Norton was not among them. He had not repented and Lucy Brand grew hard of heart and features.

It was in the quietude of the Sunday afternoon that he came to her and asked her if she would go to the service at church with him. She shook her head.

"No, John!" she declared decidedly. "The people must not think any more that—that we are to be man and wife one day!"

John Norton's face paled under the bronze.

"What is this?" he demanded with quivering voice. "What do you mean, Lucy?"

"I cannot marry you, John! You know why, better than I can tell you!"

She expected him to quail before her steadfast gaze, but he stared at her with brazen effrontery, as it seemed to her.

"I know nothing!" he returned doggedly. "You are mad!"

"Not so mad as to marry a man when I do not love him!" she retorted. "I have changed my mind about you, John, and the reason for it needs no telling to you! You can go your own way in future, and I'll go mine!"

"You'll make me the laughing-stock of everyone in the village!" he cried angrily. "I ha' waited for you for years, and now you throw me over! Do you mean that?"

"I do!" was the firm reply.

"It's a woman's whim, and you'll be sorry for it! I'll go my own way, and when you want me to go yours again, you'll have to come and ask me to walk it with you, for I'll never come o' my own free will!"

A whole year passed. The villagers had wondered at the change in the conduct of John Norton, who never went to the "Thorn," and had not been so steady at farming since the discontinuance of his visits to Miss Brand, but the affair was an old story now and they had other things to think about.

The events of the preceding Spring had been recalled to Lucy Brand's memory by the announcement of the coming of the circus. The wonderful animals and birds, and the other attractions, were the subject of much gossip as they had been twelve months before.

"I wonder if the magpie will escape again?" asked one labourer with a laugh.

"I believe that the proprietor let un do it a-purpose!" was the opinion of another. "It makes a stir, it do, and the bird cooms back all right enow for the performance!"

"Jimmy's about right!" asserted a third. "The magpie was there, arter all, last toime!"

The opinion was then put forward that the bird had not escaped at all, and that the whole thing was a get-up, but this was scouted; some of them had actually seen the bird flying about.

The morning of the day on which the circus was to give its first performance was one of bright sunshine and the villagers were merry. Then came the report that the magpie had escaped, and it provoked general hilarity. It was all a trick, a piece of up-to-date advertising, but it had the desired effect of creating interest in the circus.

It was afternoon and the maids had gone to witness the performance. Miss Brand sat in her kitchen, but she was not making up her accounts; she had decided to postpone that process till the following day, in order that this day should not too closely resemble that other day.

As she silently brooding over the past, her attention was arrested by a flutter at the window. Looking up, she saw a bird standing on the top sash, which was open as usual.

"It's the missing magpie!" cried Lucy. "I wonder if I could entice it in here and catch it for them?"

She rose softly in order to find some morsel that would induce the bird to approach her, but the movement startled the magpie, which flew to a small tree in her private garden and disappeared in a hole in the trunk.

"I'll have it if I'm quick!" murmured Miss Brand.

She went quickly through the winding passage towards the back door and so to her own garden. She covered her hand with her apron, so that the bird might not peck her and plunged the hand into the hole.

A familiar sound on another tree made her turn, and she saw the magpie perched on a branch and looking at her knowingly.

At the same moment her covered hand touched something that gave forth the faintest of sounds.

Puzzled by this, she caught it up with the clumsy fingers and brought it to the light. Her arm shook to such an extent when she saw what it was that she nearly dropped it. Her own little cloth bag, with its golden contents!

With a screech the magpie bore down upon her and tried to snatch the bag, but she beat it off and ran indoors with her treasure. Yes, there it was, and the contents——? She counted the money and found that it was three pounds short; that was the amount she had picked up on the shelf and on the floor.

The magpie had entered through the top of the window, just as it had been on the point of doing to-day; it had seen her counting the gold and had carried off the bag, after picking out the four golden coins for amusement. She remembered that the magpie's contribution to the circus performance was to do something like that.

So that was the thief and she had accused John Norton most unjustly! "I will go to him and tell him that——"

A hubbub in the front. She left the kitchen and went to the door of the inn; four men were carrying a rough litter, followed by a dozen or so of the inhabitants. She cast her eyes towards the litter and gave a cry; John Norton lay upon it, his eyes closed as if in death.

"What has happened?" she cried.

"Thrown from his trap somehow! Don't know 'zactly what's happened," replied one of the men. "'Fraid he's dead! We're taking him to the farm."

"Bring him in here!" she said imperatively.

They hesitated for a moment, but finally obeyed. He was put to bed and the doctor intercepted on his way to the farm and brought to the "Thorn."

"Will he die, doctor?" asked a woman, with a white face and a subdued manner.

"I hope we shall pull him through, Miss Brand, but it will take time and great care."

"He shall have the care, doctor."

When John Norton was able to recognise anyone, the first person he saw was Lucy Brand. A strained expression passed over his features; she understood and bent over him.

"I have come to tell you I want you, John!" she said softly. "I have discovered my mistake and the great wrong I was doing you. I want you to get well, and take care of yourself in future, for my sake!"

She bent still lower and kissed him. He flushed with joy.

"Is it true, Lucy? Ah, yes! I have been a bit reckless and careless since then, because nobody cared for me! But I'll soon get well now and we'll be happy. Kiss me again, so as I may be sure!"

And she did.

E. Buckland.

Digitized by Google

BRAND NEW COMPETITION.

Cash Down. Cash Down. Cash Down.

1st Prize, £50. 2nd Prize, £25. 3rd Prize, £10.

And 25 Gramophones.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below will be found six paragraphs containing the buried names of Railway Stations in the United Kingdom (or words that sound the same as the names). You must write in the spaces given the names of the Railway Stations so indicated.

No word or part of a word may be used more than once in making up the name of a Railway Station. In the event of the name of a Railway Station occurring more than once in a sentence, it should be underlined and written down each time. In case of more than one person finding the same number of words for each or any sentence, those words containing the largest number of letters will have preference. No name of a Railway Station may be composed of a single letter, either standing by itself or taken from any word in the sentences.

When you have discovered the names of Railway Stations in the sentences, underline (in ink) the words which go to make up the names (or words that sound the same as the names) and then on the line underneath each sentence write (in ink) the correct names of the Railway Stations to be found in each.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to Bradshaw's Guide, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or Room Eight, SHORT STORIES, 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The names of the Railway Stations consist of one word or two or more consecutive words, or consecutive parts of one word, or two or more consecutive words.

The first prize of £50 will be given to the Competitor who fills in the greatest number of railway stations under the conditions stated. The second prize of £25 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in the order of merit.

When you have filled in all the names you can find, cut out the list below and keep it by you. Don't on any account send it to us until the closing date is announced in SHORT STORIES. A sixth list of sentences will appear next week.

In the event of a tie a further list (or, if necessary, several further lists) of sentences will be submitted to the tieing competitors until one wins the first prize outright.

CUT THROUGH HERE

EXAMPLE.

The oaks were swaying in the breeze, the cows were grazing peacefully, when out of the park tore a huge black bull.

The Oaks, Sway, Cowes, Grays, Park, Black Bull.

FIFTH LIST.

25. The British Museum contains specimens of Coalport and Worcester china, besides Doulton and Belleek ware.

26. She was out with the Quorn hunt and came in at the kill, winning the brush. Her mount, Vernon by name, was very fleet.

27. "I have found a stoat's nest," he explains during the recess. "May Gordon and Hoyland come home with me to take it?"

28. In the road were lying some curious grey stones, shaped like a triangle. They each had one bright side, the others overgrown with moss.

29. We hope to lay on a fresh water supply to the new houses we have just bought. There were only wells before.

30. During Spring cleaning Woodward spoilt two great coats by getting some reddish coloured paint on them. He was very cross because of it.

NAME..... ADDRESS .....

Digitized by Google

THE TRANSFORMATION OF THE TRAMP.

Telling of a Queer Meeting which Ended in a Love Affair.

WITH a whizzing sound the biting east wind rushed through the streets, driving before it a cloud of fine snow that penetrated everything.

It lashed the faces of those unlucky pedestrians and drivers who were compelled to weather it, the snow filtering through the folds of scarves and other supposedly protective articles of clothing, it soaked into overcoats and made life well-nigh unendurable.

Only those who were forced to go from one place to another ventured outside the house in such dreadful weather, and they battled against the blinding snowdrift as against a flood.

Stay! There were others who had to endure the storm; these were the homeless, the waifs and strays of society, who, unable to get shelter by paying for it, struggled against the elements in search of some place to hide in until the sudden storm ceased.

Phew! A sudden gust, more fierce than its predecessor, drove a man against the railings of a house in a quiet street and made him gasp. He was a man of fair proportions, but weakened by cold and lack of food. His thin jacket was saturated; the strips of brown paper which he had fastened on his legs to keep out the wet were soaked also.

"I c-a-a-n-'t sta-a-nd this! It will kill me!" he said half aloud, as well as his chattering teeth and his generally frozen condition would permit him to speak. "This is awful! I thought I could have reached old Jack's crib, he might have given me a corner if there had been a corner to spare, though!

"For fivepence I could have got a bed, but I haven't earned one solitary ha'penny this mortal day—nor yesterday! And I'm as hungry——! If I had got any coppers I should have spent them in food, I suppose, not in the hire of a bed for the night!"

His benumbed fingers gripped the railings as another blast drove the snow against him. He turned his back to it and pressed close against the ironwork. It gave at his touch, and he found that it was a gate leading to a short flight of stone steps. He knew the kind of house.

The steps would take him to a door under the other steps that led up to the front door. Generally the space under the front steps was built into an apartment of some description, but occasionally it was left untouched, and the basement or lower floor was flush with the window of the lower room.

"I'll go down here!" he muttered in desperation. "There must be some kind of a corner that will be warmer than up here, and if they hand me over to the police, I shan't be worse off. By Jove, I shall be fed and kept warm, so I shall be better off!"

He slipped hastily down the steps, and, to his joy, found that the underneath space had not been built up, so that he could stand back in the most sheltered corner and be comparatively warm.

"This is one degree better!" he muttered, swinging his arms after the manner of carmen and others in an effort to get some warmth into his stiffening limbs. "I am wet through, so I stand a chance of turning into a gigantic icicle! The blinds of the whole front seem to be down, and I couldn't catch a chink of light anywhere! Perhaps there's some servant at the back who might take compassion on me if I ring. I'll try it!"

He fumbled about with his almost lifeless fingers for the bell knob. Ah! He placed both hands to it so that he could get hold of it, and pull, but the knob yielded to the feeble tug, and remained hanging down. The wire was broken.

"I'll get shelter if there's any chance—or prison!" he cried.

Placing both hands on the handle of the door, he tried to turn it and rattle the door at the same time in order to attract attention. To his surprise it opened and he found himself at the entrance of a dark underground hall or passage. There was a smell about it that suggested disuse.

"I'll have shelter, at any rate!" said the man in a tone of determination. "A careless servant has done me a good turn by forgetting to lock up the premises. Is it worth while exploring this passage? I think so! Hunger knows no law!"

Once embarked on an enterprise that might land him in prison, he seemed determined to go through with it. He groped his way along, feeling for a door, but he stumbled against stairs first.

"Hum! This is the way to the upper regions! I'm half inclined to believe that the house is vacant! Here goes!"

At the top of the staircase he found himself in another hall. On the left was an opening, and as he groped his way into it he was blinded by a sudden glare of light that made him start back.

"Don't be alarmed!" he cried involuntarily. "I am a starving and frozen man who has crept in here for shelter and to beg for food. I am honest, I swear it. I have touched nothing! Robert Amfield is not a thief, but he wants food! For Heaven's sake help me!"

He had expected to be seized by a masculine hand, or to hear the cry of a woman for assistance, but all was still. His eyes were becoming accustomed to the glare; he looked about him for the occupant of this illuminated chamber, but could see no one.

"What does it mean?" he asked himself in amazement. "Ah, I see. In groping about I touched the electric light switch! My apology was not needed, there is no one here. It seems to be a kind of dining-room and study all in one. But is there any food? If this electric light were gas I could get warm!"

He was getting bolder. He approached the fireplace and uttered a cry of pleasure. It was arranged for a gas fire, and there were matches at his elbow. In another minute the dull noise of the gas was heard and Robert Amfield was holding his hands as near to the flame as he dared.

"Gracious, it puts life into you!" he exclaimed. He moved the fender and crouched down against the stove. "My clothes are beginning to steam, and that may mean rheumatism, but that isn't so bad as death from freezing. I'll take my coat off to dry!"

Digitized by Google

For fully ten minutes he crouched thus, thawing himself, as he expressed it. He was not so saturated as he had imagined, and he soon felt nearly comfortable. Leaving his coat to dry, he began to seek for food.

"This is the rummiest go I've ever experienced—a sort of Liberty Hall without the consent of the proprietor! Query—Am I stealing this man's gas? Robert Amfield has not descended to anything shady yet, and he doesn't want to. Well, if I am caught I'll undertake to work it out in manual labour. That's fair, and my conscience is easy!"

The expression of tranquility that came over his face changed quickly to one of alarm, belying his statement that his conscience was easy. He heard a noise! He listened; was he caught in the act? What was it? A cry for help?

His manhood was aroused by the fact that someone might be in distress. Without waiting to put on his coat, he went into the hall and listened, the sound appeared to come from below or outside.

He made his way down the stairs and into the dark passage. He could hear the cry quite well now, although it was deadened by the howl of the wind.

He had left the door open, and the cry — it was more like a moan now—came from outside.

He was soon out in the open, where he could just perceive the figure of a man or boy lying in the snow. He caught the form in his arms and dragged it into the shelter of the passage.

He stood aghast at the sight of a young woman gazing at herself in the mirror.

"Oh, don't, you'll hurt!" cried the youth—for it was a lad of about eighteen. "I believe I've sprained my ankle, or broken my leg, or something!"

"Can't you rake up a few more injuries?" asked Robert Amfield, half amused, half sarcastic.

"My wrist may be dislocated for all I know!" declared the boy. "I'll have the law on you, Mr. Gentleman! It's a clear case of compensation! You left the area gate wide open for respectable people to tumble down. You did it on purpose, that's fact. I can get a lawyer to take it up and the judges will be down on you. How much will I take to square it, did you say?"

"No, I didn't!" retorted Amfield. "You can drop that line of persuasion, as I am not the proprietor of this hotel. I am sorry that you tumbled down the area steps—no, I suppose they are not exactly area steps. Anyhow, I'm sorry. But I don't think you are hurt much, just a bruise or two. There! You can stand all right enough. You're wet and hungry, eh? So am I hungry. I've got rid of the wet, and that is what we will do for you if you're civil and come upstairs!"

He led the astonished youth to the room he had just left and told him to get "right into that gas fire."

"I say," exclaimed the new comer, opening his eyes very wide, "this is all right!"

"Mind you don't set fire to that jacket of yours!" admonished Amfield. "The sleeves don't come much lower than your elbows, but there are long streamers of thread that might lead to a conflagration! You're a pretty-looking object!"

"Your costume ain't exactly correct for Piccadilly!" rejoined the lad saucily. "It's a case of the pot and the kettle, ain't it?"

"You're right!" said Amfield with a hearty laugh. "I forgot that I hadn't seen myself in a glass lately. We seem to be well matched! How did you come to be out in the wet?"

"How did you?" inquired the lad. "I expect your answer will do for both of us!"

"Right again!" declared Amfield. "Well, I'm on my beam ends, with no friends, no home, no money — no nothing!"

"I am ditto to every one of them," said the lad laconically. "Go on!"

"I tumbled into this vacant house for the homeless by accident. I had good prospects once on a time, and ambition, Tommy! Is that your name? If not, what is it?"

"Joe!" was the short reply. Then, in his former defiant manner, he added, "I can't ditto all that. The only good prospects I've ever had were good prospects of being in the workhouse. Perhaps I did have ambition—of a sort. I wanted to keep out of the union!"

"Poor beggar!" said Amfield sympathetically. "You're young to pass through these experiences!"

"Not so young as when I begun!" laughed Joe, who seemed pleased that Amfield spoke pityingly. "If you're running this superior boarding house, fetch out the eatables."

"I'm running it by proxy," said Amfield with an amused smile. "I will try to find something!"

He tried the mahogany cupboard while Joe watched him. Presently he drew out a dish with a cover, under which he discovered a wedge of cheese, about three pounds.

"Here we are!" he exclaimed. "This cheese is like a man

Digitized by Google

fresh from the country in one respect; yet it is a long, long time since it left the farm!"

"You mean that it's green!" grinned Joe. "Never mind, it will pass muster!"

"Musty, muster, mustard," suggested Amfield. "The last would destroy the first, but we haven't any. Here we are once more—some biscuits! We can fall to, Joe, it's a feast!"

The boy, who had forgotten all his injuries, real and imaginary, seated himself at the table, and fell to with much zest. There was no exchange of observations, each was as hungry as the proverbial hunter, and they ate of the plain fare with such avidity as to seriously threaten organs of digestion that had not been in regular practice for some time.

"That was good!" asserted Joe decisively. "There's nothing to wash it down with, is there?"

"Haven't you had enough moisture to last you for a time?" queried Amfield. "By Jove—I mean, by Joe! You were hungry, poor little beggar!"

"I can't return the compliment properly because I didn't have time to look at you and see how you were eating!" said Joe. "I don't know that I'm so little, though!"

"You're small for a lad," responded Amfield. "I say, Joe! We are both without friends, but we needn't be so any longer. I like you; I believe you are a thorough straightforward chap down on your luck, and I've taken quite a fancy to you. We'll be friends, eh? We may be able to help one another!"

"Y-e-e-s!" hesitated the boy. "Oh, don't be offended!" he added hastily. "I should like it above all things, but—you might not!"

"Yes I should!" The tone was positive. "Now I am going to see if there is any chance of a smoke. You do not smoke? You ought not! You're too young—and just a bit too delicate. You've been starved, that's flat, otherwise you would be fatter in the arms, and look more sturdy."

He rummaged again, but did not find the desired smoke. They drew chairs to the gas fire, and prepared to enjoy it. Amfield's eyes, wandering over the room, fell upon an album on which was printed in gold letters the name James Amfield.

With an exclamation that startled his companion, he sprang up and seized the book. Turning over the portraits inside, he stopped at one and gazed sadly at it.

"That is my father's photo! Then this house belongs to my cousin, James Amfield! How strange! The man who did me out of my inheritance, and this house should belong to me!"

"What's it all about?" asked Joe mystified. "Have you seen a ghost?"

"Almost!" said Amfield, replacing the album and returning to his seat. "Joe, as we are friends, I will tell you all about it!

"My father was a man of money, but a hard, harsh man, with very little parental love. My sister, Mary, was older than I and she had set her heart on a man who hadn't money. My father forbade the marriage; my sister rebelled, and I took her part. My father turned us both out. My sister married; she sailed for Australia, and the vessel was lost. I tried to make a position for myself, with what brains I had, but I was too good-natured, got into difficulties through standing as security for false friends—and here I am!

"My cousin James was a hypocrite; he saw his chance and toadied to my father, embittering him against his children. When my father died all his money went to James Amfield.

"I wonder where James is now? This house is not occupied; perhaps he is away and a man comes in to look at the house now and then. Suppose he were to come in upon us now?"

"I should be off!" declared Joe unhesitatingly. "I think somebody must come in because this room isn't dusty. Look! Here's a letter addressed to Mr. John White. Yes, it's got a foreign stamp on it."

"New York," explained Robert Amfield. "The Glasgow post-mark is the 20th—five days ago, so somebody does come. I think I'll take a peep."

He took the letter from the torn envelope and read it. The signature was that of James Amfield, and the letter was to inform the butler and general factotum that the writer would be at home on the 25th.

"That's to-day! Why, he may be here at any moment! I wonder why there is no one here to receive him? Where are you off to, Joe?"

"I'm not fit to receive company!" was the reply, as the lad took up his coat and made for the door. "I heard a noise at the front somewhere. He may be here! Are you coming?"

"I'll stay and face him! Don't go!" But the lad was out of the room. "I haven't seen dear James lately! We hurled some lava-like language at one another through the medium of the post after my father's death, so the present meeting will be a warm affair! Well it will counteract the cold outside!"

Robert Amfield waited, but he heard nothing. It must have been a false alarm. He looked at the letter again, and saw some pencilled words on the back page. "I find that I shall not be home till four days later."

"That explains the absence of Mr. John White! I feel at home here! I am sure that cousin James, who was so good and charitable, will not grudge me a rest and food! Yes," surveying himself in the glass, "I am not neat in appearance! There ought to be a bath-room here, with shaving utensils. Perhaps another suit of clothes! I'll see!"

He moved to the door, switched off the light and made his way upstairs to the first floor, uttering his thoughts aloud and not noticing a slim figure outside the door of the room where he and Joe had made themselves comfortable.

"I'll make myself presentable. Where did that silly boy go? Upon my word, I feel quite attached to the poor beggar! Never felt so taken with anybody before. I call it mean of him to go, after swearing friendship! His were tolerably dirty, but they wouldn't have soiled mine! They were honest hands nevertheless—I am positive of that!"

"Right!" murmured the listener. "They may be sooty, but they've never been mixed in anything dirty like dishonesty! Shall I stay? I wonder if I ought?"

It was quite three-quarters of an hour before Robert Amfield descended to the room which he had mentally designated the study. In that time he had had a bath—his body was tingling all over with the effects of the vigorous towelling administered to it—and had shaved. He had turned out a tweed suit of subdued pattern, together with some clean linen and a pair of boots.

He was a changed man; a thorough gentleman in appearance and deportment. The transformation was complete, and he resembled only in the remotest degree the outcast who had penetrated without permission the deserted house in the fashionable suburb.

He pushed open the door of the well-lighted room, but stood aghast at the sight of a young woman gazing at herself in the mirror.

She was posing before her own reflection, with amusement written large on her face, and Amfield continued to stare at her in bewilderment. Here was a new development! Who was this? Had she been in the house all the time? That was hardly likely. Then had she been sent by White to dust and clean? That also was improbable, for it was late in the day to begin work, and she was not dressed for cleaning and scrubbing. She was neatly attired in a dress that must have cost a fair price at a West-end establishment, but Amfield noticed that it was not so well-fitting as it might have been.

Digitized by Google

In making another pose in order to see as much of her back as it is possible to do with one mirror, the girl caught sight of Robert's reflection in the glass, and uttered a cry. Turning hastily to him, she asked, in confusion :

"Are you Mr. Amfield ? I thought that you would not be here just yet, although your letter said so. I was thinking that I should see—— Never mind ! I hope I am not intruding ? "

"She mistakes me for my cousin James ! " thought the transformed tramp. Aloud, he said evasively : "I am Mr. Amfield ! May I ask to whom I am indebted for the honour of this visit ? "

"Oh, dear ! " cried the girl. "How formal ! Well, I'm—er—my name is—Mary Amfield ! "

"What do you mean ? " demanded Robert sternly.

Who was this, taking the name of his dead sister ? He had no time to demand further explanation, for the bell of the front-door rang violently.

"Stay where you are ! " commanded Robert. "Don't move till I see who it is ! "

The girl, who had recovered her composure to some extent, bowed defiantly, and Robert went to the front-door and shot back the two bolts. A rush of wind and snow followed the opening of the door, and Robert heard a boy's voice :

"Telegram ! White ! Is that here ? "

"Yes," answered Amfield mechanically.

"Here you are, then ! " pushing it into his hand.

Returned to the light and warmth, Robert Amfield deliberately slit the envelope with his finger and read the telegram.

"James Amfield died here yesterday. Last words that his property goes to cousin Robert. Try find him."

The cablegram was from New York, where, it was to be conjectured, James had been on business ; he had died after a very brief illness, and on his death-bed his conscience had smitten him.

Perhaps he had already made a will in England, leaving the property to Robert ? It mattered little ; for, if there were no will, the attested death-bed statement would be accepted as a legal bequest. He, Robert Amfield, the outcast, was rich ; he had entered into his own again !

"You're a cheat, a fraud ! " cried the girl, bending over him and shaking her fist at him. "You're not James Amfield, and you've killed the man who was here an hour ago, swearing friendship to a girl who never had a friend in her life. He told me he would be a friend, and I heard him say that he liked me, as he went upstairs ! What have you done with him ? "

"What ! Are you Joe ? Well, I——" Robert could not continue for a second, his amazement was too great. "So you are transformed, like me, only more so ! Don't you know me now that I have had a wash and a brush up ? "

"Oh ! " cried the girl, shrinking away. "It is you ! I see now ! I was so confused when I thought you were your cousin come home that I didn't recognise you, and I gave you the name of your sister, because that was the first that came to me ! "

"Why did you masquerade in boy's clothes ? "

"Mine were so torn and ragged and I got frightened. I couldn't get a place as a servant, and no one would believe I was honest. I got into a suit of boy's clothes and did all sorts of jobs, and so I got a sort of a living where a girl would have starved."

"You shall be poor no longer, young lady ! " declared Robert, rising and taking her by the shoulders. "Look at me, Joe—or Josephine ! I said we would be friends, and so we shall, for now that I am well-off, it is my fixed intention to endow thee, my dear Joesphine, with exactly one-half of all my worldly goods ! Do you understand ? "

Apparently she did, for she blushed.

"And to seal the contract," concluded Robert Amfield exultantly, "I claim a loving kiss ! "

G. Merriam.

Your Editor Chats.

The fifth list of sentences in the competition to discover buried names of railway stations will be found on page 527. Five more lists of sentences—making ten in all—will appear.

I receive daily a large number of letters from readers, asking me to clear up certain points in connection with the competition on which they are in doubt. There would be no doubtful points were competitors to read the rules carefully. No information regarding the competition will be sent privately ; any point likely to be of general interest to competitors will be dealt with in the paper.

Below are some questions asked this week, together with my replies :—

Question : If a part of a word forms the name of one railway station and the whole word forms another, may I put both down ?

Answer : If you will carefully read the conditions of the competition, you will see that it says that "no word or part of a word may be used more than once in making up the name of a railway station."

Question : Are the sounds of the words in the sentence to be taken only as they would be read, or may they be taken according to the way in which parts of the words might conceivably be pronounced ?

Answer : They must be taken as the word would be read.

Question : May I pick out words or parts of words from any portion of a sentence, and put them together so as to form the name of a railway station ?

Answer : No ; it is clearly stated in the rules that words or parts of words taken together to form the names of railway stations must be consecutive.

Question : If the name of a railway station occurs several times in a sentence, must I underline and write it down each time ?

Answer : Yes. This is distinctly stated in the rules of the competition.

The cover this week is a reproduction of the Bruce Tartan. This is the ninth tartan which has appeared as the wrapper of Short Stories. A list of the others, together with the dates of their appearance, will be found on page 517.

I don't want my readers to forget that there is such a thing as the Fresh Air Fund, and each week during the Spring and Summer I shall give them a reminder of its existence. For the small sum of ninepence, one child, who has lived amidst bricks and mortar all its life, and probably never seen grass and trees except in one of the parks of their city, can have a whole day in the country, with plenty to eat and drink. Think what this means to a child—how it will enjoy the freedom and freshness of the pure air, and the joy it will have in being where there is no notice to "keep off the grass," and where it may actually gather buttercups and daisies to its heart's content.

£8 2s. provides for a party of 200 children with the necessary attendants. Donations of whatever size will be gratefully received and acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly. They should be sent to the Hon. Secretary, Fresh Air Fund, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., who will forward collecting sheets on application.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

A GAME OF CHAFF.

The Tale of a Rich Girl's Wooing.

THE great house loomed darkly before the young man who paused for a moment at the iron gates. Then he stepped forward briskly and passing round the mansion rang the bell at the side door. It was almost immediately answered by a young woman who put her finger to her lips as she ushered him in.

"Please be very careful," she said. "The family is so fussy. Come this way."

She took him into an apartment that might have been the breakfast room, and motioned him towards a chair.

"Can't I shake hands with you?" he asked. "It seems like quite an age since we parted."

"Thank you," she said, and gave him her hand. "It was just two weeks ago to-day—if that can be considered an age."

"Thank you for remembering the day," he gravely said.

"I will admit," said the girl, with a little blush, "that it was quite an episode in my life. I'd never had such an opportunity before."

"No?" he said, with a slightly rising inflection. He looked at her with a curious expression. She was a pretty girl, a very pretty girl, and though her hair was smoothed into plainness and surmounted by a simple little white cap, its beauty and lustre seemed brightened by this attempt at concealment. Her gown was plain, too, and over it she wore a fresh white apron.

"Yes," she said, and her inflection took the opposite direction. And she in turn looked at him. He was a man worth looking at. Well knit, well featured, and well spoken. "Some men," she shortly added, "are easily deceived."

"Some deceptions are preferable to the truth," he said. "But pray go on—you have something to tell me."

"Yes," said the girl. "No doubt you have guessed it. You saw me at the seaside for those few days. The glamour of the place dazed you. You took appearances for realities."

"They were such charming appearances," he softly said.

"Please don't interrupt," she cried with another little blush. "You saw me with Miss Ainslie's aunt. You took me for Miss Ainslie—and I let you deceive yourself. I was only the dear old lady's companion. I am only Miss Ainslie's companion. One moment. Miss Ainslie showed me your note asking the privilege of calling. She suspected I knew what it meant. I confessed. I told her the whole story—how I let you think me a great heiress and how I led you on. She advised me to write and tell you to call——"

"At the side door," said the man.

"Of course at the side door," exclaimed the girl. "I couldn't ask you here on the footing of the family guests. I wouldn't have asked you here at all, but Miss Ainslie advised it. She said it was my duty to undeceive you. That is all, I think. Good night."

She stood up as she spoke the last words and moved towards the door. But the man did not stir.

"The evening is young yet," he said, "and short calls disagree with me. Pray sit down. I, too, came here this evening to make confession. I was not the only one deceived."

"What do you mean?" she asked, as she resumed her chair.

"I mean," he replied, "that I represented myself to you in what you must have regarded as a rather favourable light."

"I think," she said, "that you gave me the impression that you were a person of some importance."

There was a silence.

"I fancy there must be something in the air of the average watering-places that encourages these fanciful deceptions," he said. "We seem to long to be something other than what we really are. And yet I am very glad to-night to know the truth."

"May I ask why?" said the girl.

"I was about to tell you," he replied. "You see, that as the petted heiress, Grace Ainslie, you seemed as far above me as a star. I was mad to write to you to-day. But now it's different. You are nearer my social level. I do not have to storm the bastion of wealth to reach you."

"That's rather pretty," said the girl. "And you are not disappointed?"

"No," said the man, "I am glad."

"Glad that I am a dependent instead of an heiress?"

"Glad for my own sake, yes. And now may I ask your name?"

"M-my name?" stammered the girl. "Why should I tell you?"

"Do as you please about it," said the man. "It will be easy to give you another."

"And may I ask what yours is?" queried the girl demurely.

"A truce to names," he said. "They count for nothing to-night."

"And yet I'm foolishly particular regarding them," she said, with a smile.

"You are thinking of the possible change," he thoughtfully remarked. "I don't blame you for being a little fastidious. It does you credit. You wouldn't fancy a name like Hoopenlooper, would you?"

"No," she gravely answered. "I wouldn't like any name that ran over the edge of a calling card."

"But, after all," he cried, "it is the man, not the name."

"Then," she said, "you leave me to infer that your name is an atrocious one."

"My name is all right," he said. "But let it go. There are other things to hold our attention. In the first place, how do we stand socially and financially? Wait, please. I am about to tell you something concerning myself."

"Not the story of your life!"

"Not exactly. But pray do not interrupt. I am thirty-

Digitized by Google

one, in good health, no serious habits, fairly good-looking, measurably ambitious and something of a favourite where I am best known. I have a comfortable situation in connection with a city office, and there is a neat little sum lying to my credit in a certain bank. I think I might even compass the cost of a modern suburban villa."

"That's nice," she said. "I have a little balance on a bank book myself."

"That's nice, too," said the man. "Do you think it would cover the cost of the furniture?"

"If carefully invested," said the girl, "I think it would."

"I'm glad of that," the man commented. "I never believe in adopting the instalment plan where you can raise the cash. And now be equally frank and tell me about yourself."

"No," said the girl, "I'm too much prejudiced in favour of the subject. Let's hear your opinion."

"All right," said the man, "but, of course, I'm prejudiced, too. At the same time it is a good thing to air one's prejudices occasionally. If our prejudices do not agree pray correct me from time to time.

"To begin with, you are beautiful. Then you are fairly intelligent. You have a nimble wit, but you have been somewhat spoilt. Eh, you don't like that? Nevertheless, it is quite evident that your employers have been too indulgent. Oh, yes they have. And yet one who really—admired you, could overlook this—shall I say painful—defect, in time."

"Is that all?"

"All! I could dilate on your attractions until the grey fingers of the dawn beckoned me away."

"How nicely you express yourself. I had only to shut my eyes to hear the surf beating on the shore and the band softly thrumming on the hotel verandah."

"What a lovely time we had—while it lasted. How those golden moments scuttled through pleasure's hour-glass!"

"There you go again. But we did have a lovely time deceiving each other, didn't we?"

"It was our foolish vanity that did the deceiving—our hearts were as true as steel."

"Steel is very hard, Mr. Thingamy."

"Mine is ductile steel, Miss Whatsyourname. 'Tis a heart of wax when thou art near. And your face is the only impression it bears."

"But, ah, if your heart warmed up unduly that impression would soon be obliterated."

"No, no, it is indelible. Ah, if I only knew your name how delightful it would be to make love to you."

The girl made a quick gesture of dissent.

"You would take altogether too much time," she said. "I shudder to think of your verbosity if you had a three-syllable name to encourage your efforts. Besides, you must remember that this is my night in."

"Your night in?"

"Yes, it's my night to have company and to receive it—or him—in this particular apartment. All the other servants go out in order to leave the lucky one a clear field. My chance doesn't come again for ten days. But that will not excuse me for overdoing the present opportunity. You really must go. I fancy I hear footsteps now. Hush!"

The footsteps came down the hall. They paused and the door opened. An elderly man with a heavy white moustache looked in.

"Oh, there you are, Grace!" he cried. "Excuse me, I didn't know you had company. Bless my soul, if it isn't Warren Hayes! How are you, my boy? I didn't know Grace knew you. Helping her with private theatricals, I see. Don't let her work you too hard. There, there, I won't interrupt any longer. Glad to see you at any time, my boy."

"I'll drop in on you at the office in the morning," said Warren Hayes. "I have a little important business I want to see you about."

"All right, my boy. Any time after ten. Good night."

"Good night."

There was a short silence. The man looked at the girl. The girl looked at the floor.

"I was silently admiring the way your father says Grace," remarked Warren Hayes.

"Come," said the girl sharply, "what is that special business you have with papa to-morrow morning."

"And here I've been openly crediting you with unusual cleverness," said Warren Hayes, with a despairing gesture. "Yet I fancy you half suspect. The fact is, Miss Grace Ainslie, alias Whatsyourname, that when a young woman admits her devoted admirer through the side door it is about time for papa's consent to be asked."

"You are a rude and nasty man," said the girl. "And I suppose you are just conceited enough to fancy that you will succeed with the father as well as—I mean that you hope to succeed with the daughter as well as you think you'll succeed with the father."

"Exactly," said Warren Hayes.

The girl looked at him with a little scowl.

"Well," she said, "you'll not get in the side door again."

"Oh, the front door will do," said Warren Hayes.

And then the girl softly laughed.

Amy Richards.

"I HEAR that Miss Woody is inconsolable over the loss of poor little Fido." "Yes, poor thing. Every time it rains cats and dogs she rushes to the window to see if he is among them."

LITTLE GIRL: "Ma, that man on a bicycle knocked me down and made me break the glass jug." Mother: "Well, break the pieces up and throw them out where he'll run over them and puncture his tyres as he comes back."

"How is the razor, sir?" asked the barber. "Didn't know I was being shaved," said the victim. "Very glad, I'm sure, sir," began the barber, feeling flattered. But the victim cut him short: "I thought I was being sand-papered."

Important to Those About to Marry and others.

Small Homes and How to Furnish Them.

By Mrs. Waldemar Leverton.

With 16 Illustrations, cloth, price 1s., or post free for 1s. 2d.

CONTENTS:

Choosing the Home—The Furniture—Wall Papers—Floor Coverings—On Colouring, etc.—Red Rooms—Green Rooms—Blue Rooms—Yellow Rooms—Pink Rooms—The Entrance Hall—Staircase Nooks—Cosy Sitting Rooms—The Dining Room—The Kitchen—The Scullery—The Bed Rooms—A Girl's Bed-Sitting Room—A Bachelor's Room—Nurseries and School-rooms—Beautifying the Bath Room—Wall Decoration—The Use and Abuse of Drapery—Piano Decoration, etc., etc.

At all Booksellers; or of the Book Publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, W.C.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

To the BOOK PUBLISHER,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please forward me a copy of "SMALL HOMES," for which I inclose the sum of one shilling and twopence.

Name.....

Address .....

.....

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIAL.

Held Apart

The Story of a Strange Double Fraud and its Influence upon some Young Hearts, a Great Name, and a Famous Fortune.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Author of "The Golden Dwarf," "A Daughter of Mystery," etc.

SOME INTERESTING PEOPLE.

John Davenal. A diver.
Hannah Davenal. His sister, maid to Lady Tarleton.
Moira. Supposed to be the diver's daughter.
Sir Guy Vanbrugh. Moira's lover.
Adeline, Lady Tarleton. His aunt.
Irene Tarleton. Her daughter.
Edward Stormont. Lady Tarleton's brother-in-law.
Paul Jerome. His friend, a war-correspondent and journalist, in love with Irene.
Dennis Hartigan. A ship's steward, and husband of Hannah.
"Kit" Hartigan. His sister, a blind girl.
Detective-Sergt. Ussher. Of Scotland Yard.

NINETEENTH CHAPTER.
What Dennis Hartigan Heard.

A MURMUR passed through the group of listeners round the fire of the bar-parlour, a murmur of surprise and doubt. The old fisherman knocked the ashes out of his black "cutty."

"Believe it or not, as you like," he said, and at the table in the distant corner Dennis Hartigan strained his ears to catch the words. "I saw her, and I ought to know Mollie Davenal. Why, it was my missis did everything for her when John Davenal brought the little lass to Groudle after his wife died. Not that it's the first time Mollie has been under water, there's some of you here knows of one other time."

"Aye," agreed a member of the meditative party, "I can speak for that, for John Davenal was chaffed about it, and told us the lass had wheedled him into letting her have a dip in the suit. But what for would she go down with him lying at death's door?"

"We've no proof she did," commented a neighbour drily. "Maybe the gentleman from the Tower was over free with the spirits for John Thomas. He's told us already he had his fill of as good whisky as man need wish for."

There was a chuckle of mirth from the stolid revellers, but the old fisherman smote his huge fist on his knee.

"Now if it was to be my last word on earth," he retorted, "yon was Moira Davenal, and there's an end of it." And he began irritably to refill his pipe.

Dennis Hartigan lifted his glass to his lips, and drank a mouthful. His lips trembled slightly, and the glass jarred against his teeth. He set it down, and affected to busy himself with his meal. But under his drooped eyelids his gaze was fixed on the gossipers. They were pondering, with North country phlegm, the emphatic statement of their grizzled companion.

The opening of the bar-parlour door broke in upon their silence. A lean, brown-skinned, black-bearded fellow, with twinkling eyes, and a certain gruff shyness in his bearing, entered the apartment. He had a sou'-wester on the back of his head, and his garments were a jersey, a rough jacket, and blue trousers tucked into the tops of his sea-boots. At his appearance the fisherman started up.

"Here's a man as will go bail I'm telling the truth," he said; "Peter Travis, you was on a diving job off the breakwater this afternoon. Who was your diver?"

The newcomer removed his sou'-wester, and looked into it.

"Oh, a green hand," he answered. "Just a bit of practice, John Thomas—I—I wanted him to see the place where the Sylph had laid, and to give him a notion what working in five fathoms was like."

"John Thomas" put the shiny black cutty into his vest-pocket, and stepped towards the diver's assistant. A smile had gone round the semi-circle of listeners. Yet it had found no reflection on the sombre features of Dennis Hartigan.

"Peter Travis," said the person challenged by the smile, "you're a perverter of the truth. Your "green hand" was Mollie Davenal. I saw her with my own eyes as you took off the helmet. And Mr. Jerome, a gentleman from the Tower, as I was finding a day's fishing for, saw her, too."

Mr. Travis plucked at his coarsely-pointed black beard.

"Pity but there hadn't been two gentlemen of you, John Thomas," he observed scathingly, "then you'd have held your tongue. The lass was but doing as her father wished her."

Digitized by Google

"Her father." The exclamation had broken from more than one of the listeners.

"Aye," said Peter Travis, "her father. He'd a notion in his sickness he'd lost something down there—something he'd only trust her to look for, and because she wanted to ease his mind, and give him a chance of pulling through, she persuaded me to let her go down. And a brave lass she is, and fitter to be John Davenal's daughter than to be spied on by such as you, John Thomas."

With which crushing, if involved rebuke, Mr. Travis strolled to a seat and deposited himself in it. The old fisherman had coloured a deep brick-red.

"I'm—I'm sure I meant no harm, Peter Travis," he said. "I—I only spoke of the thing as it happened."

"You couldn't," declared Mr. Peter Travis, cutting himself a half-inch length of Irish twist. "For that was just what you didn't know!"

The retort was too much for the delinquent, and he collapsed into silence, while Peter Travis stroked his beard with an air of triumph.

"And—and was there anything there?" queried an irrepressible. The diver's assistant sniffed disdainfully.

"How could there be?" he said. "The whole thing was naught but a sick man's fancy. But the lass was above telling John a lie to satisfy him, so, as she'd been down once before in a sort of joke, I let her put on the suit and do as she wished. With the wind in the south, the spot is no more than a big pool for smoothness. And the bottom's clear enough now the yacht is up."

A murmur of intelligent approval greeted the final instalment of Mr. Travis's explanation, and the talk drifted upon other topics.

Assured that there was no more to hear, Dennis Hartigan got up slowly from his table and lounged, with conspicuous indifference, out of the room. From the bar of the Half Brick he passed forth into the night, and went along the lightless road.

In a darker angle than ever of the lonely thoroughfare, the ex-steward arrested his steps, and some fierce syllables spat themselves from his clenched jaw.

"Kit!" he said, "Kit—it can only be Kit!"

He flung himself down in the thick undergrowth of the tall hedgerow, and put his chin in his palms. A whistle shrieked far off, and the red of the railway-signal in sight along the descending lane changed to green. A moment more and an express shot by, to whisk past the level crossing, and vanish into the obscurity beyond.

Dennis Hartigan snarled viciously.

"Why did that fool interfere?" he growled to himself. "My rotten luck all over! I don't suppose she'd spoken then, she said she hadn't. And now—now they're on the track, or why—why does John Davenal send Moira down to look for—for it?"

The ex-steward shook his head.

"But how did they guess that what Kit heard had anything to do with—with Moira?" he muttered aloud. "Kit didn't know anything to suggest that. There must be someone else at work."

He shook his head again as he sat in the dark of the hedgerow, and kept on shaking it occasionally in a sullen, futile reverie. The moon emerged from the clouds above to look at him—her light was too vivid for his liking, and he rose, to wander down the lane. As her wan radiance touched him between chance gaps in the irregular banks that fringed the road, it might have been seen that he was walking without haste, almost without attention to the route he followed.

Wrapped in his own thoughts, the ex-steward went on through the night, a dusky, powerful figure. When, after a long detour, he reached the sea-front, there was no whit of decision in his lowering, anxious visage. It was late for Groudle; the clocks were striking the half hour after ten as he moved athwart the deserted wharves and came to Hawthorn Cottage.

The ex-steward halted and surveyed it. A light burnt in.

(Continued overleaf.)

A Remarkable Letter.

The Lady Typist and Bile Beans.

The following letter, written by a London lady typist to the proprietors of Chas. Forde's Bile Beans, will interest many of our readers. It shows how effective Bile Beans are in cases of headache, dizziness, morning sickness, and general debility:—

"38 Moncrieff Street,
Peckham, S.E.

Gentlemen,

It gives me much pleasure to send you an account of the benefits I have derived from Chas. Forde's Bile Beans.

Three years ago I was engaged as a lady clerk in the office of a City firm, and had to be at my work by 8.30 every morning. This meant having to catch an early train to the City in all weathers, sitting in a stuffy office all day, taking food irregularly, and reaching home again late every evening to such comforts as one can get in lodgings.

One morning I awoke with a violent headache, a thing almost unknown to me previously, but I found it had come to stay! For the next three months it scarcely ceased! Then there came a nasty sickness in the morning, followed by dizziness, and, occasionally, fainting during the day. I attended the Women's Hospital for months, after having advice from three doctors. Yet, though at first I benefited by the treatment, I soon went from bad to worse again. My friends told me I looked like death, and I think I gave up all hope, for I was almost a skeleton, and the pain in my side, due no doubt to liver complaint, was like knives going through me!

After trying everything I could get, and doctor's medicine and hospital treatment so long, with so poor result, I adopted a friend's advice—gave up everything else, and tried what Bile Beans could do for me.

They did wonders! Before the third box was finished I was like a new woman. In two months they cured me, whereas doctors had failed to do so in two years. I am writing this letter almost a year after my cure, and during that time I have had no recurrence of my old symptoms. So there is no question as to the permanency of my cure.

Yours truly,
(Signed) A. CAMPBELL."

The same Bile Beans as did so much for Miss Campbell may be applied to your case. They are obtainable from all chemists at 1/1½ or 2/9 per box. Many people are of the opinion that Bile Beans are an ordinary medicine. They are not. They are the product of the latest scientific research, and have been obtainable only within the last few years. They do not merely purge and give temporary relief, like the old-fashioned remedies of forty or fifty years ago. They act directly on the liver and digestive organs, strengthening and stimulating them to do their own work, so that further medicine taking becomes unnecessary. They are purely vegetable. They contain no harmful drugs, and they are the finest family medicine obtainable.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(CLOTTED); absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil; invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1s. 4d.; 1lb. 2s. 4d.; 2lbs. 4s. 4d., free. Supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon.

Digitized by Google

but one of its windows—that of the wounded man's room. The rest of the cottage was in darkness, and seemed to share the sleep of the sleeping town.

Dennis Hartigan climbed the fence at a sheltered corner, and, keeping in the shadows of the garden, made a curious little tour of inspection. As he prowled this way and that around the silent dwelling, his half-seen form had a skulking, wolf-like air.

Presently he darted into the shadow of the house itself, gained the small porch, and tried the door. It was unlocked, he stepped noiselessly into the tiny, darkened hall, closed the door behind him, and crept towards the stairs.

Suddenly he halted.

"No," he said, in a whisper, "not to-night, it would be all over the place to-morrow, and I should lose Lady T.'s three thousand pounds. I've got to tell her where the child is, and what she is, a nice fool I should look with the girl dead already. The old cat would strike a cheaper bargain, or bluff me out of it altogether."

He retraced his steps and stole out into the garden. By way of precaution, he crossed it to scale the fence at a different point. As he peered about for something to mount by, the murmur of voices reached him, and he shrank into the bushes about the small summer-house. The voices came from its interior, and one of them was Moira's. The other, though the ex-steward could not know it, was Sir Guy Vanbrugh's.

Hartigan's pulses, still thrilling with the alarm that had seized upon his guilty spirit at the sound of human speech so close to him, beat to a sterner and more ferocious measure.

Within an arm's length of him, unsuspecting, yet not alone, was the girl whose life he was pledged to take, the girl who had become, if he could interpret aright the story he had heard at the Half Brick, not only his destined victim, but a dangerous antagonist. To whom was she speaking, and, above all, what was she saying?

Dennis Hartigan listened breathlessly. Moira's voice was low and tender, her words significant.

"And you don't mind a wife who doesn't know her own name," she asked, "or who her father and mother were?"

"My dearest little woman," was the answer, "I don't want to marry a birth-certificate. You know at least that your Christian name is Moira, I will give you a surname, and when you are Moira Vanbrugh, what will it matter who you were before?"

There was a pause, and Dennis Hartigan's ear caught a faint something that might have been the vague echo of a long-drawn kiss. The listener ground his teeth.

"But father said," pursued Moira, "that is, Mr. Davenal said, he wished he knew because he would be glad to think that the man who called himself so wasn't really my father, for he was a blackguard and a wastrel. That means that I may not be—probably am not—quite respectable, dear. And what would people think if some shocking person or other turned up and claimed to be Sir Guy Vanbrugh's father-in-law?"

A sharp inspiration stole between Dennis Hartigan's lips. But it was lost in the sighing of the bushes about him. Guy Vanbrugh laughed.

"I will deal with any such person when he arrives, my darling," Moira was assured; "perhaps when Mr. Davenal has told us all there is to tell, we shall not find the matter quite so puzzling as it is at present. But, meanwhile, Moira, I want you to promise me something. You will, won't you?"

"How can I till I know what it is?" asked Moira rallyingly.

"How can you say," demanded Guy Vanbrugh, "that you love me if you do not even trust me sufficiently to venture on a promise without an elaborate explanation?"

"Well, then," replied Moira, penitent, "suppose that I have promised, may I not learn to what I have bound myself?"

"Not to do any more diving," said her lover gravely. "Moira, you are very courageous, and so I won't speak to you of the danger to yourself. But I can't run the risk of losing you, my darling—you are the best thing Fate ever put within my reach, and I want you to be mine—my very own—some day.

"I am a sad coward. I fear, but all the time I am away from you I experience a wild desire to jump on a swift horse and gallop over to see if any harm has befallen you. Promise me, dear, freely and openly, that you won't put yourself in danger any more."

"I—I promise, Guy dear!" murmured Moira. "I—I believe I was a little frightened myself down there. But I was so confused and so disappointed at finding nothing that I hadn't much room to be frightened. Oh, what time was that?"

The last strokes of the third quarter after ten—chimed from the spire of Groudle Church—were dying away upon the air. Moira's companion leant out of the summer-house to hold his watch in the moonbeams; the ex-steward pressed closer into the shadow.

"A quarter to eleven," said Guy Vanbrugh. Moira sprang up.

"I must go in, Guy!" she exclaimed. "Kit is only a light sleeper and she might wake—we sleep together, you know. She was such a time going off to-night, poor child, and I wondered what you would think of me, writing to you to meet me, then keeping you waiting."

Her tones were muffled again, as though she had been clasped in her lover's arms.

"You could not have pleased me better," said Guy Vanbrugh, "than by such a Romeo and Juilet appointment. Night, the moon, my darling, love and mystery, what more could a man ask?"

"I wish you had a nicer Juliet," added Moira; and once more her utterance was smothered as though by a protesting embrace.

"And now I must go," she said. "I have left the door on the latch."

"Well, if you must," yielded her lover—"good-night; and may the sweetest of sweet dreams hover about your dear little head!"

Another momentary pause brought a sneer to the unseen face of the ex-steward; and, Moira, slipping out of the summer-house, glided to the cottage.

Guy Vanbrugh followed her a pace or two, and halting, watched till she had entered, and he heard the click of the key and the latch on the other side. Still he waited. At last a curtain was lifted at an upper window. Guy Vanbrugh kissed his hand, sighed pleasurably, and turned to go.

The ex-steward rose from his cramped position and imitated the younger man's example. Once he was safely out of earshot, and on the way back to the Half Brick, he stopped and chuckled. Then, without a word, he returned to his lodging at the inn on the Groudle Road.

TWENTIETH CHAPTER.
"What are you Going to Do?"

"Oh, Guy, how beautiful! Why, it is a perfect picture!"

Irene Tarleton had flung over the back of the oaken settle in the hall of the Tower a great square of dead-leaf silk, across whose wide expanse spread a trail of briar-rose, worked in delicately-tinted ribbon and scarcely less delicately-hued threads. It represented the completion of the task at which Moira Davenal had worked for so long. In the dark old place, and lit by a few chance rays of sunshine from the high mullioned windows, the mimic flowers gave to the beholder an impression of fragile, scented life.

"I'm glad you like it," said Guy Vanbrugh, surveying the splendid panel with a kind of tender reverence; "it isn't all of my present, but I think it's the prettiest part. The other parts are in London, where I expected you'd be when your birthday came round. They are a little cottage Broadwood

(Continued on page 539.)

Digitized by Google

ALFOSCO REGD

Call or Write.

Allen Foster & Co

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

47 GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Call or Write

ALFOSCO REGD

BUY DIRECT BY PARCEL POST FROM THE LEADING FIRM OF LONDON MANUFACTURERS.

Design No. 793. 10/6

Design No. 793. 10/6

Design No. 793. 10/6.

The Fashionable Coat and Skirt for Spring and Summer Wear. It has a short full Sacque Coat, single breasted, bell sleeves. The Skirt is a good shape and carefully made. Produced in ALLEN FOSTER & Co.'s new Zibeline Cloth, also in their celebrated Specialite Serge or Venetian Cloth. Colours: Black, Green, Light and Dark Grey, Royal, Fawn, Brown, Red, and Navy. Patterns post free. This excellent Costume complete, only 10/6; carriage 6d., or Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage 5d. If lined throughout the price will be 16/6; carriage 6d. A Bargain.

Design No. 1019 4/11

Design No. 1019. 4/11

Design No. 1019. 4/11.

Costume Skirt in good-wearing Black and Navy Serge, trimmed two flounces and braid; lined throughout linenette. Price only 4/11, carriage 5d. In ordering, give length of skirt in front and size of waist. Post orders receive prompt attention.

Design No 899. 10/6.

New Style. Costume with tight-fitting back, pouch front, made in A. F. & Co.'s new Zibeline Cloth, also in their Specialite Serge and Venetian Cloth. Colours: Navy, Royal, Green, Oxford, Fawn, Brown, Purple, Light Grey, Dark Grey, Black, &c. Stylish Costume with bell sleeves, tastefully trimmed fancy braid. Bell-shaped Skirt. Wonderful value for 10/6. Sent carriage paid. 6d. ex. Skirt alone, only 5/6; carriage 5d. This Costume may be ordered in the fashionable "Alfosco" Tweed, trimmed glacé silk instead of braid, price 21/-.

Design No. 899. 10/6

Send Post-card for PATTERNS AND NEW SKETCH BOOK OF SPRING FASHIONS IN COSTUMES AND JACKETS. FREE ON APPLICATION. - - - - - CALL OR WRITE.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,

47 GOLDEN LANE, BARBICAN, LONDON, E.C.

DO YOU WANT A GOOD CYCLE?

Write for my Lists. I deal only in the Best Coventry made Cycles, and by contracting for thousands annually, I BUY CHEAPLY and SELL CHEAPLY.

Premiers, Rovers Coventry Challenge, Triumphs, Swifts, Humbers, Centaurs, Raglans, Singers, etc.

The QUALITY is there. Get my prices, save money and ensure satisfaction.

A High-Grade COVENTRY CYCLE for £6 0 0.

Two Years' Guarantee. Easy Payments without publicity. Cycle sent on receipt of first payment. EDWARD O'BRIEN, The World's Largest Cycle Dealer, COVENTRY.

REMEMBER THE BLACK BEETLES.

TELL YOUR COOK

To well sprinkle the floor near the fireplace and kitchen cupboard last thing at night with

"KEATING'S POWDER,"

unrivalled killer of Fleas, Beetles, Moths. (Harmless to animals.) Sold everywhere, ONLY in tins, 3d., 6d. and 1s. each.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

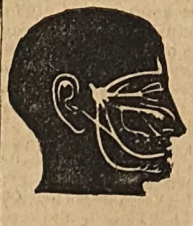
SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "I pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 57 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

ZOX for Neuralgia at Any Time.

GIVES INSTANT RELIEF TO HEADACHE, TOOTHACHE, NERVE PAINS



Any Sufferer Sending Stamped Addressed Envelope May Try Zox FREE.

Neuralgia is a Disease of the Nerves, and most commonly attacks the nerves of the face. Its presence is announced by the most piercing darting pains, recurring in paroxysms, followed with brief intervals of relief; but hardly a moment elapses after a lacerating pain darts along the course of the affected nerve ere another shoots forth, inflicting pain equally distressing to the patient. The annexed cut presents in the prominent lines the nerves of the fifth branch, which are most liable to attacks of Neuralgia. All who suffer from this terrible pain, or from Headache, Toothache, or nerve pains generally, will be glad to know of ZOX, a Simple, Safe and easy Remedy certified free from injurious substance by no less an authority than Dr. A. B. Griffiths, F.R.S. The Proprietors offer to send Two Free Sample Powders to any reader of "Short Stories," who will send them a stamped addressed envelope.

ZOX is sold by Chemists, &c., at 1s. and 2s 6d. per box, or can be had post free from

THE ZOX COMPANY, 11 Hatton Garden, London, E.C. "In pain? Try ZOX."

Digitized by Google

HE CURES THE SICK.

Makes the Lame Walk and Performs Modern Miracles Which Astound and Mystify the Doctors.

"I Want the Sick to Write Me," says the Great Healer.

Tell the People My Services Are Free, So are the Services of My 20 Eminent Specialists.

Tell Them They Can Be Cured At Home: That I Am Giving My Great Discovery To the World, That All May Be Well and Enjoy the True Blessings of Perfect Health.

PROF. THOS. F. ADKIN.

"My ambition in life is not money," says Prof. Adkin, the great healer, who is daily curing men and women of the very worst diseases after learned doctors have pronounced their cases hopeless. His method of treatment is somewhat mysterious, but the fact that he cures the sick when all else fails, when the doctors lose hope and science despairs, is demonstrated beyond controversy. No matter whether you have Consumption, Kidney Trouble, Rheumatism, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, or simply an ordinary cold or fever, they are all alike to Prof. Adkin. He cures them all, he cures you quickly, painlessly, permanently at your own home. He also tells you a secret method by which you may keep yourself in perfect health. Without exaggeration, it can be safely said that Prof. Adkin is the most interesting, remarkable and wonderful physician healer of the age. His only talk, his only thought is How to cure Incurables, to bring hope to the hopeless, joy, sunshine and happiness to the miserable and suffering. He is truly carrying on a grand work. He is President of one of the largest healing institutions in the world. He employs twenty eminent physicians and specialists to assist him with his work. He spends thousands of dollars every year in giving free advice and help to the sick. No matter where you live, the services of the best specialists may be yours. All you have to do is to write a letter to Prof. Adkin describing your case, and he will immediately diagnose your disease and explain the proper home treatment for your speedy recovery. This will not cost you a single cent. No money is asked for this service, none is taken. If you are sick and want to make a donation for the purpose of carrying on the work, such will be thankfully received. Prof. Adkin will also send every sick person who writes him within the next thirty days, a free copy of his wonderful new book, entitled "How to be cured and How to cure others." This book is highly endorsed by leading physicians, it contains invaluable information in regard to diseases and what to do in cases of emergency. It should be in every home. Remember it costs you nothing if you write to Prof. Adkin now.

Mrs. C. A. Brownell, of Dane, Oklahoma, writes: "I was tortured for months by terrible pains in my head, and this, together with the loss of sleep, began to affect my mind. Your treatment has done wonders for me. I sleep well nights, and those terrible pains in my head are gone. Thank God, hope has taken the place of despondency and I have a new lease of life."

Alex. Moffat, of 338 Brown Street, Rochester, N.Y., writes: "When I applied to you for treatment I was as I might say a physical wreck, suffering from pains in the chest and stomach, also poor digestion and on the verge of nervous prostration. I had tried most everything and had about given up when I tried your treatment. My pains have gone, my nerves are strong and I feel like a new man. I wish you success in your noble work."

Mr. J. N. Purdy, Purdy's, N. Y., writes: "I have been suffering from severe stricture and bladder trouble for over three years. I was given up by my physician as incurable. My urine had to be drawn from me and the scalding and burning was intense. My suffering was almost unbearable. I took advantage of your offer, and to my great astonishment I was relieved the second day. Your cures are certainly wonderful."

Mrs. M. A. Lynch, of 1522 Girard Ave., Los Angeles, Cal., writes: "Two months ago I was almost prostrated with insomnia and general debility, from which I had suffered sixteen years. I could sleep at most only two or three hours out of the twenty-four. I suffered with severe headache and neuralgia, could scarcely endure a sound. I feel like a new being. The results of Vitaopathic treatment in my case have certainly been wonderful."

If sick be sure to write Prof. Adkin at once for free help. Be sure to state the leading symptoms of your disease, how long you have been sick, etc. Your letter will be treated with the strictest confidence and receive immediate attention. Address, Prof. Thomas F. Adkin, office 580 R, Rochester, N.Y., U.S.A.

Digitized by Google

SERIAL STORY.

and one of those automatic piano-players. This screen is to go on the back of the Broadwood."

Irene gazed at him thoughtfully.

"It's awfully good of you, Guy!" she exclaimed. "I adore music and I play wretchedly. But that a mere man should think of such a detail as a piano-screen—it passes belief."

Guy Vanbrugh twisted his moustaches in embarrassment.

"To—to be honest," he said, "it wasn't I exactly. I—you see I happened to notice the young lady busy with some of this kind of thing, and I asked her if she couldn't do something for me—that is, for you. You remember you said once that you loved fancy-work, but hadn't the patience to do it. So we—that is, Miss Davenal and I—talked it over, and she suggested quite a lot of things that might be useful."

He continued hastily. Irene's expression was both puzzled and disconcerting.

"Then I remembered," he said, "about my idea of getting you a piano-player, and between us we hit on the notion of a panel for the back of the little Broadwood. She couldn't get a design the right size, so she invented this one."

"Miss—Miss Davenal!" repeated Irene; "my dear Guy, what are you talking about?"

Her cousin adjusted a cuff-link with much intentness.

"It's quite simple," he replied; "I was seeing Davenal—John Davenal, the diver, about my yacht, and his daughter was there at the time, doing something of this sort. It was she who did this."

"Miss Davenal," murmured Irene absently; "but I thought her name was Hartigan and that she was blind."

Guy Vanbrugh raised his eyebrows.

"You must be thinking of Kit," he explained; "she is no relation of the Davenals, except as it appears now that that fellow Hartigan, her brother, married Hannah Davenal, she and Kit were sisters-in-law. Davenal's own daughter is Moira; she is fair and tall, Kit is small and dark. But how did you know about the Davenals?"

"Oh," said Irene, regarding him acutely. "Jerome whisked the little blind girl out of the way of an express at the level crossing, and when I was out riding with him the next day, we passed their cottage on the quay. She was in the garden, so Jerome stopped to ask if she was any the worse. She is a quaint, childish little creature."

Her cousin smiled.

"Kit is not as young as she seems," he remarked; "that is to say, she is by no means a child. But I hadn't any idea Jerome had been playing the knight-errant, and rescuing distressed damsels. Was she in much danger?"

Irene shrugged her shoulders.

"Only standing on the crossing," she answered. "in a species of fright, with a train thundering down on her. The gates were shut, so Jerome, who happened to be on uncle Edward's old hunter, leapt them, snatched her up, and managed to whip over the further gates into the lane beyond before the express shot by. Needless to say, he didn't tell me all this, but the blind girl did."

"By Jupiter!" cried her cousin enthusiastically, "what a clever, plucky thing to do! But there, I always knew J. was one of the best. What a jump it must have been—in and out, with no room to spare, and less than half a minute to do it and avoid knocking the poor girl's brains out at the same time. It deserves the Victoria Cross."

"So I told him, Guy," said Irene Tarleton, and she fingered a corner of the silk over which Moira had toiled so arduously. She looked up and met her cousin's glance.

"Guy," she observed slowly, "I should like to see Miss Davenal and say how much I admire her wonderful talent. What is she—a precocious country girl, or a lady?"

Guy Vanbrugh pulled mechanically at his driving-glove.

"A lady," he answered, "and not one of Nature's only. Her father has had her rather highly educated. But he is devotedly attached to her, and she has the simplest and most womanly of tastes, and is contented to live in the station to which she has been accustomed."

"You said she was fair," added Irene, watching him. "Is she pretty, or only a well-behaved, flaxen-headed frump, clever with her needle and able to read Browning?"

Her cousin's mouth relaxed; his amusement was unmistakable.

"She is more than ordinarily good-looking," he said, "and her hair is not flaxen, but of the tint of a marigold. And I do not suppose she has ever opened a volume of Browning in her life—not that one can be sure, for she is too shy and unpretentious to parade her interests, in books, or in anything else."

Irene dropped the silk she was examining and took a step to her cousin's side.

"Guy," she remarked, with a ripple of mirth in her voice, "would you like me to go and make friends with this wonderful young lady?" She had laid a slight yet perceptible emphasis on the word "friends." Guy Vanbrugh trifled with his gloves.

"I'm—I'm sure she would be very glad," he said. "I—I have spoken to her of you."

Irene burst out laughing.

"You dear, transparent fellow!" she ejaculated. "Well, I'll go and see Miss Davenal, and I won't chaff her or you till you choose to take me into your confidence. I suppose she's merely taking her time—we all do!"

Guy twisted at the button of his glove.

"I mustn't say 'yes' to what you mean, Irene," he stammered, "I—I'm not quite free, yet, to talk frankly. But I should like you to know Miss Davenal, especially——"

What more he would have said must remain matter of conjecture, for he ceased abruptly. Lady Tarleton had emerged from the library hard by. When she saw the two standing in close converse by the oaken settle, her eyes lit with a swift, false smile, and she advanced towards them.

"Ah, my dear Guy!" she exclaimed, "and what brings you to the Tower? Not that it is not a great pleasure to see you, but you really have been ignoring us so shamefully, that a visit from you is quite in the nature of a surprise."

She passed round the settle to offer him her hand. Her glance fell on the silken panel, and she wrinkled her brows, struck by a suggestion of familiarity with it.

Then she remembered; she had seen just such a one at Hawthorn Cottage, during the singular interview with Guy and Moira Davenal—it had occupied a corner, stretched upon its lath frame the better to be manipulated.

Her eyes, sharper than either of her auditors, had chanced to suspect, had marked not only the nature, but the beauty of the work. But she kept her countenance, despite the recognition.

"What a lovely thing!" she said.

"Yes, isn't it?" responded Irene, with secret amusement. "Guy had it done for me. It is part of my birthday present."

"I thought perhaps Irene would be interested in one of those automatic piano-playing contrivances," supplemented Guy Vanbrugh, "so I ordered one to be sent to Portland Place, together with a little Broadwood I took a fancy to, and—and, seeing some of this work that had been done locally, I ordered a panel of it for the back of the Broadwood."

Lady Tarleton's thin lips twitched, and her false smile grew.

"How very sweet of you to remember the dear girl's birthday!" she said. "But there, I might have known you wouldn't forget such an important occasion!" And the speaker gave to the words that extravagant accentuation affected by elderly folk when they think fit to banter the sentimental preferences of the younger generation. She inspected the panel patronisingly.

"Quite creditably done," she commented, "and you are right, my dear Guy, to support local industries. Well, I must run away, I have been talking business to your uncle for an hour, and I ordered the carriage at eleven."

(Continued overleaf.)

Digitized by Google

She gave her hand to her nephew again, and her gaze encountered his steadily, and with a cynical, good-tempered significance.

"You ought to show Guy those wonderful curios of your uncle's, Irene," she added, "he would be most interested. They are most marvellous carvings, Guy, incredibly ugly china and jewels, and things that it is death to bring out of some extraordinary country or other your uncle managed to penetrate into. They're all set out now in the justice-room."

Irene took her cousin's arm, it tickled her to poke sly fun at her mother's matrimonial machinations.

"Come on, Guy," she said, "we'll go and look at the curiosities, like good little kiddies on a wet day!"

And, nothing loth to have an additional opportunity of probing Guy Vanbrugh's secret, she marched him off gaily, through the hall, and down the corridors that led to the justice-room.

Lady Tarleton gazed after them.

"Does Irene love him?" she muttered. "That would be a strong lever to part him and this—this village girl. In that case is Irene only flirting with this newspaper man? I wish I knew."

She sighed and turned. The silken panel, still hanging over the back of the settle, attracted her attention, and she frowned.

"Pretty, proud, and clever," she murmured. "The girl is no mean enemy. I must get Guy away if it is possible. Yet, in the alternative, I must not leave him here, with her."

Thus communing with herself, Lady Tarleton had moved towards the staircase, and was ascending it. Sweeping absent-mindedly round a curve, she brushed against someone coming down, and, glancing up, beheld Paul Jerome. He paused and apologised before passing down. Lady Tarleton re-assured him effusively, but peered at his retreating figure through her lorgnette with an evil scowl on her pale features.

"I must get rid of you," she told herself, "you, my dear Mr. Jerome, are a very unimportant, and yet a very inconvenient pawn. It should not be difficult to sweep you off the board."

Oblivious to this contemptuous epitome of his position, the war-correspondent made for the library from which Lady Tarleton had so recently emerged. As he neared the door, a footman came through from the rear of the hall, and followed him into the room.

Edward Stormont was writing at a table in the middle of the great, book-lined apartment. About the floor were strewn various packing-cases, their contents of unmounted skins, horns, native stuffs, and implements of barbaric warfare and agricultural scattered around. The explorer raised his head as his friend entered.

"Hullo, Jerome," he said. "I was wondering what had become of you. I am a lamentable host, I know, but, to tell you the truth; you seemed to have a distinct preference for feminine society, and so I——"

He stopped, seeing the footman.

"Well?" he asked.

The servant stepped forward.

"Mr. Ussher, sir," he said; "would be glad if you could spare him a moment."

Edward Stormont growled an anathema upon the detective.

"Here, Jerome," he observed, "you profess to be interested by this blundering Argus. Help me to grapple with his latest inspiration, his portentous mystery bores me horribly."

"With pleasure," assented the war-correspondent, and sat down on a corner of the big writing-table. Edward Stormont had nodded to the footman, the latter withdrew, to return promptly with Mr. Ussher. The door closed behind the detective, and he advanced into the room. Perceiving Paul Jerome, his brows contracted.

"Mr. Jerome is quite discreet, Ussher," said Edward Stormont, "and completely in my confidence. You need have no hesitation, as I expect you are aware, in taking him into yours."

"Humph!" replied the detective. "Mr. Jerome is a newspaper man, but, no doubt, under the circumstances, and as your friend, sir, he will see the necessity of forgetting entirely his professional claims, even to the extent of a vague and guarded paragraph."

"Of course!" agreed Edward Stormont curtly.

Mr. Ussher produced his notebook.

"I have approached you, sir," he said, addressing Edward Stormont, "as a more or less disinterested party in this matter, and practically on my own responsibility. But I have always had the reputation of a scrupulously tactful investigator. I wish to retain that reputation."

"Yes, yes," he was answered curtly, "we are sure of that, Ussher. But to the point, and, by the way, take a seat."

"I thank you, sir," said Mr. Ussher, acting on the invitation. "Well, sir, my position is this. Pursuing one clue and another, calculated to throw light upon the death of Hannah Davenal, I have by chance stumbled upon an important person—one of your own gamekeepers, sir, who did not, as it happens, know the deceased woman either by name or appearance."

"Good Heavens!" cried Edward Stormont, "then how can he be considered important?"

The detective tapped his finger on the back of his note-book.

"That is the crux of the whole question," he allowed. "I have been carrying about with me a portrait of the dead woman, a photograph that I got from her husband. This I showed—with intention, sir—in the Half Brick public-house, to a group in the bar.

"I was anxious to foster gossip—it is in gossip that our best clues are often found. This gamekeeper of yours, sir, was among the group, and recognised the portrait of Hannah Davenal as that of a woman he had seen in Groudle Park a night or two before the deceased was found dead in bed."

Edward Stormont bent a pen-handle till it snapped.

"But the point, Ussher, the point," he said, irritably. The war-correspondent intervened.

"There is no doubt some reason, Mr. Ussher," he added, "why you come to Mr. Stormont about the matter. You need not, as we understand, report to him at all in the case."

The detective bent his head in solemn approval.

"You are perfectly correct, Mr. Jerome," he conceded, "but I have not fully explained. Taking your man aside, Mr. Stormont, and chatting with him persuasively, I asked him at length why he had not followed the woman, or spoken to her. His answer was that they—she had a companion, a woman closely cloaked and muffled—seemed to wish to avoid observation. Ordinarily, that would, of course, only have led him to be increasingly vigilant. But——"

Mr. Ussher halted, put a thumb in his note-book, and rested the volume on his knee.

"But," he proceeded, "there was something about Davenal's companion that, he hinted, gave him good grounds for—for discretion. She—she was, as he put it, after some considerable persuasion, and a certain amount of liquid refreshment, the 'dead spit'—which, oddly enough, sir, means in these parts, the living image—of your sister-in-law, Mr. Stormont, Lady Tarleton."

"Lady Tarleton!" repeated the master of Groudle Tower. "My sister-in-law—well, and what if it were she? If my sister-in-law goes out with her maid at night, what has that to do with the murder of the same maid a day and a night later?"

"I presume, sir," said Mr. Ussher coldly, "nothing. But it is my duty, sir, to trace every movement, every action of Hannah Davenal's life during the period immediately preceding her death. And, before attaching any weight to this story of a mysterious excursion of my lady and her maid, in the small hours of the morning—for it was in the small hours that Davenal and her companion were seen, it would be as well for me to ascertain, through you, sir, if any such excursion on Lady Tarleton's part took place."

Edward Stormont's answer was to rise and ring the bell.

"I beg your pardon, sir!" exclaimed the detective, rising hurriedly from his chair, "but what are you going to do?" Edward Stormont faced him loftily.

"Ask my sister-in-law to favour us with her presence!" he said.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

Catarrh and Consumption.

The constantly increasing death rate from consumption is a warning to those who suffer from chronic cold or catarrh in the head, according to the views held by the editor of the "Journal for the Deaf and Review of Diseases of the Ear, Nose and Throat." In the last issue of the "Journal" this subject is discussed and several cases are given as illustrations of the tendency of nasal catarrh to extend to the throat and lungs. The tendency seems to be specially well marked in those who are subject to taking cold easily. In the same issue the editor also points out the success of the Drouet Institute in curing catarrh of the nose and throat in numerous cases where operations and cauterisations inside the nose had failed. As names and addresses are given, this will be of interest to those who have any form of catarrh of the nose, throat or ears. A free copy of the "Journal for the Deaf and Review of Diseases of the Nose, Throat and Ears," can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, Drouet Institute, 10 Marble Arch, London, W. The Journal also contains a Pathological Report Form, by means of which anyone can obtain free advice as to the treatment of deafness and ear, nose and throat diseases. The editor, however, advises patients, whenever possible, to attend the Institute for a personal examination.

Rupture Free Cure.

Wonderful Home Treatment that Cures Without Pain or Loss of Time.

Dr. W. S. Rice (Dept. 953), 8 & 9, Stonecutter Street, London, E.C., has invented a method that cures rupture without pain, danger, operation, or an hour's loss of time from the day's work. To avoid all questions of doubt, he sends free to every sufferer a free trial of his method, and there can be no earthly reason why anyone, rich or poor, should not avail themselves of this generous offer. As an instance of this remarkable method, the cure of Mr. John Foulkes, 317, Beaufort Street, Toxteth Park, Liverpool, is well worth noticing. Mr. Foulkes is 74 years of age, and had suffered from a scrotal rupture for nine years. He used Dr. Rice's home method of treatment, and in a short time was cured sound as a bell. A full description and sample of this remarkable method of cure will be gladly sent upon application. It has cured thousands. Do not hesitate to give it a trial. Write at once—to day.

Mr. J. FOULKES.

COMPLEXION AND HAIR.

We receive, from day to day, many letters from readers asking us how to clear the complexion of Blackheads, Freckles, Tan, Redness, etc. The most marvellous preparation that we know of is "PERALIA," manufactured by the "Peralia" Perfumery Co. of North Shields. This wonderful liquid, while it instantly beautifies the complexion, and removes all obnoxious excrescences, such as pimples and blotches, is perfectly harmless, and its purity is guaranteed by a well-known medical man, whose certificate accompanies each bottle. Besides acting on the above, "PERALIA," by frequent application, will remove wrinkles, crow's feet, and, in fact, entirely rejuvenate the features. This is due to its penetrating action, as it makes its way through the pores of the skin, exerting its beneficial effect on each and every one, and cleansing it effectually from dirt, callous growth, and decayed tissue. "PERALIA" is, in our opinion, the only beauty specific that does its work in such a thorough and scientific manner. It is the most successful remedy we have to aid us in the fight against the ravages of either Time or Disease. If you feel that your beauty is waning, or that fine complexion being marred by disfiguring humours, you should at once have recourse to "PERALIA."

We cannot speak too highly of this preparation. Readers can obtain it of all chemists, in bottles, at 1s., 1s. 6d., and 2s. 6d., but the proprietors offer to send a sample bottle, under cover, on receipt of the price, and 3d. postage.

In conclusion we must say a word for their unique preparation "CRIMPOLINE" for curling the hair. Most women, and all young girls are extremely anxious about their hair being trim, and yet having that graceful curly appearance that is so attractive. Unlike other curling fluids, "CRIMPOLINE" is not sticky, nor greasy, and curls the hair so much that once the hair becomes curly you need not continue using it. The rain does not take the curl out of the hair either after using "CRIMPOLINE," so you need not fear that washed-out, bedraggled look again.

It is used and recommended by Madame Patti, Vesta Tilley, Minnie Palmer, etc. Prices, 1s. 9d. and 2s. 6d. per bottle. When sending for, or ordering, "PERALIA," we advise you also to send for "CRIMPOLINE." Don't forget the address, "PERALIA" PERFUMERY CO., Dept. 14, Camden Street, North Shields.

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

Free Wheels. New Departure Hub, Bowden Brakes. All Improvements—Lamp, Bell, &c. Carriage paid.

Carr. Paid.

For Cash or 12 Monthly Payments of

£8 8s. 15/10 | £9 10s 17/6
£9 16 8 | £105s. 19/3

Juno Motor Cycle is the King of Motor Cycles, £32 or 60/- mo. Accessories at lowest prices; Acetylene Lamp, 2/11; Cycle Stand, 1/8; Motor Horn, 5/6.

Write for New Season List, 136 pages and 600 illustrations, sent post free.—METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co. Ltd. (S.S. Dept.), 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C. West End Showrooms: Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

TOWLE'S PILLS

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

of all Chemists, or Post Free on receipt of 15, 34, or 56 penny stamps or P.O.O. from the Sole Proprietors,

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Nottingham, Eng.

SENT ON APPROVAL

Ten Days Free Trial is allowed on every cycle we sell and the full price with all carriage charges refunded if unsatisfactory. 1903 Models

£3.10 to £6.10

New Departure Coaster Brake Front Rim Brake and highest grade genuine British made fittings and accessories.

200 Good Second-Hand Cycles £1.10 to £2.10

Don't Fail to get our big illustrated catalogue before deciding on your 1903 machine. We save you money.

Rider Agents Wanted in every district to buy sample at special price and take orders for us. Large profits easily made in spare time. Address Dept. 44c,

MEAD CYCLE CO. Liverpool.

Digitized by Google

GIVEN AWAY
With this week's
HOME NOTES
(No. 484)
A PAPER PATTERN of this SKIRT.

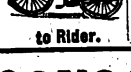
Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.
PRICE ONE PENNY.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,
For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

From Factory



to Rider.

How Does This Suit You?
Handsomest & Best of Cycles right away after payment Month's Instalment—or Deposit—as you wish. £14 14s Grade for £8 10s Write, H Dept, Williams' Direct Supply Mfg. Co., 12 Approach, London Bridge, London.

SONGS COPIED.
Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page. Mrs. Conyers, Morchard Bishop, Devon. Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

Mrs. Conyers,
MORCHARD BISHOP, DEVON.

THE LADY'S SILVER
"MALVERN"
WATCH AND CHAIN.

2/- DEPOSIT. 21/-

2/-

TWO SHILLINGS
deposit (and subsequent weekly or monthly payments to suit the convenience of purchaser) secures one of these elegant and thoroughly reliable Watches and Chains for £1-1-0 instead of £2-2-0, the usual retail price.

NO DISCOUNT WHATEVER can be allowed to customers sending cash in full with order, but they will be entitled to a week's free trial of the Watch and Chain; and Cash in full will be refunded if the articles are not approved.

SPECIFICATION.—The Lady's Silver "Malvern" Watch and Chain at £1-1-0 is a marvellous production and equal quality and value has not been attempted by any other firm in the world. The Watch is fitted with a horizontal movement of excellent quality; it is fully jewelled, carefully fitted and finished throughout and thoroughly sound in every respect. The cases are Sterling Silver, beautifully finished and richly engraved, artistic dial and gold compo hands, keyless or key-wind as preferred. The Chain is real Silver of elegant design and finish and strongly made; it is of full length but owing to want of space this cannot be shown in the illustration.

The Watch and Chain are forwarded post free, complete with signed warranty for ten years. They are produced by special and greatly improved machinery, and are supplied DIRECT to the Purchaser, at a small commission on the actual nett cost of production.

When writing, please mention this publication.

W. E. WATTS FOUNDED 1858. WHOLESALE DEPOT 106-108 DERBY R^D THE ONLY ADDRESS— NOTTINGHAM.

To CURE Drunkards

Mrs. Geo. Fuller, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

Beauty.
Icilma is the only absolutely safe Natural preparation for the Complexion. All who wish to keep a good complexion or who have any skin trouble, however slight, should send id. stamp for postage of free sample and Hygiene of the Skin to ICILMA (Dept. 127), 142 Gray's Inn Road, London, W.C.

CHICKEN HATCHING EXTRAORDINARY FOR 2/6
The Texas Egg-Hatcher and Rearer combined supersedes all incubators. Hatches above and rears little ones below simultaneously all the year round. A money-making home industry requiring neither capital nor labour. Turns 1d. eggs into valuable Chickens or Ducklings. Millions selling in America. 15-egg size 2/6; 30-egg, 5/-; complete for use. Address, AMERICAN POULTRY SYNDICATE (Room 101), 7 Albion Grove, Stoke Newington, London, N.

---

2 PENCE DAILY
Any respectable person, male or female, can obtain a warranted cycle on easy payments of 1 shilling or more weekly. No guarantors required. Mutual trust between our patrons and ourselves. Catalogue Free.
Symonds' London Stores,
124-128, City Rd., London, E.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%

The Birkbeck Almanack, with full particulars, post free
C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

MACKINTOSH'S
Is DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!
PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.
A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

Digitized by Google

On the Rolling Wave.

She: "Take care, Alfred! That isn't the remedy for sea-sickness. Don't you see the bottle is marked poison?" He (groaning): "That's the one I want."

A Dangerous Time.

When a girl goes round the house pointing out pictures and things that are her personal property it is a pretty good sign that she is contemplating matrimony.

Sent a Substitute.

"You are not the young lady to whom I give lessons," said the music master. "No. The young lady to whom you give lessons is ill, and she has sent me to practise for her."

Mutual Exposure.

"Can you forgive me and love me still?" said the new bride, "when I confess that my teeth are artificial?" "Thank goodness," cried the groom as he snatched off his wig, "now I can cool my head."

A Gentle Hint.

"I've stopped asking people if my bonnet is on straight." The Husband: "Why, my dear?" The Wife: "I love you too much, John, to disgrace you by calling a body's attention to an old bonnet like this."

Sure Signs.

"I think Annie must have accepted young Willespoon last night," said Mr. Smith. "She hasn't said a word to me. What makes you think so?" asked his wife. "I ran across him several times to-day, and every time he saw me he turned as pale as a sheet."

Her Missionary Work.

The Pastor: "Miss Ethel, you should be engaged in some missionary work." Miss Ethel: "Oh, I am, and have been for some time past." The Pastor: "I'm so grateful to hear you say so. In what field are you engaged?" Miss Ethel (proudly): "I'm teaching my parrot not to swear."

Charlie's Strange Mistake.

Old Mrs. Jones entered the drawing-room unexpectedly and spoilt a very pretty tableau. "I was just whispering a secret in Cousin Jennie's ear," explained Charlie. "I'm sorry," said the old lady gravely, "that your eyesight has become so bad that you mistake Jennie's mouth for her ear."

Taking All the Curls.

"I am glad you like my new watch charm, Miss Laura. It is a pretty ornament I think, though it needs something to make it complete. May I ask you for a lock of your lovely hair?" "Certainly, Mr. Ferguson. You can have all you want, but—but—doesn't it seem a pity to mar the symmetry of these curls by cutting one off?" "It does," responded George, with quick and eager comprehension. "I wouldn't do anything for worlds to destroy their perfect symmetry. I'll take them all." And the youth ornamented the vicinity of his watch pocket with the entire head for a long, long time.

Different Men.

"I love and I am loved." "Then you must be perfectly happy." "But it isn't the same man!"

Trouble Taken in Vain.

Grace: "George, all is lost." George: "Why?" Grace: "Papa has oiled those squeaky shoes you bought him."

A Nasty Smack.

Ethel: "They say that Blanche is to marry a man old enough to be her grandfather." Florence: "Why, everybody knows there is no such man!"

Once Was Enough.

He: "I suppose that young idiot Smith has proposed to you a dozen times?" She: "No. Once was enough. Come and see us when we get settled."

A Dangerous Task.

She: "It must have taken a great deal of persistence on your part to learn to play the violin so well." He: "It did. I had to go constantly armed for five years."

No Fire After All.

He: "I heard an alarm of fire, I think. I must go and see where it is." Returning after twenty minutes: "It wasn't fire," he said shortly. "Nor water either," she replied, still more briefly.

Nicer to Ride.

"Algy, dear," she murmured, "I should be happy if I could walk through life hand-in-hand with you; but——" "But what, dearest?" he anxiously asked. "But I should be happier if I could ride."

Papa Would Not See.

George: "And if things do not go well with us the first year, darling, I—hem—presume your father will not see us suffer?" Birdie (sighing): "No, dear, poor papa's eyesight is growing rapidly worse, even now."

An Unwelcome Visitor.

She: "Papa says that when coming to see me you must not come in a 'bus any more." He: "Really! Does he expect me to walk all this distance?" She: "Of course not. He says all he asks is that you will come in a carriage hired by the hour."

Which Was the More Becoming?

"She is determined to be a musician, but cannot decide whether to make a speciality of the violin or piano." "Has she no positive predilection for either?" "Oh, yes; but some of her friends think she looks better standing, and others that sitting is more becoming to her."

He'd Made an Appeal.

"Wasn't that young Mr. Tiff who left the house as I came in?" asked the judge of his eldest daughter. "Yes, papa!" "Did I not issue an injunction against his coming here any more!" "Yes, papa; but he appealed to a higher court, and mamma reversed your decision."

The Postmistress Knew the Reason.

"Any letter for me?" asked a young lady of a post-mistress in a country town. "No," was the reply. "Strange!" said the young lady aloud to herself as she turned away. "Nothing strange about it!" cried the post-mistress over the counter. "You ain't answered the last letter he writ ye."

No Need to Waste Time.

"Harry," she said, "if a fire were to break out suddenly in the house what would be your first impulse, do you think?" "Well, my first thought would be for you, of course. I would get you to a place of safety, and then do what I could to extinguish the flames." "That would be very nice of you, Harry, to think of me first, but if a fire were to break out now, for instance, wouldn't you lose valuable time reaching me from such a long way across the room?"

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

The Troubles of a Colonial.

"HORTON," who is a Colonial, has been keeping company with a young lady for three years, but they are not engaged, as the young lady's mother will not give her consent. "HORTON" is thirty, and the young lady will be twenty-one this month, and the question he wishes answered is—"If I put up the banns, can her mother stop them? And if she tries to do so, is the minister compelled to take any notice of her? She has no reason whatever to stop them except her dislike to me."

* * * * *

When a girl becomes of age she is her own mistress and responsible for her actions. The mother, of course, can forbid the banns, but will be powerless to make them null and void unless she can show sufficient reason why this should be done. The mere fact of her objection to you would not be considered sufficient. I wish you every happiness, "HORTON," and hope that the young lady's mother will be won over to your side before the banns are put up. The scenes that follow the forbidding of banns are always unpleasant.

Should She Become Engaged?

"MARECHAL NIEL ROSE" (whom I shall call "M. N. R.") has been keeping company with a young man for twelve months, and they are deeply in love with each other. Unfortunately, "M. N. R.'s" mother does not believe in love; she married for position, but has not been at all happy with her husband, so "M. N. R." is not encouraged to have a young man, and has not introduced her present one to her mother. The young man now says that he will have to go abroad for nearly four years, and wants "M. N. R." to become engaged to him before he starts, but she doesn't quite know what to do, because of her mother. Though she does not live at home, she feels she ought to be guided to a certain extent by what her mother says.

* * * * *

You are both very young, "M. N. R."—you say you are only twenty and he twenty-two—and I do not advise you to contract a definite engagement at present. Your mother's arguments would not carry much weight with me, as she has thoroughly proved for herself that marriage without love was an utter failure, but she is right in saying that this may be only fascination because of your youth.

* * * * *

Tell your young man that you do not see your way to entering into a definite engagement at present, but are willing to wait for him on the understanding that if either of you meets someone you like better, you are quite at liberty to become engaged without causing any bad feeling or mutual recrimination.

A Time of Probation.

"M. H." is not quite eighteen. She has kept company with a young man for three months, but he now tells her that they must be nothing more than friends for a stated time. "M. H." has promised to do this, and she wonders whether, if during this time she goes for a walk with any other young man is it likely to cause any difference between her and the original young man.

* * * * *

Provided you are satisfied with the explanation you received when your more intimate relations were turned for the time to those of friendship only, I think it would be much wiser for you not to accept invitations to go for walks with any other young man.

What is the Matter?

"IN LOVE WITH A CUSTOMER"—please do not use such a long pseudonym again—keeps a tobacconist's shop. For some time a young man used to come in regularly several times every day, and always had a pleasant word for her, but latterly he has been coming very irregularly, and when he does come seems as if he could not be civil. "IN LOVE WITH A CUSTOMER" took a great liking to the young man, and wonders if she has done anything to offend him, and how she may find out without appearing to be forward.

* * * * *

You say his brother is a regular customer of yours, so surely it would be quite simple to inquire of him whether anything were the matter with the object of your fancy. Tell him you missed such a regular customer, and hoped you had done nothing to make him want to stay away, or something of that sort. The brother need have no suspicion that you are inquiring out of anything more than ordinary curiosity.

Has She Another Lover?

"VIX" has been engaged to a young lady for a year. They do not live in the same town. He has written to her regularly twice a week, but has only heard from her seven or eight times, and then the letters are exceedingly cold. He cannot go to see her because of his business, and wonders how he is to find out whether she has ceased to care for him.

* * * * *

I should advise you to write to the young lady, "VIX," and ask her to name the day for the wedding. If you receive an evasive answer you will know that her affection towards you has cooled. Then you should ask her if this is the case, and whether she would like to be released from the engagement. It is no use continuing an engagement on such unsatisfactory terms. Your further procedure in the matter must be determined by her reply.

An Indifferent Lover.

"F. N. A." is in love with a young man who has known her since she was a child, and once told her that he was deeply interested in her future. For a month or six weeks he is in the habit of paying her a good deal of attention, and then for a week or ten days he keeps away from her, after which he turns up again as if nothing had happened. "F. N. A." wants to know what she should do regarding his behaviour.

* * * * *

Next time he returns to you after one of these lapses, I should ask him pretty plainly for a full explanation. If he refuses to do this, tell him he needn't trouble to come again to see you. Treatment such as this should soon bring him to his senses, and you will quickly know one way or another whether he is serious or only trifling with your affections.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THIS IS OUR TRADE MARK

THE

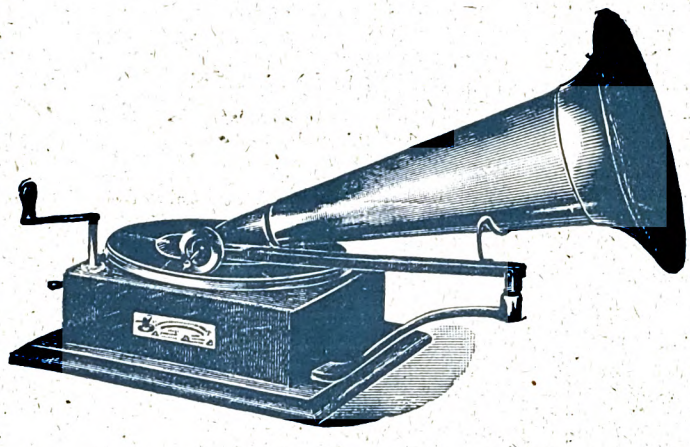
GRAMOPHONE

Entertains, Educates, and Teaches.

If you wish to cultivate voice reproduction, if you are anxious to improve your technique, you should listen to and learn by Gramophone Records made by the greatest singers and musicians of the world.

GRAMOPHONES.

No. 3 - - -	£3 3
No. 4 - - -	4 4
Menarch Junior	5 10
Monarch - -	7 10
Double Spring Monarch - -	10 0
Triple Spring Monarch - -	12 10



GRAMOPHONE RECORDS.

7 inch Records, 2s. 6d.

Grand Concert Records, 5s.

Red Label Records, 10s.

11 Special Records Sung by Cam. F. Tamagno, £1 each.

Monarch Junior, £5 10s.

The Gramophone is not a mere producer of a tune or a song but a scientific instrument which faithfully reproduces the actual voice or playing of a singer or a musical instrument combination. The Gramophone makes a home happy. It is the World's Entertainer. It reproduces the best music from every country in Europe at a trifling cost. Thanks to the Gramophone everyone can become acquainted with all that is best in the world of music.

On receipt of a postcard we will send you Catalogues and name and address of the nearest dealer in our Gramophones.

THE GRAMOPHONE AND TYPEWRITER LTD.,

21 City Road, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Cadbury's cocoa

THE STANDARD OF HIGHEST PURITY.—The Lancet.

Cadbury's is Cocoa and the Best Cocoa only.

ABSOLUTELY PURE.

"Cocoa alone is an excellent food as well as a stimulant, having a salutary action upon the nerve centres."
The Lancet.

"Cadbury's is a perfectly pure Cocoa of the highest quality."—Medical Annual.

A Perfect Beverage for all Seasons of the Year.

TO BE FIRST

Is to occupy an enviable position. Many aspire for first place, but few attain it. To acquire the lead, aspiration and push alone are not sufficient. Merit is required. This is exactly why . . . .

BEECHAM'S PILLS

stand foremost among medicines. They possess real merit, and have proved themselves worthy of a permanent position in the family medicine chest. Trial purchasers become regular users, because they find nothing to equal Beecham's Pills for dispelling

BILIOUS AND NERVOUS DISORDERS,
Indigestion, Sick Headache, Languor,

and other such troubles which arise from a Disordered Stomach. They regulate and tone up the entire system. The genuine worth of BEECHAM'S PILLS has obtained for them the unique position of having the Largest Sale of any Patent Medicine in the World.

Sold Everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills) and 2/9 (168 Pills).

BIRD'S CUSTARD POWDER

BIRD'S CUSTARD is Pure, Nutritious, and easily digested. It is a delicious article of food for daily use. Exquisite for Luncheon, Dinner, or Supper. Eggs often disagree; BIRD'S CUSTARD never.

In Springtime,

BIRD'S CUSTARD AND RHUBARB. Wholesome and healthful, rich and creamy. BIRD'S CUSTARD is the one thing needed with all Stewed, Tinned, or Bottled Fruits. It enhances their flavor and imparts to them a grateful mellowness.

NO EGGS! NO RISK! NO TROUBLE!

SHORT STORIES.

No. 748.] Week ending May 2nd, 1903. [Price One Penny.

"BY HEAVEN, I RECOGNISE YOU! YOU ARE LADY MADRESFIELD—MURDERESS!"

(A Dramatic Incident from the Story, "The Mystery of Madresfield Towers." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

Headache

Kaputine cures the most obstinate Headache or Neuralgic Pains in ten minutes. Is the only preparation of its kind having the confidence and recommendation of Medical Men.

Kaputine
THE SAFE REMEDY

DR. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., says: There can be no hesitation on the part of anyone suffering from Neuralgic troubles to employ Kaputine—the safe remedy.

The only remedy of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and Infirmaries.

Packets of 18 doses 1s.

KAPUTINE LTD., HUDDERSFIELD.

Neuralgia

GRAVES' WATCHES

"SAFE AS THE BANK OF ENGLAND."

THIS is the feeling of those who deal with the Firm of J. G. GRAVES, because all Goods are sent out to handle and examine at leisure, and NEED NOT BE KEPT unless they give the fullest satisfaction.

THE 'BEATRICE' 25/-

Lady's Sterling Silver Horizontal Watch.

Specification. Horizontal Movement, Jewelled throughout; Automatic Stop to prevent over-winding, Artistic Dial, Handsomely Engraved, Extra Strong Sterling Silver Cases.

A Thoroughly Reliable Timekeeper, and Warranted for Five Years.

Terms. Send only 2/6 with order, and remit the balance in nine more MONTHLY payments of 2/6; or, if you prefer to pay the balance in one sum within seven days of delivery, a Handsome Bonus Present will be sent you as discount.

THE LARGEST WATCH-SALES FIRM IN THE WORLD.

No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, Cutlery and Plate, Fancy Goods, etc., etc., post free.

Good Agents Wanted in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms. No risk. Good pay.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 DIVISION ST., SHEFFIELD

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

Free Wheels. New Departure Hub, Bowden Brakes. All Improvements—Lamp, Bell, &c. Carriage paid.

For Cash or 12 Monthly Payments of

£8 8s.	15/10	£9 10s.	17/6
£9	16/8	£10 5s.	19/3

Juno Motor Cycle is the King of Motor Cycles, £32 or 60/- mo. Accessories at lowest prices; Acetylene Lamp, 2/11; Cycle Stand, 1/8; Motor Horn, 5/6.

Write for New Season List, 136 pages and 600 Illustrations, sent post free.—METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co., Ltd. (S.S. Dept.), 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C. West End Showrooms: Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

Thousands of ladies are riding our Cycles, sold by us at £4 to £8. Cash or easy payments. We sell to Wives, Daughters, Teachers, Nurses, Clerks, Cashiers, Typists, Bookkeepers, Factory Workers, School Girls, and others in all occupations. Circulars in plain sealed envelope free.

FOR YOU

SYMONDS' STORES, 124-128, City Rd., London, E.C.

REMEMBER THE BLACK BEETLES.

TELL YOUR COOK

To well sprinkle the floor near the fireplace and kitchen cupboard last thing at night with

"KEATING'S POWDER,"

unrivalled killer of Fleas, Beetles, Moths. (Harmless to animals.) Sold everywhere. ONLY in tins, 3d., 6d. and 1s. each.

PUREST & NICEST.

PINK'S JAMS

A good housekeeper thinks The "pink" of Jams is PINK'S.

From Factory to Rider.

How Does This Suit You? Handsomest & Best of Cycles right away after payment Month's Instalment—or Deposit—as you wish. £14 14s Grade for £6 10s Write, H Dept. Williams' Direct Supply Mfg. Co., 12 Approach, London Bridge, London.

Digitized by Google

Short Stories

No. 748.] [One Penny.

For the Week Ending May 2nd, 1903.

The Mystery of Madresfield Towers.

A Story of Love and Sacrifice.

Containing the Incident Depicted on the Cover.

"You did not expect to be found out. No, you thought you had managed your theft too cleverly for that. You young scoundrel, I'll give you into custody though you are my wife's brother. Not a word, Chèrie; not a word in his defence. What I've said, I'll do."

Lord Madresfield glared vindictively at the two young creatures who cowered before him. He was not much over sixty, but he looked an old, old man, for his constitution had been shattered by dissipation in early life, and his health was wretched.

Five years ago he had taken it into his head to marry, and had selected the daughter of an old friend, who, ruined in health and in pocket, had been glad to force his seventeen-year-old girl into a marriage with the wealthy peer by way of provision for her future.

He had died shortly after the wedding, leaving his only other child, a lad of fourteen, to Lord Madresfield's care. Graham Le Mesurier found a home with his sister and her husband, but it was not a happy one.

Lord Madresfield's fancy for his wife soon gave place to indifference, and he never liked the boy, so he made their lives as miserable as he well could. Through Chèrie's devoted love for her brother he tortured her, and enjoyed her agony.

"Yes," he resumed, after gloating for a moment or two over the terror on the white faces before him, "I have made up my mind. I'm not going to be robbed with impunity. If Harland, my valet, had helped himself to my money I should send for the police. I shall do the same with you."

And with that he marched out of the room.

"Do—do you think—he—he means it, Graham?" faltered Chèrie after a pause.

The boy nodded gloomily.

"Old brute," he said, with emphasis, "I wish he were dead, I do. Why isn't he dead? He is always ill and messing about with quack medicines. I'd give him a dose if I dared. If only I were sure not to be found out, I'd put something in his medicine that would cure him of all complaints."

"Oh, don't talk so wildly," cried his sister. "You don't mean it, I know, but——"

"Don't I mean it, though? There are lots of chemicals about the house—your photographic things, for instance—a dose of which would soon put an end to him, and I'd have no compunctions about getting rid of him, if only for your sake. He's a brute to you, Chèrie."

All rights reserved.]

"Never mind that, dear. Only tell me—you did not take his money, did you?"

The lad looked at her remorsefully.

"I'm sorry, Chèrie, but—I did. It was only five pounds, and Desmond Fancourt put me up to it. I can't help fancying he told the old man about it, for how else it was found out I can't think."

Chèrie broke into heartrending sobs, and threw herself on a couch in an agony of grief. Graham knelt beside her, kissing her, and trying to comfort her.

"Don't cry, darling. I'm not worth your tears. I'm sick of this life, Chèrie, and I won't stay longer. I've been betting and getting into mischief—Desmond led me into it—but I'm going to turn over a new leaf. Leslie Atherton has promised to help me to get into something, and to-night—he is to dine and sleep here, I know—I'll ask him to do all he can to get me away from here at once."

Chèrie sat up, and fixed her sweet, mournful brown eyes on her brother.

"Oh, Graham, if you will be guided by Leslie, and never listen to Desmond, I shall not fear for you. Now I am going to Madresfield to plead for you. I know he will never prosecute my brother."

"If he does I swear I'll kill him," cried Graham.

Chèrie was right. Lord Madresfield had never had any intention of prosecuting his young brother-in-law, but it cost Chèrie a hard battle to gain assurance of this. Her husband poured out the vials of his wrath upon her, and abused her quite frantically.

His loud, screaming voice, raised to hysterical pitch, Chèrie's sobs of fear and grief, drew the attention of the servants, and two or three lingered round the door, half inclined to interfere, especially when the sound of a heavy blow was heard, followed by a low cry of pain.

But after that all was quiet, and Chèrie appeared at dinner in the evening, very pale, but composed, and looking lovelier then ever, though there was a great bruise on her snowy shoulder which had taxed her maid's ingenuity to conceal under a cloud of chiffon.

The only guests at dinner were Desmond Fancourt, Lord Madresfield's nephew and heir presumptive, and Leslie Atherton, a distant connection of the family. Both were handsome, distinguished-looking men, dark, tall, and thirty years of age.

Digitized by Google

Graham did not appear, and his sister longed for the evening to be over that she might relieve his mind with the assurance that Lord Madresfield had relented.

The old man retired early to rest, and after a little conversation with her guests, Chèrie pleaded a headache and went to her room.

Dismissing the maid she sat by the fire for an hour or so, sadly meditating on her shadowed life, until noticing that it was already past midnight, she went to her brother's room, tip-toeing past her husband's door, from which came the murmur of voices.

He was troubled with insomnia, and liked to have someone to talk to, so his valet, Harland, was often on duty in his master's room until daybreak.

Graham's door was locked, and no answer came to Chèrie's low tap and gentle call. She waited a little, and then went back to her room, resolved to wait till morning with her good news.

"My lady! My lady!" said a terrified voice in Chèrie's ear next morning. "Oh, my lady, wake."

"I am not asleep," returned Chèrie. "What is it, Robson?"

"It's something awful, my lady. Harland went in as usual to his lordship's room with the Benger's food he takes at seven o'clock and he found—oh, my lady!"

"Found what?" cried Chèrie. She had jumped out of bed, slipped into a dressing gown, and thrust her pretty white feet into slippers.

"His lordship is dead, my lady," said the maid, very solemnly.

"Dead!"

"And the doctor says my lord has been poisoned."

"Poisoned!" repeated Chèrie, and into her mind came her brother's threats of the day before. Could Graham have been driven to this terrible deed?

Eagerly she questioned Robson. Harland, it seemed, had at once, on finding his master dead, summoned Desmond Fancourt, the new Lord Madresfield, who had promptly undertaken the direction of affairs, and he, the doctor, and Leslie Atherton, and her brother were now in the death chamber, awaiting the arrival of the police.

Pale and shivering, Chèrie crept back to bed.

"I feel sick and ill, Robson," she whispered. "This is a fearful shock. Leave me to myself; I am best alone. No; I will have no brandy, no tea; nothing. Only leave me alone. Don't disturb me until I ring. I shall not be wanted. The direction of affairs is in other hands. My reign here is over."

Robson retired, weeping ostentatiously, and speedily forgot all about her mistress in the delicious excitement of a tragedy in the household.

The moment she was gone, Chèrie sprang out of bed once more, and began pacing the room in a storm of anguish. It was not grief for her husband that overwhelmed her; he had been a hard, merciless tyrant to her, and, though this sudden death shocked and awed her, she could not sorrow for him.

All her thoughts were for her brother. She never doubted that he had committed this terrible crime, and her one idea was to save him from its consequences. But how?

Married before her seventeenth birthday, doomed ever since to a life of seclusion by a cross-grained valetudinarian, Chèrie was, at twenty-two, as ignorant of the world and as simple-minded as a child of twelve.

It struck her that if she could draw suspicion on herself for a time, her brother would have an opportunity to escape, and, without forming any further plans, she resolved upon flight.

If she disappeared suspicion would rest upon her, and, while she was being pursued, Graham would have time to get away in safety.

It was not until late in the afternoon that Chèrie's flight was discovered. She had been inquired for, but her illness and desire for quiet, as reported by her maid, were so very natural under the circumstances that her wishes were respected, until the detective, whose professional services had been called in, asked to see her.

Robson was sent with a respectful message, but returned after a lengthened absence, in a great flurry.

"My lady's gone," she cried. "I've looked everywhere, and there's not a sign of her in all the house."

"Then," exclaimed Desmond Fancourt, or Lord Madresfield, as he now was, "the mystery is solved. Lady Madresfield is the murderess of her husband."

With the exception of her brother and of Leslie Atherton, this was the general opinion.

At the inquest, it appeared that Lord Madresfield and his wife had lived most unhappily together, that there had been a terrible quarrel on the night before his death, during which the husband had furiously struck his wife, that she had been seen by a belated servant, stealing down the corridor leading to Lord Madresfield's apartments long after midnight, and after she had dismissed her maid and ostensibly gone to bed.

It also appeared that, being an ardent photographer, the poison had been ready to her hand.

Again it appeared that Lord Madresfield was in the habit of frequently altering his will, and that one made some months before, when the young wife chanced to be high in favour, had left her, the estates being unentailed, practically everything he possessed.

Later, however, Lord Madresfield had made a fresh will, leaving everything to Desmond Fancourt, except a small annuity to his wife, to whom he showed the will, vowing it should be his last. This will could not be found.

With all this mass of evidence, coupled with the mute, but expressive evidence of her flight, it is scarcely surprising that the coroner's jury brought in the verdict of wilful murder against Charila, Lady Madresfield, and that a warrant was issued for her arrest.

But Charila, Lady Madresfield, seemed to have vanished into thin air. No out-door clothing had been missed, and yet, without them, she could not have gone far in that bleak November weather unremarked.

No one knew that an imbecile beggar-woman was in the habit of lurking in the grounds of Madresfield Towers for the purpose of attracting the attention of its kindhearted lady, and that from her last interview there she had gone away the poorer by her long cloak and battered sailor hat, and the richer by a goodly heap of silver.

* * * * *

Nell, the flower-girl, as she was known among others of her trade, tramped wearily along to take up an advantageous position at Westminster Bridge.

Perhaps a very close observer might have noted the signs of gentle birth in Nell's clear-cut, refined features, shell-like ears, and small, well-shapen hands and feet, but a ragged gown and apron, a faded shawl, and a battered, aggressive-looking straw hat do not lend distinction to the wearer, and the casual passer-by merely remarked that she was a very pretty girl.

Nell had had no luck all day. It was the end of March, and that turbulent month, having come in like a lamb, was going out in the most lion-like manner.

People did not care to stop and buy flowers in a cutting wind, and it was growing very late besides, so Nell looked up anxiously as a gentleman paused in front of her.

She had selected a lovely spray, and was about to proffer it when her blood turned to ice by a well-known voice exclaiming:

"By Heaven! I recognise you! You are Lady Madresfield. Murderess!"

It was Desmond Fancourt—the present Lord Madresfield.

She gazed at him, helpless, fascinated.

"Come with me," he said imperiously. "I must talk with you. There is a nook not far off, a little alley. Here it is. We can talk there without being remarked. Now tell me, how have you managed to escape justice so long? Where have you lived these past three months?"

"Why do you question me? What have I done?"

"What have you done, woman? You poisoned my poor, helpless old uncle, and then, terrified at what you had done, you ran away."

"I did not poison him," she forced from between her rigid lips. "Let me go. You have no right to keep me."

Digitized by Google

"I ought to give you into custody," he replied sternly. "Do you know that there is a warrant out for your arrest?"

"But I am innocent," she said simply.

"You'll find some difficulty in proving it. But, for the honour of the family, I'm not going to give you into custody. I'm going to take your future into my own hands. Will you meet me here to-morrow night, at midnight? You need not try to evade me, for if you do, I shall put the police on your track."

"I'll come," she promised. "But tell me, where is my brother?"

"Not far from here. He is sharing Atherton's chambers at present, I believe."

"Where?"

He told her, and, with another warning not to try to escape him, he turned away.

Graham Le Mesurier came swinging along towards home at a great pace, and was turning in at the door of the "Mansions," where he lived, when he nearly ran against a flower girl standing there. He gave one look into her face, and drew her swiftly into the shelter of the porch.

"Chèrie, my poor little sister!" he breathed. "Come upstairs quickly, dear. There's no one about. Here we are. Leslie, I have found her. I have found Chèrie."

Atherton started up in astonishment.

"Chèrie! In this disguise! Do you know you are suspected of murdering your husband?"

Chèrie sank wearily down on a low chair.

"Yes," she replied faintly. "I—I wanted them to suspect me."

"You wanted them to suspect you?" repeated Atherton in profound astonishment. "But why? We never doubted you, Graham and I. We know you are innocent."

She turned her sweet brown eyes on her brother's face, but it only expressed the tenderest sympathy.

"Why did you do it, dear?" he asked gently.

"I thought you—oh, Graham, I was afraid that you——"

"Good Heavens! You thought I was guilty?" he interrupted, aghast. "Chèrie, how could you?"

"You said—oh, you said—about poison," she faltered.

"My poor little self-sacrificing sister, you ought to have known me better. I did not mean a word I said. My dear, how pale you look! How you must have suffered!"

He had got out wine and sandwiches, and she ate ravenously, while the two men watched her with anxious eyes.

"I haven't had much food to-day," she said, attempting to smile, "but I feel better now, and will tell you all."

It was a very pathetic little tale, and brought tears to the eyes of both men. Then she told them of her encounter with the new Lord Madresfield, and of her promise to meet him again on the morrow.

"He's very bitter against you," said Graham; "and spoke of you in such terms after your flight was discovered that Leslie and I both quarrelled with him and have heard nothing of him since we left Madresfield Towers. You acted nobly, my dear sister, but yet, it was an act of madness."

"It was," she agreed sadly, "but at the time I thought it the right thing to do. How could I have doubted you, Graham? But who could have been guilty?"

"I have an idea," began Leslie, meditatively stroking his moustache; "not yet ripe enough to discuss, but still, an idea. I distrust Harland—your husband's valet—and believe he did not speak the truth at the inquest. I know where he is, and shall interview him the first thing to-morrow."

"Ought I to give myself up?" asked Chèrie, but Leslie shook his head.

"Not yet. Not until you've seen Madresfield again."

* * * * *

It was a wild night, dark and tempestuous. Chèrie shivered as she stood waiting Desmond's arrival, and shivered as she looked into his fierce, deadly pale face as he came up.

"I have made up my mind about you," he began abruptly. "For the honour of the name I will save you from public disgrace. You shall go abroad, but I will supply you with funds to live on in another name. But first, you must sign this confession of your crime which I have written out."

"I am innocent," said Chèrie, putting aside the paper, "and I have decided to stand my trial."

"You fool, if you do, nothing can save you from the gallows. You are the only one who had anything to gain by your husband's death. The evidence against you is overwhelming."

"You have some reason for wishing me out of the way," she retorted. "Perhaps, because if I am got rid of, you will be master of Madresfield Towers."

"I am that already. The missing will has turned up, the one leaving me everything, and you, only two hundred a year. You forgot that latest will when you murdered your husband. For you did it, you know."

"You villain, you did it yourself," cried the girl, in a flash of inspiration. "I see it all now. You murdered my husband. I know you did."

"You know too much," he said between his teeth, and in another moment he had her by the throat in an iron grasp that held her rigid, unable to move, or cry out, or draw a breath. Everything swam before her, and her senses failed her. Then the iron grip relaxed and she drew a long breath, and opened her eyes to see Madresfield struggling in the grasp of Atherton.

"You villain, you infernal villain," panted Leslie, "we were just in time to prevent another murder. Another, do you hear? Harland has confessed. Ha! you know what that means, do you? Graham, help; he'll get away."

There was a fierce struggle. Chèrie heard the frantic blowing of police whistles, cries, shouts, the noise of running feet, and then came the sound of a revolver shot, and Chèrie lost consciousness in a dead faint.

* * * * *

More than a year had passed since the trial of Lady Madresfield, for her husband's murder had provided a nine days' sensation for the public.

Desmond, Lord Madresfield had succeeded in wounding himself fatally, but he lived long enough to make a full confession of his guilt, and this, together with Harland's evidence, fully exonerated Chèrie.

Desmond confessed that, being in financial difficulties, and knowing that his uncle had made a will in his favour, he resolved to get rid of the old man before a fresh will could be made.

He at first arranged matters to cast suspicion on Graham Le Mesurier, but the opportune flight of Lady Madresfield had drawn it on herself and suited him even better.

He had administered the poison in a mixture his uncle took for his cough, and with Harland's knowledge, though Desmond contrived to make the man believe it was a harmless sleeping-draught which Lord Madresfield wished to try.

Afterwards Desmond lulled the valet's scruples by promising him a large sum of money. Desmond had hidden the will in his favour, wishing to make the case still stronger against Chèrie, and meaning to produce it when it suited his purpose.

It was a sweet, fair June day, as Chèrie, once more mistress of Madresfield Towers, paced the terrace, waiting the arrival of her affianced lover, soon to be her husband, Leslie Atherton.

Her eyes brightened as she saw him approaching, and her whole face beamed such a welcome that she scarcely needed to speak. The lovely scene lay smiling before them bathed in "the light that never was on land or sea," and as they stood together looking out on the fair prospect, Chèrie's heart thrilled with joy.

"How bright everything looks!" she murmured. "There is not a shadow anywhere."

"And the shadow has been lifted from your life, sweetheart," he said tenderly. "All your life shall be bright from henceforth, bright as my love can make it."

She raised her eyes to his face with a look of touching love and confidence.

"Ah, yes, Leslie," she said, "the shadow is gone from my life for evermore. Henceforth, I live in the sunshine—the sunshine of your love."

Vera Serkoff.

Digitized by Google

THE USURPER.

The Story of What a Baby Did.

Warren Billings looked yearningly across the breakfast-table at his young wife, and his wife looked tenderly at the baby she was holding. A year ago Billings could have felt sure that his wife was looking back at him across the table, looking with love and pride, but now she looked only at the child.

The cloth was still snowy, the coffee-pot was without a speck, the china was of the daintiest, but Billings, who used to feel his wife's especial care for him in the perfection of the table, now knew he owed its present perfection to a well-trained maid.

As he gazed searchingly at his wife, he realised that the beauty of her face had changed. Her radiant colour had faded, and the face she now bent so caressingly over the child was gentle and wan.

"Suppose you let the nurse take baby, Marie?" he said quietly. "I have something important to tell you."

"Hush, baby! Hush, darling!" said the young mother, soothing the fretful child with a concentrated tenderness that made Billings realise how much apart he was from his wife's thoughts. "I'll hold baby, Warren, never mind calling the nurse."

"I have won the Dixon case," he said tersely. The Dixon case was the battle this strong young man had been fighting to win a high place at the bar. It had been their common ambition. Over its vicissitudes she, too, had watched breathlessly, and for its winning she had prayed—before the child had come. But, when at last victory had come, he, single-handed, had won it; for the baby had come to Marie.

"Oh, Warren!" she cried.

Billings hastily pushed back his chair to come to her, but the baby wailed peevishly. Instantly his wife's head was bent low over the child, and she thought only to comfort that which stirred against her breast. The radiance died out of her face, leaving it sweetly troubled—the face of a Madonna.

"I am afraid baby is not quite well, Warren!" she said hastily. "You must ask Doctor Blake to call as you go to the office."

"I have won the Dixon case, Marie," he repeated doggedly, coming no further round the table.

"I am so glad for you, dear," she said, without looking up. "It means a lot for you, doesn't it?"

"A lot for us," he broke in almost roughly. "It means a fee of one thousand pounds, and other important cases. It means for us whatever you may want it to mean, Marie. I had hoped that it would mean a trip to the Continent for you and me this summer. I am tired. I had planned to wander once more over the journey we made four years ago. Do you remember, Marie?"

"Our wedding journey," she said softly. Billings came to his wife and bent over her. But the thought of that journey moved some impulse in her that made her crush the child in her arms till it cried fretfully. "But I couldn't leave baby, Warren," she added hastily.

Billings straightened up and turned away. "You could leave the child with its grandmother for a couple of months," he said. "Baby is a year old now, and is quite well."

"Oh, I couldn't leave baby!" she repeated with great conviction.

"Very well," said Billings, and he left the dining-room without looking at her again. "I shall dine at the club to-night," he called from the hall.

She looked up from the child, vaguely disturbed. She hesitated, then called to the nurse, "Take baby a moment," she said, then hastened into the hall. Billings had gone. "But he never kissed me," she said, somewhat troubled; then she went back to the child.

Billings was a favourite with Matthews, the head waiter at the club. The dinner Matthews set before him was a lure, as Billings seldom dined at the club of late years. But Billings dined in an absent-minded way that cut Matthews to the heart.

Several men strolled over to congratulate Billings on winning the Dixon case, but none of them felt inclined to join him at dinner that night.

"Billings is going to seed," growled old Baldwin, as he came back to the party at his own table. "He stays at home too much."

When Matthews had brought Billings his coat, Billings marched away without remembering the tip that he never had forgotten before. Matthews mourned not the tip, but the sorrow that evidently had come to Billings.

It was late that night when his cab left Billings at his own door. He turned his latch-key, and went upstairs very softly.

On the landing he stood irresolute for a moment, then opened the door to his dressing-room, which had once been devoted to his use, but now a brass crib, canopied with lace, stood where the dressing-table had been, and the furnishings of the room were the useful and convenient things of a nursery.

The door to their bedroom was open, and the room was lighted with the glow of a little night lamp. Billings walked quietly to this door and looked in.

He saw the beautiful profile of his wife nestled against a pillow. He noted the long lashes curving from her closed eyelids, a little hollow in the smooth of her cheek, and the plaintive droop of her mouth.

He saw the rounded white of her throat and the rise and fall of her bosom beneath lace and silk. One loose sleeve had slipped back on the arm that lay outside the coverlet. He noticed how fragile the wrist seemed.

Billings looked till his heart ached. From the day he first had seen Marie he had measured the success of his life by the love he could win from her. In all his strong living the ambition to be loved greatly by this beautiful woman dominated every other desire.

The woman sleeping there so quietly as he yearned over her was the shrine at which he worshipped with perfect willingness to sacrifice whatever offering might be acceptable to her, so that she loved him greatly, so that she chose him over again before all other things life could offer her. Warren Billings' wife was Warren Billings' passion, and he was a passionate man.

Turning, he looked at the crib, then back to his wife; he saw the shadow of a little child grow large between them. Billings loved his child as men love babies, but he loved his wife even more because of the suffering this child had brought to her; but she loved the little life that had made her suffer. A sense of injustice struggled with his loneliness as he knelt beside the crib.

"Baby! Baby!" he said softly. "Give me back my dear wife. I love her more than you love her, baby. I love her with a grown man's love, and you love her just because she feeds you and rocks you to sleep. She is only a nurse to you, baby, but she was my comrade until you came. You have taken my goddess to make her your nurse.

Digitized by Google

"I cannot hate you, baby, you are such a helpless little chap; but sometimes I wish you were a man and weighed more than I do. Yet you are stronger than I, little one, for your cries make her forget my whispers, and the clutch of your tiny fingers is stronger than the might of my arms.

"No, I cannot find it in my heart to hate you, though you have made me a lonely man before my time. You have only to cry with a fancied pain, and she cannot hear that I have won the Dixon case. It used to be our Dixon case before you dethroned me. Give me back the heart of my wife, little son!"

The baby stirred fretfully, and Billings starting to his feet, glanced hastily over his shoulder. The long lashes still fringed his wife's eyes. He stole to the bed and kissed her white arm reverently. Then he went softly from the room.

In the library he turned up the lamp on his desk, and threw himself wearily into a great leather chair.

He was tired, tired from the last strain of his legal battle, tired of arguing against the dreariness that had grown on him during the last few months.

He leant back in the great chair, smoked moodily for a while and fell asleep.

The light at his elbow shone full on his clean-cut face, bringing out its strength and revealing its sadness too. Sleep strips off all disguises which the will imposes.

Sleep and the light shining so steadfastly on his unshrinking face brought out deep lines about the mouth and eyes; he looked haggard.

All this Marie Billings saw as she stood in the doorway looking at him with misty eyes. Her cheeks were flushed and her bosom rose and fell tumultuously beneath the silk and lace of her gown.

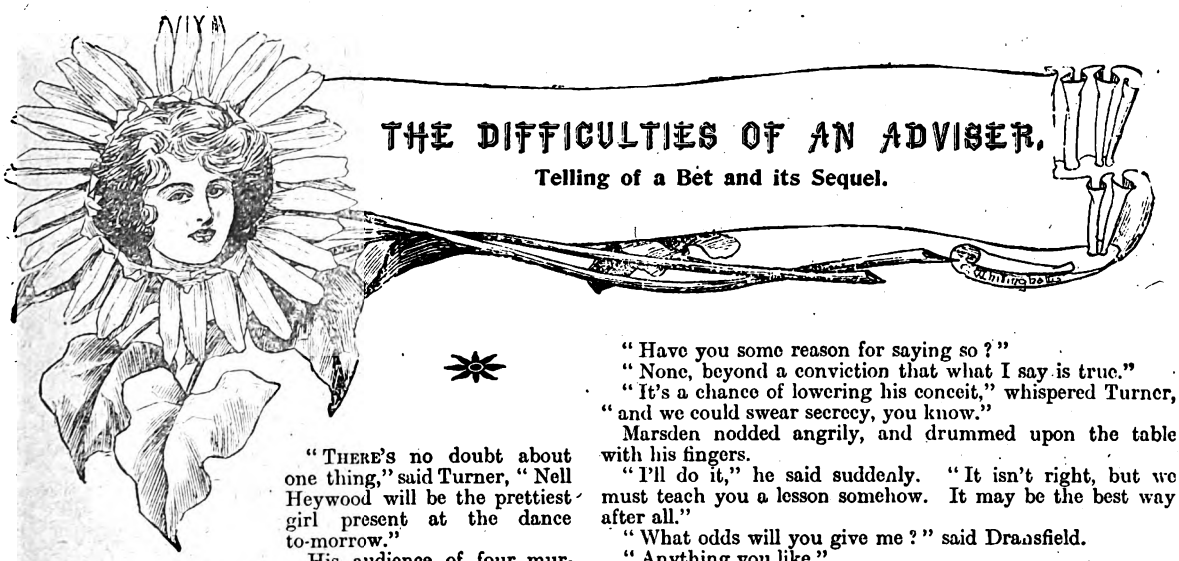
Her face was radiant with love and tenderness as she hastened to him in the silence and knelt beside his chair. She hastily put her bare arms about him; drawing herself close to him, she kissed him passionately. So Warren Billings awoke to the love of his wife.

"I want to go on the Continent with you, dear," she was saying, half crying. "I want to tell you how proud I am of your winning the Dixon case—our Dixon case.

"I want to tie your crumpled tie, dear, as I used to tie it before I neglected you so shamefully. But don't hate baby, dear, because baby only makes me love you more and better. When I love baby, Warren, I love you. I did not realise that a man might not understand. Now kiss me."

Billings kissed his wife and kissed her again. "Now let's go and kiss that blessed baby," he said at last.

A. C. McKenzie.



THE DIFFICULTIES OF AN ADVISER.

Telling of a Bet and its Sequel.

"There's no doubt about one thing," said Turner, "Nell Heywood will be the prettiest girl present at the dance to-morrow."

His audience of four murmured agreement, and cast curious glances at one of the party, who was known to be desperately in love with the girl mentioned.

"That is so," said Dransfield, "are you going to monopolise her, Marsden?"

"Perhaps you think you could cut him out?" suggested one of the others.

"I think she'd say 'Yes,' if I asked her."

"That's a lie," cried Marsden fiercely, "and, what's more, it's a most caddish remark."

"It could easily be proved or disproved," said Turner.

"Yes—if you make it worth my while," interrupted Dransfield.

"Do you actually suggest that we bet upon it?"

"Yes," he answered, his little eyes shining. "You don't expect me to get engaged to a girl I don't care twopence about for nothing. I should have to dance attendance on her for some time before I could make an excuse to break the engagement."

"It would be abominable—it would be an insult to the girl," said Marsden.

"It would prove my words."

"Have you some reason for saying so?"

"None, beyond a conviction that what I say is true."

"It's a chance of lowering his conceit," whispered Turner, "and we could swear secrecy, you know."

Marsden nodded angrily, and drummed upon the table with his fingers.

"I'll do it," he said suddenly. "It isn't right, but we must teach you a lesson somehow. It may be the best way after all."

"What odds will you give me?" said Dransfield.

"Anything you like."

"Four to one," suggested Turner. "A sovereign to five shillings."

"That will suit me," said Dransfield. "Do you agree?"

"Yes," answered Marsden curtly, "and your money shall go into the river; I won't touch it."

"A sovereign you pay me if she says 'Yes'?"

"If I thought there was any likelihood of your winning, I'd declare the bet off now, and you might keep the sovereign as penalty."

"No, no," cried Turner, "the bet is on or off properly."

"Then let it be on," said Dransfield carelessly. "I daresay I shall lose, and it doesn't matter much either way."

Then the four friends swore secrecy, and separated.

* * * * * *

"I think this is our dance?" said Marsden to Nell Heywood. "If I may have the pleasure."

She rose and took his arm, and they moved down the room together.

"Do you mind if we sit out?" she asked.

"Not at all. Here, or in the next room?"

"In the next room," she answered, and he felt her arm tremble as she spoke.

Digitized by Google

He led the way towards the conservatory, with its cunningly disposed palms and subdued light. Here, he had proposed to her and been refused six months previously, and at the memory his heart burnt within him.

"Do you particularly wish to go into the next room?" he asked. "It's very quiet—the place is in semi-darkness."

"I should like to go if you don't mind."

"I do mind," he whispered passionately. "Do you remember what happened there? Let us stay with the crowd. Have you no heart? I can't tell you. The memory of our last meeting in that room would force me to speak again—and I must not."

"You must not? But take me there, won't you? I don't ask you lightly, Jack. I have something to tell you."

They walked into the conservatory in silence. When they reached the doorway, he was turning to the right, but she pulled his arm gently forward, and led him to the seats he wished above everything else to avoid.

"This is the very same corner," he said. "What is it you want to tell me?"

"You are unkind, Jack."

"I didn't mean to be unkind, or anything else that might cause you a moment's trouble," he whispered, "but you have brought me here, and you don't know——"

"I know what you are thinking about," she answered reproachfully. "Do you really think I have no heart? Do you think that I cannot remember as well as you?"

"I am sorry," he said doggedly. "But you have not told me yet."

She drew herself a little further away from him and used her fan with an indignant energy for a minute.

"It is soon told," she murmured, trying in vain to keep her voice steady. "Your friend Dransfield has asked me to marry him."

"Why do you tell me this?" he said hoarsely. "What have I to do with the matter?"

"I told you about it in order to ask your advice."

"You want my advice?"

"As to whether I shall say 'Yes' or 'No' to him."

The net was closing in upon Marsden. This utterly unforeseen result of the bet staggered him. What could he say to her? How could he honestly answer her question? He wished with every fibre of his being that he had never made the bet, but it was too late to draw back now.

"Why do you ask me?" he said evasively.

"Because I can trust you, Jack, and still more because I remember what we spoke about here six months ago."

"That is done with. It has nothing to do with the present matter."

"No, not if your heart has changed since then."

"It will never change," he said, with a burst of passion; "and you know it, but I must not talk further about that."

"Have I forbidden you?" she whispered gently.

"I understood so, your refusal was definite."

"Six months ago," she said, as though speaking to herself.

"Why do you ask me about Dransfield's proposal?" he asked, trying hard to restrain himself.

"Because I will follow your advice—whatever it may be."

"I cannot advise you."

"I say again that I will do what you wish, Jack—whatever it may be."

"And I say again that I can't advise you. Your mother—ask anybody but me. Oh, I would give my life for you, Nell, a hundred times over, but I can't tell you to say 'Yes' or 'No' to this proposal."

"I can't say more than I have said," she murmured, almost inaudibly; "I will marry whom you wish, Jack—dear——"

"If you really care for Dransfield?"

"Come," she said, in a clear, ringing voice; "let us go back to the ballroom. They will think we are lost."

* * * * *

The next evening Jack Marsden received an unexpected visit from Dransfield.

"I'm glad to see you," he said grimly; "what do you propose to do about this miserable business?"

"I have to pay you five shillings first," replied his visitor, who looked rather crestfallen.

"Keep it. I wouldn't take such money with a pair of tongs," growled Jack, and Dransfield slipped the coins hurriedly back into his pocket with a deprecating smile.

"Please yourself, of course. But look here, Marsden, I want to propose a bargain. Only four of us know about this bet and only you and I know that it has been decided."

"Well?"

"Why shouldn't we let the knowledge remain between you and me? We can tell Turner and Clayton that we have decided to call the bet off, and that no money has been paid on either side."

"A very good idea. It will prevent the possibility of Miss Heywood's name being gossipped about."

"Oh, it isn't that exactly," explained Dransfield, "only as I have not won I don't care for those other fellows to know about it."

"Oh, that's your idea," said Jack contemptuously. "Anyhow, it's a bargain."

After his visitor had gone, Jack put on his considering cap and reviewed the situation as it now appeared. Various remarks made by Nell to him on the previous evening recurred to his memory, but with new meaning.

Every thought that came into his mind brought hope and left behind a doubt, so that after half an hour he was exactly where he began. Then he struck out vigorously in a new direction. "I'll go and ask her," he said.

His timid knock at the door produced Mrs. Heywood, who was in a state of complacent delight. She ushered her visitor into the drawing-room on false pretences and then blandly informed him that Nell was out.

"I suppose you've heard the news," she added.

Jack admitted ignorance.

"About Nell's engagement?"

"What! No, I hadn't heard that, Mrs. Heywood. May I inquire?"

"I can't tell you anything more," said the good lady pleasantly. "It only happened last evening, and Nell asked me not to tell anyone. But here she comes, you can ask her yourself if you like."

Nell walked into the room a moment later, looking prettier than ever. Jack stared at her with a wistful admiration, as he muttered the usual commonplaces. Who was the successful man, he wondered bitterly. Had she changed her mind and accepted Dransfield after all, or was it some total outsider?

"Will you allow me to congratulate you," he said quietly. Mrs. Heywood disappeared, and they were alone.

"Upon what?" said Nell.

"Upon your engagement."

"I am not engaged," she answered, "I only told mother that Mr. Dransfield had proposed to me, and I told you that, Jack."

"And then you asked for my advice?"

"Yes, and you wished me to marry him."

"I wished you? I said I could not advise you either way."

"It was the same thing," said Nell, almost bitterly.

"You would not say anything, you were indifferent."

"I could not then, my lips were sealed, but now——"

She was staring intently at the carpet, drawing imaginary lines with one foot. Jack came closer and took her hand and she did not resist.

"Do you still wish me to advise you, Nell?"

"Yes, and I will——"

"You promise to follow my advice."

"Yes." If imaginary lines were real the carpet would have been a network by this time. Jack came closer still so that her hair brushed his cheek. "My advice is," he murmured, "that you should forget everybody else and become my wife."

She turned half way round as he spoke until at the last word her face was hidden against his shoulder. There was silence for a moment and then: "Jack, dear," she whispered reproachfully; "why didn't you advise me this way last night?"

Wal Frank.

Digitized by Google

GREAT NEW SERIES.

Confessions of a Self-made Girl

The writer of these Confessions relates in this series of articles the true story of her life, from the time when she left Cornwall, an unsophisticated but ambitious girl, until she made her name and fortune. Her name is well known to you.

[For the purposes of these Confessions I am calling myself Maud Cardew, as my real name is too well known for me to wish to make the story of my life public in this manner.]

The Principals in the Story.

MAUD CARDEW.—The self-made girl.

HON. ROBERT LESTRANGE. (Commonly known as Bobbie.)

REGINALD (DI) NORTHCOTE.

Men who had helped her to come to London and befriended her on her arrival.

I Return From Switzerland.

It began with the Duke coming up to me in the hall next morning quite naturally, and accosting me as if nothing had happened.

"I hope you slept well," he said, "and that your head is better?"

For answer I turned my back on him, and walked across to the door and out into the snow. To my surprise and indignation he had the audacity to follow, and as I could not ignominiously race him up the mountain, I was obliged to let him catch me up.

"I know you are thinking I've got a consummate cheek, Miss Cardew, and various other uncomplimentary things," he began, "but honestly it is not worth while to quarrel. To tell you the plain truth I was only trying a little experiment on you last night, and now I humbly beg your pardon. I behaved like a cad. But I did not in the least intend to insult you; I only wanted to know how you took that sort of thing.

"The last day or two I have been considerably puzzled to reconcile you, as I seem to know you, and your friendship with Lady Filby and her companions. The notion of testing you took my fancy; you can't think how glad I was that you were so angry, although it made me feel a beast. But you ought to forgive me, because you must admit you have laid yourself rather open to that sort of thing in travelling with Lady Filby."

"But I believe in Lady Filby," I said resolutely.

"Good Heavens!" he exclaimed, in a low, incredulous voice. "You believe in Lady Filby!"

I was silent, and we walked on a few paces

"But everyone knows what she is," he said at last, in a perplexed voice, "surely you have friends."

"Yes, but I would not listen to them," I interrupted.

"That was a pity," he said seriously, and was again silent.

"Might I ask if you believe in the Prince and Count as honourable, straightforward men also?" he asked presently.

"It is different with men," I replied sarcastically, "one never expects anything of them."

"Still it is hardly worth while to court unpleasantness."

"I can take care of myself," haughtily.

"Yes, I believe you can," he said. "But if I were you I would not run risks of getting into an awkward place for nothing. If anything went wrong, you see, you might be called upon as a witness, and it would not be nice to be mixed up in that set at all.

"I don't want to shock your susceptibilities, but, Lady Filby, or Lady Fitzclarence, will either of them discredit a girl by their company. If you won't believe your friends at home, you can believe me.

"Jack Filby used to be a great friend of mine, and I happen to know it was for their child's sake he did not show her up. He had a singing master, a subordinate officer on a passenger ship, and an Indian prince named Kia to choose from."

Growing hot and cold all over, and on the point of tears, I quickened my steps almost to a run, but he had not finished yet.

"I do not know why Lady Fitzclarence's husband does not get a separation from her," he said; "but I daresay it's too much trouble. And as for Miss Delaware, also of your party, I can only assure you that no man with a grain of sense would dream of giving her his name."

I stood still suddenly with a gasp of horror.

"And you thought I—was—another?" I breathed.

"No, I did not think so," he answered at once; "but I could not understand how you came to be of the party."

"Oh, it is really all my own fault," I cried. "I deserve to suffer for it. I must return to town at once."

"If I were you I would not be too abrupt," he counselled. "Wire to someone to wire for you, it often saves a lot of bother."

"Perhaps I had better consult Mr. Donovan," I said anxiously.

He looked at me with keen scrutiny, and then remarked in his usual cool way, "I had almost concluded that Mr. Donovan was the attraction."

I flushed angrily.

"Then you can consider yourself mistaken," I almost snapped. "At the same time I dare swear he is as far apart from the others as the poles."

Digitized by Google

"I had observed he was a superior being," he said, with that delicate sneer of his, "but why is he here?"

"I don't know," I replied, "except—except——" as a sudden light dawned upon me, "I believe I asked him to come."

"Ah!" significantly, "that would account for a great deal."

"We could both get a wire from the theatre," I said, not heeding him.

"And return together?" he asked, somewhat pointedly.

"Yes, why not?" and I faced him squarely.

He shrugged his shoulders.

"Oh, no reason at all," he said, in a way that made me want to shake him, "none whatever." Then he added, "I am travelling to England myself to-morrow, perhaps you will accept our joint escort?"

I said I would ask Mr. Donovan, and we returned to the hotel.

We reached the door just as Lady Filby came up a path in the opposite direction, and I was surprised to see her alone. As she passed us she threw a glance of such vindictive hatred at me that I shrank a moment involuntarily. A second later Lady Fitzclarence appeared with the German count, and judging from her expression, she, too, had passed none too pleasant a morning.

"I hope you have had a nice walk," she said to me sarcastically, "I daresay you found the Duke's naughty tales and glaring flatteries very entertaining."

"I have not any recollection of either," I replied carelessly, "so I think he must have saved them all for you."

"We have been discussing Society in connection with the visitors' list at Grindelwald," said the Duke, thrusting his hands in his pockets with an expression of amusement. "It was really much more entertaining, and open to developments than you might imagine."

Lady Fitzclarence flushed angrily; but with a pretence at good fellowship, patted him on the cheek and remarked—

"Ah, Pip, you do love to try to be sarcastic, don't you?"

Then she, too, flung a somewhat vindictive glance at me before she vanished.

On my way down to lunch a little later I met Yorke Donovan hastening to his room, looking very much disturbed. He stopped me, and without any preliminary exclaimed in a low voice—

"Could you be ready to return to England to-morrow morning?"

"Yes," I said at once. "Why?"

"Meet me outside the English church at two," was all he answered, and hurried on upstairs.

When I joined him he did not speak at first of what had happened, but led the way along the Interlaken road at a pretty stiff pace. Presently, however, he dived straight into the subject.

"I can't tell you much now," he said, "but certain things have come to light this morning that make it impossible for you to remain in Lady Filby's company."

I waited, and presently he added—

"I—I—am afraid I have been much to blame in not finding out sooner."

"But how could you?" I asked. "Did you know anything?"

"I knew there was talk, of course; but I did not pay much attention to it, and, besides, I wanted very much to be here with you. But it was a mistake to come. If you will allow me, I will take you back to England to-morrow."

"The Duke is leaving also," I said, "we can all travel together. I think we had better wire for someone to wire for us."

"Yes, that is a good idea," he said at once. Then he added significantly, "I see you were in a measure prepared for this sudden move?".

"Yes," I said simply, "I was."

He made no further comment, and we tramped along the crisp snow in silence.

I was glad he was silent. I wanted to drink in the loveliness of that winter Alpine scenery, to the exclusion of all else, for the brief while it was possible.

Giant pines spread out snow-laden arms above us, a white carpet of unspeakable purity lay around, blazing suddenly into a cloth of diamonds wherever the sunbeams could find a way through the maze of branches.

Overhead was the deep blue vault of the heavens, bluer than any words can express in that keen atmosphere, pierced here and there with snow-capped peaks rearing their lordly heads above the "littlenesses" of the world. The very silence was a breathing majesty—everything above and around a white radiance of purity.

I tried to forget—I tried to lose myself. My whole being strove upwards, one with those dazzling peaks pointing ever, in storm and sunshine, to the steadfast heavens.

How little, oh, how little, seemed the glare of the footlights, the shouts of applause, the rôle of the theatrical conqueror, beside the sublime immutability of these snow-clad mountains. Then it all came back to me—the memory of the morning.

"How can they? Ah, how can they?" I breathed, in a low, passion-strung voice. "In the midst of all this!—in the midst of such unspeakable grandeur—to stoop and grovel in the mud."

"Yes, yes, that is just it," my companion exclaimed tersely. "Here—surely—one might at least be pure. And yet it was here—in such a spot as this—only to-day——" he stopped short, and caught his breath, relapsing at once into silence.

I do not know what it was that had so upset him, except that it concerned Lady Filby, but he did not come in to dinner that evening, nor join us afterwards. Lady Filby evidently chose to think it was my doing, and vented her anger in every little spite possible.

I had made up my mind to retire directly the meal was over, but a veiled intimation that I was going to look for him held me tied, undecided what to do. Then Lady Fitzclarence and the Duke and one or two others joined us, and my way of escape was practically barred.

We were sitting listening to the Duke, who was entertaining us with some of his experiences big game shooting in India, when Lady Filby broke in with—

"Now let someone else tell us of their experiences. You, Maud," with a little harsh laugh, "you must have had some highly entertaining adventures on the stage."

"Nothing very particular," I replied. "Certainly not half so entertaining as the Duke's."

"Oh, come now, I don't believe that!" she said. "What about that motor ride with Cecil Trevor when the motor broke down at night in a little village, miles from anywhere? I'm sure that would make a highly interesting anecdote," and she laughed in a way that made my face burn, Lady Fitzclarence joining in, and all eyes fixing upon me.

For a second I felt dumb with mortification and anger, but I was not capable of acting only on the stage, and played my part now.

"Oh, that!" I said laughingly, "that certainly was rather awkward, but not in the least entertaining. Cecil Trevor and I were both in such bad tempers we could scarcely speak a civil word to each other. We simply went to the nearest inn, ate a big supper in solemn silence, and parted very bad friends."

"Oh, I daresay!" put in Lady Filby spitefully; but I pretended not to hear, and went on:

Digitized by Google

"The next morning I went to town by train, and he returned later with the wretched motor, and I never went out with him again."

"Only to little dinners, I suppose," said Lady Fitzclarence pointedly.

I took no notice; the attack was too transparent to parry, so I maintained a haughty silence.

"You know you are such a saint, Maud," said Lady Filby; "it does one good to hear little stories—well, what one might call 'risqué,' about you."

"Yes," chimed in Lady Fitzclarence, "and there's a lovely one in which a gipsy girl is mixed up—do let us have it?"

I don't quite know what I did, but almost instantly the Duke, who was sitting next to me, got up in a way that tipped his chair over backwards with a good deal of clatter, during which, and while picking it up, he managed to say to me in an undertone:

"Whatever you do, don't lose your temper."

I was grateful to him, partly because it showed me he took their spite for what it was worth, and partly because it made me feel I had a friend near.

"I will tell the story of the gipsy girl," I said quietly, "if every lady present will undertake to explain whatever rumour against herself the rest of the company shall agree to fix on."

"Oh, by Jove!" exclaimed the Duke with enjoyment. "This is no place for me!" while Lady Filby flushed an angry red, and Lady Fitzclarence burst out laughing.

"Come, Betty!" she cried. "Let's begin with the singing-master."

I got up with a feeling of indignation that almost suffocated me.

"I am going out," I said abruptly; "there is something in the atmosphere of this room that positively chokes me."

"Really scandalous, isn't it?" said Lady Fitzclarence mischievously. She always made a jest of everything all her life, and had at least the merit of being honest about herself, whereas I was by no means the only one Lady Filby had deceived by her clever assumption of childlike innocence.

"Most contaminating, I should think," she said now spitefully; "beyond the leavening of even your spotlessness."

Still in a white heat of indignation I pulled on my snow shoes, wrapped myself in my golf cape, and stepped out into the wonderful, glistening world of mountains and snow. In a few seconds, offering no apology for his presence, in the most matter-of-fact way imaginable, the Duke joined me.

I said nothing, but tramped on through the crisp snow, feeling relief in the mere act of walking.

"Awful cats, women!" was his first remark.

"I don't know what I have done to upset them," I said.

"Phew!" and he whistled softly. "It's plain enough. One has set her heart on our handsome actor, who persists in keeping his eyes and his prettiest attentions for you, and the other"—he shrugged his shoulders—"well, everyone doesn't look upon dukes as dust and ashes, you know."

Something made me turn to him suddenly, and somehow, his fair, delicately-chiselled face looked strangely attractive in the moonlight, in spite of its womanishness.

"Why are you here with them, knowing all that you know?" I asked, awakened to the pity of it.

Again he shrugged his shoulders in that careless way of his.

"Oh, even Dukes can't always be seeking new fields to conquer," callously.

"But it is so poor!" I cried. "Can't you see just how paltry it all is?"

He looked at me from under half-veiled eyes, with a little amused twitching at his lips. Then he spread out his hands with another careless shrug.

"It is the way of the world," he said, "and I, for one, find it a pleasant enough way."

"It makes me tired," I said, feeling suddenly bowed as if under a weight of years, at the knowledge of the evil in the world. "I think I am sorry I ever left my home to win success. I would like to see things again as I used to see them—full of beauty, and hope, and achievement."

"You mean you would like to go back to your first illusions?"

I was silent, and presently he drew from me all about my old home, and my descent upon London in search of fame.

Then he asked abruptly:

"Where is it going to end? Have you a goal?"

For one moment I was nonplussed. I felt him watching me keenly, and the blood crept over my neck and face. I looked at the mountains, and before their calm greatness I could not lie.

"I had a goal last week," I said at last; "I am not sure if it is the same to-day."

He did not answer at once, but remained silently gazing at the scenery.

"There are not many goals open to dukes," he said thoughtfully.

"There is always your country!" I exclaimed.

He smiled with that fine sneer of his.

"An old woman's tale," he said. "I have not the slightest ambition to be mixed up in the general jumble known as one's country."

"You might improve it all round," I suggested, with sarcasm.

"That would be a pity," he replied; "it is really a most laughable farce at present, and very harmless."

"If I were a Duke," I said, "I would pretend to be a poor man and win love."

"Not worth it," he sneered. "A lot of discomfort for a mere fancy."

"Then you don't believe in love?"

"Certainly not. Every girl is biassed by her desire for an establishment, and naturally the best of its kind procurable."

I was silent.

"Yet there must be something behind the majesty of the mountains," I said musingly. "Something that has a place in human souls also. It is often difficult to believe in love in London. It is not so here."

He watched me with a strange expression in his eyes but made no comment; and slowly we returned homewards.

The next morning he, Yorke Donovan, and I returned to England. A few days later, as I stood toying with some flowers my maid came to tell me Mr. Northcote was in the drawing-room; and, bracing myself up, I went to my dreaded ordeal with Di.

"Have you come to triumph?" I asked him, feeling it was only what I deserved.

"Have I ever done so?" he said, and I felt the rebuke. It humbled me more than anything.

"You were right all through," I said. "You always are. Yet, somehow, you invariably make me act against my better judgment. I wonder why?"

"Do I?" he asked.

And I answered him truthfully: "Always."

He grew thoughtful, and getting up walked to the window. When he turned again his eye fell on a lovely bouquet, the spoils of the previous evening.

"These tell their own tale," he said; "these and the critics. Beyond doubt you have the world at your feet. I wonder, are you satisfied?"

I did not reply, thinking of a certain talk under the stars my last night at Grindelwald.

"May I ask who gave them?" he said.

"The Duke of Midlandshire," I answered, and he seemed surprised.

"I thought he was abroad," he remarked.

"He was at Grindel-

Digitized by Google

wald," I told him, "and he returned to England with Yorke Donovan and me."

He walked again to the window.

Suddenly he wheeled round.

"You did not tell me," he said—"are you satisfied?"

"I don't know," I answered slowly. "I am hoping there is still the best to come."

When he had gone the Duke came, and evidently they met on the step.

"So you know Di Northcote?" said the latter, establishing himself in an armchair much as Bobbie would have done.

"I have known him ever since I came to London. Why?"

"Strange chap! Half the girls in London would almost give their heads to marry him."

"I don't think so," I said, with somewhat undue resoluteness.

"It's a fact, all the same. He is one of the last men in the world likely to marry, and yet every woman, more or less, wants to marry him."

"But why?"

He shrugged his shoulders in the old way. "Preserve me," he murmured, "from ever having to find reasons for the inclinations of your sex. As a rule they have no reasons. Possibly there is something in the fact that he is a man who could not dissemble, and that must be rather a novelty for your sex in its intercourse with ours."

I did not reply, not being in the mood for repartee. I wanted to think about Di, without knowing why. Yet I was conscious that my goal was before me, and that if I would win it I ought to be playing my part.

I was startled by one of the abrupt, audacious questions the Duke was so fond of asking.

"Why don't you marry Bobbie Lestrange?" said he.

I flushed a little indignantly as I replied:

"Really, Duke, you are somewhat curious concerning my affairs."

"It's only what they're asking in all the clubs," he remarked coolly. "Not high enough position, perhaps?" he continued, searing me with his unsparing candour.

"Is that the conclusion you have drawn from observations of my actions and words?" I asked coldly.

"Not yours exactly," he answered, "but anyone's in your position."

Bobbie's open scorn and Di's veiled sarcasm had never hit me as did the Duke's candour now. But I could not help liking him for it, and being drawn to a similar frankness. I got up and moved about restlessly, while he sat quietly watching, and at last I said:

"I used to be like that—the same as all the rest; I believe I was like it last week. But I'm not now. I don't know why; something seems to have happened that has turned everything upside down, and I do not recognise my own views and feelings."

"I'm glad to hear you say that," he said, "for I have come here to-day to ask you to be my wife."

(Next Tuesday I will tell you of the answer I gave to the Duke.)

Lessee: "That sailors' chorus was awful! What was the matter?" Stage Manager: "The tars couldn't get the right pitch."

"I think the picture lacks atmosphere," said the kindly critic. "Fact is," said the artist, "I had a hard time raising the wind while I was painting."

"I hear you were mixed up in a rather shady transaction last week." "I cannot tell a lie. I was. I bought a couple of blinds for the kitchen windows."

"How do you like your new mamma, Johnny?" asked his uncle. "Oh, pretty well. I ate a pot of jam yesterday, and she put the blame on the servants."

Sympathising London Friend: "Where were the remains of your late husband interred?" Russian Widow (sadly): "There were no remains: he—he—met—a—bear."

Your Editor Chats.

The sixth list of sentences in the competition will be found on page 559. Six more lists will appear, making twelve in all.

From the majority of letters I have received it is very evident that readers have not read the conditions of the competition carefully. Some of the questions they ask in connection with it are very absurd. It will save a great deal of unnecessary waste of time on both your and my parts, if you will consider the conditions very thoroughly before writing to me regarding points on which you are doubtful in your own minds.

Below will be found some questions asked by readers this week, together with my replies:—

Question: If the name of a station consists of two or more words, will all the words be contained in the sentence, or only one of them?

Answer: The complete name of a railway station (or words which sound the same as the name) will appear in every case.

Question: May I fill in the names of railway stations with a typewriter?

Answer: Yes, you may do this.

Question: May I make the name of a railway station out of part of one word alone, or must it be made of either a whole word or consecutive parts of two or more consecutive words?

Answer: You may make the name of a railway station out of consecutive parts of one word. This is stated in the conditions of the competition.

Question: May I make the name "Rye" out of the letters "ri" in river?

Answer: No. The sounds are totally dissimilar.

I am writing this on my return from spending Easter in the country, where the bright sunshine flooded everything with its golden rays, making trees and flowers and fields more of a pleasure to look upon than ever. While I was enjoying this scene my thoughts would dwell on the poor little denizens of the slums who seldom, if ever, have an opportunity of seeing Nature in all her glory, and I wondered how many of them would be able to have a day in the country this year.

Of all the institutions founded for the purpose of brightening these little lives, few are so far reaching in effect as the Fresh Air Fund, which provides a day in the country for the children of the big cities in the British Isles, for the small sum of ninepence each. This sum pays for railway fare and an ample supply of good food. Unlike other Funds there are no expenses of management in connection with the Fresh Air Fund, all these being borne by Pearson's and the Ragged School Union. Every penny of the money subscribed goes in providing pleasure for the children.

I hope readers of Short Stories will send something however small, to help on this great work. Cheques, postal orders, or stamps should be sent to the Hon. Secretary, Fresh Air Fund, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. Collecting forms will be forwarded on application. All donations will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

Rose Memories.

Telling of what the Silver Casket Contained.

"WHY, what is this? A silver casket with the monogram 'B—— A——' on it, it must have been my uncle's, I will open it after dinner, the bell will ring in a minute," I thought to myself.

It was barely two months since I had heard of the death of my uncle, Sir Brian Adair, and my consequent succession to the baronetcy. I was in Tasmania when the news was cabled to me by his lawyers, and, needless to say, started for home at once.

I had only seen my uncle once in my life, and as that was twenty-three years ago, it was impossible for me to feel any acute sorrow at his death. The doctors had certified heart disease as the cause of his decease, but old Mrs. Miles, the housekeeper, told me that it was a broken heart, and nothing else. It seems that my aunt Phyllis died just a year after they were married, and with her lay buried all my uncle's desire to live.

My curiosity was aroused, so I did not take long over my solitary meal, but, having ordered a lamp to be taken to the library, I fetched the casket, and wended my way thither.

With considerable difficulty, I at last succeeded in opening the box. Inside were five little parcels, covered with tissue paper, each bearing a date. I took them out very carefully, and found beneath a document in the form of a diary, in Sir Brian's handwriting. On opening the packages one after the other, I found to my astonishment that they each contained a faded rose.

Having reverently replaced them in their coverings, I settled myself near the lamp to read the story of bygone days with which these faded blossoms were interwoven.

"May 6th, 1857.

"Forty years ago, but I remember it as if it were but yesterday. A little boy of six, with a broken leg, my nurse had wheeled me into a sunny spot in Kensington Gardens, and seated herself on a bench a little distance off, where she soon forgot everything in the delights of a paper-backed novel.

"Other children were playing all around me, but there was I alone, with no one to talk to. A feeling of intense pity for myself stole over me, and soon the tears were trickling down my cheeks. All at once I felt a soft little hand laid on my own, and opened my eyes to behold a little maiden, with dark grey eyes, and wonderful auburn hair, holding out a white rosebud to me.

"'Poor little boy, does it hurt you?—smell this, a nice smell always does me good if I am ill,' and she held the rose whilst I gladly sniffed its fragrance.

"'Oh, don't go, please stay and talk to me,' I stammered, blushing to the roots of my hair, for I was a very shy child. 'My name's Brian—please what is yours?'

"'Phyllis,' my little fairy answered. And she stayed with me quite a long time, telling me all her pretty fancies about rose-fairies, and when she went, bent and kissed me, leaving the bud in my hand."

"Jan. 17th, 1860.

"Phyllis, dear heart, I am recalling happy memories to-night—I have opened my jewel-casket, as I shall always call it, though you once laughed at what you termed my 'silly fancy.' A pink rose—you gave it to me just three years after our first meeting. What a passion you always had for roses, my Phyllis! This one you had picked from a little tree in the hothouse that my father had given you at Christmas.

"It was Fate, indeed, that had made you my father's ward, dear, kind Fate, for you brought sunshine into my lonely life. I was a delicate child, so had been kept at home till I was ten years old.

"I remember so well the day I started off to school for the first time, I cried bitterly at having to part with my little playmate. The train was just about to start, that train that was to take me far away for three months when my father lifted you up in his arms to give me a last kiss, and you stuck this little pink rose in my coat, saying: 'Don't forget poor Phyllis and her roses.'"

July 2nd, 1870.

"The faded petals of a crimson rose—Sweetheart, the flower is dead, but the love that gave it still lives on, and will live for ever. I was twenty, and you were just nineteen. My father had died the previous year, and I was now master of Adair Court, where you and my mother lived with me.

"I had just come down from my second year at Oxford, and directly I saw you again, I knew that the one aim and object of my life henceforth would be to win you for my wife. You were fond of me, I knew, but I was dreadfully afraid lest you should only regard me in the light of a brother.

"A fortnight passed, and I had worked myself up into a fever of longing to hear my Fate. So I took you into the rose-garden—it was always your favourite haunt, and then and there I told my love.

"My wife, my dearest! I can see you now, you were wearing a simple white muslin frock, and as you stood on the narrow path, against a background of crimson ramblers, your grey eyes shone with a new and tender light, and the sun's rays glinted on your hair, making it a halo of gold above your happy face.

"Yet never a word! You looked at me in answer to my question, and turning, plucked a rose, and gave it to me. What need for words? The blossom answered for you."

"Oct. 9th, 1870.

"Just the dust of a Marechal Neil rose, but the scent clings to it still—as my memory clings to the day my Phyllis pinned it to my coat—Our wedding-day!

"Not a shadow fell on our two young hearts, no dread presentiment of the future marred our bliss on that—our wedding day. Looking back through the weary vista of lonely years that have been mine since then, I know that God was strengthening me by a great happiness to endure the anguish that was to come so soon, and I thank Him, for it is given to but few mortals to taste the peace of perfect love."

"Dec. 30th, 1871.

"But one more rose, it was white as driven snow when I took it from my darling, as she lay in her last long sleep. Yet the peace on her face quieted the storm of anguish that swept over me.

"There were no lines for the Master-hand of Death to wipe out, but He had left upon the lifeless clay the indefinable impress of a Love that was stronger than the King of Terrors himself.

"People wonder why I do not hate the very sight and smell of roses, for my darling's room was strown with her favourite flowers, blooms of every hue, save only that none but the choicest white buds were allowed to touch her lovely form. But why should I hate them for that reason?

"Can they remind me of her, whose image never leaves me? Phyllis, twenty years have gone since then, but I am as much your lover now as I was when you gave me that crimson rose. I feel that my probation is nearly over, and that it will not be long before I join you, my wife, in the Land where there are no more partings."

Maud Hoey.

Digitized by Google

A FREE OFFER.

The Romance of a Fountain Pen and an Inheritance.

"Why do they do this kind of thing?" mused Mr. Fred Poynter, surveying an object which he held in his right hand. "To induce trade!" he continued lazily, answering his own question. "If you get a good advertisement, other people buy the wares.

"If you can get a free advertisement, so much the better; if you cannot, then it is better to spend a certain amount than not to advertise at all. That's the only explanation I can find of this generous offer. Really, I should make a good advertising agent if I were not so lazy and did not get my daily bread without doing much for it!"

He laid the object on the table and yawned. As he moved his elbow in the process of settling himself more comfortably in his chair, he knocked a letter from the table to the floor; by an effort, he stooped and picked it up.

"Let me see! What am I to do in order to become the proud possessor of this unique—and all the rest of it—fountain pen? New and improved system," he read. "Oh, of course! They are all better than anything else. And just being placed on the market.

"Oh, here it is! Easy enough to remember, if I had the energy to remember. Now that opens up an idea! Why doesn't it demand energy to forget instead of to recollect? Then we should remember everything, which would be simply grand! Except when a man borrows money and wants to forget the transaction. H'm, didn't think of that! Perhaps the present arrangement is the best, all things considered! Now, for this gift!"

He read the circular letter. It came from an address in London, and he was some sixty miles from the metropolis. He did not recognise the locality, but he had a vague idea that it was a crowded business district. The fountain pen was offered free on the condition that he wrote with it for two hours, and afterwards sent a letter to the patentees affirming that he had done so.

"I don't quite see what that will prove," he murmured. "Oh, without refilling! And then they will publish my testimonial and send me a large bottle of their special ink. Well, some fountain pens will write for longer than that without refilling, but this is much cheaper, and I suppose that's a good testimonial in this case. Lucky they don't ask me to write all that time at a stretch!"

He dropped the letter on the table, reflected a while, and resolved to do what was required. That settled, he dismissed the subject for the time, totally unconscious of what lay behind that offer!

His further meditations were interrupted soon afterwards by the entrance of a child, a girl of about five years. Her intelligent face, her brown eyes, with their quickly-changing expressions, her curly hair and engaging ways, had made this child dear to Fred Poynter.

He took her in his arms and kissed her; then smothered a sigh and placed her against the table, seating her on his knee so that she could reach things without trouble.

"What's this, Uncle Fred?" she asked, her face assuming a puzzled look, as she picked up the fountain pen.

"Oh, that's a pen, Lil! See, I take the top off, you hold it like this and it writes as easily as a lead pencil!"

He placed it in her fingers, and she began to make marks on the back of the letter containing the offer.

"Can I come in and do this—sometimes?" asked Lil, looking up at him.

"Certainly! You can help me to earn it. Capital!"

He watched her idly, and then his thoughts wandered over the history of the previous few years. This child was the daughter of his second cousin, a man of his own age, who had disgraced himself and left his wife and child in want.

Clifford Merton had wooed and won Elsie Prescott, and Fred Poynter, who had loved Elsie but had never urged his love because his position was too mediocre, had carried a wounded heart for more than six years.

He was one of those good-natured, easy-going men who are never likely to rise by their own exertions, and he might still have been living practically from hand to mouth had not circumstances favoured him unexpectedly.

Clifford Merton was nephew to old Charles Gorham, being the son of the latter's sister, who had been a great favourite of Gorham. Consequently, Clifford was selected as Gorham's heir after the old man had made his fortune in Australia.

Clifford Merton had a liberal allowance from his uncle, he appeared happy in his married life, and all went well till about two years before the opening of this story. Then a thunderbolt dropped from somewhere, and the aspect of things changed entirely.

Clifford Merton had been actively engaged in sowing wild oats; he had been betting, gambling, and living extravagantly. He had kept this from his wife, who loved him with a devotion which he did not merit and did not adequately reciprocate.

Finding himself in difficulties, he forged his uncle's name at the corner of one of Gorham's own cheques, and passed it through his own account in order to meet some heavy payments due to clamorous creditors.

The forgery was detected, but old Gorham instructed the bank to honour it, and then sent a cheque for £50 more to his nephew, with the curt remark that if he did not utilise that amount for the purpose of getting out of the country, he (Gorham) would have the forger arrested.

Clifford Merton's real character showed itself. He had expected a different result, and that Uncle Charles would relent and pay other large sums that were nearly due for settlement; so, as his expectations were not realised, and things looked awkward, he left the country suddenly, abandoning his wife and child.

Digitized by Google

The first intelligence which Elsie received of the whole affair was a brief letter from Clifford, telling her what had happened, and suggesting that Uncle Charles would take care of her and the child. Uncle Charles flatly refused to do this; he was a cantankerous old man when put out, and Elsie was compelled to earn a livelihood for herself and child.

Then Fred Poynter was sent for and was told that he must come to live with Gorham, with the idea of ultimately becoming his heir.

Poynter had no objection to being provided with bread already buttered, and he accepted the proposal. He insisted that Elsie should be supported, but the old man was obdurate and Poynter had to drop the discussion.

"I won't leave a penny to that scamp or his family!" raved old Gorham. "And if you send any money to him, or her, I'll send you off!"

Poynter saw that he could do no good by getting out of favour with the old man, so he resolved to accept the position and help Elsie in some other way. He did so, unknown to anybody, even Elsie herself, by having copying work and other forms of light labour sent to her through an agent and paying her liberally for it all.

A year later, old Gorham was found dead in his bed from apoplexy and the will produced by the solicitor was entirely in Poynter's favour.

The will, made at the time Poynter entered the old man's house as prospective heir and manager of his estate, contained the provision that he was to forfeit the whole if he made a bequest of any part of it to Clifford Merton or his family.

"I felt considerable affection for the old fellow," said Poynter to the solicitor, "but the fact that he died and left that provision robs him of some of that affection—robs his memory, I suppose I ought to say. It's simply hard-hearted, and I prefer to think that he didn't mean it.

"Still, I must keep to the terms of the will. I can't give her any of the money, but I cannot be prevented from engaging her as housekeeper and paying her a good salary for it! And that's what I'll do!"

He induced Elsie to take up the position, and he was doing his best to make life happy for her.

"Shall I write to my papa?" asked the child suddenly, as she toyed with the pen.

Drawn from his reverie with a start, Poynter said:

"Er—yes! But he's a long way off!"

Poynter imagined that Merton was still in Central America, whither he had stated that he was going in that heartlessly brief letter to his wife—the last she had heard of him, and he would have been surprised to know that the good-for-nothing was once again in the old country, and journeying towards him with a heart full of hatred and fiendish glee.

There was a knock at the door, and a voice said:

"Is Lily in there, Mr. Poynter?"

"That is your mother, little one!" whispered Fred Poynter to the child. Aloud, he said: "Yes, Mrs. Merton. Come in, if you want her!"

Elsie Merton entered, holding up a finger deprecatingly at Lily as she did so. She was just under thirty; her face had not lost much of its charm, notwithstanding the trouble through which she had passed—the sorrow of two years had rather added a nobler charm to it, and there came a wistful look into Fred Poynter's eyes as they rested upon her.

"Oh, she is not worrying me!" declared Fred. "She likes to come here, Mrs. Merton, and I like to have her." He spoke in his usual deferential manner.

"I think she must come with me now, Mr. Poynter," responded Elsie. "Come along, dear! You can come some other time."

"And write with that pen?" inquired Lily, gazing at Fred's face in some anxiety lest he should say "No."

"Of course!" he said decisively.

The child went off contentedly with her mother.

Poynter had never conveyed to Elsie, by word or act, the fact that he loved her; there were times when he felt that he would like to break the silence, but this otherwise lethargic man could summon enough energy to prevent himself from acting in the remotest manner dishonourably.

Elsie appeared not to suspect the secret that lay in his heart; she did not forget that he had been an admirer in the old days, but he was one of several and the old days were far off!

She understood that he was helping her because he considered it only fair to do so. She was entitled to a share of the money, and this was the one way in which he could enable her to enjoy her rights.

During that same evening there arrived in Motham a rough-looking man who had been exiled from his native land for two years. He had a little money, and he hired a bed for the night at the "Brown Bull." He had shifty eyes, appeared to be always on the alert for danger, and said his name was Robert Brice.

"I'm going for a walk; are there any places of interest about here?" he inquired of the landlord. "You see, my people propose to establish a factory down here; land is cheaper than in a town and labour is cheaper, too.

"I have lived in places where you may be attacked by wild beasts or wild men any moment, so I am always on the watch!" he added nervously, as he noted the suspicious expression of the man's countenance.

"The Manor is about a mile from here," replied the landlord. "That's Mr. Poynter's place; used to belong to old Gorham. It's in that direction," pointing with his forefinger.

"Oh, yes, I know it!" said Brice, with a snarl. Then, remembering, he added quickly, "I mean, I know the circumstances. Who doesn't? Is he married?"

"No. He has Mrs. Merton there as housekeeper! That Merton was a bad lot, you know, but his wife is all right, and Poynter——" Here the landlord entered into details, concluding with, "I wouldn't be surprised if he married her, if the rascal who deserted her should turn out to be dead!"

Brice had turned away in order to prevent his agitation being noticed. When mine host had concluded, Brice uttered a curt word of thanks and left the premises.

"I knew he had supplanted me!" he hissed between his tight-shut teeth. "I guessed it! That's why I got details long ago, and that's why I intend to kill him with that fountain pen!

"I waited to see if the old man relented, but I heard nothing, and I used the knowledge I obtained in Costa Rica from the anarchists. It's worth the cost and risk of coming home!

"I guessed that he would poison the old man against me still more! But I never thought he would try to get Elsie!" An awful expression came from his lips; it seemed to burn the air. "He shan't have her! he won't live long enough for one thing!"

He began to revile the man who had "cheated him out of his inheritance," and the wife whom he had so basely deserted.

His was a warped nature; he was a man who would stoop to crime to hide a fault, and then regarded himself as a badly-used creature because society would not permit him to have his own sweet way.

He was one of those who do not trouble to keep in the right path, or to make a fight against ordinary difficulties, but who consider that they are the sport of Fate, and try to take a sullen revenge by doing wrong, and sinking more and more deeply into the mire of evil.

Digitized by Google

"He is to write with it for two hours," he muttered, as he walked along the dusty road in the gathering darkness. "Perhaps he may do it to-day; he must have had it this morning, and it flatters a man to think that his name will be in print in the middle of a big newspaper advertisement as the writer of a testimonial!

"I shall gloat over the destruction of the man, and the wreck of——. No, it won't do much damage to the house, but it will spoil the look of him, and the room he writes in!"

He came within easy distance of the Manor, but he saw no signs of the accomplishment of his fell purpose. He remained near the Manor till ten o'clock, then he felt compelled to return to the inn and retire to his room in order not to arouse suspicion.

"Perhaps I shall find that it has taken place when I get up!" he reflected. He sat at the window for a long time, but finally retired, and fell asleep.

In the morning he waited eagerly for news of the terrible affair; he pictured, with joy, the excitement of the inhabitants and the awe with which they would tell what had happened. He was disappointed; everything was dull and quiet.

"Perhaps it will go off to-day!" he thought, prefacing that reflection by a few choice words that would not look well in print.

That day passed without incident; he hung about the Manor in the vain hope of hearing the report that would tell of the consummation of his plot, but he was doomed to disappointment once more.

The following day gave no better news, and, towards evening, tired of waiting, he resolved to creep quite close to the study, where Poynter spent his leisure, and try to ascertain if he really had the pen.

"It couldn't have gone wrong!" he thought. "The ink flowed well, and as soon as the fluid was half-way down, it would start the tiny mechanism, and the explosive would go off. Just strong enough to kill him, and do mischief to the immediate surroundings. Perhaps he didn't like the feel of it. It was a bit more bulky than the ordinary pens, but not too bulky."

He skirted the place, and selected a spot where it would not be difficult to get into the private grounds and so approach the study. If the pen were not being used, he would do something to cause the ink to leak out, and thus bring about the desired explosion. It might occur when Poynter was near it.

He found it tolerably easy to accomplish his object, and was soon ensconced in the shrubbery at a point that afforded a good view of the private room. It was empty, apparently, for he could see no one.

He had not waited long before he saw his so-called supplanter appear and seat himself at the table. He took up something and gazed at it curiously; then he bent over the table and began to write.

Clifford Merton's heart bounded with exultation. He gloated over the spectacle of what might happen at any moment, but to his disgust he saw Fred Poynter rise and leave the room. Two minutes later, Poynter re-appeared, leading a little girl by the hand.

"Lily!" gasped the watcher.

The sight of his child touched him as nothing had ever done before. It struck a chord that had not been touched for a long time, and he felt changed. Then his wife came in, the woman whom he had basely abandoned.

His better feeling, already agitated by the sight of his little daughter, was still further acted on by this scene. They seemed happy; he heard the child's laughter, and he could see the amused expression of his wife's face; they did not want him, he had deserted them, and they were happy without him.

For a few seconds he was half inclined to slink away and let them think that he was dead. He began to edge himself out of the shrubbery, away from the pleasant scene, but another thought came to him and hardened him once more.

It was Poynter who was making them happy, and he was doing it with money that should have been his, Merton's. If they thought him dead they would marry!

Poynter could easily exert influence over Elsie to induce her to consent, even if she were unwilling; for, as he provided her and her child with their living, he could urge with force any proposal of marriage which he might feel disposed to advance.

"No! I'll kill him!" he muttered savagely, going back to his first position. "I don't care what happens!"

He strained his eyes to see what they were doing; Lily was doing something on the table. She was seated on Poynter's knee. Through the open French window there came to the watcher the sound of Poynter's voice, and the words he caught were—

"The ink—running out! I—won—offer!"

Mercy! The ink was running out, and the innocent child was writing with the fatal pen! A shudder passed through his frame; he uttered a low cry of agony and broke through the shrubs.

Across the small grass plot he ran, and through the open window. The occupants of the study looked up in surprise, his altered appearance and his beard preventing them from recognising him for the time.

"Take it away from her! It will go off!" he shrieked.

He had caught the sound which he knew the pen would give forth when the mechanism began to work. He reached over the table from the back and dragged the dreadful thing roughly from the astonished child's grasp.

He sprang through the open window, and out on the grass plot he essayed to throw it from him. As it left his hand there was an explosion, the windows were shattered by the concussion, and a thick smoke obscured him from the view of the startled persons in the study.

Clifford Merton was badly injured. He was conveyed to a bedroom in the Manor, where he was recognised, confessing his misdeed, and begging that his identity should remain a secret.

"It will soon be all over with me," he moaned, "and I deserved it. I have brought enough misery on my family already, and I wish to spare them from the further scorn of the public."

As a matter of fact, Clifford Merton was recognised by the doctor, but he was regarded as a man who had retrieved his past rather than as a miscreant, and it came about thus—

An explanation of the affair had to be given, so Poynter said that the pen had been sent to him, and he had been saved from destruction by Merton, who had evidently learnt what had been done. Merton was too badly hurt himself to be able to give details. It was a mysterious affair altogether.

Merton was never able to give details. Poynter's conscience pricked him, and he allowed this version to remain for Elsie's sake.

It was three years before Fred Poynter asked Elsie to marry him, and she accepted. The money obstacle was overcome in a peculiar manner. Old Gorham's will decided that Poynter was not to part with any of the money to Merton or his family.

By his marriage Poynter did not actually part with any money in the sense of the will, he had no trouble in that respect, but his anxiety was for her maintenance in the event of his death. The birth of a son settled this difficulty also, for he could make a will and leave all to his own children, appointing Elsie trustee.

"The interest on the money will keep our son, and you, and Lil," he explained, "and you can, as trustee, use it as you like. When he grows up our boy will provide for you, if I am gone."

And in that way he evaded the injustice of the dead hand.

"I don't feel any compunction about it," said Poynter. "Gorham wanted to make me happy, therefore, he would want to make my wife happy! So I am certain he would not object if he were still alive!"

G. Merriam.

Digitized by Google

Complete in Twelve Lists.

BRAND NEW COMPETITION.

Cash Down. Cash Down. Cash Down.

1st Prize, £50. 2nd Prize, £25. 3rd Prize, £10.

And 25 Gramophones.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below will be found six paragraphs containing the buried names of Railway Stations in the United Kingdom (or words that sound the same as the names). You must write in the spaces given the names of the Railway Stations so indicated.

No word or part of a word may be used more than once in making up the name of a Railway Station. In the event of the name of a Railway Station occurring more than once in a sentence, it should be underlined and written down each time. In case of more than one person finding the same number of words for each or any sentence, those words containing the largest number of letters will have preference. No name of a Railway Station may be composed of a single letter, either standing by itself or taken from any word in the sentences.

When you have discovered the names of Railway Stations in the sentences, underline (in ink) the words which go to make up the names (or words that sound the same as the names) and then on the line underneath each sentence write (in ink) the correct names of the Railway Stations to be found in each.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to Bradshaw's Guide, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or Room Eight, SHORT STORIES, 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The names of the Railway Stations consist of one word or two or more consecutive words, or consecutive parts of one word, or two or more consecutive words.

The first prize of £50 will be given to the Competitor who fills in the greatest number of railway stations under the conditions stated. The second prize of £25 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in the order of merit.

When you have filled in all the names you can find, cut out the list below and keep it by you. Don't on any account send it to us until the closing date is announced in SHORT STORIES. A seventh list of sentences will appear next week.

In the event of a tie a further list (or, if necessary, several further lists) of sentences will be submitted to the tieing competitors until one wins the first prize outright.

<---------- CUT THROUGH HERE ----------->

EXAMPLE.

The oaks were swaying in the breeze, the cows were grazing peacefully, when out of the park tore a huge black bull.

The Oaks, Sway, Cowes, Grays, Park, Black Bull.

SIXTH LIST.

31. She wore sequins on her dress, and a belt of blue stones; their brilliant effect was praised by everyone.

32. What is your saddle worth? It looks expensive, the leather being embossed on both sides.

33. Of all the visitors at the Grange, Conrad Clifworth was most liked. His manners were so refined on every occasion.

34. It was a bigger legacy than Lydia expected as she had lived in more or less seclusion for so long.

35. Up to a certain point pleasant thoughts held sway, then disturbing ones rose, effectually driving them away.

36. The day the baby was born ended with a hailstorm, the worst Edward Housecroft ever remembered, and he was an old man.

NAME ..... ADDRESS .....

Digitized by Google

Miss Smith, of Melbourne.

How an Heiress Found Her True Lover.

A pretty girl struggling with the refractory handle of the door of a railway carriage—who could fail to come to her assistance? A charming blush and a smile accompanying the words of thanks, the train about to start and who could resist the temptation to jump into the carriage after her?

Certainly Sydney Paget was not stoic enough to pass on to the next carriage when he could sit opposite such a dainty little lady as his eyes rested on when, with a shriek and a start, the train slowly dragged its long length out of the London terminus.

Given youth, good looks, and the stimulus of a glorious day in late Spring and the bridge need be but slight which passes from silence to the ordinary small talk of every-day conversation.

From the label on her handbag, Sydney gathered that the lady's name was Miss Smith, and that she was passenger to Crawley, the small village which was also his destination, therefore it was with a feeling of pleasure that he assured himself he would see more of Miss Smith in the future.

Her rose-leaf complexion, her brilliant hazel eyes and crisp, wavy brown hair, with ever such a slight tinge of red in it, and her bright, impulsive manner made such a charming personality that the young man never noticed that her clothes were not of the newest fashion and her gloves of a cheap make; details that a woman would have seen with half an eye.

Having intimated to her that he was also going to Crawley, and, in fact, had lived there the better part of his life, they embarked on the subject of the beauties of the village, and she showed herself particularly anxious to hear about the inhabitants of the houses round the neighbourhood.

He gave her a lively description of the various oddities of the country magnates in those parts, and at length she said somewhat timidly:

"Do you know any people called Paget there?"

"Living at a place called the Hurst? Why certainly, there is the Hon. Mrs. Paget, her daughter Edith, and two sons. Do you know them?"

"Well, not exactly," she replied in an embarrassed manner. "I—er—know of them; they are, I may say, sort of connections of mine."

Sydney started, and then exclaimed:

"Why, of course, how stupid I am—you are the Miss Smith we have been expecting. How is it I did not guess at once? But you must have come by an earlier steamer than we thought, for we did not think you would be here for another fortnight. How glad I am that I met you."

"But—but," she stammered, "if you expected me may I ask who you are?"

"Why, of course—I am Sydney Paget; John must have told you about me—I am his eldest brother. What a pity he is not at home just now. Never mind, you need not feel strange with us. You will find the mater an awfully good sort, and so is sister Edith if she takes to you. And she must do that," he added, sotto voce.

Seeing that Miss Smith appeared somewhat ill at ease, Sydney rattled on at some length, asking about her voyage and Australia and quoting largely from his brother John's accounts of the country.

In a short time the young lady's embarrassment passed, and she was soon chatting away, her eyes dancing with suppressed fun; and Sydney was so taken up with watching those said eyes that he never noticed how much he was telling her of himself and his family.

The journey, all too short as it appeared to one at least of the passengers, drew to an end, and soon Sydney had the pleasure of handing his charming fellow-passenger into his own dog-cart and driving off with her at a good pace, pointing out the places of beauty and interest to her as they proceeded.

Arriving at the Hurst he helped her down and conducted her to the drawing-room, where they met a dignified-looking old lady and a daughter, evidently the eldest of the family, pleasant but not good-looking, and dressed with a style that was evidently something beyond the "Modes" of the Crawley dressmaker.

"Mother, just fancy!" cried Sydney, as he ushered Miss Smith into the room. "I came down in the same carriage with Miss Smith and did not guess who she was until she opened my eyes by inquiring about us all."

A look of surprise and pleasure came into the Hon. Mrs. Paget's face as she gazed on the sweet, embarrassed face before her, and kissing her in a warm-hearted manner, she exclaimed:

"I am glad to meet you. I hope you will grow fond of us. Edith, dear," turning to her daughter, "here is Miss Smith."

Edith came forward and shook hands, murmuring expressions of pleasure.

"Of course, my dear," said Mrs. Paget, "you are prepared to stay some time with us before you go off to your friends in Liverpool. A room shall be prepared for you at once. If we had known the exact date of your arrival everything would have been ready."

"Dear Mrs. Paget," replied Miss Smith, with one of her charming blushes, "you are too kind. I am sure I shall be most happy here."

Digitized by Google

Having had tea, Edith escorted the visitor to the room prepared for her, and then with suppressed excitement she sought her mother.

"Oh, mother, I am so glad, aren't you? I was so afraid she would be hardly presentable, and really there is no doubt she is quite a lady; and though her dress is out of date, it will pass muster down here."

"Indeed, yes, my dear. I feel we are fortunate, for I never knew who John might have got hold of out in Australia. What fault can he find with her? I wonder why he is so anxious we should not think there is any engagement between them?"

"The whole thing is a mystery to me. Of course we may find out that on further acquaintance she is not what she appears to be at first, but we shall have excellent opportunities for judging while she is here. What a good thing it is that Nellie Seymour has asked to have her visit postponed. Supposing things should not turn out all right it would be so much more disagreeable to have a stranger in the house, and it might set her against us, and then Sydney——"

"What are you saying about Sydney?" said that same person, entering the room.

"Only that you should save some of the little attentions you paid Miss Smith for Nellie Seymour when she comes next month."

"Bother Nellie Seymour! You talk of her morning, noon, and night till I am sick of her name," he burst out, striding about the room in an irate manner.

"My dear boy," broke in Mrs. Paget, "you should not speak in that way of a young lady."

"Especially one with the whole of Samuel Grubham's fortune," he interpolated bitterly. "Mother, I like this business less and less. I know quite well why you have asked her here, and everyone knows it. You want me to marry her, and you would never have thought of it had not old Grubham left her all that money."

"Now, Sydney, you should not speak like that. Of course I should not urge you to marry anyone who was not nice, but I have been assured that Nellie is a most estimable girl, and really worked hard at her profession as a nurse until she suddenly found herself rich.

"As to asking her here, she is a third cousin on your father's side, and we are quite justified in inviting her to spend a few weeks with us. Of course as the eldest son with this place to keep up you cannot marry someone with no money at all, like Miss Smith, for instance," fixing him severely with her double eyeglass.

"'You need not marry for money, but go where money is,'" quoted Edith, seeing a frown gathering on her brother's forehead.

"The man who marries Miss Smith will be a jolly lucky fellow!" he retorted, and left the room wrathfully.

Mother and sister gazed at one another ruefully.

"How very unfortunate that John should be away and Sydney at home just at this juncture," sighed the mother.

"Yes, it is almost a pity she is so pretty," agreed the sister. "But surely she must be engaged to John or she would never have come to pay us a visit, and in that case there would be no fear for Sydney. He is not a cad and she does not look like an adventuress."

The conversation was cut short by the appearance of the young lady in question, and very charming she looked in a pretty black evening dress which had evidently done duty for a long time, but which nevertheless set off the radiant freshness of her bright young face.

"You deny that you are Bessie Smith?"
"I do. I am not Bessie Smith."

Mrs. Paget looked at her critically, and decided that though she was all that could be desired as a bride for John yet Sydney must be mated with more money.

John had always been the black sheep of the family, and they had rather dreaded lest he should present them some day with an altogether undesirable Mrs. John.

The voyage to Australia which they hoped would steady him seemed only to have resulted in a sort of semi-engagement with a certain "Miss Smith of Melbourne," an engagement which he strenuously denied at first, but had lately been obliged to partly confess, by owning to some sort of flirtation, when he announced that Miss Smith was coming over to stay with friends in Liverpool, and had proclaimed her wish to pay them a visit.

Seeing that she was far prettier and more ladylike than they had expected, Mrs. Paget determined to have the engagement formally acknowledged, and so make John "settle down." A consummation devoutly wished by his worried mother and sister.

Accordingly they set themselves to be as pleasant as only two thoroughly well-bred English ladies, with a sufficiency of means, can make themselves, and plainly showed by their manner that they were quite ready to accept her as one of the family as soon as she and John chose to declare themselves.

At the end of a week the intimacy had proceeded so far that it was "Bessie" and "Edith" between the two girls, and yet never a word had been let fall to clear up the vexed question as to "engagement" or "no engagement."

Unfortunately, in spite of repeated letters to John, that worthy still found excuses for delaying his home-coming, and even a judicious epistle from Edith hinting that if he postponed his return much longer he might find others not so blind to Miss Smith's charms, and he might lose her altogether, only drew from him a frown as he read it, and the remark:

Digitized by Google

"So much the better. Anyone is welcome to her who likes to take her."

Sydney thought the week the shortest he had ever passed. In the absence of his brother he found it his duty to devote himself to Miss Smith, and the prospect of her being one day his sister put them at once on the most charming terms of intimacy which at the same time were perfectly safe, as he repeatedly assured himself.

Nevertheless, when at last, in reply to a long letter from his mother concerning Miss Smith, John suddenly announced his return home, Sydney felt an unaccountable dislike to the idea. This dislike, in fact, amounted to a decided repugnance and plunged him into low spirits, and, it must be confessed, a bad temper.

In troubled surprise Mrs. and Miss Paget had watched the development of this unforeseen complication, and feeling that it was no good saying anything to the chief persons concerned, contented themselves with comments to one another.

"Who would have thought that a girl who liked a man well enough to come from the other side of the globe to him (on very slight encouragement) would have shown herself so easily consoled for his absence?"

There was no denying that bright and happy as Bessie Smith generally appeared to be, there were times when a look of anxiety came over her charming countenance and her manner was sometimes embarrassed and unhappy.

"Thank goodness," sighed the Hon. Mrs. Paget to her daughter. "John comes to-morrow, and that will put everything in its proper place. It is most unfortunate that anything should happen to put absurd ideas into Sydney's head just before Nellie Seymour comes."

"I never should have thought," answered Edith, "that she would have flirted so outrageously with one brother while engaged to another."

"But are they engaged?" queried the mother anxiously.

"When John comes we shall know," replied Edith with conviction.

But when John came they found they knew no more than before. The two greeted each other quietly without undue pleasure apparent in their faces.

Disappointed in an immediate solution of their difficulties, the two ladies still found satisfaction in the fact that John had shown himself during the evening more attentive than they would have hoped, and that though Bessie received his attentions timidly, yet she certainly kept Sydney more at a distance than hitherto.

Two days passed, and on the second evening Edith discovered John and Bessie in earnest conversation in the conservatory, and discreetly vanished, not before, however, she heard John say,

"Of course, since you know you are engaged to me——"

Perhaps, however, she would have been less elated had she heard the rest of the conversation.

"Engaged! And to you" repeated Miss Smith hotly. "That is not true; how dare you say such a thing?"

John flushed at the indignant contempt in her voice, and therefore determined to force her to a humiliating confession by pretending to really take her for Bessie Smith.

"Have you forgotten that we met only last year at Melbourne? Do you remember that picnic?"

"Melbourne! I have never been out of England in my life."

"You deny that you are Bessie Smith? You deny that we were engaged shortly before I sailed for home? You deny that you have written to me by every packet since then? That you have come over now to be introduced to my people prior to our marriage?"

"I deny that I ever was, or ever will be engaged to you," replied Bessie, with flashing eyes and a little stamp of her foot. "Not if you were the only man in the world."

John winced, and then said with emphasis,

"You deny that you are Bessie Smith?"

For an instant the bright eyes sank daunted, and then with a proud raising of her head which defied him to think his worst of her, she replied:

"I am not Bessie Smith."

With a sarcastic smile John said, pursuing his advantage to the utmost—

"Then whom have I the honour of addressing? Who is it that is masquerading here under an assumed name, tricking my relations and deceiving the neighbourhood?"

The young girl's anger had faded, and she stood a picture of embarrassment and shame. Even John's insolent words would now draw no flush from her.

Hanging her head, she said in a small voice:

"I am Nellie Seymour."

John could not prevent a start of glad surprise, but he would not give up the advantage her position gave him.

"And why do I find the heiress, Miss Seymour, pretending to be Bessie Smith, and my fiancée?"

This gave her the necessary fillip, and her old spirit broke out, and with a proud toss of her head, she replied:

"Miss Smith is a common enough name; could I help it that your family took me for someone else? Had I known that it entailed any connection with you, it is the last name I would have chosen."

John was very wrath, but she looked so pretty and desirable in her anger, especially since he learnt her real identity, that he controlled himself with a great effort, and sought to turn it all to his advantage.

"Miss Seymour," he said gravely, "I fear you will find yourself in a very awkward position unless you let me help you. Can you not explain to me what caused you to act in this extraordinary manner?"

Nellie blushed, and then said—

"Well, I suppose I may as well tell you all about it. Two months ago I was Nellie Seymour, now I am Miss Seymour, the heiress. I cannot say the change was unwelcome, it certainly was unexpected.

"I had nursed Mr. Grubham because I was paid to do so, and had no idea he would leave me his money. The surprising thing to me was to find then what a lot of unexpected friends and relations I possessed, and how fond they all were of me.

"Amongst other invitations, I received one from the Hon. Mrs. Paget, urging our kinship most kindly, and begging me to come and stay for a month.

"A kind friend to whom I spoke of this said it was the talk of the village that I was being asked down for the——" here she stammered, and a charming blush covered her face—"for the eldest son to marry. In some indignation I decided to come here as a stranger and judge of the family for myself.

"Accordingly I took the name of Miss Smith and came. On my way I met your brother, and he mistook me for the Miss Smith your people were expecting. This was too good a chance of making the acquaintance of the family, so acting on a momentary impulse, I fell in with his idea, and was introduced to his mother and sister.

"By degrees I learnt more about the person I was representing, but though I was somewhat troubled at their frequent allusion to 'John,' I give you my word I had no idea until now that I was personating someone so near and dear to you. I fear that you must have been bitterly disappointed when you saw me," she said, with a mischievous glance, which fired John's blood.

Digitized by Google

He took a step towards her.

"By Heavens! The disappointment is now! Remain my fiancée, and I ask nothing more of Fate."

"And what would you do with two?" she said.

He recovered himself with a frown.

"Oh, I am not really engaged to Bessie Smith. She is only coming over to see her friends in Liverpool."

"And the picnic? And her letters?" Nellie was triumphant now.

"That was nothing," he stammered. "Miss Seymour—Nellie, if you will only listen to me, if you will only let tell me you how I love you."

"Enough, Mr. Paget," she said with dignity. "I wish to hear no more. After what you have said, I am sure you are not free to speak so to anyone but Miss Smith."

"And if I were?" he added eagerly.

"If you were, it would make no difference," she answered firmly.

John strode about for a few minutes with a black cloud on his face, and then said:

"What do you propose doing now?"

"I do not know," she announced. "I suppose I had better confess the whole thing to your mother, and beg her forgiveness."

"I think it would be better," he replied slowly, "if you let things remain as they are for a time, and then you can terminate your visit here and return to town. When you come again as Miss Seymour, you will find it easier to confess and be forgiven."

Nellie needed some persuasion to agree to this plan of further deception, but she was naturally averse to proclaiming her mistake and eating humble pie, and John had strong reasons for postponing the explanation, and so in the end he prevailed.

Sydney noticed with a pang that there seemed to be some private understanding between his brother and Miss Smith that evening, but at the same time he saw that she was evidently unhappy and ill at ease, and the timid, supplicating look he saw once in her eyes aroused in him a mad desire to punch John's head and carry her off.

For some few days things remained in the same strained condition, and then John received a letter which seemed greatly to perturb him.

"By-the-bye," he read, "the Orinoco came in yesterday, and my friend Tomson was on board. He tells me there was a Miss Smith there who has been most particular in her inquiries about Crawley, and especially about you, and spoke of running down on Friday."

"Hang her!" he ejaculated. "I wish she had gone to the bottom. If I only had time I am sure I could get Nellie. I am sure she likes me better than she did. But, by Heaven! that dreadful girl will be here to-morrow, and what can I do?"

"I cannot face her, that is true. If only I had time to get Nellie to promise herself to me! I could have got her to buy off Bessie to avoid a scandal. Now there is nothing for it but to run. I shall have one try for her, however. Faint heart never won fair lady." And he went to meet Nellie in the garden.

It was a glorious day, and Nellie, in her white frock, as she stood among the clumps of gorgeous rhododendrons, for which the Hurst was famed, looked a winsome enough little lady without the golden halo that surrounded her in John's eyes since he knew she was the rich heiress.

"Proofs! Here they are," and she banged down a packet of letters in John's handwriting.

With an assumption of authority which made Sydney's blood boil, John sent him about his business and took Nellie for a stroll.

Seeing she was ill-at-ease and likely to defy him if he strained the cord too tightly, John plunged at once into the subject.

"Miss Seymour"—suddenly taking her hand—"I love you. Do you not care a little for me? Will you not let this pretended engagement become a reality?"

Nellie withdrew her hand.

"I am sorry to cause you pain, Mr. Paget, but I have already told you this thing can never be, I do not love you and never shall. Will you please leave me?"

John grew white. He was very much in earnest, to win her meant so much to him, a pretty wife, plenty of money, a freedom from the fear that Bessie Smith would get him after all.

"You are breaking my heart; do you not care that you have spoilt my life?"

"It is not right of you to speak like this," she replied. "If your life is spoilt it is your own fault. I told you from the first that I could never love you and never shall."

There was no mistaking her sincerity, but he tried his last cast.

"If you will not accept the love I offer you, will you accept my name, will you marry me to save your good name?"

Here Nellie turned on him, her slight form drawn to its utmost, and in her eyes an expression of offended purity, of outraged womanhood, which effectually quelled him.

"Nothing can be said against my good name. I do not need to shelter it behind a dishonoured shield of a breaker of vows, and a bully."

Digitized by Google

Without another word she turned and left him.

In a fury he cried as she went:

"You will be sorry for this to-morrow."

That evening important business took John to town, and Edith and Mrs. Paget were once more in dire perplexity as to the course their curious case of "true love" was running.

Nellie's spirits rose high, she felt the relief of John's absence, and she gave herself up to the pleasure of being alone with Sydney once more.

At times John's threat returned to her mind, but she paid little heed to it. To-night she would enjoy herself, to-morrow she would announce the termination of her visit, and then either write and explain, or come back in her true character and beg forgiveness.

Poor Sydney was divided between rapture and a horrible feeling that, after all, the girl, whom he now found he had grown to love so dearly, was not quite acting as she should. Surely if it had been anyone else he would have said she was flirting with him, and encouraging him to love her, and that such conduct in one who was pledged to another was most reprehensible. He paced his room for many hours that night, and his conclusion was:

"Mother may have been mistaken and so may Edith; John may be telling lies, but I will stake my life that she is a noble-minded and pure girl, whose white soul has never been sullied by an unworthy thought or wish." Which shows that he had done more than stake his life on his belief, he had put all his chance of happiness on one throw.

The morrow came and even as Nellie was turning over in her mind the exact words in which to take leave of her hostess, a thunder-bolt fell in their midst. The man-servant announced in a loud tone:

"A young lady wishes to see the Hon. Mrs. Paget on urgent business. She says her name is Miss Bessie Smith of Melbourne, and that she is expected."

Mrs. Paget and Edith literally gasped and glanced at Nellie, who stood looking the picture of guilt.

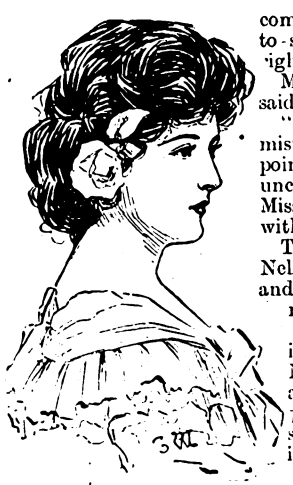
Mrs. Paget was the first to recover herself.

"There must be some mistake, I think. Please show the lady up, James."

"An interval of silence, in which the three ladies avoided one another's eyes, and then entered Miss Smith of Melbourne. A rather over-dressed female, no longer very young, of a tawdry kind of good looks, and with an Australian twang, that might be recognised at any distance.

"I suppose you are Mrs. Paget and you Edith Paget?" she remarked.

The ladies bowed and wondered what would fellow.



"Well, I'm Bessie Smith. I've come all the way from Australia to see that your son John does right by me."

Mrs. Paget came forward and said in an icy tone:

"I fear there must be some mistake. This young lady"—pointing to Nellie, who stood uncertain what to do or say—"is Miss Smith, and has been staying with us for some time."

The real Miss Smith stared at Nellie in undisguised astonishment and then with blunt coarseness remarked:

"Well, all I can say is, that if she has been staying here as Miss Bessie Smith of Melbourne and engaged to Mr. John Paget, you had better count your spoons, for she is a rank impostor."

Mrs. Paget trembled and cast a glance at Nellie, who, however, had guilt written on her countenance, and she murmured—

"We have only your word for it. Where are your proofs?"

"Proofs! Plenty of them. There!" And she banged down a packet of letters in John's handwriting. "There!" And she produced a ring which Mrs. Paget knew well as one she had given John when he came of age.

Edith went forward to Nellie.

"Bessie! Deny all this. Say you are really Bessie Smith, and this woman the impostor."

But poor Nellie could only say:

"She says truly, I am not Bessie Smith."

"Then who are you? Why have you deceived us? Are you engaged to John?" And a hundred other questions were showered on Nellie as she stood bewildered, and this was the scene to which Sydney entered and stood gazing at speechless.

"Sydney!" said his mother, "in dignified wrath, "we have been grossly deceived. This person is not Miss Smith. She is some impostor."

Only one idea, however, occurred to Sydney.

"Not Miss Smith?" he exclaimed, turning a radiant face to Nellie. "Then you are not engaged to John?"

"No," she replied, and then the room was empty, and held only the two, as for a long moment they gazed in one another's eyes and read the truth.

Then Sydney drew her hand through his arm, and, turning to his mother, said:

"Whoever she may be, I love her, and if she will accept me I shall deem myself the most fortunate man on earth."

"Sydney!" exclaimed Edith. "Are you mad?"

"This is preposterous," cried Mrs. Paget, "I insist on an explanation."

"Yes," said Miss Smith, whose triumphant smile at the confession of the impostor had changed to a look of consternation at the foregoing scene.

"You had better prove yourself respectable or the police must be called in."

Nellie ignored this remark, and turning to Mrs. Paget said:

"Forgive me—I am Nellie Seymour."

"Nellie Seymour!" the two ladies gasped in unison.

"Why? Why? Whatever made you call yourself Bessie Smith?"

And then Nellie explained the whole history of how she found she was being taken for some unknown person, and how, thinking no harm, she continued the deception until it grew more and more difficult to get herself out of the tangle, and then turning to Sydney, the sparkle of her dancing eyes veiled in tender tears, she said:

"At any rate, I have learnt the worth of one noble heart, and have no fear but that I am loved for myself. Ah, Mrs Paget!" Impulsively throwing her arms round her. "Do forgive me. I shall be your daughter-in-law after all, if you will have me."

And what could Mrs. Paget do (realising that after all her wish was fulfilled), than kiss her and forgive her.

Meanwhile, Miss Smith was clamouring to be told of John's whereabouts. No one could enlighten her. After some trouble she was persuaded to depart, and the family was left to make their mutual explanations. In time they grew to look on it as a joke, and almost to believe that they had seen through it all the time.

The village was somewhat puzzled to find that it was the eldest and not the youngest Mr. Paget who was to marry the lady from Australia, and that the lady was not from Australia after all, but was the wealthy Miss Seymour. However, the wonder was soon talked out and ceased to interest.

Nellie made private arrangements with her lawyers by which Miss Smith was bought off and persuaded to return to Australia. She said it was to make up to John for disappointing him.

L. Hughes.

Digitized by Google

THE OLD ROOM.

Telling of the Winning Back of a Husband's Love.

"My dearest Alice! In two years I will come back to the old town and claim you! The change of fortune has come at last, and I feel that this is but the first step towards success. In two years I shall be in a position to give you a home, I am sure of it! I shall not wait for the great success which I feel now is bound to come; I will have you with me, to share the increasing good fortune, for you have helped me immeasurably in the winning of it!"

He clasped her to his breast and she nestled against his stronger frame with a happy smile on her face.

"I knew it would come, Will, if you only kept on trying!" she replied simply. "I knew that if you held out till you got the first opening, you would rise rapidly!"

His face clouded for a moment at the recollection of the disappointments of the past.

He had always been fond of drawing and sketching. Someone had told him that he ought to cultivate the gift and he would become a great artist; he was of a very impressionable nature, one of those who are either deeply despondent or exceedingly hopeful and pass from one condition to the other in rapid succession, and his ambition was fired.

He had set to work to study, so far as his means would permit, but, as his parents were dead and he had to support himself, a mere lad, by his own earnings, his means did not give him the scope he wanted.

He had pursued his studies with more or less assiduity, according to circumstances, till he had attained his twentieth year and had acquired skill with the pencil and the brush; then he had endeavoured to obtain work in the metropolis as a black-and-white artist by sending sketches to editors.

His idea was to obtain employment in that way and devote his spare time and all the money he could scrape together to the pursuit of his studies at some school or under some artist.

Ill-luck seems to dog the steps of some people at the outset of their careers—very often for their ultimate benefit, although it may not appear so—and Will Darrell was one of those. His was not the nature to be strong in adversity and to be roused by it to greater effort; he wanted help in this direction.

His sketches were returned on all sides, and at the end of two months—having worked with great ardour and not having taken into account the possibility of rebuffs—he was disheartened and ready to give up the attempt and develop into that unpleasant specimen of humanity—a disappointed man.

It was at that moment that the needed help came to him in the form of a sympathetic soul, a woman of inherent goodness and a firm believer in the final triumph of those who do their utmost.

It was not exactly a common-place meeting, yet it was not an extraordinary one.

As Will was walking along the somewhat crowded pavement, one wet evening, he saw a drunken fellow trip over a paving stone that had not been properly laid; the man stumbled heavily against a girl, Alice Holmes, and sent her staggering into the road in front of a trap that was coming along at a rattling pace.

Will was nearest and he luckily had sufficient presence of mind to act promptly. In a trice he had the girl on the pavement just in time.

It was natural, after that, for the two to strike up an acquaintance, which deepened into friendship, and then into love. Alice learnt of Will's hopes and discouragements, and she consoled him and inspired him with courage to persevere.

Will Darrell's brow cleared and he pressed this girl closer to his heart as he remembered how she had encouraged him. Some fatality appeared to attend all his efforts.

Perhaps he did not try in the right direction for success; whatever the explanation, he failed every time and he would have discontinued his attempts, and his studies also, and probably have drifted into a good-for-nothing had it not been for the patience and the confidence of Alice Holmes.

She would tell him that he must succeed in the end, and that his failures should have the effect of making him more assiduous in his studies.

"Once get an opening, and you will go on!" she declared. "If you try and fail, you will feel better than if you do nothing, and you will certainly not be worse off!" That was commonsense, but it was not easy for Darrell to follow the advice.

So Alice helped him; she insisted on his taking some of the money which she contrived to save from her own small wage, so that he might have enough to carry out his object. She urged that he ought not to refuse; they were to be partners in the future, and this was capital invested for their mutual benefit.

And at last the chance did come, as Alice prophesied it would, and in a short time it led to the offer of a subordinate position on the staff of a large publishing firm, and Will Darrell was leaving his native place to take up his new duties.

Will Darrell did not feel the parting so keenly as did Alice; he was so full of the future that he had small space left in heart or mind for grief at what was actually taking place.

With Alice it was different; she was to be left alone, to lose the presence of the man she had learnt to love with all the fervour of which so true a nature was capable.

The old place would be dark and dull without him, but she assumed a cheerful expression and prepared to submit to the inevitable for a time. Perhaps it would not be tw years; she hoped that it would not be so long, for Will's sake as well as her own.

Digitized by Google

The next two years were very happy ones for Will Darrell; he was well-nigh intoxicated with success. Dame Fortune tried to atone for her former somewhat shabby treatment by lavishing her favours upon him.

There was no need for words of encouragement from Alice; her letters, on the contrary, contained gently-worded admonitions not to allow his triumphs to overwhelm him. Her letters reached him with unfailing regularity on the same day every week, but his weekly epistles to her were not sent so regularly after a time. He was always very penitent, but he had so much to do!

It was nearly three years before he asked her to come to him; he had waited till he had set up a studio of his own and was gaining some celebrity as an artist in oils. His progress had been phenomenal; his every desire appeared to be gratified almost immediately.

Both Will and Alice were overjoyed, and neither—not even Alice with all her insight—suspected that fortune might be more disastrous to happiness than failure.

The wedding was a quiet one; this was the wish of Alice whose modesty shrank from a fashionable display, such as might reasonably have been expected if all Will's new friends and admirers had been informed, and the ceremony had taken place in London.

They were married from the old home and spent a brief honeymoon in the south, returning to the studio in the realm of artists in the metropolis, St. John's Wood.

The happiness to which Alice Darrell had looked forward for so long was now hers. She had a husband of whom she was passionately fond, although her affection was not so demonstrative as that of Will for her; her husband was making a name for himself, realising her prediction and her ardent wish.

Will was in the seventh heaven of delight; life was a pleasure, a thing to hold on to with all one's strength—however could he have said, at one time, that it was not worth living? Life is always worth living if you honestly try to get the best out of it! And, thanks to his dear wife, he had been able to do this!

The joy of living remained with them unimpaired for another year, and then a change came over Will Darrell; much success, with his consequent celebrity, was turning his head. He was the lion of Society; he was invited here and there, and——

Ah! Alice had not been brought up to this kind of thing, and she was not fitted for it by education or training! She was awkward in certain circumstances, gauche, the ladies termed her. She was not quick at repartee; she was not a brilliant conversationalist or pianist.

Will Darrell heaved a sigh as he opened a letter in his studio and found that it contained an invitation from Lady Manville Retton.

"I really ought to accept this," he muttered, frowning in his perplexity, "but I don't see how I am to go without Alice—I can't invent any plausible excuse for keeping her at home—yet she is not quite—er—what one would expect to see there as"—he blushed involuntarily—"as my wife! Oh, confound it! Why wasn't she—why isn't she more up-to-date in her education and style?"

He frowned again. It was very provoking! Unless he could devise some way out of the difficulty, he would lose a great deal; for he really couldn't take Alice with him to these Society functions, and yet how was he to go without her?

"She would be awfully hurt, the dear girl!" he continued with a trace of compunction, "but it's a fact that she doesn't shine. She is a good wife, and all that sort of thing, but—I am afraid that what I overheard Fraser say (the beggar) is right; she is in my light now!"

He did very little work that afternoon; he was worrying about Alice and how he was to act. His wife always left him to himself in his studio in the afternoon, entering about five o'clock to take tea with him in his den, and staying with him till he ceased work.

If he did not work after tea, they spent a pleasant hour or so together in conversation or in arranging and re-arranging things in this or that room. Pleasant? Well, they had been very agreeable, but Will was changing his ideas.

"I must accept it!" he decided. "And Alice must stay at home!"

He didn't mean to be cruel; he persuaded himself that Alice did not care for these functions, and that they were absolutely necessary for his further progress. Therefore, it would, or should, suit both of them for him to go alone.

"I don't think you are looking very well, Alice," he said that evening with some solicitude. "I don't suppose these parties suit you, and you would rather stay at home. So would I, dear, but, you see, it's part of the business! Now, here is an invitation from Lady Manville Retton—sure to meet a lot of good people there. For Thursday. Would you prefer to stay at home? I must go."

He puffed a wreath of smoke from a good cigar so that it partly hid his face. Alice did not say anything for a few seconds, but she finally answered cheerfully:

"I should prefer it, Will; but I'll go if you——"

"Oh, not at all!" declared Will, with just a little too much eagerness. "It will not matter in the least if you are not with me! I have had an idea for a week or two that you would rather be at home! We will call it settled at that!"

He felt rather sheepish over it, but he congratulated himself that he had managed the matter cleverly. He went to Lady Manville Retton's reception, alone; and that was the beginning of the disaster.

Led away by flattery and the desire to mount the ladder of Fame in the shortest possible time, Will Darrell's thoughts became more and more absorbed in all that touched his art in any way whatever, and Alice was pushed farther and farther into the background.

He regretted that he could not give parties, but he dreaded the ordeal. Alice became, in his eyes, less and less fitted for the exalted position to which he was raising her.

It never occurred to him that it was she who had enabled him to assume this position—that she had laid the foundation-stone, as it were, by her sympathy, encouragement, and practical help in the dark days of failure. And he belittled her by supposing that Alice was incapable of taking her place by his side.

She was one of Nature's noblewomen, and her small shortcomings, even supposing that she could not smooth them away, would have failed to attract attention when her real character became known and understood.

It did not occur to him that it was his bounden duty to stand up for her. Fame had intoxicated him, it had made him selfish and deprived him of the power of correct reasoning. He drifted apart from his wife and the happy home of her dreams was as unsubstantial as the visions of sleep.

Will Darrell did not work so much now; he could command a price for his pictures which rendered it unnecessary to peg away regularly and for many hours a day. He was quicker at the work, too.

Digitized by Google

It therefore became the rule for him to work by fits and starts, painting all night in order to get a picture finished, because he had not commenced it in time.

The old times were gone ; there were no more happy hours in the studio together and Alice rarely entered it. There was usually an air of neglect about it ; she tried once or twice to clear it up and make it appear as was its wont, but the blinding tears came to her eyes and she had to beat a hasty retreat.

What was to happen ? Will Darrell was away from home for a longer time than he was in it. He seemed to have lost affection for her and paid her but scant attention.

It was heart-breaking for Alice. Her hidden grief was wearing her away. She sometimes blamed herself, saying that she had not done enough to keep him by her side ; then she would remember how she had tried to comfort him, taking an interest in all he was doing, honestly praising his work and devoting herself to him. What more could she have done ?

"I know I was backward," she would sob, "but I was learning, and he did not give me a chance."

One night she heard him mutter something in his sleep ; it was to the effect that he had made a mistake in marrying. It nearly broke her heart, but in the end it roused her to make one grand attempt to bring him back to his old love.

No, she would not organise a reception and act the grand lady ! Will was blinded ; she would restore sight, and hope, hope and pray, that he would become his old self once more.

Will Darrell had sent in three pictures for the Royal Academy. Alice dreaded the result, for she was convinced that Will had not done his best ; he had "rushed" them, confident in his power to produce good pictures with a minimum of labour—a fatal mistake for anyone, in any vocation.

He had gone off on a tour to Italy with some of his newly-found friends, and Alice was left behind to grieve and scheme for the restoration of the happiness which success had shattered.

The rejection of all three pictures followed within a fortnight of Will Darrell's departure—a terrible blow to his reputation and pride. Alice did not send the news to him ; she knew that he would learn of this disaster from others. She wrote to him to urge him to come home, as she wanted him, and she prepared for his homecoming.

There was a room next to the studio, a small room which had often reminded them both of the little parlour in her aunt's house in the old town ; they had spent some happy hours in that parlour during Will's struggle for recognition, and the room next the studio often recalled those days to her. Often did she press her hand to her heart now as the recollection came to her on entering this off-room.

She was busy with that room. A cart had come to the house with some old furniture, a second-rate lot that would have made the artistic neighbours stare had they seen it ; but it was packed and they saw cases of something delivered by a Great Northern Railway van. Alice and her servant worked with feverish haste in order to conclude the preparations by the time Will returned. He had written a brief note to Alice, telling her that he would be home on Saturday, and he arrived punctually at the stated time.

He looked dejected and forlorn, and it aggravated his feeling of irritation and annoyance that his wife was not in the hall to meet him and extend to him the sympathy which she had ever given him. Yet, did he deserve it ?

In the midst of his vexation and his silent raving against Fate and luck, he remembered that he had forsaken her and lost all claim to her sympathy.

"She does not care now !" he muttered, mechanically hanging up his hat and light overcoat.

His heart sank as he realised that he had to rebuild a reputation without Alice's help ; he little thought with what anxiety she had waited for his return, for she had half-feared that his dejection might cause him to take some desperate step before she could have the opportunity of bringing him to her side again.

He made straight for the studio and uttered an impatient exclamation on finding it locked. He turned to the next room ; the door yielded to his touch and he entered.

Another exclamation, this time of bewilderment, left his lips and he stepped back in amazement. Where was he ? This room—it was not a room in his house ! He passed his hand over his heated brow, wondering if he had gone mad and had wandered to—to the little town in the north ! What did it mean ?

He stared about him. He was at the door of the old parlour, in which Alice and he had often met in the struggling days. It was the self-same furniture and curtains, the same cheap chiming clock on the mantelpiece. And there, in the old chair and dressed in the old clothes, sat Alice !

"I am glad you have come, Will !" said Alice in the old cheery voice and with that sweet smile on her face. "Sit down and tell me all your worries, dear, while tea is being got ready, and I'll see if I can drive away the imps of mischief that worry and dishearten you !"

Alice uttered the words as nearly as possible in the old strain, but her heart was full of dread lest the hoped-for effect should not be produced.

She had thought that this transportation into old times would arouse Will's better feelings, that it would tear the scales from his eyes and make him see what he had lost—what both had lost—in the abundance of outward good-fortune.

She knew that a strange vision of past scenes, a sudden return to old surroundings and old affections had often worked a marvellous effect in showing people where their happiness really lay, and this was her plan to bring Will to her and to restore to him the happiness that was eluding him.

He stared at her in surprise. She rose and came towards him with outstretched hands. He cast a swift glance round the room and at her, and he realised in a flash the plot of his devoted wife. With a cry of joy, which contained a tinge of remorse, he opened his arms and she willingly—oh, so willingly !—allowed him to fold her in a strong embrace.

"I see it all now, dearest !" he declared, when he could master his emotion. "I have been wrong, very wrong ! Success has spoilt me. This little stage play of yours has done more than anything else could have done to show me where my real good fortune lies, and I shall never again forget that a good wife is better than all else !

"Kiss me, dear, and forgive me ! We are beginning again, but the path will be different and it will have more sunshine upon it, even although the world may not see it !"

F. Brewster.

HOW TO TAKE & FAKE PHOTOGRAPHS.

By CLIVE HOLLAND.

Author of "Practical Hints on Photography," "The Artistic in Photography," etc., etc.

Crown 8vo, Cloth, Price 1s., or post free 1s. 2d.

Some of the chapters are :

CHAP. I.—THE DARK ROOM. Its size—Fittings—Stock of Chemicals—Various uses.

CHAP. II.—CAMERAS, PLATES, AND FILMS. The choice of a camera—Shutters—Plates and their varieties—The various merits of plates and films, etc.

CHAP. IV.—Exposure. Testing speeds of plates—Tables, exposures—Plate speed table—Exposure hints—Don'ts, etc.

CHAP. V.—DEVELOPMENT OF NEGATIVES. Developers—Normal Development—Development of over-exposed and under-exposed plates—Local development—Intensification and reduction of negatives—Re-touching—Varnishing, etc., etc.

At all Railway Bookstalls and Booksellers.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

To the BOOK PUBLISHER,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of "How to Take and Fake Photographs," for which I inclose the sum of 1s. 2d.

Name.....

Address.....

.....

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIAL.

Held Apart

The Story of a Strange Double Fraud and its Influence upon some Young Hearts, a Great Name, and a Famous Fortune.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Author of "The Golden Dwarf," "A Daughter of Mystery," etc.

SOME INTERESTING PEOPLE.

John Davenal. A diver.
Hannah Davenal. His sister, maid to Lady Tarleton.
Moira. Supposed to be the diver's daughter.
Sir Guy Vanbrugh. Moira's lover.
Adeline, Lady Tarleton. His aunt.
Irene Tarleton. Her daughter.
Edward Stormont. Lady Tarleton's brother-in-law.
Paul Jerome. His friend, a war-correspondent and journalist, in love with Irene.
Dennis Hartigan. A ship's steward, and husband of Hannah.
"Kit" Hartigan. His sister, a blind girl.
Detective-Sergt. Ussher. Of Scotland Yard.

TWENTY-FIRST CHAPTER.

"What are you Going to Do?"

Mr. Ussher rubbed the dimple in his chin with the point of a bent knuckle.

"I—I thought perhaps, sir," he said dubiously, "that you yourself might make a few casual inquiries of her ladyship. Any questions on my part, sir, might so easily impress her ladyship with a sense of—of cross-examination. I should regret that, sir, extremely."

Edward Stormont inclined his head as if to acknowledge the detective's point of view.

"You are exceptionally considerate, Mr. Ussher," he replied, "but really I must decline to act as a deputy in the matter. My sister-in-law can have nothing to conceal. If she went out on the night in question she had adequate reason, if she did not she will tell us so and there's an end of it."

The door had opened as he spoke and the footman stepped through.

"Take my compliments to Lady Tarleton," he desired, "and say that I shall be glad if she can come down for a moment to the library. Add that Mr. Ussher is here."

The servant withdrew. Paul Jerome rose and approached his host.

"I have some letters to write, Stormont," he observed, tactfully; "I believe I will not intrude upon your consultation with Lady Tarleton and Mr. Ussher."

Edward Stormont laid a hand upon his shoulder.

"My dear fellow," he exclaimed, "don't desert me. If you only knew how heartily I detest the law and all that appertains to it, you would not leave me alone to wrestle with Mr. Ussher's official curiosity. However, he is but doing his duty, and we must humour him. I hope my sister-in-law will see his interrogations in the same light."

Mr. Ussher coughed. "I am most wishful, sir," he remarked, "not to appear officious or to exceed in any way the strict letter of my obligations. But, as I say, sir, I am bound to trace, and, if possible, to account for, every action of Hannah Davenal for some while before her murder. Not that I attach any importance to this story."

"Do not disquiet yourself, Mr. Ussher," interrupted the other, "I said 'official curiosity' not 'officious.' You must not do less, and we will even pardon your doing a trifle more than your duty."

He went to the door of the room. It had swung wide again, and Lady Tarleton was entering; he met her and placed a chair for her. She looked at the three men with an air of haughty expectation.

"My dear Adeline," began her brother-in-law, "you must forgive my sending for you instead of asking you to receive me. But Mr. Ussher here is in a more than ordinarily inquisitive mood, and his curiosity can only be satisfied at your hands. He has, it seems, dropped across some person, a gamekeeper, in fact, who is under the impression that a night or two prior to Davenal's death he—the gamekeeper—saw you and her in the park, at the traditionally mysterious hour of twelve o'clock p.m., if not, indeed, later."

Lady Tarleton raised to the detective a countenance on which surprise was stamped. The slightly-parted lips, the widely-opened eyes, the blank expression of the features—all counterfeited amazement to the life.

"My good man," she ejaculated, "you don't mean to say that you have come up to the Tower seriously to investigate an absurd story that I—that we—oh!" she broke off, with a harsh little laugh, "how ridiculous you police people can be. What, in Heaven's name, would take me out with Davenal in this wilderness—on foot and at midnight?"

Digitized by Google

Mr. Ussher cleared his throat.

"I told Mr. Stormont, my lady," he said, "that I attached no importance to the story—in—in one way. But the gamekeeper, my lady, was most precise with regard to the place (the neighbourhood of the mausoleum in the park), the time, and resemblance between Davenal's companion and yourself. And my object in consulting Mr. Stormont was to ascertain how far I should be well advised in treating the suggested resemblance as a clue."

"A clue!" Lady Tarleton was staring at him incredulously; "a clue to what?"

"It—it occurred to me, your ladyship," responded the detective, abashed, "that possibly some confidential mission—having no bearing upon the case, but still of a peculiarly private nature, some errand of mercy, or such-like—might have taken you, my lady, out of doors, even at so late an hour."

He cleared his throat once more—Lady Tarleton's scornful quiet was disconcerting.

"In which event," he pursued, "I should abandon my idea of tracking down this person who might be said to resemble you and who conceivably had held secret communications with Davenal. In addition, my lady, I might be called upon to observe a certain amount of tact in suppressing further and unnecessary references to the cause of your ladyship's excursion."

Lady Tarleton smiled disdainfully. "Really, Mr. Ussher," she said, "you are chivalry and discretion themselves. But your caution in this instance is wasted. Neither an errand of mercy nor any other errand took me out on the night immediately preceding Davenal's death or on the night preceding that. My servants can tell you at what hours I retired if you choose to question them."

Edward Stormont intervened. "I should imagine, Adeline," he commented, "that nothing could be more distant from Mr. Ussher's intentions. It is clear that he has got upon a point in connection with Davenal whose elucidation might throw a light upon her unfortunate death."

His sister-in-law shrugged her shoulders, but Edward Stormont persisted gently.

"Twenty-four hours or so before it," he continued, "she was seen in the park with a companion of about your height and appearance. What happened once may have happened again—she may have met the same person and been stealthily followed back to the Tower by her or by another. This mysterious woman may be, for all we know, the actual murderer. In any case, the clue is not to be neglected."

The detective made a solemn memorandum. "I am much obliged to you, sir," he said, "that is exactly my view of the affair, and I must thank her ladyship for dealing so frankly with the matter. I shall be glad if I may, for the present, consider that the subject of our conversation—the reported midnight meeting of Davenal with some woman—might be kept strictly to ourselves. Reference to it would very probably increase my difficulty in following up the clue which it undoubtedly suggests."

"Quite so," assented Edward Stormont, returning to his desk. "I presume there is nothing else, Mr. Ussher, upon which you wish to consult us?"

Mr. Ussher shook his head. "No, sir, thank you," he replied, yet lingered. "I trust your ladyship," he added, "will acquit me of any thought of discourtesy to herself."

"Certainly," said Lady Tarleton, negligently. "I am glad you feel there is a chance of the clue leading to something. I hope it may."

"I will do my best with it, my lady," answered the detective. He crossed the library to hold wide the door to which she was sweeping, and, with a low bow to Edward Stormont and a less profound inclination to Paul Jerome, stepped out after her, to leave the Tower by the rear entrance as Lady Tarleton ascended the great staircase.

When she had reached the upper landing she paused—to draw breath; she was disposed to corpulency, as the plumpness of her throat and wrists betrayed.

"That man," she said, "is a born blunderer. Yet, for a moment I fancied he was going to blunder into a——" She interrupted herself. "Bah!" she muttered, "he is too big a fool to be dangerous under any circumstances." And, having regained her breath, she pursued her way to the boudoir.

TWENTY-SECOND CHAPTER.

"Do Not Cross my Path Again."

"It is very, very strange."

Moira murmured the words to herself as she stood by the window of the little sleeping chamber which she shared with the blind girl. Near her was a highly-polished "tallboy" chest that occupied almost the whole of one wall of the apartment. An upper drawer of the set was open, she had taken from it the triangular fragment of metal that John Davenal had given to her on what might so easily have been his deathbed.

"If only one of the dates had been left!" she exclaimed abstractedly. "It would have been something. 'Born'—well, I do know my birthday, June the fifth, and I am nineteen when it comes round again. That would make me have been born in 'eighty-four.' But 'Died'—I haven't died—oh, dear, it is puzzling."

She examined the fragment of metal minutely. It had been a square, or possibly an oblong. The longest edge of the triangle was jagged and twisted, as though the plate had been severed by bending. Where the "n" in "Born" approached the torn margin there were portions of other engraved characters—they might have been the top sections of a "J" and a "u." But the "d" in "Died" was itself scarcely complete, and no guess could be hazarded at any detail of the date that presumably followed.

Moira relapsed into thought. Kit's childish experience on the breakwater suggested so much, and yet did not pass beyond suggestion by a hair's breadth. Something had been thrown from the granite pier as the blind girl sat unseen upon the landing-steps below; was it—could it have been something of which the mangled metal had formed part?

But the plate was palpably either a coffin or a memorial plate—was it, then, the former that had been consigned, seventeen years before, to the depths of Groudle Bay?

Moira passed a hand across her forehead, the riddle was as grim as it was profound. And the key to it, if key there were, did not seemingly lie in the possession of John Davenal, for he had spoken of one who "claimed" to be her father, and had added that he would be glad to learn that the claim was false.

Who, then, was the man who made the claim? And how had she been transferred from his care to that of the diver—how and why? Was it possible that the plate did not relate to her but to some kinswoman—whose name she bore—her mother, after whom she might well have been called; the name Moira was not a common one.

She shuddered as Kit's words came back to her—the words that the blind girl had heard. "This is out far enough—in with it." Was the incident a link in some dark and deadly chain, or was it the merest coincidence, singular but misleading?

Commonsense favoured the theory of coincidence. Yet she could not rid herself of the feeling that the broken plate, with its incomplete inscription, was in some fashion connected with her past, her present, her future.

After all, John Davenal had not told her the whole of the secret, even in so far as it was known to him. And to the diver such a connection had not seemed improbable, else why had he preserved the fragment?

Folding the metal in its indorsed white paper wrapping, Moira laid it in the drawer, locked the latter, and turned to the glass. She had been setting in order the upper rooms of the cottage, and her active movements had brought certain loose, fair tresses tumbling over her forehead

Digitized by Google

SERIAL STORY.

These restored to their proper position, she set the casement window wide and descended the narrow stairs. Half-way down she halted, checked by a call from the landing. The day-nurse—now the diver's sole professional attendant—was summoning her.

"Miss Davenal," she said, "will you lend me a hand for a moment?"

"Certainly, nurse," answered Moira, and ran back. "What—what is it?" she asked, a trifle anxiously. The nurse laughed at her.

"Nothing serious, dear," she said in a whisper, "only your father insists on having the bureau lifted to his bedside. He wants to read some old letters, he says, and really it is so difficult to keep him contented that he must have his way, seeing that he won't let me get them out for him. But the bureau is rather heavy for me to move alone."

She held up her finger as Moira stepped towards the door of the diver's room.

"Don't talk or stay," she observed, "he is doing famously, but I don't know how it is, the sight of you appears to excite him more than anything else. I did ask him about it, and he said you were all he had in the world, and the thought of being spared to be with you a while longer seemed too wonderful to be true."

Moira's lips trembled.

"He—he loves me very much," she faltered, "more than I deserve."

"Oh, I don't say 'Yes' to that," retorted the nurse, pushing wide the door of her patient's room. "Here is somebody who will help me, Mr. Davenal," she remarked cheerily; "since wilful man must have his way." And she went to an end of the heavy mahogany bureau. Moira, with a gentle glance at the diver, took the other.

John Davenal, propped up among his pillows, smiled wanly.

"I'm giving you a deal of trouble," he said, "and I'm afraid it's an awkward job for womenfolk. Yon old piece was old when I was a boy, and it's fine and solid. But it'll be a convenience to have it near, it'll do for a kind of table. And then I'm—I'm very restless, Moira, and I think I'd like to play at business for a little."

"It must only be play, then," the nurse warned him, as she brought his keys from the mantel. The diver pointed out the right one, and she unlocked the stout flap and drew it down. It projected over the bed. John Davenal regarded its proximity with a sort of contentment.

"That'll do nicely, thank you," he decided, and added wistfully, "won't you let Moira sit with me a bit?"

The nurse shook her head.

"No," she responded, "you will only talk whether she answers back or not. And, besides, you are to have another visitor this morning, Mr. Hartigan."

The diver's brows contracted.

"Aye," he said; "well, you've given me my way in one thing, nurse, so you shall have yours, though I can ill do to be without the sight of my lass. But I'm getting round fast now, Moira, and we'll have a long talk together one of these days."

"Yes, father, dear," assented Moira, and she slipped out.

From the stair-head she saw, to her surprise, that the entrance-door of the cottage stood wide. And in the hall-way at the foot was Dennis Hartigan. She descended to him, and he saluted her gruffly.

"Well," he asked, "and how's your dad to-day?"

"Going on very well," she told him, wondering vaguely why she was conscious of so instinctive a dislike of the ex-steward.

"That's good," he commented. "I'm to be allowed to see him this morning, I believe—by special request, so to speak."

"Yes," said Moira curtly. "I will ask if you can go up." She sought the landing again. The nurse had already stepped out on to it.

"Mr. Hartigan can come up," your father says, she intimated, and added explanatorily, "he heard his voice."

She glanced back into the room.

"Let Mr. Hartigan do the talking, now," she added. The diver nodded.

"I'll try and remember, nurse," he replied, and the door closed, leaving him momentarily alone. He guessed that the nurse had gone to supplement her warning with some words of advice to the visitor.

Swiftly the diver put out an arm to the bureau near him, whipped open a small hinged panel, lifted something out, and thrust it under the counterpane. A footfall sounded on the threshold of the room, the door swung in, and the ex-steward entered.

John Davenal, lying among his pillows, contemplated his visitor with a strange calm, quite unlike the usual weak passivity of the invalid. Dennis Hartigan stepped towards him with nervous strides and an air of awkward sympathy.

"I'm glad to see you again, John," he said; "we were afraid you were going to give us the slip. But, thank goodness, you seem in a fair way to cheat the undertaker."

"Aye," added John Davenal, "and the black-hearted scoundrel who tried to put an end to me."

He drew the bed-clothes up about his throat with his left hand—the right lay beneath the counterpane, hidden from the shoulder down.

"Yes," said the ex-steward, "but, to be candid, John, I am inclined on reflection to think that Moira and Kit are right and that you must have been attacked in mistake for someone else. You yourself can have no enemy who would be likely to do such a thing."

The diver seemed to be gazing into vacancy; a dark smile flickered upon his lips for a moment.

"A man," he answered, "may think he has no enemies, and yet may narrowly escape death at the hands of one. And that enemy, who struck an unsuspecting man at night and in the back, may live to stand, in his turn, face to face with death, and never dream of it."

"Sort of poetic justice, eh?" commented Dennis Hartigan, with a forced laugh, as he sat down by the bed-head. "Well, perhaps you're right. At all events, you are very sensible in making up your mind to leave the beggar to his fate. The police are apparently at their wits' end to find a clue to your assailant, and I gather from that worthy officer, Mr. Ussher, that they are beginning to adopt the theory of mistaken identity as the only means of explaining the attack on you."

John Davenal had changed his position when the ex-steward sat down; the diver, lying on his left side, still confronted his visitor with an odd, vigilant expression.

"I wanted to see you, Dennis," he said, "about—about Moira. We had been talking about her that night; we parted rather abruptly, I fear."

Dennis Hartigan snapped his fingers.

"Don't you worry about that," he replied. "I was a bit hot, myself. However, I've been thinking the matter over, and, at the moment, I won't press my claims to Moira. For the present, she may remain with you."

"For more than the present," said the diver resolutely; "for now and for always, Dennis Hartigan. Let there be no mistake about that. I have told Moira something of the truth; I mean to tell her the whole. Queer things have been passing through my mind as I have lain here, and I am as good as sure that Moira isn't your child, nor Hannah's. And whose child she is I intend to find out, for the lass' own sake, and at any cost."

The ex-steward rose slowly from his chair, his teeth showing between his parted lips.

"So that's your game, is it?" he snarled. "Well, as it happens, I was forewarned—how, it matters not. A wink is as good as a nod sometimes, and—and——"

He checked himself—a sudden cast of thought had shadowed his face; the passion died out of it, mastered by an evil shrewdness.

Digitized by Google

"You've a rare maggot in your brain now, John Davenal," he exclaimed, leaving his interrupted sentence unfinished to begin a new one, "and I suppose the best thing to do is to let you find out your mistake for yourself?"

The diver studied him.

"Aye," he said, "I expected you'd refuse to fight me, Dennis. But don't think I can't read you. You're laying a plan to play me some dog's trick or another; I can see it in your face. Mark me, Dennis Hartigan, I know you for what you are; seek to injure me or mine and I will put you where by rights you should be now, within the four walls of an English gaol."

Dennis Hartigan's jaw set and he extended a hand whose thick fingers shook with rage and hate.

"You fool!" he cried, in a hoarse whisper, "what do you mean—do you realise that I could throttle you as you lie there?"

His arms hovered over the diver's prostrate form, his nostrils were dilated, and his eyes glowed with a spasm of extravagant ferocity. John Davenal did not flinch.

"Stand away, Dennis Hartigan," he said coolly. "I did not escape your knife to fall a victim to your naked hands."

A low cry, like the suppressed threatening bark of a bull-terrier crouching for a spring, broke from the ex-steward, and catching up a spare pillow from the bed-foot, he swept it towards the diver's head.

Quick as was the motion, it was checked. The pillow remained suspended in the air. A steel-blue ring—the muzzle of a revolver-barrel protruded from the bed-clothes about John Davenal's chest, and the diver's finger nursed the trigger. His keen grey pupils had in them the quiet light of conscious power.

"Put yon pillow down," he said, "and listen to me."

Dennis Hartigan ground his teeth, and obeyed.

"Have your own way," he growled. "I only wanted to frighten you. You've an ill conscience, I'll be bound, or you wouldn't have that thing so handy."

The diver paid no heed to this clumsy attempt at a diversion.

"I don't doubt that you think me a fool, Dennis," he said, "but I should have been a bigger fool than you think me if I couldn't have argued out that the man whose schemes—whatever they were—I was thwarting, was the one most likely to have attempted my life. Especially, Dennis, when that man is such a man as you."

The ex-steward sneered.

"Stow gassing," he exclaimed. "What's your next move?"

John Davenal was silent for a while.

"I would ask you for the whole truth about Moira," he said, "but you would only tell me a skein of lies and laugh in your sleeve at my folly in believing them. There is no one who saw you lurking at my own gate to give me that coward's blow, nor can I swear I saw or heard you myself. You may go, Dennis Hartigan, and if you are wise, you will get out of Groudle. As for Moira, she is mine, and shall remain mine until someone with a better right than you offers to take her from me. Go, and do not cross my path again."

Dennis Hartigan stood irresolute. The diver still covered him with the revolver.

"Be warned, Dennis," the ex-steward was told, "raise a finger to meddle with Moira and, no matter what price I pay for it, I will take away for ever the evil shadow that you have flung across her happiness."

The other laughed. "That means," he added, "that you will swing for me. By Jove, I am almost inclined to let you."

John Davenal lifted the revolver clear of the bedclothes.

"There is more than a single bullet in this," he rejoined significantly, "and Moira has a sweetheart who will take care of her. But whether I died on the scaffold or by my own hand, Dennis Hartigan, Moira would be out of your power. Yet I am loth to stain my soul with blood, and if you will go away I will be content."

His brother-in-law lingered, with clenched fingers and

(Continued overleaf.)

WESLEY'S THEORY OF EARTHQUAKES.

"The cause of earthquakes," said John Wesley, "is sin." How he reasoned it out is not easy for the average sinner to see. The idea of such a tremendous physical convulsion as an earthquake resulting from the violation of moral law is nonsense in the eyes of modern science. The reverse is more often true. "The cause of a deal of sin," said Hannah Moore, "is bile." That we can see through. Bile poisons the brain, and the brain is the organ of the mind. It is certain that all the earthquakes that ever shook this wicked world never did half the damage that is done every year by sleepy stomachs and lazy livers. Generals have lost battles, statesmen have been beaten in diplomacy, workmen have been thrown out of jobs, clergymen have preached poor sermons, and husbands and wives have quarrelled for no reason under the sun but "a touch of liver complaint." The crust of society can never lie quiet with such a force as biliousness under it.

Writing of a time five years ago, a lady asserts that she had not strength to work. She suffered acutely with a sharp stabbing pain down the right side and between the shoulder-blades. Her appetite failed, of course, for Nature never calls for food when she is not in a condition to use it. Still a trifle of sustenance must be taken. The lady took it, digested a bit of it, and suffered great distress from the presence of the rest in the torpid stomach, when, indeed, it was not vomited, as was often the case. We need scarcely add that her sleep was disturbed and failed to refresh her. To quote her own words, "I arose in the morning with a splitting headache and a feeling of utter weakness and prostration. My tongue was furred, I was tired, lacked energy, became irritable and bad tempered, and could have quarrelled with my best friend."

Now what sort of a life is this to lead? What is anybody good for while in such a state as that? What would you wager on your own success in business if you had to pit yourself against other people's sharpness, while you had to fight with a poison-soaked head and a stomach that refused its breakfast? Not a crooked sixpence.

Our correspondent continues: "The doctor told me I was suffering from an enlarged liver, but his medicines gave me no relief, and I began to give up all hope of ever getting better, when I was advised by a friend to try Mother Seigel's Syrup. Before I had finished the first bottle my health improved. As I continued taking the Syrup my health was gradually restored, and I have had no recurrence of my complaint since. If ever I feel run down I take a dose or two of the Syrup and it seems to put new life into me. Signed, Agnes Gatley, 3 Boundary Terrace, Moss Nook, Nr. Cheadle, Ches."

The success of Seigel's Syrup in curing this malady is due to the fact that it goes straight as an arrow to the very root and source of it, the paralysed digestion.

Whatever may be the true theory of Earthquakes we may be sure of one thing anyway—namely that bile in the blood, arising from an arrest of the digestive function, is the hot-bed of more sorrow, pain and death than all the powers at the interior of the earth ever scattered over its surface.

Digitized by Google

twitching nostrils, gazing at the prostrate man on the disordered couch. Then, reluctantly, he moved towards the door. The diver's aim followed him indomitably. At length, with a shrug and a muttered volley of profanity, the ex-steward opened the door, slid through, and closed it behind him.

Stealthily he descended the stairs, and, unlatching the hall door at their foot, stepped out unobserved.

TWENTY-THIRD CHAPTER.

"Known as Moira Davenal."

THE afternoon had grown late and the westering sun stared dazzlingly at the ex-steward as he went down the garden, let himself out at the wicket, and stalked along the edge of the little harbour.

He was muttering viciously in a kind of savage soliloquy—the completeness with which the diver had read him and the suddenness of his discomfiture had entered deep into Dennis Hartigan's mean soul.

The on-coming evening had chilled the warmth of the Spring afternoon and he went in to the Half Brick to drink a glass of spirits and order some food. There was a cheerful fire in the bar-parlour, he ate his meal near it and then sat over the hearth, smoking.

The darkness settled down over Groudle, the bar-parlour filled with its coterie of privileged gossips, and talk and the clink of glass and pewter waxed general. At last Dennis Hartigan awakened sulkily to the invasion of his solitude, knocked the ashes from his pipe, and rising, sauntered out of the Half Brick.

As he passed through the bar of the inn, he checked his watch against the clock over the mantel. The time was half-past nine.

Once outside, the ex-steward struck into the open country, found a stack-yard at the rear of an outlying farm, and mounted beneath the corrugated iron roof that covered the loaf-shaped piles of hay. Here, on a soft and fragrant couch, Dennis Hartigan composed himself for a species of cat-nap. So lightly did he sleep that each of the chimed quarters floating from the distant parish church disturbed him.

One by one he marked them attentively. At the second quarter after eleven, he shook off his slumbers, descended, and made for the ring-fence that shut in the park of Groudle Tower. Climbing it, he entered the demesnes beyond, and in due course, gained the grim, domed edifice where, in their last cold slumber, lay the former holders of the great estate.

The ex-steward sat down on a low-growing bough in the shadow of a plantation; he fidgeted uneasily on his extempore seat and swung his legs in frequent spasms of restlessness. Finally he got up and walked out upon the turf that described a circle about the grassy hollow which contained the windowless stone building.

His eyes, ranging this way and that through the dusk, perceived at length an indistinct, moving figure that shunned the moonlight and darted from shadow to shadow on the fringe of the plantation.

Dennis Hartigan took refuge behind a breast-high clump of evergreens and waited. Crossing the glade in front of him, the figure paused, and, to see the better, lifted from her face a corner of a dark and heavy shawl. The wearer was Lady Tarleton.

The ex-steward stayed where he was, enjoying her perplexity awhile. As she passed on, with a gesture of impatience, he stepped out and halted in her path. She looked up and saw him.

"Oh," she said; "so you are here?"

"And what is equally to the purpose," retorted Dennis Hartigan impudently; "you are. Have you brought the money?"

"I have," he was told; "three thousand pounds in bank-notes."

"Good!" exclaimed the ex-steward; "let me have a squint at them."

Lady Tarleton hesitated.

"Might we—might we not be observed here?" she asked, almost nervously. "I have come as cautiously as I could, of course, yet there are the game-keepers to think of. The park is a haunt of ground-game poachers and the keepers are always on the alert."

"Humph!" said Dennis Hartigan; "well, we'll be on the safe side and get back into the plantation. But I'll want a glimpse of those notes and there's not much light except in the open."

Lady Tarleton unfolded a package and held it out, retaining it by a corner. Dennis Hartigan fluttered the flimsy sheets, straining his eyes over them in the moonbeams.

"One, two, three, four, five, six," he counted; "and for five hundred a piece. Very well, I'll tell you what I promised to before I ask for 'em."

He strode into the group of young trees behind them and Lady Tarleton followed him.

"Well," she said, and her voice quivered with eagerness; "where is the child?"

"In Groudle," answered the ex-steward.

"In Groudle!" gasped Lady Tarleton; "how—how imprudent!"

"It pays sometimes to do imprudent things, my lady," retorted Dennis Hartigan; "it stood to reason we wouldn't be expected to plant the kid down so near home. Consequently she was safest there if anything was ever suspected. But that wasn't our chief reason, we wanted the child carefully nursed up; if she was badly-managed and died, where were we?"

"Y—yes," stammered the other; "but there are—there were plenty of good foster-mothers out of Groudle."

"Maybe," admitted the ex-steward; "however, we did better than find a foster-mother. We put her with Hannah's own people and there she is to this day. We told them her right Christian name, Moira, and she is known as Moira Davenal. She is supposed to be John Davenal's daughter."

Lady Tarleton tottered.

"A bit startling, isn't it?" Dennis said; "and now you know the truth and I've earned my three thou."

He took the notes audaciously from her grasp. The action served to recall Lady Tarleton from her stupor.

"Oh," she murmured, "it is impossible—it can't be!"

The ex-steward laughed.

"It's true," he said; "go and look at the girl. Look at her red hair—that's her mother's; look at her blue eyes—those are her father's."

Lady Tarleton clutched his arm.

"Yes, yes!" she exclaimed; "I believe you. I see it all now. And you will do as you said? You—you will get her out of the way? She must be got out of the way—for more reasons than you can guess. She must, I say!"

Dennis Hartigan flung off the eager, desperate grasp. "I'll do my part of the bargain," he answered; "not but what I could make a better, if I went to Sir Guy Vanbrugh, who's sweet on the girl. He wouldn't mind being brought, through his wife, to the ownership of Groudle Tower."

Lady Tarleton snatched at him again. "You won't," she said; "you sha'n't. I will pay anything, anything. It would be ruin for me—ruin! Guy Vanbrugh is to marry my daughter—it has always been understood!"

The ex-steward released himself. "Make your mind easy," he rejoined; "I've a bone of my own to pick with John Davenal. No man shall ever say he bested me and didn't live to regret it. Good-night to you, my lady, and—wait."

He turned abruptly from her and vanished into the depths of the plantation. Lady Tarleton remained standing, lost in thought. The sound of a voice aroused her—a voice not that of Dennis Hartigan. She retreated more closely into her place of concealment.

"Mind how you go, Mr. Ussher, sir," said the voice, and the tread of cautious feet went by. Lady Tarleton peered out and saw, by the light of a fitful moonbeam, that struggled into the grove, the tall form of the detective himself. With him was a man in the rough garments and the hard cloth gaiters of a gamekeeper.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

COMPLEXION AND HAIR.

We receive, from day to day, many letters from readers asking us how to clear the complexion of Blackheads, Freckles, Tan, Redness, etc. The most marvellous preparation that we know of is "PERALIA," manufactured by the "Peralia" Perfumery Co. of North Shields. This wonderful liquid, while it instantly beautifies the complexion, and removes all obnoxious excrescences, such as pimples and blotches, is perfectly harmless, and its purity is guaranteed by a well-known medical man, whose certificate accompanies each bottle. Besides acting on the above, "PERALIA," by frequent application, will remove wrinkles, crow's feet, and, in fact, entirely rejuvenate the features. This is due to its penetrating action, as it makes its way through the pores of the skin, exerting its beneficial effect on each and every one, and cleansing it effectually from dirt, callous growth, and decayed tissue. "PERALIA" is, in our opinion, the only beauty specific that does its work in such a thorough and scientific manner. It is the most successful remedy we have to aid us in the fight against the ravages of either Time or Disease. If you feel that your beauty is waning, or that fine complexion being marred by disfiguring humours, you should at once have recourse to "PERALIA."

We cannot speak too highly of this preparation. Readers can obtain it of all chemists, in bottles, at 1s., 1s. 6d., and 2s. 6d., but the proprietors offer to send a sample bottle, under cover, on receipt of the price, and 3d. postage.

In conclusion we must say a word for their unique preparation "CRIMPOLINE" for curling the hair. Most women, and all young girls are extremely anxious about their hair being trim, and yet having that graceful curly appearance that is so attractive. Unlike other curling fluids, "CRIMPOLINE" is not sticky, nor greasy, and curls the hair so much that once the hair becomes curly you need not continue using it. The rain does not take the curl out of the hair either after using "CRIMPOLINE," so you need not fear that washed-out, bedraggled look again.

It is used and recommended by Madame Patti, Vesta Tilley, Minnie Palmer, etc. Prices, 1s. 9d. and 2s. 6d. per bottle. When sending for, or ordering, "PERALIA," we advise you also to send for "CRIMPOLINE." Don't forget the address, "PERALIA" PERFUMERY CO., Dept. 14, Camden Street, North Shields.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

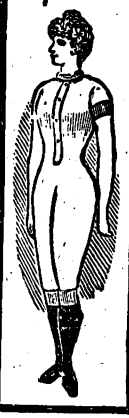
REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM (CLOTTED)

absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil; invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1s. 4d.; 1lb. 2s. 4d.; 2lbs. 4s. 4d., free, supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by

MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon.

Unprecedented Offer

FOR LADIES ONLY.



2/- Per Pair

We have secured a consignment of exceptionally good wearing, nicely finished, unshrinkable, woven, that we are offering at the remarkably low price of 2/- per pair, only so long as our present stock remains unsold. Beautifully shaped, perfect fitting, trimmed self-coloured torchon edging.

NATURAL COMBINATIONS

2 pairs for 3/10; 4 pairs for 7/6

Postage 4d. extra.

High Neck, Short Sleeves. Colors: Natural and Pink. With Smocked Knees, 6d. extra.

In three sizes—Small, Women's, Medium. Extra large size, 6d. extra.

Special Purchase White Spencers

1/3 each. Postage 2d. extra.

CHILDREN'S COMBINATIONS,

Same quality, in six sizes, from 1/3 per pair.

Better take advantage of this offer to-day—it may not appear again. State size and color.

MONEY REFUNDED IF NOT APPROVED.

Illustrated Catalogue of General Drapery Costumes, Skirts, and many useful lines at bargain prices; post free everywhere.

T. & J. ROBERTS, Dept. 16, Moorhead, SHEFFIELD.

10,000 RUGS GIVEN AWAY

GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

This Phenomenal Offer is made to the readers of Short Stories (2/5/1903) only. On receipt of Postal Order for 5/-, or 62 stamps, we will forward, DIRECT FROM OUR LOOMS to your address, one of our 10/6 genuine SEAMLESS WOVEN, REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, etc., handsomely bordered and woven in 30 different patterns, and large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room. These Carpets will be sold as an Advertisement for our goods, below the Actual Cost of production. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained direct from our Looms, thus saving the purchasers all middle profits.

With every Carpet we shall ABSOLUTELY GIVE AWAY a very Handsome Rug to match, or we will send Two Carpets and Two Rugs for 9/6.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED. THOUSANDS OF UNSOLICITED TESTIMONIALS RECEIVED.

GALAXY ILLUSTRATED BARGAIN CATALOGUES OF CARPETS, HEARTHRUGS, TABLE LINEN, CURTAINS, ETC., POST FREE,

if mentioning Short Stories (2/5/1903) while writing.

Cheques and P.O.'s payable to

F. HODGSON & SONS (Dept. S.T.S.) Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants,

WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Digitized by Google

Rupture Free Cure.

Wonderful Home Treatment that Cures Without Pain or Loss of Time.

Dr. W. S. Rice (Dept. 953), 8 & 9, Stonecutter Street, London, E.C., has invented a method that cures rupture without pain, danger, operation, or an hour's loss of time from the day's work. To avoid all questions of doubt, he sends free to every sufferer a free trial of his method, and there can be no earthly reason why anyone, rich or poor, should not avail themselves of this generous offer. As an instance of this remarkable method, the cure of Mr. John Foulkes, 317, Beaufort Street, Toxteth Park, Liverpool, is well worth noticing. Mr. Foulkes is 74 years of age, and had suffered from a scrotal rupture for nine years. He used Dr. Rice's home method of treatment, and in a short time was cured sound as a bell. A full description and sample of this remarkable method of cure will be gladly sent upon application. It has cured thousands. Do not hesitate to give it a trial. Write at once—to day.

Mr. J. FOULKES.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

THE REMEDY FOR THE PEOPLE.

RECOMMENDED BY FRIENDS TO FRIENDS.

are

NOT PUSHED BY DOUBTFUL METHODS.

DESERVING OF THEIR POPULARITY.

NOW ENJOYING A GREATER SUCCESS THAN EVER.

STILL WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

Patronised by Royalty.

TRIUMPH Cycles

10 Guineas AND 15 Guineas } Or from a Guinea per month.

The Best Bicycle that British Workmanship can produce.

TRIUMPH CYCLE Co., Ltd., COVENTRY.

4 & 5, Holborn Viaduct, E.C. 30, Deansgate Arcade, Manchester

CHICKEN HATCHING EXTRAORDINARY FOR 2/6

The Texas Egg-Hatcher and Rearer combined supersedes all incubators. Hatches above and rears little ones below simultaneously all the year round. A money-making home industry requiring neither capital nor labour. Turns 1d. eggs into valuable Chickens or Ducklings. Millions selling in America. 15-egg size 2/6; 30-egg, 5/-; complete for use. Address, AMERICAN POULTRY SYNDICATE (Room 101), 7 Albion Grove, Stoke Newington, London. N.

Ten Days Free Trial

is allowed on every cycle we sell. The full price and all carriage charges returned if unsatisfactory in any way.

1903 Models, fully warranted,

£3.10 to £6.10

New Departure Coaster Brake Front Rim Brake and highest grade genuine British made fittings and accessories.

200 Good Second-Hand Cycles £1.10 to £2.10

Don't Fail to get our big illustrated catalogue before deciding on your 1903 machine. We save you money.

Rider Agents Wanted in every district to buy sample cycle at special price and take orders for us. Large profits easily made in spare time. Address Dept. 6D.

MEAD CYCLE CO. Liverpool.

GIVEN AWAY

With next week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 486)

A PAPER PATTERN of this

GIRL'S SMOCKED BLOUSE.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

"As a specific for Toothache it has no equal. I have used it successfully for years."—Prof. W. WILSON, M.D.

THE BEST FAMILY MEDICINE

KAYE'S WORSDELL'S PILLS

Are a certain Cure for Indigestion, Biliousness, Headache, Dyspepsia, Constipation, Liver and Kidney Complaints etc. For Ladies of all ages they are invaluable.

Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d. and 4s. 6d. per box.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Cunham, 67 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watmall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Coniston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

Digitized by Google

An Impossible Task.

"Arthur says he wants to get out of debt before he marries me." "I didn't suppose he'd trifle with any girl's affections in that way."

A Deep-Laid Plot.

George: "Who is that beautiful girl over there?" Amelia: "Why, George, that's a mirror—it's me!" George: "————?" Amelia (blushing): "Yes, George."

How the Colour Came.

She (poetical): "Do you notice, darling, what beautiful azure tints the sun lends to the bosom of the ocean?" He (practical): "That, my dear, is the dye out of some of those cheap bathing suits."

Why She Loved.

"And do you love me for what I am, or for what I was?" cooingly asked the millionaire with one foot in the grave. "For what you will be, dearest!" ambiguously replied the poor girl with a living to make.

He'd Overdone It.

She: "You remember what you promised before we were married? You said you would make every effort to make yourself worthy of me." He: "Yes, and the result was that I overdid it, and made myself better than you deserve."

A Doubtful Compliment.

Miss Pretty: "I don't see how you whistle through your fingers that way. I'm sure I could never do it." Mr. Goodheart (wishing to compliment her delicate little hands): "No, Miss Pretty, if you should try it, your whole hand would slip into your mouth."

What She Wouldn't Do.

"Oh," she suddenly explained, "I wish I were a man!" "What would you do?" he asked. "I'll not say what I would do, but there is one thing I will confess that I wouldn't do." "And that is——?" "I wouldn't sit as if I had handcuffs on when I happened to be alone with a girl."

Foiled Again!

"I know I am poor," he protested, "while you are the heiress to at least half a million!" "Barely £150," she faltered. "Foiled again!" hissed Antonio McFogarty, the income-tax assessor, tearing off his false whiskers and plunging away into the night, while mocking laughter rang in his ears.

Her Valuable Present.

"I asked for a lock of your hair," he said reproachfully, "and now I find that, instead of giving me a lock from your own head, you gave me a lock of false hair." "And you doubt me because of that?" she asked. "Naturally," he replied. "But you do not realise that the false hair is the more costly?" Thus were his suspicions put at rest.

We're Made of Dust, You Know.

He: "I could kiss the dust you walk on." She: "What's the matter with the dust that does the walking?"

What He'd Like to Get Her.

She: "We must get the cook something for the summer." He: "Yes. I'd like to get her another situation."

Must Be Kissed.

He: "Your sweet face is my book of life. I swear it." She: "But your oath is not valid until you have kissed the book."

Thought She was First.

Millie: "What does this motto on the ring mean?" Willie: "Faithful to the last." "The idea! I thought I was the first!"

Fine Place to Get Butter.

She: "I understand that matter weighing one pound on the moon's surface, if transferred to the earth, would weigh six pounds." He: "Can't you manage to buy your butter up there, dear?"

No Fear On That Account.

"When you play that sonata," said a teacher to his pupil, "you must show off your fingering as much as possible." "Don't you fear about that," she responded; "I'll have a finger-ring on every finger."

Her Gentle Hint.

"You sketch with a free hand," remarked the professor, who had been critically examining her portfolio. "Entirely free," said the lady, as she cast down her eyes in soft confusion, and waited for the professor to follow up the opening.

It was Not a Flower!

Just she and I, all all alone beneath the stars so calm and bright; I told her that to me her cheeks were like twin lilies pure and white, but in the morning, as I brushed my powdered vest for half an hour, I realised the lilies must have been some other kind of flour.

A Difficult Point.

Chappie: "What is troubling you, deah boy?" Chollie: "Maud says I must awsk her fathaw's consent, and I don't know how to manage it this time of year. If I leave the door open when I go into his office I'll let in a dwaght and make him angwy; but if I close it I cut off my wetweat."

His Part of the Bargain.

New Son-in-law: "Ahem! You remember, Mr. Oldchap, you said that after we were married you would assist me in the matter of furnishing a house." Mr. Oldchap: "Certainly, my boy, certainly. Come round the corner with me and I'll introduce you to a friend of mine who is in the instalment business."

Feminine Jealousy.

Miss Jellus: "Your bedroom must be a very healthy place, dear?" Miss Prettiface: "What makes you think so?" "Because I have noticed that when you are downstairs sometimes you are dreadfully pale; but if you go up into your bedroom for a short time, you come down with a beautiful colour!"

Proper Sort of Work.

He was an unkempt-looking fellow, and he stopped at the suburban residence and asked for employment. The lady of the house was superintending the transplanting of the plants. The door of the greenhouse was open. "Are you a gardener?" asked the woman. "Ain't had much experience." "Can't you plant these flowers?" "I hate to risk spoilin' 'em, ma'am." "Then what can you do?" "Well, ma'am, if you'll give me one o' your husband's cigars," he replied meditatively, "I'll sit in the greenhouse an' smoke out the insects that's eatin' up the leaves of them rose-bushes."

Digitized by Google

IN CONFIDENCE

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Should He Give Presents?

"JOHN R." wishes to know if it is necessary for him to give his sweetheart presents. He has been engaged for a year, but so far has never given her anything. She has never hinted anything on the subject. "JOHN R." has not a very large income, and is saving as much as he can against their approaching wedding.

* * * * *

I do not think it is necessary to give your sweetheart presents solely for the sake of doing so. Love should not require to be proved in such a material way. If you remember her birthday, and perhaps Christmas, under the circumstances you might regard your duty as done in that respect. When a man once starts giving a girl presents, he more or less pledges himself to continue doing so, which often means a great waste of money. You are better advised in saving up for the future.

❦❦❦

Testing a Lover.

"RENE" is in love with a young fellow, but cannot decide whether or not he returns the feeling. He is very loving, she says, but has not said whether or not he likes being with her. She has been with him for about three years, and though he has often asked her to go with him to the theatre, she has always refused. Would it be correct to accept such invitations?

* * * * *

You can scarcely expect the fellow to prove whether he loves you if you do not give him an opportunity of declaring himself. If you are so fond of him, I should accept as many invitations from him as he offers. He may be as doubtful as to your love for him as you are of his for you. Go to the theatre with him, and see how things develop.

❦❦❦

A Faint Heart.

"FAINTHEARTED" knows a young lady whom he greatly admires. He often passes her on his way home, but has never had the courage to address her. He cannot obtain an introduction to her, and knows nobody who is acquainted with her, but is aware that she has not got a lover. What would I advise him to do?

* * * * *

In the first instance get a copy of Pearson's Weekly for April 2nd, in which you will find an article entitled "Strategy for Sweethearts." It will give you some instances similar to your own, in which fainthearted men have ultimately succeeded in winning fair ladies. If you lack courage you should try to devise some means like those sketched out for getting to know the young lady you refer to.

A Tale of Two Girls.

"DONALD" is engaged, but early this winter went away from home for a long tour. While away he met a girl with whom he fell violently in love. She did not appear to object to his advances, and even allowed him to kiss her. After some weeks of flirtation, she incidentally told him she was engaged herself. It was a great shock to him. When he returned home he again saw his own fiancée, and after a day or two in her society felt he loved her as much as ever. A week or so later, he again met the other girl, and was as violently enamoured of her as before. Which of the two girls is in my opinion the one "DONALD" really loves at heart?

* * * * *

Before even considering your own feelings, "DONALD," there is the question of honour. You are engaged to a girl who evidently possesses your affection. No matter what infatuation you might develop, can you, as an honourable man, wish to act in a shabby way towards her?

* * * * *

Further, the other girl is, you say, herself engaged. She appears to me to be a flirt. I don't imagine she really cares for you. Probably the thought that she was gradually drawing your affections from your own fiancée inspired her with a mischievous feeling. I should see as little of her as possible. Stick to the girl who has proved her love for you, and with whom you say you are quite happy. You will soon get over an infatuation.

❦❦❦

Feeding the Husband's Friend.

"FRANCES" is a married woman whose husband brings home friends to dinner or supper. She likes to treat them as well as possible, as they are very often business friends, yet it generally happens that she has nothing in the house for more than two. How should I advise her to arrange on such occasions?

* * * * *

Your husband ought not to bring home people without giving you a hint first. It is very inconsiderate to a housewife. But if it happens that he cannot help himself, it would be a good plan for you to have things in the house ready for such occasions.

* * * * *

Say you stored a tin or so of soup, some curry powders, and some savouries, such as anchovies, sardines, and so on you might be able at very short notice to put on quite a nice little spread for your husband's guests. For advice on the preparations of them I advise you to write to ISOBEL in Pearson's Weekly, who is expert at those things.

❦❦❦

An Estrangement.

"ELLA" used constantly to meet a young man, and thought that he was in love with her. He used to seek her out, and to take her to places of amusement. They lost sight of each other for some months, and now he scarcely even speaks to her. Do I think he can no longer care for her, or what would explain such conduct?

* * * * *

Evidently your relations are not the same as before. I suppose he has met another girl, or more probably is worried about something, and is, therefore, not socially disposed. But speculate as one may, it is very difficult for a woman to get the real reason for a man's seeming estrangement.

* * * * *

Men's interests in life are so varied, and if we went into the matter, we should probably find that we women occupy very much less of their thoughts than we imagine. I should avoid worrying the young man. Treat him as distantly as he treats you. If he cares for you he will sooner or later seek you out again.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Constipation

AND LIVER COMPLAINT COMPLETELY CURED.

MRS. S. NICHOLLS, Edge Hill Lane, Four Oaks, Sutton Coldfield, Birmingham, suffered for two years from liver troubles, constipation, and but recently was completely cured of both complaints. Interviewed by a Birmingham Telegram reporter with regard to this cure, Mrs. Nicholls said:

"I used to have dizzy sounds."

"For two years I have been a dreadful sufferer from pains arising from liver complaint. They were the worst in my head, but I also had them across my sides, back, and shoulders. I used to have dizzy rounds, which made me feel very bad; indeed, I never felt well. In consequence of acute constipation my sufferings were severe, and I had painful sensations across the region of my kidneys. I obtained some medicine from a doctor, but this did not give me any permanent relief. A short time back I saw a testimonial in a local paper from someone who had suffered worse than I did for years with liver complaint, and had been cured by Bile Beans for Biliousness. I determined to try Bile Beans, and sent for a Box. The effect they had upon me was highly beneficial. The pains gradually ceased, and the attacks of giddiness became less frequent. By persevering with the Beans the constipation has now entirely left me. I am also cured of the liver complaint, and am glad to say I now enjoy good health." "Would you recommend Bile Beans to other sufferers?" queried the reporter. "Indeed I would. Bile Beans have done me such a great deal of good that I can recommend them to anyone suffering as I did. You can make what use you like of these few facts, for I should like others besides myself to benefit by the use of Bile Beans."

Bile Beans for Biliousness are the product of modern scientific research, and, therefore thoroughly up-to-date. They do not merely purge, giving temporary relief only, and leaving the patient weakened, like the out-of-date, so called remedies of forty or fifty years ago, which contain probably aloes, mercury, and other harmful drugs. Bile Beans, without the slightest discomfort, prompt the liver and digestive organs to act in Nature's normal way, leaving those organs strengthened and stimulated to continue the performance of their duties without further assistance. They produces a gentle action on the bowels, curing or preventing constipation, cleansing the stomach, and ridding the system of all impurities. Do not be misled by claims of half a hundred pills in the box where probably four to six constitute a dose, and the doses cannot be discontinued. One Bile Bean is one dose. They can be discontinued after the cure is effected; they are purely vegetable; they do not contain any harmful drugs, and they are the safest family medicine.

Bile Beans for Biliousness are a permanent and speedy cure for Headache, Influenza, Constipation, Piles, Liver Troubles, Bad Breath, Liver Chill, Indigestion, Flatulence, Dizziness, Pimples, Blood Impurities, Buzzing in the Head, Debility, Spring Ailments, Anæmia, and all Female Ailments. Of all Medicine Vendors, Price 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. per box (large box contains three times quantity small size).

Bile Beans FOR Biliousness

, ASK YOUR BUTCHER FOR

Swift's

AMERICAN

BEEF

Choice and Tender.

Patent

Dry Cleaning

What is it? A novel system of cleaning by means of scientifically distilled Spirit, without in any way affecting the material, altering the colour, or affecting the shape of it.

What will it clean? Dresses, Jackets, Blouses, Dressing Gowns, Overcoats, Suits & Trousers, Tapestry, Cloth, and Chenile Curtains, Table Covers, Carpets & Rugs.

Where is it done? at JOHNSON B OS., BOOTLE DYE WORKS, LIVERPOOL.

SEND POST-CARD, and address of nearest branch will be sent you. 150 Branches in London and Provinces.

SOLD BY ALL UP-TO-DATE DEALERS

THE "OCEANIC"

THE UP-TO-DATE

HALF-GUINEA

BRITISH BOOT.

STYLISH—DAINTY
DURABLE—COMFORTABLE

ASK FOR AND SEE THE STAMP 'OCEANIC' INSIDE EVERY BOOT.

MACKINTOSH'S

Is DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!

PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.

A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

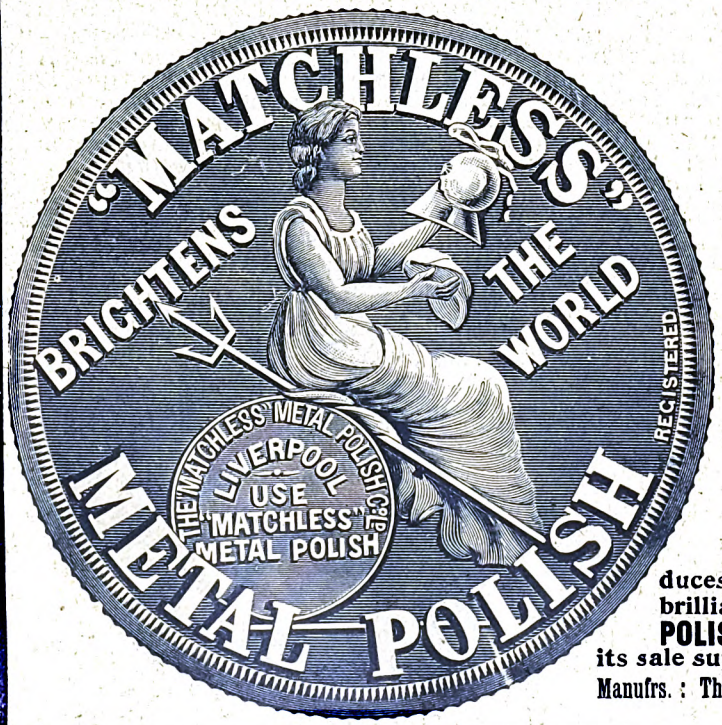
EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE



EVERY BRITISH HOUSE-WIFE

should polish all metals with it too. Most foreign polishes set up acid and are sticky in use, and require hard work. "MATCHLESS" Metal Polish spreads evenly over the metal, and produces easily and quickly a lasting brilliancy. "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH is made wholly in England, and its sale supports British Labour.

Manufrs.: The "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH CO., LTD., LIVERPOOL.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 749.] Week ending May 9th, 1903. [Price One Penny.

HE STOPPED IN AMAZEMENT. IRENE WAS ABOUT TO ADMINISTER A HYPODERMIC INJECTION OF MORPHINE.

(A Dramatic Incident from the Story, "Saving the Situation." See inside.)

A KODAK for 5/-

The No. 1 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 2½ by 2½ Inches.

Despite its small size and low price the No. 1 BROWNIE is a thoroughly efficient little camera, and yields photographs as clear and distinct as possible. No dark room is needed for changing the films. In use the Brownie Kodak is simplicity itself.

THE NEW BROWNIE KODAK

The No. 2 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 3½ by 2½ Inches.

MARVELLOUS VALUE PRICE 10/- ONLY.

Finders for vertical and horizontal pictures. Everset time and instantaneous shutter. New and convenient spool-holding devices. Improved non-detachable winding key. Loaded and unloaded in daylight.

Ask for the Kodak Catalogue of all Photographic Dealers or of

KODAK LTD., 43 Clerkenwell Road, London, E.C.

Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold Street, Liverpool; 72-74 Buchanan Street, Glasgow. Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, London, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, London, E.C.; 115 Oxford Street, London, W.; 171-173 Regent Street, London, W.; 40 West Strand, W.C.

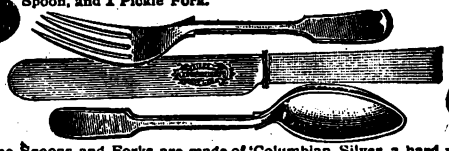
GRAVES' CUTLERY

.. THE ..

'ENTERPRISE' PARCEL, 25/-

OF HOUSEHOLD CUTLERY AND PLATE

CONTAINS: 6 Table Knives and 6 Dessert Knives, made of reliable Sheffield Steel and fitted with polished white 'Ivorette' Handles. "Ivorette" is the best substitute for genuine African Ivory. The Plate consists of 6 Table Forks, 6 Dessert Forks, 2 Table Spoons, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Tea Spoons, 6 Egg Spoons, 2 Mustard Spoons, 2 Salt Spoons, 1 Pair of Sugar Tongs, 1 Moist Sugar Spoon, and 1 Pickle Fork.



The Spoons and Forks are made of 'Columbian Silver, a hard white metal. It is the finest substitute for Sterling Silver known, will wear white throughout, and is unaffected by acids or exposure.

J. G. Graves is the only manufacturer who supplies the Public Direct.

HOW TO PAY. Send 5/- with order and complete the purchase in five more monthly payments of 4/-; or HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT for full cash payment. If not satisfied, return the Parcel, and your deposit will be refunded in full.

Send for our Illustrated Booklet "CUTLERY THAT WEARS," post free.

J. G. GRAVES,
69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

Good Agents Wanted in spare time. No Risk. Good Pay.

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

Free Wheels. New Departure Hub, Bowden Brakes. All Improvements—Lamp, Bell, &c. Carriage paid.

For Cash or 12 Monthly Payments of

Carr. Paid. £3 3s. 15/10 | £9 10s 17/8
£9 16/8 | £10 5s. 19/3

Juno Motor Cycle is the King of Motor Cycles, £32 or 60/- mo. Accessories at lowest prices; Acetylene Lamp, 2/11; Cycle Stand, 1/6; Motor Horn, 5/6.

Write for New Season List, 132 pages and 600 illustrations, sent post free.—METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co., Ltd. (S.S. Dept.), 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C. West End Showrooms: Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

HOME NOTES

1D. WEEKLY.

CHICKEN HATCHING EXTRAORDINARY FOR 2/6

The Texas Egg-Hatcher and Rearer combined supersedes all incubators. Hatches above and rears little ones below simultaneously all the year round. A money-making home industry requiring neither capital nor labour. Turns 1d. eggs into valuable Chickens or Ducklings. Millions selling in America. 15-egg size 2/6; 30-egg, 5/-; complete for use. Address, AMERICAN POULTRY SYNDICATE (Room 101), 7 Albion Grove, Stoke Newington, London, N.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well.

TOWLE'S PILLS

have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

of all Chemists, or Post Free on receipt of 15, 24, or 56 penny stamps or P.O.O. from the Sole Proprietors,

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Nottingham, Eng.

Women, men, girls and boys in all vocations are riding Symonds' Cycles. Greatest value ever known. Prices £4 to £8. Easy payments. No guarantors required. Catalogue free.

SYMONDS' LONDON STORES, 124-128, City Rd., London, E.C.

DO YOU WANT A GOOD CYCLE?

Write for my Lists. I deal only in the Best Coventry made Cycles, and by contracting for thousands annually, I BUY CHEAPLY and SELL CHEAPLY.

Premiers, Rovers Coventry Challenges, Triumphs, Swifts, Humbers, Centaurs, Raglans, Singers, etc.

From 8/- MONTHLY

The QUALITY is there. Get my prices, save money and ensure satisfaction.

A High-Grade COVENTRY CYCLE for £6-0-0.

Two Years' Guarantee. Easy Payments without publicity. Cycle sent on receipt of first payment. EDWARD O'BRIEN, The World's Largest Cycle Dealer, COVENTRY.

REMEMBER THE BLACK BEETLES.

TELL YOUR COOK

To well sprinkle the floor near the fireplace and kitchen cupboard last thing at night with

"KEATING'S POWDER,"

unrivalled killer of Fleas, Beetles, Moths. (Harmless to animals.) Sold everywhere, ONLY in tins, 3d., 6d. and 1s. each.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor,

66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Walnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 22lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Coniston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 749.] [ONE PENNY.

Week Ending May 9th, 1903.

This Story Contains the Incident Depicted on the Cover.

SAVING THE SITUATION.

Telling of How a Girl Saved her Father from Ruin.

"RENE!"

"Yes, dad!"

Irene Woodhouse raised her eyes somewhat languidly from the book she was reading, and glanced at her father in response to his utterance of her name; she was roused from her lethargy to something like alertness by the anxious look on his striking countenance.

"Did you want me? Is anything troubling you?" she inquired tenderly, leaving her seat on the couch and standing before him.

"Nothing particular, my dear!" he replied evasively. "I was thinking. You see, you are old enough now to be turning your thoughts to marriage, to finding a protector for the time when I shall not be here! Oh, I shall not live for ever!" he added with a forced smile, as Irene shook her head. "I fancied—well, I had an idea—Don't you think that young Rawson rather likes you? That would be a good match; old Major Rawson has money, and it will all go to Cuthbert, and——"

"I don't want money! I must marry a man whom I can love, and I cannot conceive that I shall ever love Cuthbert Rawson. You know, dad—at least, I thought you knew—that he and I are at daggers drawn, in a friendly way, so to say. No, it wouldn't be Cuthbert Rawson, at any rate!"

"Oh, well. Let that rest, my dear! We will dismiss the subject."

So saying, Mr. Woodhouse rose, kissed his pretty and affectionate daughter, and left the room. Irene seated herself again, and took up her book, but she did not read; there was something on her father's mind, and she was uneasy.

"If I were reading a novel," mused Rene, "I should at once jump to the conclusion that the heroine's father was bankrupt, and was just struggling to keep up appearances and get his daughter married, so that she should not be left penniless. But it cannot be so in the present case.

"Firstly, I have an annuity settled on myself; not a large one, but sufficient to keep me from seeking a situation as companion or a similar post.

"Secondly, father has a pension as a retired Civil Servant who held a good position, besides money of his own. So if he had squandered all his own money, his pension would keep us going in our present fairly modest style. Now what is it?"

Irene could not rid herself of her feeling of vague anxiety. All through that day it beset her, she passed a restless night, and during the next day the uneasiness increased. That is the natural result of brooding over any trouble, real or imaginary.

"I feel there was something in that remark about my marrying Cuthbert Rawson!" she said decidedly, during the afternoon. "It was a strange thing to say, in the circumstances. I cannot endure this any longer. I must know what is wrong!"

Irene Woodhouse was pretty, as already mentioned; she was a girl of determination, which often induces an expression of countenance calculated to decrease good looks in a woman; and she was possessed of intelligence rather above the average, but not sufficiently above the ordinary level to entitle her to be described as brilliant. She might shine in a quiet way, but she would not dazzle.

She went straight to her father, whom she found in a small room gazing vacantly out of the window, and addressed him with a directness that took him completely off his guard.

"Father, there is something wrong, and you must tell me all about it at once. I have a right to know!"

Mr. Woodhouse sprang to his feet in alarm, and in doing so he tacitly confessed that Irene was right in her assumption.

"Sit down, father," she said, quietly and decisively, "and tell me all. I can bear trouble."

"You cannot bear this, my child!" said the old man, breaking down entirely and covering his face with his hands. "It's the disgrace! I would sooner be penniless, but—I will tell you all!"

He dried his eyes, which had filled with the bitter tears of mortification and remorse, and told her briefly.

"Mrs. Warren, my cousin, left a sum of money invested in Consols. I was to have the benefit of the interest till you were twenty-one, after which the Consols were to be handed over to a soldiers' benevolent fund, of which Major Rawson is treasurer. The Consols were handed over to me in trust.

"I suppose I was stupid, but it occurred to me three years ago that I could do better with the money than let it remain in Consols, and, as there was nothing in the will to the contrary, I sold out and invested in other securities. I made more interest, but I did not want it for myself; it was my fixed intention to make money for the fund, so that I could hand over more than was given to me. So I set aside the additional interest and was glad. Oh, what a dolt I was! The new investment went wrong and most of the trust money was gone!

"I tried speculation with the remainder and with my own money, but I was unsuccessful! I now stand in this position: I have to hand over that money in two months or be branded as a defaulter!"

"But we can raise money!" cried Irene, pale as death. "My annuity can be commuted, for the office will buy me out for a lump sum. We can sell the furniture and all we have. We——"

Her father interrupted her.

"That is not enough! And if it were, the very fact that we

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

are selling would betray us, and the disgrace would be as great. They could not prosecute me, but they would brand me as a criminal all the same. I should most probably lose my pension too. I did it innocently, but they will not believe that. Major Rawson would seize the opportunity, for he has never forgiven me for siding with his opponent at the last General Election."

Irene stood like a marble statue; her cheeks were white, her eyelids were closed. All her nerves were strained.

"Why did you make that remark about Cuthbert Rawson?" she asked suddenly. "Considering all things, it is strange that you should hint at marriage with him."

"Because had it been possible it would have saved the situation!" was the reply. "If you were engaged or married to Cuthbert the Major would place things in the best light, instead of the worst. He would help us out of the trouble. It is not as if I were a thief, Irene. But the marriage is out of the question, and we must prepare to sell and bear the consequences of my foolishness!"

"Perhaps all will be well," said Irene, after a long pause, during which she had kept her eyes closed. The lids were raised now, and revealed a peculiar glitter, a kind of wintry gleam, in the usually bright eyes. "Leave it to me, and do as I wish; we may weather this storm, father."

Irene had formulated a plan, which she set herself to carry out with the utmost deliberateness. The love which she bore her father, a love that almost amounted to worship, overwhelmed all other considerations, and changed temporarily the character of her being.

She felt no kind of love for Cuthbert Rawson; they had often met and conversed, but it was like flint striking against steel, it produced sparks. They might have admired each other in a way, but the idea of love was not likely to enter the head of either Cuthbert or Irene.

Moreover Irene had noticed quite lately that Cuthbert appeared to be falling a victim to the charms of a new member of their circle, an accomplished daughter of an Anglo-Indian official, Miss Maude Page.

"She has more chance than I should ever have had," said Irene in a tone that sounded harsh. "She is decidedly brilliant, and he likes a brilliant woman! Well, all's fair in love and war!" she added with a reckless laugh. "I must win Cuthbert Rawson! I don't love him, but I can become as good a wife as any other woman, so I shall be doing him no injustice, and—I shall save father! I'll do it!"

Anyone who could have gazed upon Irene Woodhouse at that moment and peered into the inmost depths of her being would have pitied rather than have blamed her. She was changed completely, and she was about to make the attempt to immolate herself on the altar of filial devotion.

It was a season of festivities, and the Woodhouses were not behind in the giving of parties. The select circle wondered somewhat at this, for the Woodhouses had lived rather quietly; but they did not worry themselves much about it. They were satisfied with the fact that it was another source of amusement and pleasure, and they gladly accepted the invitations. Thus it came about that, by means of her own functions and those of her friends, Irene secured many opportunities of meeting Cuthbert Rawson.

In spite of all her efforts she felt that she had made no progress with him on the first two occasions. Miss Maude Page was decidedly attractive; she was a grand conversationalist, not very deep, but witty and entertaining, and Irene saw that she was behind the woman whom she intended to oust. There was a steely glitter as she went home after the second meeting.

The next occasion on which the two met Cuthbert Rawson was involuntarily attracted to his "dear enemy," as he secretly and smilingly called her.

"May I have the pleasure of the next waltz, Miss Woodhouse?" he asked, bending over her. "That is, if it is not taken?"

"It is at your disposal, Mr. Rawson," she said, with a mocking smile. "That is, if we can hold together for as many minutes as the waltz lasts; I always think that you and I are like positive and negative electricity! There seems to be attraction mixed with repelling force!"

She laughed merrily, and her eyes flashed at him with unusual fire. She seemed to be quivering with life and energy; he was fascinated.

"I don't understand about electricity, and I am not sure that you are right in your comparison, Miss Woodhouse. I believe, candidly, that your knowledge of the subject is as shaky as mine. I believe in personal magnetism, though. Hallo, I must be off for this dance! We'll discuss it during the waltz."

Irene was also claimed for the dance, and her partner was charmed by her sparkling talk.

"Never knew her to be like that before!" he observed to his friend Rawson, after the dance. "She sparkles; that's the best way to describe it."

Rawson's curiosity was aroused; some other feeling also made itself manifest in him, although he did not understand it. He kept his eyes constantly seeking Irene, and he waited with some impatience for the waltz. Even Miss Maude Page failed to prove so attractive as hitherto.

"This is our dance, Miss Woodhouse," he said, bowing low as he stood before her. "Now we can discuss the question of——"

He did not finish the sentence, for the band struck up the first bars of a particularly dreamy waltz, and they placed themselves in position. Fortune favoured Irene, for, by some awkwardness, he did not hold her correctly.

"I am positive that my simile was correct!" she said with a bewitching little laugh. "The music serves as a force of attraction, but something within you repels, or you would not be so awkward!"

"I believe you are right!" he retorted, catching the infection of her animation. "However, it is possible to overcome the force of repulsion—that is the correct term, I believe—but it's an ugly word! I wonder why you and I always strike fire when we meet, Miss Woodhouse?"

"Because we are kindred spirits, Mr. Rawson!" she flashed back. "If we were not we should not produce a flame!"

"Good, there is something in that!" he laughed. "This is a grand waltz, and you dance it perfectly. I wonder why we have not waltzed together before? Oh, I give in!" he added quickly, as her lips parted. "I have never asked you, you will say! I suppose I have not, which is my fault and my misfortune combined!"

"Am I not to be counted as sharing in the misfortune?" she queried, with assumed demureness.

"If you wish it, yes!" he rejoined gallantly. "I will take care that we are not companions in misfortune again, Miss Woodhouse!"

The waltz ended, he led her to a secluded seat; he was in no hurry to surrender possession of his enchanting partner, and he secured two other dances before he relinquished her. Those dances were looked forward to with such eagerness that Miss Page secretly voted him "flat."

That was the beginning of the drama. Rene's game of conquest had begun in real earnest, and she never let her hold loosen. Her brilliancy became the talk of Society; she charmed everybody; even old Major Rawson, despite his bitterness towards Mr. Woodhouse, spoke of her as "a really charming girl," and looked not unfavourably upon his son's attentions to her.

"I'd sooner the boy married someone else," he said to himself, "but if that's his choice, why, let him go ahead, and I'll put up with Woodhouse as a relation by marriage!"

The servants, who saw how absent their young mistress was on the occasion of a function at home, and heard of her from other servants, said that she exhausted herself during those special hours, for she was always dull, and often lying down when there was nothing going on.

For the space of five weeks this went on. Mr. Woodhouse became more and more depressed as the fatal time drew near. He saw but little of his daughter's actions, for he usually retired to a quiet room with some of his old friends when he had escorted his daughter to a social function

Digitized by Google

He saw that Irene was becoming pale and worn, and he marvelled at the change between this condition and her appearance when she was going out.

"We must give it up, Irene," he said sorrowfully one morning. "I do not know what plan or idea you had in your head five weeks ago, when I told you all, but the time is nearly up, and I—we—must prepare for the blow to fall!"

"Wait!" said Irene enigmatically. Her dull eye lighted up with animation for an instant. "Wait till to-morrow!'

In her own room she paced up and down feverishly.

"I feel that the proposal will come to-night during the ball which I am giving. I cannot go on much longer. I will marry him, and then——"

She caught sight of herself in a mirror and the shock made the words die away. She seemed almost to have become an old woman.

"I must discontinue it as soon as my object is accomplished," she breathed with intense emotion. "Will he soon tire of his bride? And I? What will it be for me? I do not love him! Love him?" she added strangely. "Do I love him?"

She passed her hand over her forehead, which was burning, then pressed both hands to her heart. She shuddered at nothing tangible, and hurried about her duties.

It was a splendid scene that evening, and some of the guests whispered that they didn't quite see how the Woodhouses could run to it; they comforted themselves with the reflection that it was a special effort, of course, for which the host would have to pay by retrenchment of a severe character during the following few months.

Irene did the duties magnificently; she was the belle of the evening, and she excelled every woman there by her piquant, vivacious manner, and her conversational powers. Rawson was enchanted, he claimed so many dances that Irene had to cry "Hold!" and cut his claims down to a minimum.

During the interval, while the guests were taking refreshments, Rene stole away, leaving her father and a widowed lady of the vicinity—a great friend—to do the honours. Her brain seemed on fire, all her nerves were aching under the extreme tension, she felt that she was on the verge of a paroxysm of hysteria.

"I feared it!" she murmured. "It would be a repetition of what occurred ten days ago, but I have prepared for it! I must not fail now! I must win to-night, or I may lose for ever! Oh, my head, my whole body is throbbing, throbbing, throbbing!"

She hurried to a small room at the back of the house. From a corner cupboard she took something and placed it on the table. She shuddered as she did so.

The secret of her wit and meteoric brilliancy lay revealed there. She had learnt much about drugs from her father, who always kept a stock of them.

She knew that a certain decoction, in which arsenic figured, was a powerful exhilarator, she knew that the fearfully dangerous potion was able to draw out all the latent talent, all the hidden mental faculties, and transform for the time a person of apparently ordinary capacity into a genius, or something very near it.

In a minor degree such drugs are used in France and America, but the decoction taken by Irene Woodhouse to effect her purpose was more potent in its results, for the reason that it had an Indian drug mixed with it.

Naturally, such artificial stimulants have their after effects, leaving the victim dull and heavy, and this fact explains the lassitude shown by Irene on the days following the social gatherings in which she shone so brightly.

But there was another danger, that of over-excitation of the nerves, and a collapse in the very midst of triumph. To prevent this, Irene had retired to the little room to prepare a hypodermic injection of morphine. She knew that the combined effects of the two drugs would kill her if she continued their use, but the game was nearly finished, that night would see victory or defeat!

She was so intent on her preparations that she did not hear a knock at the door or her name softly uttered—"Irene!" It was Cuthbert Rawson, who had seen her steal away, and had tried to follow her, so that he might lead her away to a secluded nook and tell her that he loved her to distraction. He had seen her disappear in that room which, he knew, she used as a reading and work-room on other occasions.

He waited in the corridor for her, but as she did not reappear he ventured to the door, and called her by name. Ah, she would understand that he loved her if she heard him call her "Irene!" No answer. He gently pushed open the door and looked in; perhaps he had been mistaken after all, and the room was empty.

What he saw stupefied him with amazement. Irene was about to administer a hypodermic injection of morphine, and she was talking audibly to herself, unconsciously telling Cuthbert Rawson all the miserable secret.

He stepped up to her, causing her to drop the syringe with a cry of fear.

"Why have you done this, Irene?" he asked, his voice indicating great sorrow.

She gazed at him blankly for a moment, then fell on her knees before him with a convulsive sob, hiding her face for shame.

"Why did you do it?" he asked again, gently. He raised her to her feet, drew her hands from her face, and waited for her reply.

With flaming cheeks she told him the whole story. She narrated her father's foolishness, and how she determined to save him in the way he had unintentionally suggested—by winning Cuthbert Rawson.

"I knew that I must be brilliant, charming, enchanting if I wished to accomplish my object!" she confessed. "And that I was not to be compared with others. So I adopted this device to aid me. Now leave me to despise myself as you despise me. No, stay, while I tell all, in justice to myself!

"I did it to save my father! Yes, but afterwards I did it because—because I had learnt to love you, and I wanted you for yourself, and for my own happiness. I have lost all, and my father is ruined, my happiness gone!"

She threw herself on the ground and sobbed in an agony of grief. She was oblivious of everything. The paroxysm lasted for five or six minutes, and all this time the guests were making merry, unconscious of the tragic scene that was being enacted so close to them. Irene's sobs moderated, and she essayed to rise; she felt a strong arm pass round her waist, and the next moment she was in Cuthbert Rawson's embrace.

"No, no!" she pleaded. "Leave me!"

"Poor child!" he said tenderly. "Your devotion to your father covers a multitude of foolishness on your own part. No one will know, dear, except myself, and why should I complain of something that has brought us together? If you have sinned, you did it against me, and if I forgive, what remains?"

"Will you ever be able to forgive me?" she asked humbly.

"Of course! Especially if you promise to be as devoted in your love to me as you have shown yourself in your love to your father! And you may rest easy about the other matter. I can arrange that, and will gladly do so in order to secure a wife whom I can love and admire for her goodness!"

Irene did not return to her guests, and her absence was explained as due to a sudden but slight indisposition.

When the guests had departed Rawson took Mr. Woodhouse aside and asked for Irene. When she came, Cuthbert said significantly—

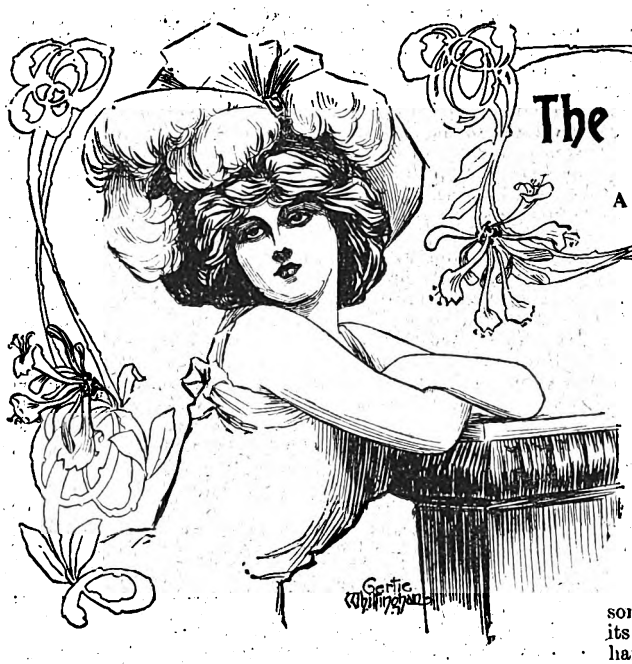
"I have asked your daughter to marry me, sir, and I hope for your consent. Irene will tell you all when I am gone. I know all, and it increases my love for her. The past is dead; the future is bright!"

F. Brewster.

Tupman: "I hear that you are building a new house?" Snodgrass: "Yes, I couldn't very well build an old one, you know."

He: "What is the name of your machine?" She: "Do you mean the name the maker gives it, or the names papa called it when he fell over it in the hall the night before last?"

Digitized by Google



The Romance of Ina.

A Very Pathetic Love Story.

"I THINK that's all, nurse, I'll take you up now. You understand that it is a very trying case. That is the chief reason why"—the doctor's face broadened into a kindly smile—"I wish you to undertake it."

"I am very flattered that you choose me; you know the harder the work the better it suits me."

"Exactly, but don't overdo yourself. We can't have you a patient on our hands."

Nurse Ina only shook her head in reply. She was, as she herself expressed it, "hatefully strong"; in all her years of nursing she had not had a day's illness.

An excellent nurse was the general opinion, but—not a pleasant woman. The face beneath the dainty cap was worn and stern, not through physical suffering, and the steel grey eyes were hard as flint. It is not often that one sees an elderly nurse; the neat and dainty uniform is almost always associated with that youth and freshness to which it is so becoming.

Nurse Ina was some way past forty, and betrayed the fact in every line of her haggard face, that was wrinkled beyond her years. No trace of the beauty that had once been hers remained, save the masses of wavy hair, whose reddish hue Time had scarcely begun to change to grey.

The unthinking called her cold and cynical; she was respected by all, however, liked by a few, loved by none.

Not that she seemed to yearn for affection in any form; she went on her way doing her duty with a kind of fierce ardour that made her a favourite with doctors, who found no task was too hard, too unpalatable or onerous for the untiring zeal of Nurse Ina.

The patient she was called upon to attend was a man suffering from a fever, and whose ravings had frightened his first nurse almost into hysterics, rendering her absolutely useless. The doctor had sent her back with a sharp reprimand, and having a grateful recollection of Nurse Ina's capabilities, had sought her out, and been fortunate enough to find her disengaged.

"You won't be frightened like Sister Mary," he said to her, half humorously, as he led her through the silent, carpeted passages to the sick room. "You won't fail me?"

"I don't think so," said Nurse Ina calmly; "I am to undertake the case alone?"

"Yes, if you can. Here we are. Poor fellow, he is quiet enough now."

The large room was dimly lit by a couple of shaded candles; it looked vast and lonely with the bed in the middle, on which the sharp outline of a motionless figure was just distinguishable. Another doctor stood beside it, he came forward to speak to his colleague, bestowing a glance of keen scrutiny on the nurse.

"No change," he murmured, in the subdued key of a voice trained to sick rooms, "and for some time there will be none. This is the new nurse?"

"Yes. One on whom we can have perfect reliance."

Ina stepped softly to the bedside, and looked down upon her patient with perfect calmness. His was a handsome and delicately moulded face that illness could not rob of its beauty. The nurse frowned as she stooped and laid her hand upon the low, broad forehead. The eyes were shut; she wished uneasily that he would open them, and show her that she was mistaken in the sudden thought that had passed through her brain, but the heavy lids remained closed.

"You will have no one to interfere with you in any way," said the doctor who knew her. "He is a bachelor, and his relations seem to trouble but little about him."

Nurse Ina looked again at the blank face on the pillow; that haunting likeness was still more apparent.

"What is his name?" she asked slowly.

"Lindsay, Edgar Lindsay. Anything else you want to know?"

"Nothing else, thank you."

"Then we'll leave you. I shall be in later. Good-bye for the present."

"An invaluable woman," he said to his colleague, as they made their way downstairs, out into the street, where the straw was laid to deaden the steady roar of the traffic. "I have absolute confidence in her."

At the instant when he spoke the "invaluable woman" was lying prone upon the floor, weeping as she had not wept for twenty long years, since that day when she and Edgar Lindsay had parted, as each declared, "for ever."

And as her sobs echoed through the silent room the sick man began to talk, to laugh, to sing in a feeble, raucous voice that was horrible to hear. Nurse Ina, dashing away her tears, went to him.

As she looked at the face that during so many weary years had been ever present with her, she was conscious of a curious pang that he should have altered so little, whilst she——!

"He would never have recognised me," she thought sadly, "he never will."

The patient opened wide, unseeing eyes upon her, bright with the fever that was consuming him.

"It's all my fault—and yet—you didn't love me, or you wouldn't let these awful little beasts get hold of me, they're pulling me into the sea, and you won't hold me. Help me—or I shall be gone down, down, and it's all slimy, and I can see snakes and snakes—and nothing but snakes, and they'll stifle me, they will! One's coiling across my mouth, another's crushing my arm—oh—oh—hold me, hold me; put out your hand—just touch mine, only touch mine, only touch me! That's all—I'm slipping—sliding——"

He threw out his hands with a scream, and Nurse Ina took them in her strong grasp and supported him in her arms, resting the poor weary head against her shoulder.

Digitized by Google

For a few seconds her soothing personality quieted him, he lay quiescent, even seemed to rest, but suddenly he tore himself away, and began once more to chatter, to rave of the horrible visions that tortured him, breaking into scraps of song, quoting poetry, and all without rest or intermission, till Ina grew dizzy and confused as she listened.

The doctor paid his promised visit and looked very serious, the nurse knew that look upon his face, and her heart sickened within her.

"He is worse," she forced herself to say quietly, though her life seemed to depend on the answer.

"He is," said the doctor gravely, "I fear, I very much fear. I think his people ought to be notified as to the serious state he is in."

"Why, he has no people," spoke Ina passionately, and without thinking. "At least none who care for him. Leave him to me, I——"

She stopped, conscious that the doctor was regarding her curiously.

"I knew him—once, years ago," she said more quietly. "He is very much alone in the world. The relations he has, you yourself said, do not trouble much about him."

"True; but they must know," said the doctor thoughtfully. "He is very rich, you know, nurse, and his money interests them, of that we may be sure."

"I hate money," answered Ina bitterly, turning away. She was thinking how it had parted them over twenty years ago. How the suspicion implanted in Edgar Lindsay's mind by disappointed and poor relations had grown and flourished till it had finally blossomed out into full vigour, in that scene when he had accused her of loving his income, not himself, and she had sworn never to forgive the insult.

"I hate money," she repeated half to herself, "it brings on moral paralysis of the heart, it kills all good feelings."

"Rather sweeping," observed the doctor mildly. "There's nothing more to be done, nurse. We'll pull him through if we can."

"Yes," said Ina in a low voice, "we will."

It was even to her, used to many sad nights, a ghastly vigil; had she been attending a stranger it would have been painful; that the patient was the one creature in the whole world whom she loved made her task one of torture to her.

As the hours went by, he seemed to be slipping away from her, the little thread of life was growing so slender; the only consolation was that his poor voice was hushed; he was almost too weak, as it seemed, to draw his breath.

As the grey dawn stole silently into the room, and the sooty sparrows outside on the leads welcomed it with cheerful chirpings, Ina had her reward, so she thought, for the many years of sad unlovedness, the heart-hunger she had endured.

For a feeble ray of light fell upon her weary, tear-worn face, as she bent over him, and there came a gleam of consciousness into Edgar Lindsay's beautiful eyes, he gazed at her steadily; she saw he was surprised or puzzled, then a sudden look of perfect rest and happiness appeared, he moved his lips, and Ina heard a weak whisper:

"Ina, my Ina, have you forgiven me?"

The next instant he was delirious once more, her name mingling with incoherent ravings, but Ina could not for an instant doubt that he had recognised her.

"He loves me still," she told herself, and it seemed to her that her happiness was too wonderful to exist. She never doubted for an instant that he would live now. She was fighting a duel with death, in which her great, overwhelming love was her weapon. Who could resist it?

He would live and learn how Fate had brought them together in the strangest fashion, and the life that both had wasted, for want of a little unselfish power of forgiving, should be lived at last. Dayspring had been denied them, but the afterglow of a sad autumn was, however, to be theirs.

It was even sweet to hear how he reproached himself for their sad quarrel.

"All my fault, Ina," he moaned, "all my fault, and you're letting me die, you won't save me, though I love you. Yes, I love you and yet I hurt you, and I was glad; I liked to; at least—— Oh, Heaven, I didn't mean to lose you. You mustn't leave me, Ina—Ina, don't you see I'm sinking down, down into this awful crevasse all for want of you. It's all blackness at the bottom, and above it's light, and I can see you. And if you would, you could save me; oh, don't let me go, hold me tight, tight, tight! I want to live now, for you love me."

His grasp on Ina's hand was agony, but it was a pain she delighted in.

"Dearest, you are safe, I am with you," she said soothingly. "Oh, Edgar, if I hadn't been utterly selfish, I should never have left you, never."

"I love you, I love you, I love you," he muttered hoarsely. "I can't say that often enough; I love—I love——"

His voice drifted away into incoherent mutterings, died away into perfect silence, and to Ina's exquisite joy he fell asleep. She knelt beside him, for he was holding her hands, and she dared not move, watching the haggard look slowly die away from his face, leaving it calm and peaceful, and listening to his breathing as it grew more regular.

"He is asleep," she whispered to the doctor, as he entered. "Oh, there is a chance now?"

And the doctor thought he had never seen a more beautiful face when it wore that smile than that of the faded, elderly nurse.

"Many chances," he said kindly, "but you must be knocked up, though I must confess I never saw you look so well. Night-nursing evidently agrees with you."

Ina actually blushed, and looked almost ten years younger.

The improvement in the patient's condition was maintained all day, and though the nurse's heart was never rejoiced by another sign of recognition, her contentment was absolute. She had conquered, death had retired defeated, and Edgar was hers once more.

It was growing dusk, and Edgar was asleep, when a servant came to Nurse Ina, and asked her if she could go downstairs to speak to a lady who was inquiring after Mr. Lindsay.

The nurse hesitated.

"If she won't keep me long," she said dubiously, "I can just speak two words to her."

In the great drawing-room she was confronted by a very dazzling vision, a creature all golden hair and appealing brown eyes, and wearing a gown that was the acme of ruinous simplicity.

"Oh, nurse, I am so sorry to disturb you"—the voice was as sweet as the face—"but, how is Mr. Lindsay? I never heard till I came to town yesterday that he was ill."

"He is better, I am glad to say," said Ina, wondering who this exquisite little person could be. "In fact, he is out of danger."

"Out of danger! And I—I had not the slightest idea that—that—— Oh, nurse, how dreadful! How thankful I am I came!"

There were tears in the lovely eyes, and Ina looked on, whilst her visitor dried them without the least affectation.

"Perhaps," said the sweet voice—"perhaps I had better tell you who I am, or you must think me very strange. But the fact is—Mr. Lindsay and I are engaged.

"You look surprised," she added a little petulantly, "but I don't know why you should. I am nearly twenty-two, and he is—oh—there isn't a young man to be named in the same day with him."

Digitized by Google

She looked at the nurse, who had not said a word; she thought she had never seen a living person so absolutely colourless, even the lips were clay-colour, and she decided that nursing must be an unhealthy occupation.

"Perhaps," the gracious vision began, with just a faint touch of hesitation—"perhaps I'd better tell you that—that Mr. Lindsay and I quarrelled just before he was ill. It was all my fault," she said penitently, "I was horrid. I didn't hear from him for some time, till quite casually last night at a party someone mentioned that he was very ill.

"You can imagine how wretched I was. I determined to come and find out for myself, but I could not get away till now. And then you tell me he is 'out of danger.' To think that I nearly lost him; that I never knew!"

Ina regarded her visitor stupidly. She could scarcely grasp the meaning of the latter's flow of words. Engaged—Edgar Lindsay—on whose lips her name had ever been during his delirium, who had, she was persuaded, recognised her, and addressed her in terms of the deepest affection, he engaged to this beautiful, dainty being, who was young enough to be his daughter! It was inconceivable! Desperately she clung to the last vestige of the happiness which was drifting away from her.

"You are going to marry Mr. Lindsay," she said, "you?"

"Yes, and oh, nurse, I want you to do me a favour"—the appealing brown eyes were brought to bear on the nurse's impassive countenance. "Here is a letter, only a tiny note, containing just two words. When he is well enough, give it to him. He will understand it—it will make it all right."

Ina conquered a wild desire to tear the offered missive into many pieces, as she took it from the little outstretched hand.

"You are making no mistake," she said, "you are sure Mr. Lindsay will understand?"

"Of course." The girl looked a little surprised. "Why, nurse, I hope—I think that my note will do him more good than all the doctor's stuff in the world."

"I don't understand," murmured the nurse wildly. "Oh, what does it mean?"

"And," continued the other happily, "you will come down to me every day, won't you, nurse, and tell me how he is? I shall be so anxious till he is out of danger."

The nurse laid her hand heavily on the silken shoulder, her haggard eyes gazed full at the smiling, daintily-beautiful face.

"Tell me your name," she said hoarsely. "Quick, quick!"

For a sudden awful thought had come to her, and she stood motionless as the rock from which her features seemed carved, as the girl answered:

"My name is Ina—Ina Colquhoun."

Sybil Campbell Lethbridge.

The Rose's False Message.

And How the True One was Given.

WITH many wild whoops, and much leaping and tumbling, the children hurried out of the weather-beaten school house and took their several ways towards their homes in various parts of the sparsely settled neighbourhood.

A moment later Millie Forrest, the teacher, came out and, hurrying across the playground, turned into the long lane, bordered with high banks and hedges.

Small, slender, with big brown eyes, an oval face with irregular features, the young "teacher" was not what one would call pretty, but there was a piquant arch to the red lips, and the heavy mass of nut-brown hair that overhung her brows was a glory in itself sufficient to have awakened envy.

She hurried along the lane and turned through a wicket gate into a small copse. Following a winding path, crossed by deep shadows cast from the trees by the declining sun, she was halfway through the wood when Edgar Sommers, a neighbour's son, came from the clump of bushes and with a show of bashfulness, joined her.

"Evening, Millie," he said, after an embarrassing silence. "Had a good day at the school?"

"Much the same as all other days," replied the girl, with a defiant lifting of her head. "I am tired of it all. I wonder if everyone finds life such a dreary round? Sometimes I wish I might fall into the old mill pond yonder with no one near to rescue me."

The young man's eyes grew moist and his lips trembled perceptibly.

"Is it so dull and stupid for you here, Millie?" he said slowly. "I—I wish I might do something to make things brighter and—and sweeter for you."

The girl turned her face away that he might not see the sudden light that came into her eyes and the flush that coloured her brown cheek.

"I'm rough and awkward," he continued, lengthening his stride to keep up with the girl's quickened step, "not worthy of you in any way, Millie, but—I love you, love you more than my life, more than a thousand lives. If you would only give me the right, I would do as much as a man could do to make you happy."

She was going forward rapidly, nervously, her head lifted and a look of gladness in her eyes. Had he seen it he would have taken her in his arms, then and there, and settled the question for ever. But he did not see it and her silence was like death to his hopes.

A wild rose nodding and blushing beside the path caught his eye, and stooping, he plucked it from the bush.

"See, Millie, the last of the season; let the flower plead for me. I won't ask you to decide now, but you are going to the dance over at Major Barlow's to-night. If you think you could trust me and let me love and care for you, wear it in your hair."

He held out the rose to her and she took it demurely from his big, brown fingers.

Digitized by Google

"If you wear the flower to-night, you will make me the happiest man in the world," he said, in a half whisper. "If you don't, you will break my heart."

He stood for a moment gazing with longing eyes upon the slender figure of the girl going on, with the warm sunlight turning her bronze hair to gold. Then he went back heavily along the path, and passed through the meadows lying beyond the copse, and by the old water mill.

As he passed the mill he saw Frisbie, the new miller from the city, standing in the doorway, his curling hair white with flour dust. Edgar could not but acknowledge him a handsome fellow and remembering how often he had been a visitor at the Forrests' since he came to the neighbourhood, he answered the young miller's hearty greeting gruffly and passed on.

Millie went through the woods softly humming to herself:

"Give me a kiss that, going home,
My feet may walk on air."

She dressed herself with unusual care for the evening, and when she was ready put the wild rose in her hair. The dance was to be only a friendly party, and she would go over early and be with the Barlow girls when the others came.

As she tripped into the little sitting-room she met her mother going with a jug for water. Millie took the vessel from her mother and ran lightly down the slope. Stooping, she dipped the jug into the spring. In the dusk the clear, undisturbed waters shone like silver.

As she lifted her full jug and turned to retrace her steps, the rose slipped from her hair, and, falling into the spring brook, was carried swiftly out of sight.

The happy girl did not miss the pretty token until well on her way to Major Barlow's. It was too late then to go back to look for it, and she went on framing many pretty excuses for not having the rose in her hair to be seen when Edgar should come.

It was nearly nine o'clock and the full moon was shining when Edgar Sommers, on his way to the dance, reached the narrow footbridge that crossed the spring brook. He was anxious and despondent.

His great love made him timid and cast a halo about the object of his affection. It seemed impossible that she should care for him.

He stood for a moment on the bridge looking down into the moonlit water. A bright object, dancing on the ripples, caught his eye. It whirled over the tiny rapids and lodged against the roots of a willow.

Edgar sprang over the low rail of the bridge and snatched from the water the rose he had given Millie a few hours before.

Here, then, was her answer to his pleading. She had thrown it away, and the spring brook brought it to save him the humiliation of meeting a more direct refusal from her lips.

He was dumb with the sudden overthrow of his hopes, and walked on aimlessly, the rose crushed in his hand.

Suddenly the strain of a violin playing the "Beautiful Blue Danube" fell on his ears. He had come unconsciously to where she was.

He would have turned back, but could not. A desire to look upon her face once more before he went for ever away, drew him on until he stood in the shadow of the creeper that ran over the doorway of the Barlows' house.

The door was open, and he saw the gay couples floating about the big dining-room. Millie was dancing with the new miller, and they glided on to the rise and fall of the music, the handsomest couple in the room.

How Edgar hated the man! He longed to stretch out his hand, take the white throat of his rival between his strong fingers and crush out his life. It was for this unknown, smooth-voiced stranger that she had thrown him over.

But she did not love him, so what matter who claimed her. He turned away and was soon hidden in the shadow of the woods that skirted the stream below the house.

Millie waited impatiently for Edgar's coming. She had determined to go to him as soon as he arrived and tell him of the loss of the rose and acknowledge her intention to have worn it. He would forgive her seeming carelessness when he knew she loved him; she felt sure of that. But as the hours wore on and he did not come, she became restless and frightened. What could have happened to detain him?

At last the people prepared to go home, and the miller offered to escort her across the fields. She would have refused him, but there was no good excuse.

There was no one else to accompany her, and so the two went out across the meadows. He gay and confident, she sad and apprehensive.

As they were going over the rustic bridge where Edgar had found the rose the young man suddenly threw his arm about Millie's waist, and, drawing her close, said:

"Toll, little one, that is the country custom, isn't it? Come, give me a kiss for toll!"

"Let me go!" she cried, and struggled to free herself.

"Not until I have taken toll," he replied, bending over her. "It is my right, you know."

Before the now frightened girl could cry out there was a quick step on the bridge, and a big, brown hand fell on the shoulder of the miller, and he turned to face the tall young farmer. The girl ran to the end of the bridge and stood trembling with fright.

The two men faced each other on the narrow bridge. The moon, far down in the west, cast a mellow light on the scene.

Edgar was the first to speak, and his voice had in it the ring of steel.

"Millie," said he, "has this—fellow the right to offer to kiss you?"

"You know he hasn't." She stood straight now, and her brown eyes flashed, then her manner changed suddenly.

"Don't strike him, Edgar. Let him go. You are to blame. If you had come as you promised this would not have happened."

"And the rose," said he, "I found it here in the brook."

"It was in my hair when I left home. Oh, Edgar, I understand; you — you thought I threw it away!" She was close by his side now.

"And you didn't?"

"I would have sacrificed my life first."

"Thank God!"

And when they looked again they were alone.

Audrey Templeton.

Digitized by Google

Her Wedding Gown.

Telling of a Jealous Woman's Attempted Revenge.

THE modiste called it a ravishing confection. It would, she averred, suit mademoiselle's fair beauty to perfection—the young dressmaker who had designed it would be proud of her work when she saw it on mademoiselle. Yes, she was a good worker, and she had the artistic taste and eye which made the successful designer.

Mademoiselle—otherwise Miss Helena Vernon—nodded haughtily. She had examined with care the lovely reflection in the long pier glass before her, touching with critical fingers the exquisite folds of shimmering white satin which swept the soft, velvety carpet of the room in the establishment of the fashionable modiste to whom the beauty of the season had intrusted the making of her wedding gown. It was perfection, and she permitted herself to smile upon Madame Noelle.

"With the slight alteration which I told you of, it can be sent home without fail to-morrow?" she said, taking a last look at the graceful sweep of the magnificent train veiled in priceless lace.

"But certainly; mademoiselle shall have it without fail to-morrow. If the alteration may be arranged now while mademoiselle has it on?"

She rang a bell, and gave a whispered order to the silk-attired woman who answered the great modiste's summons, and Miss Vernon continued to admire herself in the glass with great satisfaction.

She would certainly be handed down to posterity as the bride of the season; the dress was but the finishing touch to her glorious beauty; and as she was making the match of the year she had, of course, good cause for her self-congratulation.

She turned as a door opened to admit a girl in a soft black dress, who bore the insignia of her trade, scissors and pincushion, in her hand. Miss Vernon's haughty glance swept her for an instant; she noted the beauty of the girl's clear, pale complexion—like a magnolia newly-opened—the warm colour of her bronze hair. And the sight angered her, as the sight of any beauty always angered her—other than her own, that is to say.

There was that indescribable air of good birth about this young creature with the gleaming scissors and well-filled pincushion, to which Helena Vernon could never attain—be she prospective Countess of Endsley a thousand times over—she was but nouveau riche after all, and the Earl had well counted her "dollars," as he himself termed it to his confidential friends, before proposing to the beauty of the season.

The scissors snapped and clicked; pins were set in with quick, skilful fingers, and Miss Vernon glanced downwards at the shimmering gown which clothed her in a mantle of loveliness.

The fitter rose from her knees.

"That is all, madam," she said, in soft, sweet accents.

"See that it is sent home to-morrow without fail," said Miss Vernon curtly, as the fitter assisted her to slip out of the wedding gown. "By the way, what is your name? I don't remember having seen you here before."

"My name is Angela Dennys, madam," said the girl, colouring a soft crimson, as she met the haughty woman of fashion's supercilious glance. "I have not been with Madame Noelle very long."

Miss Vernon nodded carelessly. The girl was pretty—too pretty for her station; it was just as well that she had not arranged to meet the Earl here, after all. He had such a ridiculous fancy for a face like that.

Ten minutes later Miss Vernon was driving down Bond Street behind her prancing thorough-breds, while Angela Dennys went to one of the workrooms to give directions about the lovely wedding-gown which was to grace the most fashionable bride of the season in a few days' time.

She had designed the dress with such loving pride and care as if it was to be her own. As the thought flashed upon her she blushed; and one of the girls sewing away industriously remarked that Miss Dennys was prettier than ever.

Ever since she had come to Madame Noelle she had proved herself of the greatest value. Her taste in designing was little short of genius, and madame was generous enough to acknowledge that Miss Dennys was a treasure to her trade.

She was certainly of a superior class to the usual run of workwomen in the establishment, but she was a reticent young woman and said very little to anyone about herself, and the little air of mystery which hung over her served to make her quite an interesting personality in the workrooms when she came in to give her directions.

Madame Noelle herself was interested in the girl, and the more so when the evening on which the wedding-gown was sent home, Miss Dennys came to her before leaving, and said:

"I wish to give you notice, madame—I am going to be married next month."

"Going to be married!" echoed madame, in real dismay. "But must you give up your work altogether, Miss Dennys? I should be glad to keep you on afterwards at an increased salary, you know."

"Thank you, madame—but I cannot," said Miss Dennys with a smile. "I shall have no further occasion to work in my future life."

"Oh! well, in that case, Miss Dennys, I must say no more," said madame with much graciousness, "and I wish you every happiness."

In the house in Grosvenor Square in which Vernon the millionaire lived, Miss Vernon sat and waited with unrestrained impatience for her fiancé. They were dining out together and this was to be almost her last dissipation as a maiden.

In three short days she would be transformed into the Countess of Endsley. Her triumph then would be quite complete, but—a shadow darkened her lovely face for an instant. Memory, which was not to be banished for ever, came back to her with terrible force. She thought she had forgotten that moment of madness a year ago, when she had thought the world well lost for—love. A factor which had not been taken into account in her present brilliant prospects.

Of course it would have been merely social suicide to marry the penniless heir-apparent to an earldom when the coronet of the same earldom was laid at her feet. Still—young Gilbert Thelusson had touched her heart as no one else had ever touched it.

Digitized by Google

She laughed at what she called his folly; he had imagined himself to be in love with her—which was exactly the case—and she had sent him about his business with a pang, but no sign of surrender. And, six months later, her schemes had succeeded beyond her wildest expectations—the broken-down Earl had proposed and was accepted.

He came in now, a fat, bloated-looking man with the signs of dissipation written largely over his heavy face. He might have been taken for anything but what he was—the descendant of one of the noblest and oldest families in the Peerage.

"Ready, Lena?" he said in a thick, hoarse voice. "We'll be late, I'm afraid, but I was delayed when I was just comin' out by a visit from young Gilbert. Used to be rather a pal of yours at one time, wasn't he, eh?"

He chuckled, and Miss Vernon shivered as she slipped into her fur-trimmed cloak, and led the way downstairs to the brougham which was waiting at the door.

"Of course I have met him often," she said coldly, as they were driven away through the lamp-lit square. "What a late call he seems to have paid you."

"Oh, it was business more than anything else. There's not too much love lost between us, you know, my dear—on his side, at least. He's a nice enough boy, but a trifle too strait-laced for these times. He dropped in to tell me he is going to be married. A new departure."

"Married?" echoed Miss Vernon faintly. The brougham was dark, and she was thankful for that mercy. Gilbert going to be married! Somehow, she had always considered him her special property although they saw little of each other.

The Earl laughed. "Seems to astonish you, Lena," he said; "yes, it's true enough. Next month, I believe, and to a stunningly pretty girl too. Face like a flower—he showed me her photograph. He's as gone as possible, you see."

"Who is she?" Miss Vernon hardly knew her own voice.

"Name? Angela Dennys—poor and pretty. That's all I could gather; but there were some Dennys used to live near my place—they went smash in those Australian bank failures and the girls had to go out and earn their living. Hard on the poor things, but they had grit, and they got on right well. This is one of them, so she's all right, from that point of view."

Angela Dennys! The girl with the face like a magnolia flower who had designed her wedding-gown! Miss Vernon drew a long breath—and this girl was to be Gilbert Thelusson's wife! The world is a mad and a merry place, my masters!

The evening was spoilt for Miss Vernon, though she was flattered and sought after to her heart's content. She saw always before her the sweet face of the girl whom she considered her rival—the girl who was to be Gilbert's wife.

Late into the night she sat and thought deeply; her maid had gone; and by degrees an idea came to her in the silence of the night. She would not see this thing done without making an effort to put a spoke in that wheel. And she sought her couch with a smile on her lips and evil in her jealous heart.

* * * * *

It was at an unusually early hour the following morning, that Miss Vernon's brougham drew up at the door of Madame Noelle's shop in Bond Street.

"Can I see—Miss Dennys?" inquired Miss Vernon curtly as the server came forward. "I wish to speak to her on a matter of urgent importance. Please tell her to come to me at once."

The softly-carpeted room with its many gilt mirrors was empty, and Miss Vernon turned round sharply as the door opened and Angela Dennys came in.

For a brief instant she examined the girl's face with angry, critical eyes, then she spoke.

"You are engaged to be married to Gilbert Thelusson?" she said shortly.

Angela coloured, and instinctively she raised her head a trifle proudly.

"I am," she said, "but may I ask, madam, what you require this morning?"

Miss Vernon made an impatient movement.

"I have come to see you," she said, "on private matters; nothing else. You are aware that I am to be married on Thursday to the Earl of Endsley, to whom Mr. Thelusson is heir?"

"I know, madam," said the girl quietly, "but I fail to see——"

"Wait a moment; what I wish to tell you is this. You think, of course, that Mr. Thelusson—loves you. Well—he does not because—he loves me and always loved me and because I refused him, and am to be married to his uncle, he vowed to marry the first girl who would take him. You see that he has lost very little time about it. And, of course, it will ruin his prospects for ever, for neither his uncle nor I will ever consent to receive a—dressmaker into the family."

Miss Dennys paled, but her eyes met those angry ones quite serenely.

"I think you must be mad, madam, to speak to me in such a manner," she said with dignity. "Both Lord Endsley and Mr. Thelusson know all my family connections well, and I have nothing to blush for. If it is true that—that——"

Her voice faltered. And Miss Vernon gathered her cloak round her with an air of triumph.

"Oh, ask Gilbert himself," she said airily. "He does not tell lies as a rule, and you will find that what I have told you is the case. Of course, you thought it would be a fine thing to be the wife of the heir to the title, but let me tell you that we shall never acknowledge you—or him!"

And without another word or glance, Miss Vernon swept out of the shop.

"Well, I've dropped the poison at any rate," she said to herself cruelly as the carriage bowled swiftly homewards, "she's one of those sentimental women who will weep and sob, and Gilbert I am sure hates a scene."

She glanced once more at the gorgeous wedding-gown which was lying in its box in her room—designed by the careful Angela.

Her wedding-gown! The sign manual of her coming triumph.

As she replaced the cover of the box, someone knocked at her door. A maid entered bearing a telegram on a silver tray.

Miss Vernon tore it open, and read the few words on the thin pink paper.

It was addressed to her father—but it was brought to her by mistake, she supposed.

"Endsley died suddenly this morning. Heart disease. Break the news to Miss Vernon."

The little pink paper fluttered from her shaking fingers, and dropped on to the box in which lay the wedding-gown.

It was the death warrant of her triumph, and with a groan she fell to the ground.

* * * * *

Three months later Miss Vernon, in the hall of the Schweitzerhof Hotel at Lucerne, picked up an English paper, and read the following short paragraph:

At St. Peter's, Eaton Square, Gilbert, Earl of Endsley, to Angela, elder daughter of the late Colonel Dennys, of Warmingham Manor, Devon.

It was all over.

She had schemed and lied in vain. She had waited thinking that Gilbert would come to her—come to her for consolation which she was only too ready to give him, but—it was not so.

At the next drawing-room, Angela, the young Countess of Endsley, was presented on her marriage, in her wedding-gown of silver tissue, designed by herself and made by Madame Noelle of Bond Street.

And Miss Vernon consoled herself as best she could and married a wealthy, worn-out roué, and, though she sometimes came across Lady Endsley in Society, she never managed to get into that select circle of which Angela was the particular star.

E. Burrowes.

Digitized by Google

GREAT NEW SERIES.

Confessions of a Self-made Girl

The writer of these Confessions relates in this series of articles the true story of her life, from the time when she left Cornwall, an unsophisticated but ambitious girl, until she made her name and fortune. Her name is well known to you.

For the purposes of these Confessions I am calling myself Maud Cardew, as my real name is too well known for me to wish to make the story of my life public in this manner.]

The Principals in the Story.

MAUD CARDEW.—The self-made girl.

HON. ROBERT LESTRANGE. (Commonly known as Bobbie.)

REGINALD (DI) NORTHCOTE.

Men who had helped her to come to London and befriended her on her arrival.

I Discover That I'm in Love.

THE Duke's proposal was so abrupt I could hardly believe he had said it, and yet so like him that I need not have been surprised at all. For some minutes I made no reply, but sat down and buried my face among the cool petals of his bouquet of roses. Then suddenly I looked up.

"What if I don't love you?" I said.

"I will teach you," he answered.

"Do you think that you love me then," I asked, "in spite of your views?"

"I should not offer to share a coronet with you if I did not," he replied.

Something in his words struck me unpleasantly. It sounded like a question of buying and selling after all, and evidently he would consider that the best of the bargain was mine.

"What will the world say?" I asked.

He laughed carelessly. "What does it matter?" he said. "I shall certainly choose a wife according to my inclination, and the world will have to make the best of it. If beauty, brains and refinement are not enough, I don't know what is."

So it was that my goal lay in my grasp.

And yet I faltered.

At last I got up, feeling suddenly, without apparently any reason, on the point of a flood of tears.

"I'm very tired," I said, trying to hide the tremour in my voice. "I don't feel quite myself, somehow. I think I haven't recovered from last week yet. I—I—it is a funny thing to say, but I seem to have lost confidence in myself. I am afraid!"

He got up and came to me quickly.

"That's the nicest thing I have ever heard you say, Maud," he said, in a new tone. "If I have put my request baldly, remember it is only my way. You must know I mean more than the mere words. I know I am a sceptic, but I have a heart, and perhaps it is none the worse for not being too near the surface. But you should understand, for you must have discovered, as I have, the rottenness at the core of the usual, high-flown manner of speech."

I liked him at that moment as I had never liked him before, yet I could not escape an inborn conviction that he felt he was doing me a great favour, and would never cease to feel so. And I was too independent not to resent it even in a duke.

Finally he left me to think it over, and I spent a long, miserable morning of doubt and uncertainty. He had said he would call in a week, and that left me a respite of which I was very glad.

On Saturday, as I was looking very seedy, Di arranged to take me for a drive to Hampton Court the following day, and I was very glad to go. At first we only talked very little; but in the afternoon, when we were strolling through the grounds, he said suddenly:

"You are worrying about something."

I tried to smile naturally, but quickly grew grave again.

"Have you found out that you are not satisfied?" he said presently.

"I don't know," I answered, "I am in two minds about many things."

Then I asked him suddenly, with a cry in my heart that I did not understand at the time:

"Is there love in the world at all? Do you believe in love?"

He was silent for quite a long time.

"I cannot say 'No!'" he said finally, "because I once loved myself, and have no right to presume I am the only one. At the same time it is a thing I have never expected to find again, since I once believed, and was disillusioned."

"And what is the world like without it?" I asked—"without even the hope of it?"

"Oh, it is all very well," he answered, "when you have accustomed yourself to asking and expecting little."

I looked hard into his cold, clear-cut face, trying to see behind the mask.

"I wonder if you are honest?" I said. "I wonder if you mean what you say?"

"If I do not," he replied, "I shall certainly continue to cling to the illusion that I do."

Digitized by Google

And that was all I could get from him to help me in my dilemma. I was disappointed without knowing why; but on Tuesday evening—the day before I was to give my answer—I discovered the reason.

To my surprise, when I went on the stage, I saw Di in the stalls with a lady, and, so far as I was able to judge, he was much engrossed with her. In all the time I had known him he had never, to my knowledge before, taken a lady anywhere, and certainly I had never seen him in the smallest degree engrossed with one.

To my chagrin the incident caused me a sense of disquiet altogether out of proportion, and I took myself to task very strongly over it. At a small supper-party afterwards one of the company suddenly remarked:

"By the way, did anyone see Mr. Northcote in the stalls with Lady Danestone? We shall be hearing some news soon, I expect."

"Who is Lady Danestone?" I asked casually.

"Oh, a very old friend of his, a widow, who has been abroad with her father for some time. Everyone has been expecting them to get engaged for some time."

"I thought it had always been said that Mr. Northcote would never marry?" I remarked.

"I daresay he never would have married anyone else, but since she has come back there is no knowing. Don't you think she has a lovely face? She was the belle of two or three seasons before she married Lord Danestone, but after he died she retired from Society, though it was always known Mr. Northcote saw a great deal of her."

I did not ask anything further, but I became conscious that my gaiety was growing more and more forced, and finally made the first signal of breaking up. I spent a few bad hours that night, driven this way and that by conflicting emotions. One moment I would throw everything to the winds and take my goal, the next I felt an unreasonable dislike for the Duke. But, most of all, I hated this Lady Danestone, and this only made me furious with myself, for what possible reason could I have for hating her?

Well, of course there was but one reason, and at last I was bound to confess it.

I loved Di Northcote.

How did it happen, or when it began, I could not tell, but there was no mistaking the fact. It was there, indisputable, fixed.

This, then, was the end of my triumphs—to fail in the greatest of all!

"What would it all be now?" I asked. "Would not everything crumble to mere vanity and vexation, since I had failed at the crucial point?"

"No!" I declared stoutly. "What I had set out to achieve, I would achieve—I would never allow myself to consider I had failed. I would marry the Duke and start afresh from my high pinnacle and mould my circumstances to my will."

Nevertheless, I cried myself to sleep, and the next morning wrote a little letter to the Duke, saying I could not marry him. In the afternoon he came for an explanation, and he showed far more feeling than I in the least expected. But to all his questions I could only shake my head, and answer:

"I cannot explain. I do not understand myself, but I think my experiences at Grindelwald altered me, somehow. I don't seem to care much about success and position now. I want something better. I feel somehow as if I were starving—starving for the nameless something, whatever it is, that gives one a grip upon life and makes everything worth while."

He watched me closely for a few seconds, and then got up to go.

"It's a funny old world!" he said. "We all seem born to strike across each other's lives and spoil them. If you had married me, I believe—mind you, I don't say I am sure—but I believe I should have taken life seriously and tried to do something. As it is I shall go on playing, and I shall play to the end of the chapter."

"It is much more sensible, really, because it saves a lot of bother. I shall go on with the game you interrupted at Grindelwald first, and when I am tired of it I shall go and hunt elephants again in Central Africa."

"And when you are weary of both?" I asked.

"Oh, then I must find something else. I daresay I shall not have half the difficulty that you will."

I smiled faintly.

"If I were to marry you," I said, "I should want to come after the elephants too, and never set eyes on England again," which was virtually to myself an acknowledgment of failure.

"You may come yet," he answered. "The trackless forests of the Dark Continent are an infinitely finer play-ground than the boards of a London theatre."

"But not so engrossing possibly," I answered. "My play is upon the heart-strings of humanity."

After he had gone I stood still for a long time staring vacantly at the fire, then I fell to my old trick of talking to myself in the glass.

"You will probably go yet, Maud," I said; "go and hunt with him in Central Africa."

June 15th.

It is sometime since the Duke vanished from London Society again as quickly as he had come, but I have heard of him at fashionable resorts abroad, and from all accounts he is having his play with a vengeance.

Meanwhile I have scored another big success, and am giving Di plenty to do as my banker. His engagement has not been announced yet, but Lady Danestone is still in London, and they are seen constantly together.

So the round goes on.

I play my part night after night, receive an ovation that is getting almost monotonous, and am fêted to any extent I like. Indeed there does not seem much I cannot have for the wishing, but withal there is a restless ache in my heart that will not be soothed, and I am not happy.

Di still comes to see me upon business matters, and when he is talking things over in that freezing way of his I feel as if I wanted to hate him, and I feign a coldness equal to his own.

And when he is gone I tell myself that he is a hard, cold man, unworthy of any woman's affection, and with only an indulgent tolerance for me, the actress, because it happens to amuse him.

Unless I am tired, and then I think of the cliffs at home, and the sea-gulls, and the wind-swept hills, till the tears blind my eyes. And it seems that after all Success is a poor thing without Love; because if you have everything in your life and have not Love, your heart may yet go hungering for evermore.

It is not too much to say I often feel I would give everything up to-morrow to nestle in the arms of a woman's world that was all my own. But how high a price we pay for this knowledge? How many women, rich in love to-day, would not envy me with all their hearts?

And I?

Well there are moments when I think wistfully enough of the cottage girl at home, tramping happily over the cliffs, with some stalwart lover, while the waves sing a low cadence to his stumbling protestations, drinking in the wonder of it, and the newness—that newness which is forever old.

June 20th.

Di came to see me yesterday afternoon unexpectedly. Some company in which he had invested for me had gone smash, and he was much perturbed about it. I leant back carelessly in a large armchair, and assured him it was of no consequence, and he could forget all about it at once.

Digitized by Google

"But it is rather a large sum," he said anxiously. "It means that you will be living up to your income for the present and that is never wise."

"It does not signify," I said. "I will retract next year."

He seemed to find a meaning behind my words, and looked at me keenly.

"Why not this?" he asked.

I laughed a little bitterly.

"Oh, I may as well make the most of my last," I said, not knowing what I meant myself, but yielding to some impulse. "I am thinking of taking a long rest."

He got up and walked about the room, as he always does when at all disturbed, and then fired a question at me from the window.

"Are you going to be married?" he asked.

I laughed with that same feeling of bitterness.

"Quite possibly," I answered. "Don't you think it is time I made a choice?"

"I hope you will make a wise one," was all he said.

"You speak like a book of sermons," I retorted. "What do you call a wise one?"

He did not answer, but continued his walk up and down the room.

"Evidently," he said at last, with seeming irrelevance, "you are not satisfied."

"No," I answered. "I confess I am not. I seem to have missed the something that makes it worth while."

"Have you found it out since we went to Hampton Court?"

I made no reply, but looked as callously indifferent as I could. "At least," I thought, "he shall not have the satisfaction of knowing the result of his indulgent tolerance." How I wronged him!

"By the way," I remarked suddenly, "that is a very beautiful woman I have seen you about with lately."

"Yes," he answered simply. "She is very beautiful."

"A widow, I am told," I went on, "who was once the belle of two or three seasons."

"Yes, I knew her at the time."

My goaded heart leapt ahead. Then he had loved her so far back as that? Loved her before she married her first husband, to win an unexpected reward for his faithfulness after all these years.

"I have an appointment with her and her father at the Academy this morning," he said. "I ought to be going." Then he added, "I am glad you are not upset about the money. I should feel I was much to blame had not those who advised me been very hard hit also."

"It is not of the smallest consequence," I reiterated cheerfully, and he went away looking very relieved.

But for me! When he had gone I sat down and buried my face in a sofa cushion, and wondered how I was to live out my life without him. The idea of him married to another woman, one who would probably treat me with the greatest condescension if we met at all—was unendurable. I felt as if I could do myself some injury.

Then Bobbie came.

He never waited to be announced, but always ran upstairs to the drawing-room to look for me, and so it happened that he came in suddenly, while I was still on the sofa with my face buried in the cushion.

"Christopher Columbus!" he exclaimed in genuine astonishment. Then crossing the room quickly, "Are you ill, Queenie?"

I looked up and tried to laugh.

"No, you silly boy! This is the latest phase of the 'rest' cure. It's to prevent wrinkles coming."

"Rest cure be blowed!" said Bobbie; "and what do you want to be thinking of wrinkles for? I dare bet my bottom dollar you're telling fibs."

I made room for him beside me, and he sat down, passing his arm along the back of the sofa.

"Tell you what, Queenie," he said. "You've got the blues."

"Yes, Bobbie," I admitted. "I've got the blues what you'd call 'thundering bad.'"

He laughed, but there was a little tender note in his voice.

"You've just jolly well got to tell me all about it," he said, drawing nearer, "and if there's a man at the bottom of it, I'll just go out now and break his head. Or if it's a woman I'll do the same."

"It is a woman," I told him.

"Then who is it?" he demanded. "By Jove! I'll make her hair curl!"

"Don't be hard on her, Bobbie," I pleaded. "Her name's Maud Cardew."

"Phew!" he whistled softly, then added, "Beastly nasty feeling to quarrel with yourself. Can't lash out hard and get it over."

"No, that's just it," I agreed, "and however sarcastic, or angry, or resolute you get, 'myself' only grows more miserable and takes no notice."

"I expect it's liver," he remarked so comically, that I couldn't help laughing.

"I'll tell you what," he added. "Marry me, and I'll guarantee you never have any more blues at all."

I smiled, and ran my fingers through his hair, feeling almost like his mother.

"What? Aren't you tired of it yet?" I asked. "I thought the May proposal was to be the last?"

"This is an extra one for luck," he asserted, dauntless as ever.

"It won't bring you the luck you imagine, Bobbie," I said; "but something better, the luck of my still remaining firm."

He got up without replying.

"Let's go out," he said. "I'll telephone for my dog-cart, and we'll go to Richmond."

We did, and his cheery nonsense had revived me wonderfully, when he suddenly launched upon a theme that undid everything in a moment.

"Won't it be the rummiest thing out," he exclaimed, "to see old Di spliced?"

I asked him what he meant, and he ran on—

"Oh, you know! Lady Danestone—old friend—cold broth—soon hotted—question popped—wedding bells!"

I could not help laughing at his original mode of explaining the situation, but at the same time I felt my newly-revived spirits sink to zero.

"Do you think there is anything in it?" I asked casually.

"Why not?" he replied, with unconsciously cruel candour. "There they are. She's beautiful and charming, he's highly eligible and unattached, and seems very hard hit. It looks to me as simple as one and one makes two."

I could not deny it, and it seemed as if the cold arms of the inevitable wrapped me closely round. I went in feeling as if every man's hand was against me.

August 25th.

Strange things have happened since I last wrote, and the Wheel of Fortune has turned for me this time, a most unexpected development. I am writing this in Scotland, whither I came with Colonel and Mrs. Mateson when they journeyed north for the grouse shooting.

I knew there would be a small house-party, but I do not think even my hostess knew at the time she invited me, that the Duke, who is some connection of theirs, was to be among them. He crossed over from Carlsbad quite unexpectedly, and came into dinner one evening, just as if he had come in casually from the shoot with the other men.

Digitized by Google

We were all very much astonished, though no one perhaps so much as I, and I was considerably less at ease than he, when, all unknowing, Mrs. Mateson assigned him to me for a dinner partner.

"This is a bit of luck," he said, and proceeded to converse in his usual cool, careless style, as if nothing had ever passed between us at all.

"What made you come here?" I asked presently. "I thought you were on the Continent?"

"I was until yesterday; how did you know?" and he looked into my face with so straight and deliberate a gaze that I felt myself flushing scarlet.

"Oh, I heard it somewhere," I replied carelessly.

"What made me come here?" he remarked presently. "Well, to tell you the honest truth I heard you were among the guests. I'm going off to the elephants shortly, and I thought I'd like to say 'Good-bye' once more. I also thought I'd like to see if by any chance you would change your mind and come with me?

"Somewhat ignominious to ask twice I know, but since you are one of the very few women I have met in my life who does not bore me to distraction in a few hours, I decided it was worth it," after which long speech he proceeded with his dinner much as if he had been discoursing on the weather.

"You still put it like a business transaction," I said, trying to take him lightly.

"You know why," he answered quietly. "I do not wish to insult you with inane flattery and sickening sentimentality, all of which in nine cases out of ten mean nothing at all."

He let the subject drop after that, but later on he inveigled me into taking a stroll with him to see Loch Katrine in the moonlight.

It was one of the most beautiful scenes I ever remember, and I have often felt since that a sort of intoxication of loveliness crept over my senses, lulling me into a state of forgetfulness of all but the present.

I had come to Scotland feeling somewhat world-weary, and asking myself often, "What is the good of it all? What does anything matter? Is it not far wiser, like the Duke, to seize all the fun, and care nothing about anything else?"

And to-night upon my restlessness the loveliness of the northern night had a strangely soothing effect, which yet, in the background, so to speak, greatly increased my dread of returning to the old life, with its perpetual ache.

And there was the Duke beside me—tall, subtle, graceful, beautiful as a woman, yet with the strength of a man, to wrap one round.

I remembered that his reputation was none of the best, that his past would not bear probing; but was there any man's except Di's that would? Even Bobbie had sown a plentiful crop of wild oats.

So I let myself drift, and more and more alluring grew the thought of those strong arms. I was so tired—so sick of it all.

Yes, I—Maud Cardew—the successful actress of the day, with all her life before her—had to confess that night to a nausea that seemed to embrace everything.

So the danger grew—so the hour tempted—so the dreaming night lulled my better self to sleep.

When at last the Duke stepped near I did not move, but let him fold me in his arms.

(Next Tuesday I will tell you of an accident that befell me.)

A Woman Now.

A Story Proving that Love is the Key to all Happiness.

"You won't marry me, Ida?"

"No, I think not. I'm quite sure not," added Ida Morny, after a second or two of hesitation. Guy Hardwick looked earnestly at her.

"But why not?"

"I don't love you," returned the sixteen-year-old damsel, with extreme frankness.

"Ida, you are cruel."

"No, I am not. At least I don't mean to be cruel. Oh, Guy! what made you fall in love with me? We were having such a nice time out there playing champion croquet games and getting up tableaux and charades and going on picnics. And now it's all spoilt."

"Ida," said Guy passionately, setting his teeth together, "you are a mere child. You haven't an idea what love means—apart from chocolate creams and new ball dresses," he added bitterly. "What made me fall in love with you? Because I couldn't help it. And now you refuse to give me back so much as a heart-throb in return."

"And I can't help that," retorted Ida, naively. "Don't look so cross, Guy. You frighten me."

"Because I am in earnest, Ida. Try to think of this as a woman should. Try for once to lift yourself out of the trivial world that surrounds you, and tell me from the very depths of your heart if you do not think you can love me."

Little Ida Morny began to cry.

"I don't want to love you," she sobbed. "I don't know why I should get married. I'm very happy as I am. Mamma says it is time enough for a girl to think of matrimony when she is twenty-five years old. And I am only sixteen."

"There," interrupted Guy, bitterly, "that will do. I looked for an ocean of deep, solemn sweetness in your heart, I find but a shallow pool, reflecting back the shadow of transient events—and that is all. Good-bye, Ida. Forget that I have made a fool of myself—if you can!"

And he strode away, biting his lips, and tearing at his long, black moustache as he went.

Ida looked after him with quivering dimples and tearful, velvet-blue eyes.

"I don't know what he means," said this little, half-blossomed bud of womanhood to herself. "I am sorry I have offended him, but I couldn't help it!"

And she went back to the hotel for her hour of guitar practising, feeling a little bewildered and a little regretful, just as she did when her pet greyhound ran away from her!

Digitized by Google

Just at the entrance to the laurel walk—a wild, sylvan spot that overlooked the blue gleam of the sea—Hortensia Carey met Mr. Hardwick. A tall, Juno-like woman of thirty, with soft, swimming, Oriental eyes and a face that was a dream of beauty in itself.

Hortensia Carey had come to Shackleton-on-Sea to get a rich husband. Hortensia liked Mr. Hardwick and she didn't like "that insignificant little mite of an Ida Morny," and Hortensia, snugly shielded behind the trees and bushes, had heard every word of the declaration of love and its refusal.

"Strike while the iron is hot!" said Hortensia to herself "There's many a heart caught in the rebound, and why not Guy Hardwick's?"

So she glided forward with upturned eyes shining softly beneath their long lashes.

"Mr. Hardwick, you are sad! You look troubled!" she murmured sympathetically.

"Troubled!" he echoed, moodily. "There's not much in the world but trouble."

"And you say that!" cried Hortensia. "You! Now I, who am only a woman, might utter it with reason!"

Guy looked into her Cleopatra-like face. Strange that he never before knew how beautiful it was.

"Will you take my arm down this steep hill?" said he. "And tell me what you mean by those last words?"

Hortensia knew how to avail herself of the golden tide of opportunity. Guy Hardwick was just in the mood when a man wants relief from himself. And the upshot of it was that he invited her to go out for a row after sunset.

"Don't ask me if there is anyone else you prefer," sighed Hortensia. "I am accustomed to place myself in a secondary position."

"There's no one I should prefer to you," said Guy slowly. "No one, at least now."

* * * * *

"Engaged!" cried Ida Morny, dropping her croquet mallet. "Guy Hardwick engaged! I don't believe it!"

"I saw the ring myself on Hortensia Carey's finger," said Mrs. Openwell. "She told me. She's proud of it, and well she may be, for Mr. Hardwick is by all odds the finest young fellow here this season. I don't quite like Hortensia, but she is very handsome. They will make a splendid couple. Quick, Ida; they are waiting for you to play—it is your turn!"

And Ida gave her ball a thump with the mallet, vitally damaging her partner's play, and not in the least knowing what she was about.

She went home and looked into her mirror.

"Yes," she said to herself, "I thought so! I'm only a little, insignificant creature, with pale cheeks, senseless blue eyes and hair like flax! Miss Hortensia Carey has eyes like black stars and the height of a queen. She's worth loving—but I didn't think Guy would have forgotten me so soon!"

And then Ida began to cry, she didn't quite know why.

"I think I'm tired of Shackleton-on-Sea," she said to herself. "I mean to write to Uncle Theodore to come and take me home. I suppose they'll be married at once, and Miss Carey won't return to Wortham at all. I won't go to the wedding!"

Of course the contemplated nuptials of wealthy Mr. Hardwick and the beauty of the season made plenty of gossip and considerable sensation. It found its way into the newspapers, no one knew how (except, perhaps, Miss Hortensia herself). Reporters jotted down the number of Miss Carey's dresses and jewels, the probable number of thousands per annum which constituted the bridegroom's income—and Hortensia's superb face actually appeared on the front page of the illustrated papers of the day as the bride of the season.

Guy was indignant enough—but Hortensia only laughed.

"Never mind, dear Guy," said she. "People will talk—and, after all, they don't mean any harm."

But one beautiful summer morning Miss Carey's seat at the breakfast table was vacant—and scarcely had the fact been observed when someone cried out:

"Why, General Vincent is gone, too!"

Undeniably it was awkward for the bridegroom-elect. Still more so when a note, sent from the nearest post-office, gave him to understand that the lovely Hortensia had given back her heart to the General, an ancient suitor of hers, who had recently fallen heir to a large fortune.

The note was prettily worded; it contained sentimental regrets to Mr. Hardwick that the future they had contemplated so sanguinely could never be realised and prayers for pardon in the name of love!

Guy set his teeth together, but he made no comment. He took his fate as it was dealt out to him! Nay, perhaps, in his inmost heart he felt some thrills of relief that he was for ever separated from Hortensia Carey. For he had some time since made the discovery that he did not love her as a man should love the woman whom he means to marry.

He sat thinking of these things, his head resting on his hands, his eyes fixed with infinite mournfulness on the blue sea.

"Oh, Guy! I am so sorry! So sorry!"

And Ida Morny burst out crying.

"Sorry, Ida? Nay, keep your kindly sympathy for those that need it more," he answered, somewhat bitterly. "Am I not better off, by far, than if she had married me? She did not love me, you see. Nobody loves me."

"Guy, that is not true!"

"It is pretty well proven!"

She came nearer to him, with burning cheeks and glittering eyes. "I love you, Guy."

"Love, little one? Love? You do not know the meaning of the word."

She drew back, trembling and sobbing.

"You give me my heart back then, Guy? You do not care for me?" she uttered.

"God knows, darling, that you are the only person in the world for whom I really ever cared."

"Then won't you let me comfort you now? Won't you let me take her place?"

And looking into Ida's eyes Guy read the truth.

"When I wooed you before, darling, you said 'no,'" he whispered and his gaze grew more intense.

"But I have grown into a woman since then, dearest."

So they were married. And, I suppose, I might add that they "lived happy ever afterwards." For Love is the key to all happiness—and Love folded his silver wings above their nuptial altar. As for Hortensia, she was rich—and that was all she cared for.

Queenie Robins.

Digitized by Google

Complete in Twelve Lists.

BRAND NEW COMPETITION.

Cash Down. Cash Down. Cash Down.

1st Prize, £50. 2nd Prize, £25. 3rd Prize, £10.

And 25 Gramophones.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below will be found six paragraphs containing the buried names of Railway Stations in the United Kingdom (or words that sound the same as the names). You must write in the spaces given the names of the Railway Stations so indicated.

No word or part of a word may be used more than once in making up the name of a Railway Station. In the event of the name of a Railway Station occurring more than once in a sentence, it should be underlined and written down each time. In case of more than one person finding the same number of words for each or any sentence, those words containing the largest number of letters will have preference. No name of a Railway Station may be composed of a single letter, either standing by itself or taken from any word in the sentences.

When you have discovered the names of Railway Stations in the sentences, underline (in ink) the words which go to make up the names (or words that sound the same as the names) and then on the line underneath each sentence write (in ink) the correct names of the Railway Stations to be found in each.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to Bradshaw's Guide, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or Room Eight, SHORT STORIES, 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The names of the Railway Stations consist of one word or two or more consecutive words, or consecutive parts of one word, or two or more consecutive words.

The first prize of £50 will be given to the Competitor who fills in the greatest number of railway stations under the conditions stated. The second prize of £25 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in the order of merit.

When you have filled in all the names you can find, cut out the list below and keep it by you. Don't on any account send it to us until the closing date is announced in SHORT STORIES. The eighth list of sentences will appear next week.

In the event of a tie a further list (or, if necessary, several further lists) of sentences will be submitted to the tieing competitors until one wins the first prize outright.

CUT THROUGH HERE

EXAMPLE.

The oaks were swaying in the breeze, the cows were grazing peacefully, when out of the park tore a huge black bull.

The Oaks, Sway, Cowes, Grays, Park, Black Bull.

SEVENTH LIST.

37. The March gales this year brought on great distress, blowing over houses and doing other damage.

38. Before denying that Charlie Grafton was his accomplice, Harold Wood had strenuously maintained that they were in league.

39. He duns me for that money lent on March the twentieth, but I cannot risk a payment till Consols reach par.

40. Clara Haworth was a very idle child. She attended St. Mary's School, Hilford, for a year, but was then dismissed.

41. The Giant's Causeway is celebrated the world over. If by a goddess or god stone had been laid upon stone it could not be more wonderful.

42. "Is it true that George Robey hides in a pear-tree at the Tivoli?" "Yes, that is his latest eccentricity."

NAME ..... ADDRESS .....

Digitized by Google

Aunt Aster's Party.

A Story Introducing Picture Puzzles.

Nor for worlds would I say anything against the Picture Puzzle Competitions which at present are flooding our magazines. I am too greatly indebted to the idea. I am merely going to tell a story which shows that in amateur and inexperienced hands it could lead to trouble. Sherpin's hands were amateur to rawness and very inexperienced indeed.

It befell this Spring that he and I were spending a few days in a hotel at Cliffgate, a south coast watering-place. He was there by invitation of a certain Miss Aster who was husband-hunting for her pretty niece, Margaret Staines.

They always wintered at this hotel. I had run down from town because the three of them were there, and because I wanted to keep an eye on Sherpin when I wasn't using it for the purpose of looking at Miss Staines.

Aunt Aster didn't care for me because, though I was not a poor man, I was only a fledgling of a barrister; while Sherpin had twice my income and a suspicion of a peerage somewhere tucked away in his family, for all the world like a tendency to consumption. The situation was a hackneyed one enough, but that didn't mend matters for me.

The Mitre wasn't the kind of hotel that I should otherwise have patronised. It was rather the family kind, where you fraternised in an evening, and played games in happy domesticity.

That is as a rule. But at this particular epoch its visitors sat apart in small, preoccupied heaps, with pencils, and pages of little pictures, while the silence was only broken by a request for advice or an occasional triumph-shout as solutions of puzzles suddenly dawned.

Aunt Aster complained bitterly.

"It's perfectly absurd!" she said.

She is tall and angular, with rather mud-coloured hair, and a particularly ample nose and ears.

"Last year we had round games or music or recitations every evening! I brought down my Halma-board last night in desperation, but Major Ricketts was sitting looking at a picture-book and wouldn't stir! Could I tell him what town a horrid drawing of a sheep's liver and a sheet of water represented? I said I could not—nor did I."

"Why, those towns are as easy as anything!" broke in Margaret Staines, tossing a bewitching little fair head. "What's bothering me is a bottle of champagne and a sort of hotel, and——"

"Aylesbury!" said Sherpin, staring absently at his cigarette—we were sitting on the hotel verandah—"I found it last night for Mrs. Butcher. It's a beer-bottle."

"Yes, but unfortunately it happens to be a composer's name, Mr. Sherpin. Besides, how could you make a house into——"

"They—haven't a single one left!"

It reached us—a panting, disappointed cry from a stout lady, who was hurrying along the garden path. Up the verandah steps she struggled, and dropped breathlessly into the chair which I vacated.

Aunt Aster surveyed her with sympathy.

"Have you asked Mrs. Nettleship?" she said. "She told me last night that she'd still three half-crown ones to sell."

"Sell?" gasped the newcomer. "Sell? It's not tickets! How can I spare time to go to theatricals when I've not found two of the railway stations? The competition closes on Tuesday! It's a copy of Bradshaw I wanted! The man simply laughed at me—said he was sold out in a couple of hours!

"That old cat of a Miss Entwistle won't let me so much as glance at hers because we're trying for the same one, you know! A pound a week for life! There's a man in a halo and a pot and some roots and things! Oh, there's Mr. Salmon! I wonder if he could——"

She was up and puffing down the steps before we had time to comment. Aunt Aster gazed at her retreating figure.

"Last year," she said severely, "that was as nice, sensible a woman as you could wish to see! We were here for a month together. It's all these abominable picture-books! I never saw a set of people more completely unhinged!

"So far as any evening entertainment goes one might as well stay in a convent! I wanted to take the small drawing-room for one of my usual evenings next week, but I don't suppose anybody would come unless I drew them pictures of what they were going to eat and offered them a few thousand pounds for solving them. What's the matter, Mr Sherpin?"

Sherpin—he is round-faced and small-eyed, and always earnest as any deacon—had sprung suddenly from his seat.

"A notion!" he cried excitedly. "Ripping idea! Why don't you give a picture puzzle party? Names of people you ask, you know—someone draw pictures to represent 'em, and each person have a bit of paper and put 'em down, and there'd be prizes for those who got most right!" His eyes gleamed like stars behind a pair of gold-rimmed pince-nez.

"Oh, what a perfectly lovely idea!" said Margaret, clapping her little white hands.

Aunt Aster hesitated.

"I haven't the least doubt of its 'taking,'" she said grimly, "but I have no wish to be even remotely connected with those nursery amusements."

"But, auntie, you must move with the times! You know cards or music would fall awfully flat just now." Margaret's blue eyes were shining too. "Only who'd do the drawing, Mr. Sherpin?"

Digitized by Google

"Oh, er, I'd easily manage that if Miss Aster will allow me. Pin up some sheets of white paper, you know, and do it with black chalk, and give 'em two minutes to guess each picture. Take 'Entwistle,' for instance—just 'ENT' and a whistle—why there's hardly a name going you can't picturise in some way! It would be the event of the month!"

It occurred to me as I sat in moody isolation while they planned and suggested, and Miss Aster gradually thawed under Sherpin's enthusiasm, that he was probably right.

"I knew Sherpin and I had seen him draw in his college days, moreover, and I realised something of the enormity of his proposals. I ventured, in a moment or two, to raise the hesitating objection that with only twenty or thirty names from which to choose, his subject area would be somewhat limited. He said "Nonsense."

"Everybody hasn't an Oxford man's brains!" chimed in Margaret.

Aunt Aster added, with an inconsistency that took my breath away, that in getting up any sort of entertainment you invariably found that people seemed to raise difficulties for the sheer pleasure of doing so.

So I kept silence from good words or bad, and she sent out invitations that evening for the following Thursday. She was proud, I fancy, of the fact that her parties were considered "features," more or less, of life at the Mitre.

She informed me a day or two later that on finding that she hadn't a single refusal, she had given the entire arrangements into Sherpin's hands.

"He's so resourceful," she said. "And, between ourselves, Mr. Fenton, he's so keenly interested in anything connected with dear Margaret, that I have no fear of the evening not being a complete success!"

"In spite of the pictures?" I said unwisely.

She gave me one withering glance.

"I have always understood, Mr. Fenton, that the art of being a good hostess consisted in providing the kind of entertainment most appreciated, without considering one's own likes and dislikes. If you think that Mr. Sherpin's programme will in any way interfere with your enjoyment of the evening, I do beg that you will reconsider your acceptance!"

What could I do but grovel? I never saw Margaret in the daytime, since I was obliged to go up to town, and in the evening she and Sherpin were always studying Public Property or some other magazine, together because they were entering for the same competition.

At all events they couldn't sit hand-in-hand at an At Home, and perhaps I might get an opportunity on this occasion, at least, for a quiet word with her.

There seemed little prospect of it, however, when Thursday evening arrived, and I found my way into an already crowded drawing-room. Aunt Aster stood at its door smiling benignly as congratulations poured upon her from every fresh arrival.

"Such an original idea!" "How clever of you, dear Miss Aster!" "Delightful change from cards or music—not that your parties"—this from an old crock of a Major who lived at the hotel—"weren't always charming!" "Where is Miss Staines?"

She was moving among the guests, explaining, laughing, welcoming in a breath—the sort of charming, put-you-at-your ease woman that a man would like to see doing hostess in his own drawing-room. And at the far end of the room, with a black-board—a common or garden black-board—covered with sheets of white paper, stood Sherpin, chalk in hand, eager, perspiring, and issuing nervous directions.

"It simply couldn't be anyone else!" he said, beaming significantly at his hostess.

"Miss Staines has given you all cards with numbers, hasn't she, ladies and gentlemen? Now I'm going to draw—if you'll all kindly sit down—pictures on this board representing the names of people present.

"After each picture you'll be allowed two minutes to guess what I've drawn—I mean what name it represents, of course, and you'll kindly set down the name on your lists without, of course, saying it aloud. The winner will be the—er—lady or gentleman who has most names correct."

Aunt Aster sat down heavily and with an air of proprietorship beside a satin-wood table, on which reposed an inkstand and a cigarette-case, both in solid silver—her prizes to the successful competitors to be. She never did things by halves.

I surveyed my neat little card decorated with some thirty small spaces and corresponding numbers. (I treasure it yet.) Then I surveyed Sherpin. He "flaps" somewhat, with his particularly big feet and hands on most occasions, but at the moment he was literally hurling himself at the blackboard—which swung round and hit him at intervals—arms and legs working alike in the agonies of a portrayal of his artistic conceptions.

Presently he fell to one side. The sheet held a weird, globular object and a square block containing hieroglyphics of some kind. (Sherpin always did write a most villainous fist.)

"Pumpkin!" screamed a certain old Mrs. Appleton triumphantly from the front row of chairs. She was very deaf, by the way, and had absorbed the directions with difficulty. "It's a pumpkin—let me see—Cinderella—Cinderella—what's that coin in the corner?"

Digitized by Google

"You mustn't speak—you mustn't speak!" cried a score of voices.

"Dear madam, it's a football!" corrected old Major Ricketts—"a very well drawn—eh? Oh, beg pardon! Not speak? No, of course not!" He made excited signs to the old lady, who was still saying "Pumpkin!" triumphantly and explosively.

They had been helping each other for the past week in a competition for a certain weekly, and I suppose habit was too strong for him. The room was staring at the board, for the most part, in agonised perplexity.

"Would you—might I ask, is the foliage intended to be inside the pot?" queried a timid voice.

"Foliage?" said Sherpin. "Oh—er—well, that's got a bit rubbed—" he scored his drawing violently—"that's a '20' and 'c-w-t'—but I mustn't help you, you know!" he added playfully.

"A seat, does he say? Well, I should never have recognised it—never! Meant for Dr. Seaton, I suppose," said Mrs. Appleton across three women to the Major.

I made an entry on my card, having already divined that the appellation in question was her own. Sherpin, a trifle redder in the face than usual, intimated that the first two minutes had expired and turned over his sheet. "But that hardly gives us time to see it, even!" objected one, Mrs. Nettleship excitedly.

"Oh, nonsense," said Sherpin cheerily. "Two minutes is quite long enough for any intelli—I mean for anyone but an—good Heavens, Mrs. Nettleship, what is it? You're not going? There's one coming now that even you will see in a—I—I mean—I say I'm sure I——"

Mrs. Nettleship had risen from her chair. She has the reputation of being a touchy woman, and gave Sherpin a glance that would have annihilated a braver man and swept—looking neither to right nor left—from the room.

Under the circumstances, and in the uncomfortable silence that followed, an attempt at a delineation of a few stiff leaves and a vessel that would promptly have sought the bottom of any sea, fell a trifle flat.

Aunt Aster was looking uncertainly towards the door, and Margaret was looking uncertainly at Sherpin. I edged a little nearer to the board.

"Now I shall puzzle you," he said, laughing nervously. He flapped round the board a third time, and when he stepped aside we saw a sketch of a man who knelt at a woman's feet and kissed her hand. At least that was what Sherpin meant it for, and all, I am convinced, that he intended to convey.

But there was only one man in the hotel who had a long and fiercely-pointed moustache—a man whose interest in a certain lady visitor was a matter of general comment—and Sherpin had somehow managed to bestow one upon the kneeling figure in his drawing.

"Why, it's Mr. Spooner! Look at his mustashys!"

It was the shrill, distinct voice of the seven-year-old daughter of a friend of Margaret's, allowed among the throng by special concession and declaiming now with pointing finger.

"Hush, dear, hush," said Sherpin, in politely annoyed tones. "You mustn't say when you find them out. Beastly little nuisance!" he added in lower tones to a neighbouring guest.

There was a moment's silence—the silence of sheer consternation.

"But, good Heavens, Sherpin, that's going a bit too far! Turn it over, man," muttered his neighbour hastily.

"Upon my word, sir." The individual of the pointed moustachios jumped up from his seat. The lady of his attentions was already crying quietly in the shelter of a curtain.

"Will you pass on to the next, Mr. Sherpin?" said Aunt Aster frigidly, with intense presence of mind. Sherpin was staring at the agitated room in blank astonishment.

"Pass on to the next?" he said. "But they've not had their two minutes! They've not—good Heavens"—as comprehension dawned suddenly, "you didn't think I meant it for a picture of Mr. Spooner? That is, of course, it's meant for him—I mean his name—but it's only a man—any man—spooning with a girl! It's not Miss Walters! I say, I hope nobody thinks I——"

"Get on, you chuckle-headed ass!" I said fiercely. I was at his elbow by this time. Perhaps my tones carried authority, for he turned his sheet mechanically over. I saw the folds of a distant curtain move convulsively, and realised that Margaret was trying to comfort an almost hysterical guest. Aunt Aster had begun to talk loudly about the weather.

"I'm going on," said Sherpin, with nervous rapidity, curling a big foot round one leg of the black-board as if he were trying to climb it. "You'll all guess the next, I'm afraid! In fact, there's only one person in the room it could possibly represent."

I caught my breath apprehensively as I heard the soft whirring movements of the chalk.

"Only one lady," Sherpin repeated himself as he worked. "I should say person—it could possibly—represent. There we are!"

"I don't know that I was surprised to behold a drawing—the best that he had yet effected—of a peculiarly large-eared donkey. There was a quick gasp from the room.

"Why, I thought you'd all fly to your cards!" exclaimed the exhibitor airily. "It's so palpable! You wouldn't be in this room at this moment if it wasn't for this donkey—I mean this lady—I mean, oh, I've forgotten something."

He rushed to the board again and added a minute "T. E. R." to his handiwork.

"It simply couldn't be anyone else!" he said, beaming significantly at his hostess.

There was another moment of breathless silence. I think everyone was too scared even to smile. Then I saw Aunt Aster rise in awful majesty. And at the same instant I realised that the switches controlling the electric light of the room were exactly behind me—and that the gods had delivered the situation into my hands. In a second I had the assembly in total darkness, and Sherpin by the collar.

"Get out!" I whispered fiercely. "Go and get into bed—under your bed—anywhere—only disappear."

"But—but—but——"

I choked him at the third conjunction with a still stronger grip, and his voice broke in an odd gasp. I heard my own explaining to the company that something had unfortunately gone wrong with the electric light, but that if they would move on into the small coffee-room—where I knew that refreshments were spread—I had no doubt that matters could speedily be put right.

Someone opened the door, guests and hostess filed out obediently, and I shut it after them. When I turned on the light again Sherpin was not there. Nor was he to be seen when I, too, went to eat in the coffee-room.

I explained unblushingly to Aunt Aster that he had been taken suddenly ill, and I think she said that she was glad to hear it. We finished the evening with music and games—under my direction, since she and Margaret still seemed a trifle unhinged and grateful for supervision.

When Aunt Aster said good-night to me she pressed something into my hand. It was the silver cigarette-case.

* * * * *

It was actually Margaret herself who won the £500 that Public Property offered for the deciphering of its picture puzzles. She heard the news on the very day that I persuaded her to say yes to a question that I had been trying to ask for some time, and she went straight off and bought the motor-car in which, at the moment, we are enjoying a very golden month. I think Sherpin is abroad somewhere.

As I said at starting, I, of all people, have least cause to complain of the Picture Puzzle idea. I owe it a wife, and a particularly delightful honeymoon. I merely wanted to point out that in inexperienced hands it has its dangers.

Evelyn Glover.

Digitized by Google

The Lady Marion.

The Story of a Lost Identity.

Happily it is not often that titled women find themselves in such straits as did Lady Marion Grant on the death of her father. She was barely nineteen, and the Earl had left her penniless, having lost his whole fortune gambling at Monte Carlo.

He had quarrelled with every member of his family; he had changed his name, and, in his selfish anger, had refused to tell even his only child what his true name was.

That he was a Peer, he admitted, that she was entitled to the prefix of "Lady" he allowed, but she knew that Grant was not her real name, nor did her father leave any papers that enlightened her on the subject of her birthright.

There she was, a girl with a few kind friends, who knew her as Miss Grant, and were ready to give her a home till after she had recovered the first shock of her grief; but then she must go out into the world and fend for herself.

One thing at least her father had done for his motherless child, he had given her an excellent education. She could speak four languages, sing, play both the piano and violin, and was, besides, thoroughly well read.

Mrs. Harmon, the kind friend at whose house she was staying, strongly advised her to answer any likely advertisements for a finishing governess for girls, though, as she said to her husband, her very youth and beauty would go against her obtaining such a post.

Every morning the girl would anxiously scan the papers, but she found that when she applied in person for an engagement, her youth was always against her.

Well, something must be done, so she resolved to assume a middle-aged appearance, and persuaded her friend to lend her some money to buy a brown wig, in which streaks of grey hair were discernible.. This, with the addition of a pair of spectacles, immediately put quite twenty years on to her age, and in this disguise she sallied forth one morning in answer to a letter requesting her to call and see Lady Worthampton in person.

Terribly nervous, lest her trick should be discovered, and at the same time feeling like a child playing a practical joke, Miss Grant rang the bell of one of the houses in Park Lane.

It was immediately opened by the footman, who informed the butler that it was another lady come to see her ladyship about the situation of governess. Marion was at once conducted to the boudoir, where Lady Worthampton was writing.

A tall, beautiful woman, still in the thirties, rose as she was announced, and stretched out her hand in kindly welcome.

At a glance, her eye took in the slender figure, and high-bred air of the grey-haired woman before her, quite a different type from those who had hitherto applied for her situation.

"Your letter sounded so promising, Miss Grant, that I thought I would ask you to come and see me; I am devoted to my three little girls, and very anxious about their welfare, so I thought it best to see everyone before I engaged their services."

"Yes, indeed, Lady Worthampton, I am sure it must be a great anxiety choosing a governess, for it is such a responsible post," Marion answered, in a clear, sweet voice, that certainly seemed very fresh and impetuous for the owner of grey hair.

Lady Worthampton gazed at her curiously, and the girl felt herself growing red.

"You have, I understand, had no previous experience of teaching?"

"No, I have always lived with my father, we travelled about a good deal, and it was not until his death that I found myself compelled to earn my own living."

Here the girl's voice faltered, and Lady Worthampton gave a sympathetic movement.

"But," she continued, 'I have always been devoted to children, and I think have generally succeeded in winning their affection. As regards the actual teaching, I do not fancy you will find me inefficient."

The mother smiled, she liked this woman, why, she could not say, but there was a strength and self-reliance about her, that contrasted favourably with the somewhat depressed specimens of humanity that had hitherto sought the post.

"I have three children, as I told you; I will send for them. so that you may judge whether you are likely to be friends. The eldest is just at an awkward age, fourteen, and requires rather tactful handling."

In response to her summons, the butler went for the children, who shortly after burst into the room, the youngest one hurling herself on to her mother, in a manner which showed the perfect confidence of their relationship.

"Maisie, dear, don't you see there is a visitor here," laughed her mother reprovingly. "Edith, dear," this to the eldest girl," go and shake hands with Miss Grant, and you, Mary. She is kind enough to wish to be your new governess."

In spite of the spectacles Marion's winning smile was irresistible, and the three girls were soon talking to her quite naturally, whilst she seemed to enter into their interests in a wonderful way, considering those grey hairs.

Lady Worthampton was delighted, and when she had dismissed the children, turned to Miss Grant with a smile, saying:

"You may think me foolish and impetuous, Miss Grant, but I am still young enough myself to believe in the intuitions of children. I know now that you will make mine quite happy, and be able to make them mind you, for they will do anything for people they like, and they do like you. About salary, shall we say sixty pounds a year, till we see how things get on?"

"Thank you, I shall be very pleased indeed to accept your situation, they are dear children, and you," she added, "you are so kind to me, compared with the other people I have seen."

"I hope, Miss Grant, that when I have had time to know you better, we may be real friends," responded Lady Worthampton, as she shook hands with her new governess, and bade her good-bye till that day week.

* * * * *

It is three months later, and the London season is in full swing. Worthampton House is packed with guests, amongst whom is its mistress' brother, Captain Lancelot Hardcastle.

The children are all devoted to Uncle Lance, and lure him up to the school-room on every possible opportunity. But good as he has always been to them, his visits to them this time are more frequent than ever, for there is a certain mystery surrounding Miss Grant that he has made up his mind to fathom.

She bears a curious likeness to a girl, almost a child, whom he once met abroad in one of the smartest French hotels, living there with her father, and yet he remembered quite well, that Mr. Grant had told him that he had no relations living of that name, on one occasion when he chanced to ask him if some Grants he knew were any connections.

Digitized by Google

The governess moved like a girl, talked like a girl, but yet had grey hair. That she was not what she seemed, he felt quite certain, and to-day he had confided his suspicions to his sister, who merely laughed at him, and told him not to interfere with Miss Grant's private affairs. She and the children were very fond of her, and that was the principal thing.

"I know, Molly, ask Miss Grant down to your fancy dress ball next week, and then let us see what we shall see," said Captain Hardcastle enigmatically.

"Certainly, I had intended to do so; I am quite sure that Miss Grant dances beautifully!"

That evening, after the children had gone to bed, Lady Worthampton went up to the school-room, and found the governess sitting by the open window, with her glasses off.

Instantly the door opened she sprang to her feet, and placed them on her nose, but not before the intruder had caught sight of a pair of exquisitely black-lashed blue eyes.

"I have come to ask a favour of you, Miss Grant, I want you to come down to my ball next Tuesday, and if you will let me, I should like you to hire a fancy dress for the occasion, and send the account in to me.

"And now comes the favour. I want you to choose whatever costume you like, but to let no one know what it is, not even the children, only myself. It is an odd request, I know, but there's method in my madness, and you know I am your friend," she added, laying her hand on Marion's arm.

The girl was too astounded to speak for some seconds. She had so longed to go to that ball, she was still not nineteen, and passionately fond of dancing.

"You are very, very good to me," she faltered at last, "and I should love to come down, but about the dress, I have some things by me that will do quite well."

"Then, that is settled; mind you do not tell anyone," said Lady Worthampton as she waved good-bye, and went downstairs to her guests.

Marion had all at once had an idea. Was it possible that by this means she might learn her own identity? She had three curious ornaments, which her father had warned her never to part with, heirlooms, he said they were, she would wear them on Tuesday.

As for a dress, she would wear her own beautiful golden hair in ringlets round her neck, whilst she would buy a large Duchess of Devonshire hat in purple velvet, with white ostrich feathers.

She had in her possession a dress of pure white satin, with a curious device in seed pearls, that had been her mother's, and which, with a little alteration, would fit her perfectly. As for the jewels, they were three brooches, composed of sapphires and diamonds, of remarkable beauty and design.

How she got through the day on the eventful Tuesday, she didn't know, even the children could not help seeing that she was excited about something, though they had no inkling that their mother had asked her to the ball, at which Royalty was to be present.

Captain Hardcastle told her that he knew she was coming, and wanted to know what dress she was going to wear, but his utmost intreaties only won the response, "a white one."

At nine o'clock that night, when she was dressing, a knock came at her door.

"Who's there?"

"It is only I, Miss Grant, may I come in?" said Lady Worthampton.

Marion felt herself in a dilemma, she could not refuse her kind employer entrance, but how would she take the deception of age she had practised on her?

However, there was no time to think, for again came the voice:

"Please let me in—I won't tell,"

Marion opened the door, and hastily retreated into the shadow of her room, in case anyone passing should catch sight of her.

"Miss Grant!" exclaimed Lady Worthampton in astonishment, as she saw standing before her one of the most beautiful girls she had ever set eyes upon.

"Oh, forgive me, I had to make myself look old, no one would take a young governess, and I really didn't deceive you about my teaching," she said imploringly.

There was a pause, and then Lady Worthampton spoke, as only one woman in a million would have been generous enough to speak.

"Child, for you are little more than that, I forgive you, for it is many a long day since I saw anything so lovely," and the elder woman took the girl's pure, beautiful face between her hands, and kissed her, as if she had been her sister.

"No wonder Lance has lost his heart to the governess, though he has never seen you like this, has he?" she inquired, holding up one of the golden tresses in her hands.

"Not since I was fifteen," was the blushing response. "I remembered Captain Hardcastle quite well, for he dined with my father one evening when we were in Paris, and I was still a child in short frocks, but he does not remember me," she added.

"No, he has never spoken to me of this, though it was at his suggestion that I asked you to say nothing about your dress to-night. My dear child, what a lovely frock, where did you get it?"

"It belonged to my mother," said Marion, with a pleased smile.

"I don't think you have told me all about yourself, have you dear?" asked kind Lady Worthampton, as she saw the three wondrous brooches.

"I have told you nearly as much as I know myself, dear, kind friend; there is a mystery about me, my father was an Earl, and I am his only child, but he had quarrelled with his family, and changed his name to Grant, and died suddenly without revealing the secret of his real name to me."

"Then you are Lady——"

"Marion, and I know no more," returned the girl.

"My dear child, this is romantic enough for a novel. Well, come with me, if you are ready, and we will solve this mystery between us some other time. I am so glad, dear child, that you came to me, for I have an idea, but I will not raise your hopes, that your identity may be revealed this very night. Oh, I came to bring you this from Lance," and as she spoke, Lady Worthampton took up an exquisite shower bouquet of white roses, and lilies-of-the-valley.

Captain Hardcastle was drawn aside by his sister for a brief moment, when he entered the ballroom, where she stood awaiting her guests, and listened to her explanation of the beautiful girl who stood at the entrance of the conservatory.

"Molly, you're a brick! Montague is coming to-night, isn't he?"

"Do you mean—do you think?"

"I am almost sure that Lady Marion will prove to be the child of Montague's eldest uncle."

An hour later Captain Hardcastle led the belle of the ball into the conservatory to rest, after her last dance with him. Marion, for it is she, had never looked so lovely, a pink flush was on her cheeks, the light of love in her eyes, and a joyous elasticity in her step that had been lacking ever since her father's death.

Half the men in the room were in love with her, and it was with a thrill of sisterly pride that Lady Worthampton noticed her brother lead the girl to a secluded niche.

"Marion, my darling, I could not wait any longer, you know that all these weeks past, I have grown to love you. You know, do you not, dear, that it is Marion, and not Lady Marion that I want for my wife?"

"I know," answered the girl, raising her lovely eyes to his, so that he might see the answering love to his own. "I know," she continued softly, "that you loved me as the poor, middle-aged governess, and oh, Lance, I believe I have loved you ever since that night more than three years ago, when you gave me some chocolates, because my father would not let me go with him to the opera."

Digitized by Google

"My love, my little Marion," answered the enraptured soldier, as he folded her lovely form in his arms, and kissed one of the golden curls that lay near his lips.

"But Marion, do you really not know what your father's title was, have you no clue?"

"None," she answered, "only these three brooches I now wear are heirlooms."

Scarcely were the words uttered, than two men entered the conservatory, talking in low and agitated tones. On seeing that one of them was the Earl Montague, for whom he entertained a strong dislike, Lancelot drew his betrothed into an alcove shaded by a huge palm-tree, and laid his finger on his lips to enforce silence.

"I tell you, Caston, it must be the girl, how else could she have those brooches. You know they have always gone to the eldest daughter of the head of the house, to come back to the family at her marriage, or the coming of age of the daughter of the next in sucession.

"These brooches have been searched for everywhere. I know that my uncle had them in his possession when he left England but so cleverly did he disguise his identity that we have never been able to find out what name he assumed. He may indeed be living now, for all we can prove to the contrary."

"And what is it your intention to do?" asked the man addressed as Caston.

"Do? Why, nothing; do you think that after all these years I intend to try and find a claimant for either the title or the money? I am not quite such a fool, my dear fellow!"

"Blackguard!" muttered Lancelot to himself, "you will have to sing another tune presently."

Marion meantime had listened breathlessly, and when the two men had walked off, turned to her lover, saying:

"Did they mean me?"

"Yes, dear, undoubtedly they meant you, those jewels are recognised."

"Then I am——"

"Lady Marion Montague. My darling, do you know what the world will say of me?" he inquired anxiously, as he drew her arm within his own.

"Of you, no, what should it say?"

"That I gained your consent to become my wife, before you knew who you were, and what a high position you held in the social world. Darling, when your claim is made, you will be a very rich woman, whilst I am a comparatively poor man, will you also think that of me?"

"Lance, do you doubt my love? I was so, so happy, and you go and spoil all by thinking me capable of such mean things," and, greatly to Captain Hardcastle's dismay, Marion, who was overwrought and excited, began to sob quietly.

"Hush, my darling, my sweetheart, I cannot bear your tears, I know you love me, I know you trust me, thank God for it. Sweet, you mustn't cry, you must be very, very happy again; look up, dear, and let me kiss away those tears," said her lover, as, lifting up her face to his own, he bent and kissed the long black lashes and sweet, pure lips, until they were once more smiling back at him.

But time had passed quickly and the lovers had, in common courtesy to their hostess, once more to make their appearance in the ball-room.

* * * * *

But little more remains to be told. Backed by Lord Worthampton's money, the lawyers soon succeeded in proving Lady Marion's identity, and Lord Montague has to disgorge a good jointure out of his immense income.

Directly the case was settled, Lady Marion Montague became the wife of Captain Lancelot Hardcastle, and was presented at Court on her marriage by her sister-in-law, Lady Worthampton, who lived to bless the day when she took a fancy to the grey-haired, young-voiced governess.

As for the children, they were inconsolable at the thought of losing her, and their aunt's visits were always looked forward to as red-letter days in the schoolroom.

M. Hoey.

Your Editor Chats.

FIVE more lists of sentences will appear in connection wiih the competition, making a total of twelve to complete the set. You will find the seventh list on page 591.

When readers raise points on which they are in doubt, they must not expect to have them answered by post, as some of them do. This of course would give them an unfair advantage over other competitors. If a point of sufficent general interest is raised it will be answered in this column of the paper each week.

Below will be found some further points raised by readers, together with my comments thereon:—

Question: Before you made the rule regarding the making of names of stations out of a single letter, either standing by itself or taken from a word, I had filled in several such. May I cross them out or must I obtain fresh lists?

Answer: Provided you cross them out so that the other names are not rendered illegible, it will not be necessary for you to get fresh lists.

Question: May the name of a station be formed from letters in the middle of a word, or must they be taken from either the beginning or end?

Answer: Provided the letters are consecutive, it does not matter from which part of a word they are taken.

Question: If the name of a station occurs in more than one of the sentences of a list, may it be put down each time?

Answer: It is clearly stated in the conditions that the names of stations should be put down each time they occur.

IN a few weeks' time a series by Winifred Graham, the talented authoress of "When the Birds Begin to Sing," which appeared in SHORT STORIES, and other tales, will commence. This series will be something quite different from anything we have had in SHORT STORIES.

THERE will also start shortly a new serial by Blanche Eardley, who is at present contributing her experiences as an actress to Pearson's Weekly under the title of "Tinsel Triumphs." This lady's writing is quite new to readers of SHORT STORIES, but I am sure you will all be very charmed by it. Watch this column next week for fuller particulars of our two new attractions.

I WONDER how many of my readers have sent their contributions to the FRESH AIR FUND yet. The earlier you send them the better, as the number of children to have a day in the country depends upon the money received. It naturally takes time to arrange for the parties, so if contributions do not come in very freely at the end of Spring and beginning of Summer it means that there must be many little faces wearing—instead of a bright, happy look—a look of intense disappointment that the summer has gone and they haven't had a FRESH AIR FUND excursion, just because the money came too late to be able to be used this year, or because it didn't arrive at all.

If you can't send so much as you would like to now, send what you can afford at once, and the remainder as you are able. Contributions should be sent to the Hon. Secretary, FRESH AIR FUND, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., who will forward collecting sheets on application. All amounts will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIAL.

Held Apart

The Story of a Strange Double Fraud and its Influence upon some Young Hearts, a Great Name, and a Famous Fortune.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Author of "The Golden Dwarf," "A Daughter of Mystery," etc.

SOME INTERESTING PEOPLE.

John Davenal. A diver.
Hannah Davenal. His sister, maid to Lady Tarleton.
Moira. Supposed to be the diver's daughter.
Sir Guy Vanbrugh. Moira's lover.
Adeline, Lady Tarleton. His aunt.
Irene Tarleton. Her daughter.
Edward Stormont. Lady Tarleton's brother-in-law.
Paul Jerome. His friend, a war-correspondent and journalist, in love with Irene.
Dennis Hartigan. A ship's steward, and husband of Hannah.
"Kit" Hartigan. His sister, a blind girl.
Detective-Sergt. Ussher. Of Scotland Yard.

TWENTY-THIRD CHAPTER.

Ussher Interviews the Gamekeeper.

A THRILL of terror shook Lady Tarleton as she sank down upon the leaf-strewn soil of the plantation, crouching, like a hunted thing, into the wild undergrowth of the coppice near her. All the artificial courage that her unscrupulous nature had drawn from the atmosphere of wealth and comfort in which she lived, and had her selfish being, seemed suddenly to have deserted her. She was no longer "my lady," but that trembling and pitiable wretch, a guilty creature in hiding.

Shivering in her spasm of abject cowardice, she lay concealed, scarcely daring to breathe. The sound of crackling twigs and rustling leaves that marked the progress of the two men continued for another moment, then she heard the gamekeeper's voice again, and listened intently. He had moved with the detective to a more distant point, and his tones, though audible, were less distinct.

"Here was where I stood, Mr. Ussher, sir," he said, "just by this broken poplar. I was on my way to look round the rabbit-warren on the far side of the park. We've no end of trouble with those poaching iron-workers, they've dogs as dumb as fishes, and as clever as any Christian."

Lady Tarleton raised herself on her hands and knees and peered out among the thinner growths of the leafy screen that sheltered her. Some few yards away the gamekeeper and Mr. Ussher had paused—they were gazing across the open glade that framed the low, dark pile of the mausoleum.

"And as I was about stepping out on to this bit of lawn," pursued the gamekeeper, "I saw by the light of the moon two figures coming towards me, and going, as it were, in the direction of the Tower, too, for they were bearing over to my left a bit. Both were women, and they were walking quick, and had their heads down. One was taller than the other, and walked in a stiff, old-maidish way, the second was stouter and rolled in her gait."

"Now what," demanded the detective, speaking for the first time, "what do you mean by that? Do you suggest that she was drunk?"

"Oh, dear no," was the answer, "I should say short of breath. When they got near me I could hear her pant. And they were hurrying enough to make anyone short-winded that was given to stoutness. That was what made me think of her ladyship, who is stout and a trifle uneven in her walk."

"Quite so," responded Mr. Ussher, "but you told me you saw this person's face. Now what I want you to do, is to go out there into the open to about where they were when you say you saw her face. I will remain here and ascertain if my own sight will carry to the point in question."

"Very well, sir!" assented the gamekeeper, and he strode out into the glade.

Lady Tarleton bit her lip, she was beginning to shiver again. There was something unnerving about the spectacle of the two men so deliberately experimenting with a clue which, she knew, might lead, all too disconcertingly, to herself, and betray, in a flash, the buried secret of years.

Out into the moonlight stalked the gamekeeper. Halting between the rim of the plantation and the mausoleum, he faced the detective and took off his hat. Further removed from him than Mr. Ussher, Lady Tarleton could plainly perceive, in the brilliant, steel-blue radiance of the spring moon, his simple, good-natured visage.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Ussher nodded gravely by way of a silent commentary on the experiment, and followed his companion into the glade. The unsuspected watcher sprang up and darted to the verge of the protecting shadow cast by the plantation. If it were at all possible, she must hear what else the detective had to say.

"Humph!" he exclaimed, thoughtfully, "so far the thing is feasible. But you told me that this—this female was closely muffled. How, then, could you see her features?"

"That was not difficult," rejoined the other, "it was cold, and she evidently wanted to wrap herself up a little more. One end of her wrap was thrown about her neck and face. She drew it off, and flung it round her again. The second woman, the woman of your photograph, who wasn't wrapped up much, helped her with it, and for an instant I could see both of their faces. The smaller woman was quite plump in feature, with a short nose and a pouty sort of mouth."

"Could you," queried the detective, "could you tell what colour her hair was?"

"No," said her companion, "she had a little shawl on over her head, and then the wrap she wore about her was thrown, as I tell you, round her shoulders, and brought, like a veil, across her face. Even when she took the wrap off I couldn't see her hair or her dress. But what struck me was that she was a dumpy, middle-aged, sourish kind of body, between you and me, Mr. Ussher, the spit of my lady."

"Humph!" coughed Mr. Ussher. "Well, I'm obliged to you, I'm sure. It may lead us somewhere, and it may not. But as her ladyship may not be too pleased at this particular female resembling her, you needn't be too free in mentioning the likeness. It's quite sufficient for me to know about it, and I don't want you to come to any loss through me."

"I'm obliged to you for the hint," answered the gamekeeper, a certain anxiety creeping into his tone, "is there anything else I can show you while we're here?"

Mr. Ussher reflected. "No, I think not," he decided, "but tell me, why didn't you follow the women?"

It was the gamekeeper's turn to cough. "Well," he responded, "fancying I had seen her ladyship in person, I concluded the best thing I could do was to mind my own business and get on to the rabbit-warren."

"Discreet, I own," admitted the detective, "but, from my point of view, regrettably so. However, it can't be helped. Which way did they go?"

The gamekeeper indicated the route, it led towards Groudle Tower. Mr. Ussher noted it critically.

"Well," he observed, "shall we get back?" And he suited the action to the word by commencing to retrace his steps to the plantation. He was bending his course to the very spot whence Lady Tarleton was straining her eyes and ears.

"This is a shorter road, sir," called his companion. Mr. Ussher diverged accordingly, and Lady Tarleton breathed again.

Not until the two men had vanished in the night did she dare to steal out, and make, with the utmost caution, by devious, leafy ways, for the Tower.

TWENTY-FOURTH CHAPTER.

"Quite Possibly Coincidence."

"INDEED, sir, and it's very natural to be interested in murders and such-like, and you a newspaper gentleman and all, they do say. I know I always take care to see the papers myself if there's been a big murder, or some great criminal is being tried for his life."

Paul Jerome smiled. "You are exceptionally candid, Mrs. Linton," he observed, "but I fancy most people are of

(Continued overleaf.)

EXTRACTS FROM TWO OF MANY MEDICAL REPORTS

"This addition to the list of patent foods is a very palatable and appetising article. By a series of digestive processes in vacuo, it is reduced to a form which furnishes a most readily digestible food, remarkable for its pleasant flavour. Experimental usage has proved this Food to be potently alimentive."—Quarterly Medical Journal.

"I have analytically examined Moseleys Food, and find that the relative proportions of carbo-hydrates, hydro-carbon, and proteid constituents are most excellently blended, so as to secure its being well digested by the delicate stomachs of children and invalids."—Dr. ———, F.R.C.S., Bradford.

UNSOLICITED TESTIMONIALS.

(HUNDREDS RECEIVED).

"My child, six months old, has derived great benefit from Moseleys Food. The poor little thing could not retain nourishment, and was daily becoming worse, in fact it was nothing but skin and bone. Moseleys Food was recommended, which I tried and have since used. I feel sure it has saved the little one's life."—Mrs. Ellen Goodwin, 29 Foundry Lane, Hyde. Jan. 9, 1903.

"I have found nothing to beat Moseleys Food. I have four children three brought up on the breast, one on your Food, and the last one has thriven better than the other three."—H. Townsend, 32 Millow Street, Accrington, Lancashire.

"Our last baby has been brought up on your Food from its birth and is now five months old, and the bonniest child we have had."—Edward Dufty, 4 Bradbury Street, Sheffield.

MOSELEYS FOOD Ltd., Sample Dept., Stockport.

Digitized by Google

SERIAL STORY.

your opinion at heart. And so it was here that the poor creature was found dead?"

The housekeeper pushed still wider the door of a small room on the topmost storey of the Tower, and, passing in, drew up to the roller the partially-lowered blind.

The apartment thus flooded with light looked into the central courtyard of the Tower, and was one of a row of servants' bedrooms, each scarcely larger in area than a billiard-table. Its furniture comprised a bed, a toilet-table, a wash-stand, and a single, cane-seated chair. The boards showing between the strips of carpet that diversified the floor of the room were dark with age.

Painfully neat as was the tiny chamber, it had an air of grim and desolate loneliness. Mrs. Lintot, with her rosy, withered cheeks, and sweeping gown, seemed out of place in it.

"Yes, sir," she said, "it is. Not a very homely corner to die in, I'm afraid, but my lady is very seldom here, and Davenal never had a proper room of her own. Not that she would have made it any more comfortable, sir, as some of us do, with nick-nacks, and bits of her own things. There was no sentiment about Hannah Davenal, or Mrs. Hartigan, as I suppose we ought to have called her."

The war-correspondent was examining the lock of the door. "There is no key to this?" he queried.

Mrs. Lintot shook her head.

"It's against the rules of the house for servants to lock their doors," she explained. "I have all the keys of this storey. As it happens, this room was shut up for a little while after the murder, but I soon had it open again, the sight of that locked door made me nervous, and servants are superstitious enough, always. I'm going to have the place turned into a box-room, no one will ever want to sleep here."

"A very tactful proceeding," said Paul Jerome, absently, and he crossed to the window. It faced the tall and ruined mass of the tower that had given its name to the antique residence, and it was practically inaccessible from without.

The point had not been without interest for him, and he nodded thoughtfully, as if registering a mental memorandum. Then, with a final glance round the little chamber in which so dark and mysterious a tragedy had been consummated, he passed out on to the landing.

Bare, irregular, low-ceiled, and lit by a couple of thick panes set between the huge rafters, it was a curious part of the Tower. The war-correspondent surveyed it—nook by nook.

"Is that the only means of access to these regions?" he inquired, indicating the winding staircase that left the landing at a distant angle, and plunged into the lower portion of the house.

"There is no other way up, sir," responded the housekeeper, closing behind her the door of the apartment from which they had emerged.

Paul Jerome traversed the landing. "Where does this lead?" he asked, peering down a narrow, doorless, dusky archway.

Mrs. Lintot came to his side.

"That is a blind passage, sir," she answered, "in either wall are cupboards—huge and rambling places. We never use them, though they are big enough to sleep in, excepting for the shelves and that they have no windows."

The war-correspondent took a stride into the passage, pulled open one of the ranged doors, and glanced in. As he bent forward to penetrate the gloom, he lost his balance and staggered into the darkness—there was a step before him which he had failed to notice.

"Dear, dear!" cried Mrs. Lintot, hastening to the threshold of the cupboard, "have you hurt yourself, sir?"

Paul Jerome reassured her. He had steadied himself against what he felt to be a tier of shelves, and proceeded to get back into the narrow corridor.

In its less equivocal light his hands attracted his attention they were thickly soiled with fine black dust. He took out his handkerchief and wiped it off. Abruptly he checked the action, contemplating the smeared finger-prints he had made on the white linen.

His lips pursed reflectively as he glanced back towards the cupboard. Again he checked himself, and pushing to the door of the shadowy recess, turned away with a jest at the expense of his grimy fingers.

Mrs. Lintot was apologising for the presence of the dust. "But, indeed, sir," she added, "no one ever troubles about those cupboards, they are unused from year's end to year's end. There must needs be such places in a big old house like this, sir."

"Of course, of course," assented the war-correspondent; "however, I shall be glad to 'wash the filthy witness from my hands,' as Lady Macbeth has it. So I will make for my room. Many thanks for piloting me round."

He slipped a couple of half crowns into the housekeeper's palm, cut short her acknowledgments, and dived downstairs out of the regions he had obtained her assistance in exploring.

Once in his own apartment he did not seem particularly anxious to cleanse his soiled hands. Instead he got out a beautifully laundered handkerchief, and began deliberately to impress his thumb and finger prints upon its snowy surface. Ultimately he had recourse to a magnifying glass and inspected the prints. His expression, as he busied himself in these proceedings, was absorbed to a degree.

At last he did wash his hands in a bowl of cold water, and plucking his bed-room candle from its holder, pocketed it. A hasty reconnaisance, and he stole out of the room, retraced his steps to the upper storey, and darted into the corridor between the rows of unused cupboards. A moment, and he was ensconced in the very cupboard into whose depths he had so unwarily staggered.

The spurt of a match lit the place with the glow of a vesta, he pulled the door to after him, lighted his candle, and examined his surroundings. He was in a species of store closet, reached by a step from the passage without. In it there was space sufficient to permit of his standing upright before a series of deep shelves.

The shelves were an eighth of an inch thick with dust and showed plainly where his clutch at one of them had brushed the wood clear. On a lower shelf, conspicuous in the direct illumination of the candle, were other and similar marks. But these did not show the wood beneath, nor were they clear and sharp. Fresh dust had settled on them, blurring and partially filling the indentations.

Paul Jerome's face fastened upon them and his eyes sparkled. Then he shook his head with a sudden dubiousness.

"Quite possibly coincidence," he muttered; "the murderer may have hidden here, and he may have tripped down that step as I did. He may have clutched at the shelf as I did, and as I did, left his sign-manual in the dust. But so—bar the hiding—might any one of a dozen innocent persons; a new and curious housemaid, for instance."

He shook his head, put his foot on the step, and made as if to blow out the candle.

"And yet," he said, "those marks on my handkerchief, grey, uneven, powdery, unmistakably suggested the prints on the pillow that was used to smother the chloroformed Davenal."

His soliloquy was interrupted. The door had a lock, and the lock a projecting, box-like case. About the lock, on the light green paint, exceptionally well preserved, of the door frame, were the prints of ranged finger tips.

The war-correspondent examined them. Then he opened the door and inspected the frame without—it was clean and unsoiled. He returned to his examination of the interior. The finger-marks had evidently been left by the hands of someone grasping the edges of the lock-case, as if to hold it to.

Some pressure had been used, and the formation of the skin-ridges peculiar to the tips of the human thumb and fingers was perfectly reproduced. Paul Jerome studied them for five minutes. At the expiration of that time he blew out his light and went back to his room.

Digitized by Google

Short as had been his occupation of this apartment, he had already transformed it into a species of "den." A small portmanteau full of manuscript and miscellaneous papers lay open on the bed, a metal ashbowl and a cigar-case stood on the toilet table, hard by a collapsible tube of paste.

Near the table was a folding deck chair, with the war-correspondent's initials painted on it, and a big blotting book thrown down in the seat of it. In an adjoining corner lay a pile of London "dailies."

Paul Jerome displaced the blotting book, pulled the deck chair to the corner, and commenced to burrow in the heap of newspapers. After hastily scanning several copies of a particular journal, he picked up, with an exclamation of satisfaction, a loose sheet of the same paper, a London "halfpenny morning" famous for its enterprising interest in criminology.

The sheet he had fished up was an illustrated one, and among its contents bore a couple of photographic reproductions. Each represented a set of finger-prints, and beneath them was a bold inscription—

THE GROUDLE TOWER MURDER.

How the Mysterious Husband's Innocence was Established.

HARTIGAN'S FINGER-PRINTS AND THOSE FROM THE PILLOW.

The war-correspondent sought out a penknife, cut away the illustration, and stuck it on to a piece of blank paper. Then he marched off with his candle and the piece of paper to the topmost storey.

Entering the windowless cupboard that he had submitted to so curious an examination, he set down the candle on the ledge, and applied to the finger-prints on the door-frame a portion of the paper he had brought with him. He took the precaution to damp it, and laying it cautiously against the soiled paint, he rubbed it lightly with the smooth end of a vulcanite fountain-pen.

Completing this extempore transfer process, he removed the paper. It bore a clear copy of the prints on the frame. He compared them with the newspaper copy of those found on the pillow. They were to all appearances identical.

Paul Jerome's face was grave as he extinguished the candle and carried off the sheet of paper upon which he had set up a parallel so deadly and yet so futile. For the discovery he had made could not be said to throw any definite light upon the problem that the war-correspondent, piqued into action by certain puzzling circumstances, had finally determined to solve.

TWENTY-FIFTH CHAPTER.

"Guy is Sweet on Her."

"CAN you spare me a moment, Edward?"

Edward Stormont arrested the progress of his steadily-travelling pen and looked up at the speaker. Lady Tarleton had come noiselessly into the library where he sat at work.

"Certainly, Adeline," he said; "I am quite at your service." He laid his penholder on the rack of the silver inkstand before him and waited.

Lady Tarleton sat down.

"I wanted to ask," she went on, "if you are likely to be staying at the Tower much longer before going south."

The explorer twisted his moustache, he was endeavouring to concentrate his mind upon the question thus abruptly presented for consideration.

"I can hardly say," he decided; "you see, I began to make notes for my new travel book, and note-making drifted into writing. And though, as you know, I am far from partial to the Tower as a place of residence, yet I have all my specimens and diaries here and unpacked, and the writing fit seems to have come on me. So, on the whole, I fancy I shall not leave Groudle for a month or more."

He glanced inquiringly at his sister-in-law's face; it bore a far from pleased expression.

"But don't let me interfere with your movements," he pursued. "That business about your unfortunate maid will

(Continued overleaf.)

A Woman's Life Prolonged.

Bile Beans Cure Headache, Nausea, and Debility.

Disorders of the digestive system and liver are so common and give rise to so many painful symptoms that the following facts, told by Mrs. J. Philip, of Warren Street, Fitzroy Square, London, N.W., cannot but prove useful to many readers. Said Mrs. Philp:—"Some months ago I began to experience severe pain in my head, accompanied by sensations of ringing and buzzing. Afterwards I became dizzy at short intervals, and I had all sorts of curious sensations, difficult to describe, while at times my sight became so blurred I could scarcely see. After a while to this torture was added an inability to keep food down. If I took a cup of tea in the mornings this would start sickness and vomiting, which made my head almost burst with pain. Then my appetite declined, and I became very weak and hopeless, and felt altogether knocked up.

I consulted three doctors in succession. One told me my condition was the outcome of worry and being indoors too much. Another said I had had my system impaired by cold and so on. All gave me various medicines, but none succeeded in making me the least bit better. I had been suffering between three and four months in the way described, and was still getting worse, when the wife of a friend of ours happened to call and express great enthusiasm about Bile Beans, which she said had worked a wonderful cure in her case. This friend pressed me hard to try them, so I sent for a box. You could scarcely imagine now the condition I was in at that time or realise what a marvellous change Bile Beans have made in me. They cleared away the headache and noises quickly, made me feel in the best of spirits, brought back my appetite, my flesh, and clearness of skin, in fact they have now built me up into quite a healthy happy woman. How many I've taken I can't tell you as I've given a lot away. They are so wonderful a medicine I can't resist giving them to anyone I see suffering, and I know I've done a lot of good in making them known.

There is an old lady neighbour of ours who is nearly eighty, and who would doubtless have been in her grave now but for my giving her some Bile Beans. She was very low down, and now she's so cheerful she seems likely to be among us for years yet."

Bile Beans for Biliousness are an absolute cure for headache, debility, indigestion, biliousness, weakness, liver and kidney disorders, constipation, piles, anæmia, and all female ailments. Bile Beans may be had of all medicine vendors, but insist on seeing the full name: Bile Beans for Biliousness.

Miss MARIE TEMPEST says:—

"I have used your EUGOL TOOTH POWDER for some time, and I consider it the most delightful preparation ever brought before the public." A bottle of Eugol Liquid Dentifrice, also box of powder or paste, post free for 2s. 6d., with plan for return of your 2s. 6d. for four minutes' easy work.

EUGOL CO., 52 Berwick Street, LONDON, W.

SULPHOLINE LOTION.

For clearing the Skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

Digitized by Google

SERIAL STORY.

probably never come to a trial. I suspect that the police have no real clue to go upon. If they do secure a capture, there will, of course, be a hearing at petty sessions before the trial proper, and you will have to come north for that. But I should not, if I were you, tie myself here to avoid what is an improbable journey. As for me, Lintot will see that I don't starve."

"And Mr. Jerome," queried Lady Tarleton, drily.

The explorer suppressed a smile.

"Jerome is settling down on to a book also," said Edward Stormont, "or so I understand. He is to republish his war-correspondence, with notes and a preface. So both of us will be able to work quietly and entertain one another between times. Though if both you and Irene flit he may not elect to stay." And the explorer chuckled.

Lady Tarleton frowned. "I prefer that he should," she retorted; "Irene is quite sufficiently enamoured of muscle and daring as it is. She might get into a dangerously silly mood if this soldier-scribbler went on making eyes at her. And, as you know, she is practically betrothed to Guy Vanbrugh."

"Is she," said Edward Stormont; "well, my dear Adeline, marry your daughter to please yourself. If I had a daughter, and Jerome took a fancy to her, I should give them both my blessing. He is a sterling good fellow, and could be trusted to retain permanently both a woman's love and respect. Not that I've a word to say against Guy. I wish I had a son like him. If Irene were mine she should choose for herself."

He shook a pile of manuscript into order, noting slyly the dark sneer that crossed his sister-in-law's features.

"But a truce to these romantic problems," he added. "I shall stay on at Groudle and keep Jerome, if he will let me. Yet you must consider yourself free to get back to town, or, if you like that better, abroad. But I'll wager you, should Jerome be really in earnest about Irene he will haunt her in London or Paris as easily as here."

The explorer laughed mischievously, and Lady Tarleton shrugged her shoulders. "That is as it may be," she rejoined, "but I don't think I shall remain at Groudle, for many reasons."

"I shall be sorry to lose you," said Edward Stormont politely, "but no doubt we shall soon meet in London, especially if Jerome decides not to give me his company."

Lady Tarleton's brows knitted, but she evaded further discussion of the subject.

"I am not certain precisely when I shall return to town," she answered, "but probably it will be within the next few days. Groudle has completely got on my nerves."

Her brother-in-law rose to open the door for her. Then for the first time, he noticed her pale cheeks and drawn features.

"By Jove," he exclaimed, "I believe you are right. You are looking quite hipped and off-colour. And yet I'll be sworn a morning's shopping in town would pull you round. How you women do miss your beloved Bond Street. But there, to speak seriously, Davenal's death must have given you rather a nasty shock."

"Bond Street and Davenal apart," said Lady Tarleton coldly, "Cumberland has never suited me. I haven't Irene's rude health or your cast-iron constitution. Well, the afternoon is slipping away, and I will leave you to your work."

With a glance at the clock on the mantel, Lady Tarleton quitted the library, and directed her steps towards her boudoir.

At the foot of the stairs she came face to face with her daughter. Irene was dressed in the hard felt hat and dark habit of the English horsewoman, and she was singing a snatch of her song about the Scottish gentleman who went to war and returned home again to his lady love.

Her mother barred her way, to regard her disapprovingly.

"Irene," she remarked, "I wish you wouldn't sing about the house—it is so school-girlish. And, by-the-bye, you may be interested to know that we go back to town shortly. Your uncle will probably remain with this newspaper friend of his. But I must get home to Portland Place and civilised society."

She had fired her bolt with characteristic suddenness and brutality, and, with a cruel little smile, passed on. But she had marked the swift pallor that whitened momentarily the roses of Irene's cheeks. They flushed again, slightly, and Irene herself pursued her own way in a stern assumption of indifference. But her step was slower and nothing more was heard of the song with which she had begun the descent of the stair.

"The little fool cares for him," muttered Lady Tarleton, "or, what is as bad, she thinks she does. I must cut that knot, and, if possible, get Guy to town, away from——"

She stopped, reflected an instant, and turned from the stair-foot to the hall-door. It was open, and Irene had just mounted the tall brown hack—the groom was about to spring to his own saddle. Lady Tarleton went to her daughter's stirrup.

"Irene," she said, "you might ride round by the Close and ask Guy to dine with us before we go to town. Say to-morrow, or even to-night."

Irene gathered up her reins.

"I'm not going that way, mamma," she replied calmly, "and yet, as it happens, I am bound on Guy's business, something he asked me to do. You will have to find another messenger."

Lady Tarleton's face relaxed.

"Oh," she observed tolerantly, "may I ask the nature of your commission?"

"I am going to pay a call," said her daughter, "on a little protégée of his—the girl who did that beautiful piano-screen. She is quite an artist, Guy says, and we ought to take an interest in her, for she is actually a niece of poor Davenal's. I set this afternoon apart to go and see her."

She bent from her saddle to add a subdued sentence.

"As a matter of fact," she said, "I believe Guy is sweet on her, if the truth were told."

And having, with this stab, paid her mother handsomely, Irene shook her hack into a trot and rode off before Lady Tarleton could reply.

A sinister cloud settled on her mother's features. Lady Tarleton was looking across the park in the direction of the glade where, within sight of the Lennox mausoleum, she had held a certain grim colloquy with Dennis Hartigan.

TWENTY-SIXTH CHAPTER.

"That Name was Moira."

"How clever you are! Do you know, Miss Davena, if I were not going back to London any day now, I should ask you to give me some lessons."

Irene Tarleton laid down the pieces of finished and unfinished ribbon-work she had been examining, and glanced about her.

"What a quaint, delightful room," she said, "this is the sort of place that I should like to live in. Some day, when I am my own mistress, I am going to have a cottage in the country and spend no end of time there, far from London seasons and scandal, and shopping, and all the things that one is supposed to live for."

"I—I should be very glad to show you how to do the ribbon-work," answered Moira gravely, passing over the other's outburst of confidence; "it is very easy—all but the designs, and most people prefer to buy those."

Her visitor laughed and gathered up the folds of a voluminous habit.

"I'm afraid," Moira was told, "that I really should not have the patience to learn to do it really well, Miss Davenal, and I hate to botch things. So possibly it is just as fortunate I am not staying in Groudle. But I'm glad to have met you, I'm sure. If you can design like that, you ought to be painting

(Continued on page 604.)

Digitized by Google

ALFOSCO REG.

Call or Write.

Allen Foster & Co

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

47 GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

BUY DIRECT AT FIRST COST FROM THE LEADING FIRM OF LONDON MANUFACTURERS.

Call or Write

ALFOSCO REG.

Design No. 899 10/6

Design No 899. 10/6.

New Style. Costume with tight-fitting back, pouch front, made in ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'s new Zibeline Cloth, also in their Specialite Serge and Venetian Cloth. Colours: Navy, Royal, Green, Oxford, Fawn, Brown, Purple, Light Grey, Dark Grey, Black, etc. Stylish Costume with bell sleeves, tastefully trimmed fancy braid. Bell-shaped Skirt. Wonderful value for 10/6. Sent carriage paid, 6d. ex. Skirt alone, only 5/6; carriage 5d.

WRITE FOR OUR NEW SKETCH BOOK AND Catalogue of Bargains Containing hundreds of Illustrations of Latest Novelties for the Summer Season, Sent with Patterns, post free. Call or write.

4/11 4/11

Design No. 1019. 4/11.

Costume Skirt in good-wearing Black and Navy Serge, trimmed two flounces and braid; lined throughout linenette. Price only 4/11, carriage 5d. In ordering, give length of skirt in front and size of waist. Post orders receive prompt attention. Every lady should see Allen Foster & Co.'s New Illustrated Catalogue of Skirts, Blouses, Corsets, Underskirts, &c., sent post free.

Design No. 456. 13/9.

Stylish Costume. Special value for 13/9. The bodice has a blouse front with tight-fitting back and is lined throughout; trimmed tucks, silk strappings and small buttons. Skirt also trimmed tucks, silk and buttons to match bodice. Made in ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'s new Zibeline Cloth (a material with a silky surface and carrying a splash effect), or in their world-renowned Specialite Serge or Venetian Cloth, all colours. Patterns post free. Price only 13/9; sent carriage paid 6d. extra. In sending order please give bust measurement under arms, length of sleeve, size of waist, and length of skirt in front.

LOWEST LONDON PRICES. UP-TO-DATE STYLES

Design No. 456 13/9

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,

47 GOLDEN LANE, BARBICAN, LONDON, E.C.

SEAWEED AS A MEDICINE

Its Marvellous Effect upon the

STOMACH, LIVER, KIDNEYS AND BLOOD

SEAWEED possesses a natural strengthening, healing, and purifying power, infinitely greater than ordinary medicines. This is now regarded as conclusive by eminent authorities, who recommend it daily, since Veno's Seaweed Tonic was first introduced.

A pure palatable extract of Seaweed is one of the principal ingredients of Veno's Seaweed Tonic. This remedy excels in the cure of INDIGESTION, WIND, HEADACHE, NERVOUS COMPLAINTS, KIDNEY TROUBLES, WEAK AND PAINFUL BACK, TORPID LIVER, FEMALE TROUBLES, POORNESS OF BLOOD, and "HABITUAL CONSTIPATION." Its most brilliant effect is produced in Stomach, Liver, and Kidney Troubles. The remarkable cures Veno's Seaweed Tonic effects even in the worst cases is positive proof of its great therapeutic value.

Ask for VENO'S SEAWEED TONIC, 1/1½ and 2/9 per bottle, at Chemists and Drug Stores.

FREE TRIAL BOTTLES. A free trial bottle of either Veno's Seaweed Tonic or Veno's Lightning Cough Cure, and a free copy of "The People's Medical Instructor," an indispensable treatise on diseases for the household, a complete family doctor in itself, will be sent to any address on receipt of 3d. for postage from THE VENO DRUG CO., Hulme, Manchester, Eng.

BORAX

Extract of Soap

To the woman who tries it for the first time, the superiority of Borax Extract of Soap comes as a pleasing revelation. Whether used for washing clothes or for house-cleaning it proves itself so much better—both in effectiveness and labour-saving—than anything ever used before, that its regular use is assured.

The fact that thousands of commonsense women will have none other is convincing proof of its merit.

Try it in your spring clean.

Sold at usual dry soap prices by Grocers, Oilmen, and Stores everywhere.

FREE SAMPLE PACKET & SOME NOVELTIES if you name this Paper and your Grocer.

BY SPECIAL APPOINTMENT MAKERS TO THE KING.

The Patent Borax Co. Ltd., Birmingham

instead of doing fancy-work. Guy says you're a born artist, and now I've seen you I believe him."

Moira blushed.

"Sir Guy doesn't judge my work very critically, I fear, Miss Tarleton," she responded evasively, "but it was kind of you to come and see me. Sir Guy told me about you when he ordered the piano-screen, and I took quite an interest in doing it for you."

Irene's eyes sparkled.

"Oh," she said, "and what did he tell you about me? That I am a tom-boy and knockabout, trying to pretend I'm not grown up? That he and I have always been the best of friends, till our people wanted to make us something more, and we decided we knew better than they did? That I have a designing mother whom I have to bully unmercifully and that, as a consequence, I am in perpetual hot water? Did he tell you all this?"

"Miss—Miss Tarleton," stammered Moira, but Irene only laughed the more.

"Oh, it would all have been true," she said; "however, I suppose I mustn't take it for granted he was quite so confidential. Good-bye, for the present," she added, "the world is a small place, and I have a presentiment we shall see more of one another. I think you and I would get on famously."

Moira accepted the extended hand—it clasped hers warmly. Then, with a nod, and a little wave of her whip, Irene stepped out of Hawthorn Cottage to mount and ride off, her groom at her heels. She looked back to smile and nod again at the girlish figure that had followed her to the garden wicket.

As Moira stood, pondering the significance of Irene Tarleton's conspicuous friendliness, some one passed before her. She glanced up, saw Dennis Hartigan, and retreated. He entered the wicket, throwing away the end of a strongly-smelling cigar.

"Well," he inquired, "and how is the dad?"

"Getting on nicely," said Moira; "I will ask nurse if he is to have any visitors to-day."

The ex-steward checked her with a gesture as she went towards the cottage.

"Never mind," he answered, "I didn't come to see John—it's you I want a chat with."

Moira had gained the threshold of the little hall; she paused and the vaguely repellent air with which she had addressed him became more marked.

"I'm afraid I'm rather busy, Mr. Hartigan," she said; "you see I am dad's housekeeper, and while he is ill I have a great deal to do. The nurse is very kind, of course, but nurses have to be made comfortable."

Dennis Hartigan lounged on the step of the cottage, fingering his peaked cap.

"You're dad's housekeeper, are you," he repeated; "now that's not as true as it would be if you put it another way. You are John Davenal's housekeeper, and I'll be bound you're a good as well as a pretty one. But you don't keep house for your dad, because——"

He stooped to peer into her face.

"Because," he said, "John Davenal isn't your father, and well he knows it. And you know it, too," he added slowly, "or so I understood from John when he and I had a chat a day or two ago. But there's something you don't know—something you went diving the other evening near the breakwater to try and find out."

Moira was gazing at him with wide, penetrating eyes. Perceiving, by instinct, the ex-steward to be coarse, brutal, and dissipated, she had disliked him from the first, and to discover him on a sudden intimately acquainted with her and her doings troubled and bewildered her.

"I don't see," she parried, "how you can tell what I know or what I don't. And if dad told you more than he has told me, he has reasons for it, and I prefer to wait until he chooses to tell me what there is to tell himself."

Dennis Hartigan made a grimace.

"There are things John Davenal isn't certain of," he said, "and it's those that touch the heart of the matter."

"Then how do you know them if he doesn't?" queried Moira bluntly.

The ex-steward grinned.

"I didn't say I did know them," he rejoined, "but I'm a rare hand at piecing a tangled skein. And, besides, there's such a thing as a lucky hint. By chance I've lighted on a track that may lead us to the truth. Come here."

He beckoned her out of the porch, and from the step of the cottage pointed to a barque lying in the outer bay. Her sails were shaken out and the blue peter, the signal of her approaching departure on a voyage, was flying at her fore.

"In that ship," said the ex-steward, regarding her with a fierce craftiness out of the corner of a bloodshot eye, "there is a sailor, booked for a trip to Valparaiso—the barque sails in an hour or two. This morning he is probably sober, last night he was drunk—drunk at the Half Brick Inn, where I was having some supper. When the wine is in, boys, then the wit is out."

Moira looked at the speaker with a kind of impatience.

"Well," she asked.

Hartigan laid a hand on hers.

"Now I've found out what set you diving by the breakwater," he pursued; "it was Kit—I know that yarn of hers about the drunken sailor and his 'This is out far enough—over with it.' Though what made either you or John connect that with your arrival in Groudle I don't know."

Moira's face showed him that he had hit some part of the target at which he had aimed. He tapped her hand significantly.

"My drunken sailor," he said, "was, it appears, all one with Kit's, and thanks to his loose jaws and the Half Brick liquor I can tell you what was thrown over—a little coffin, empty, and with a name on it. That name was Moira."

"Yes, yes," exclaimed Moira, breathlessly "but what else—Moira who?"

Hartigan shook his head.

"That's what I couldn't get out of him," he said, "but you might have better luck—sailors have a weakness for a pretty face. I did try to see him again this morning, but he had gone aboard and his ship is on the point of sailing. How would it be if——"

He stole another anxious glance at her.

"If I was to run you aboard of her," he added; "for—half an hour?"

(To be continued.)

The Art of Beauty.

By A TOILET SPECIALIST.

Crown 8vo, Cloth, Price 1s., post free 1s. 2d.

Some of the Seventeen Chapters are:

The Cure of Stoutness—The Cure of Leanness—The Figure—Bad Complexions, How to Cure Them—The Hair in Ill-health—Moles, Warts, and Superfluous Hair.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

To the Book Publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, W.C.
Please forward me a copy of "THE ART OF BEAUTY," for which I inclose the sum of one shilling and twopence.

Name .....

Address .....

.....

Digitized by Google

"Dont's for the Deaf."

The things that deaf people should avoid are well summed up in a few brief hints entitled "Dont's for the Deaf," part of an article on "Hygiene of the Ear," contained in the latest number of the "Review of Ear, Nose and Throat Diseases." Turning the leaves of this popular magazine one finds also much of interest in the way of general information on deafness and different forms of catarrh. The routine treatment of the aural specialist comes in for much criticism, and new methods are thoroughly discussed, preference being given to the new treatment based on outward applications behind the ears. This treatment, the Drouet method, which can be applied at home, is said to have effected a large number of cures in cases where other methods failed. Those who are interested in the subject can obtain a copy of the "Review of Ear, Nose and Throat Diseases," free by post, by addressing the Editor, Drouet Institute, 10 Marble Arch, London, W. Another special feature of the "Review" is the enclosure of a Patient's Report Form, for the benefit of those who wish advice, for which no fee is charged if given by correspondence.

The Editor advises patients, however, whenever possible, to visit the Drouet Institute for a personal consultation with the medical staff. Consulting hours are, in the morning, 10 to 12, and in the afternoon, 2 to 4, week days only. A fee of five shillings is charged for personal consultations.

Rupture Free Cure.

Wonderful Home Treatment that Cures Without Pain or Loss of Time.

Dr. W. S. Rice (Dept. 953), 8 & 9, Stonecutter Street, London, E.C., has invented a method that cures rupture without pain, danger, operation, or an hour's loss of time from the day's work. To avoid all questions of doubt, he sends free to every sufferer a free trial of his method, and there can be no earthly reason why anyone, rich or poor, should not avail themselves of this generous offer. As an instance of this remarkable method, the cure of Mr. John Foulkes, 317, Beaufort Street, Toxteth Park, Liverpool, is well worth noticing. Mr. Foulkes is 74 years of age, and had suffered from a scrotal rupture for nine years. He used Dr. Rice's home method of treatment, and in a short time was cured sound as a bell. A full description and sample of this remarkable method of cure will be gladly sent upon application. It has cured thousands. Do not hesitate to give it a trial. Write at once—to day.

Mr. J. FOULKES.

COMPLEXION AND HAIR.

We receive, from day to day, many letters from readers asking us how to clear the complexion of Blackheads, Freckles, Tan, Redness, etc. The most marvellous preparation that we know of is "PERALIA," manufactured by the "Peralia" Perfumery Co. of North Shields. This wonderful liquid, while it instantly beautifies the complexion, and removes all obnoxious excrescences, such as pimples and blotches, is perfectly harmless, and its purity is guaranteed by a well-known medical man, whose certificate accompanies each bottle. Besides acting on the above, "PERALIA," by frequent application, will remove wrinkles, crow's feet, and, in fact, entirely rejuvenate the features. This is due to its penetrating action, as it makes its way through the pores of the skin, exerting its beneficial effect on each and every one, and cleansing it effectually from dirt, callous growth, and decayed tissue. "PERALIA" is, in our opinion, the only beauty specific that does its work in such a thorough and scientific manner. It is the most successful remedy we have to aid us in the fight against the ravages of either Time or Disease. If you feel that your beauty is waning, or that fine complexion being marred by disfiguring humours, you should at once have recourse to "PERALIA."

We cannot speak too highly of this preparation. Readers can obtain it of all chemists, in bottles, at 1s., 1s. 6d., and 2s. 6d., but the proprietors offer to send a sample bottle, under cover, on receipt of the price, and 3d. postage.

In conclusion we must say a word for their unique preparation "CRIMPOLINE" for curling the hair. Most women, and all young girls are extremely anxious about their hair being trim, and yet having that graceful curly appearance that is so attractive. Unlike other curling fluids, "CRIMPOLINE" is not sticky, nor greasy, and curls the hair so much that once the hair becomes curly you need not continue using it. The rain does not take the curl out of the hair either after using "CRIMPOLINE," so you need not fear that washed-out, bedraggled look again.

It is used and recommended by Madame Patti, Vesta Tilley, Minnie Palmer, etc. Prices, 1s. 9d. and 2s. 6d. per bottle. When sending for, or ordering, "PERALIA," we advise you also to send for "CRIMPOLINE." Don't forget the address, "PERALIA" PERFUMERY CO., Dept. 14, Camden Street, North Shields.

ZOX for Neuralgia at Any Time.

GIVES INSTANT RELIEF TO HEADACHE, TOOTHACHE, NERVE PAINS

Any Sufferer Sending Stamped Addressed Envelope May Try Zox FREE.

Neuralgia is a Disease of the Nerves, and most commonly attacks the nerves of the face. Its presence is announced by the most piercing darting pains, recurring in paroxysms, followed with brief intervals of relief; but hardly a moment elapses after a lacerating pain darts along the course of the affected nerve ere another shoots forth, inflicting pain equally distressing to the patient. The annexed cut presents in the prominent lines the nerves of the fifth branch, which are most liable to attacks of Neuralgia. All who suffer from this terrible pain, or from Headache, Toothache, or nerve pains generally, will be glad to know of ZOX, a Simple, Safe and easy Remedy certified free from injurious substance by no less an authority than Dr. A. B. Griffiths, F.R.S. The Proprietors offer to send Two Free Sample Powders to any reader of "Short Stories," who will send them a stamped addressed envelope.

ZOX is sold by Chemists, &c., at 1s. and 2s 6d. per box, or can be had post free from

THE ZOX COMPANY, 11 Hatton Garden, London, E.C.

"In pain? Try ZOX."

Digitized by Google

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(CLOTTED).

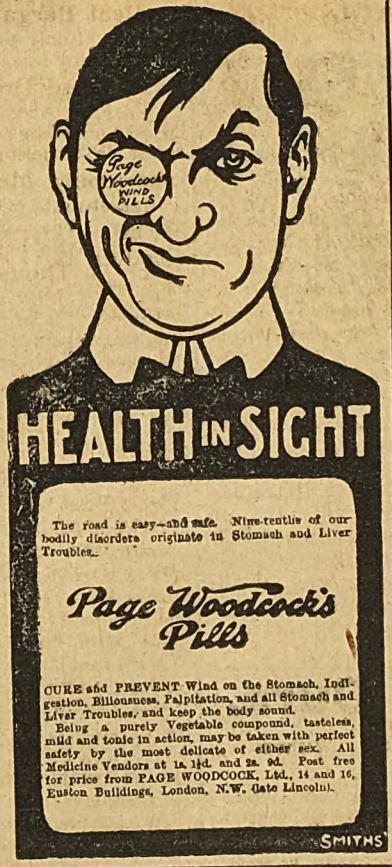
Absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil; invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1/4, 1lb. 2/4; 2lbs. 4/4, free; supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard-Bishop, Devon.

From Factory

to Rider.

How Does This Suit You?

Handsomest & Best of Cycles right away after payment Month's Instalment—or Deposit—as you wish. £14 14s Grade for £6 10s Write, H Dept, Williams' Direct Supply Mfg. Co., 12 Approach, London Bridge, London.



HEALTH IN SIGHT

The road is easy—and safe. Nine-tenths of our bodily disorders originate in Stomach and Liver Troubles.

Page Woodcock's Pills

CURE and PREVENT Wind on the Stomach, Indigestion, Biliousness, Palpitation, and all Stomach and Liver Troubles, and keep the body sound.

Being a purely Vegetable compound, tasteless, mild and tonic in action, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex. All Medicine Vendors at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Post free for price from PAGE WOODCOCK, Ltd., 14 and 16, Euston Buildings, London, N.W. (late Lincoln).

SMITHS

GIVEN AWAY

with this week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 486).

Paper Pattern OF THIS

GIRL'S SMOCKED BLOUSE

(10—12).

Of all Bookstalls & Newsagents.

PRICE 1d.

SPECIAL BARGAINS

ANY SENT ON APPROVAL WILLINGLY.

SAVE £ d $

GENT'S 18-ct. Gold-cased KEYLESS HUNTER, jewelled movement, lever balance, exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; sacrifice, 10/6; approval willingly.

